Early in 1860 he left Springfield for Edinburgh, Scotland, and remained at its celebrated university for a period of six months, going from there to London, and thence to Paris. The firing upon Fort Sumter brought him home with other Americans, and he at once went into the volunteer service as surgeon of the 18th Massachusetts Infantry, and joined the Army of the Potomac. He was soon promoted to be brigade surgeon, and ordered to report to Gen. George H. Thomas, reaching him immediately after the battle of Fishing Creek, Ky.

He was soon gazetted as medical director of his column, and went with Gen. Thomas through the campaign ending with the occupation of Corinth, doing arduous service at the battle of Pittsburg Landing (Shiloh). Being very ill after the occupation of Corinth, he came East on sick-leave; but, meeting intelligence of the disastrous campaign of McClellan on the Chickahominy, he at once reported for duty, and was put in charge of Fairfax Seminary Hospital, near Alexandria, Va.

Although at times detached on other duty, he was in charge of this hospital nearly the whole time, and closed it at the end of the war, retiring from the service with the brevet rank of lieutenant-colonel.

Returning to Springfield, he engaged actively in the practice of his profession until 1872, when he made another voyage to Europe, accompanied by his wife and boy, his farthest objective point being Vienna. Returning in 1873, he lost his only child, a bereavement which shadowed his whole life.*

In 1873 he accepted the appointment of Professor of the Theory and Practice of Medicine in Yale College, which chair he held until 1877, when he was unanimously transferred to the chair of Surgery, which double appointment, in a remarkable degree, recalled the fact that his grandfather, Nathan Smith, was Professor of Physic in the same institution from 1813 to his death, in 1829.

In 1878 he was, in addition to his other duties, appointed lecturer upon Medical Jurisprudence. He is at the present time vice-president of the Massachusetts Medical Society, post surgeon of the United States Armory in Springfield, president of the board of examiners for pensions, and medical director of the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Company.

The most striking natural characteristic of Dr. Smith is a marvelous quickness of comprehension and correctness of diagnosis, joined with an intuitive knowledge of the probabilities and possibilities of his case. The absorbed personality, the introspection of the man, at times causes him to think aloud, and his patients and their friends get the benefit of his thoughts, while he may be wholly unconscious of the fact. He is quick in his conclusions and rapid and skillful in his operations, bold in action as original in conception, dauntless to the verge of audacity. He possesses a firm hand and steady nerve, united with great endurance, has the most minute knowledge of the human anatomy, and his eye is never at fault. These remarkable qualities, united in perfect combination, constitute him the eminent physician and surgeon which he is.

Before closing our account of the family, it would be well, for a moment, to advert to the sons of Nathan Smith.

PROFESSOR N. R. SMITH, of Baltimore, Md. This gentleman early showed the same remarkable traits of character which distinguished his father. Commencing his career in Burlington, Vt., as Professor of Surgery in the State University, he soon after moved to Philadelphia, where, for a short period, he occupied the chair of Professor of Anatomy in Jefferson Medical College. After a year or two spent in that city, having been appointed Professor of Surgery in the University of Maryland, he removed to Baltimore, where, for about fifty years, he, in a wide and ample field, carried out many of the suggestions and elaborated many of the half-finished procedures of his father. For this period of time he unquestionably occupied the foremost place in the profession of surgery throughout the entire South, visiting, professionally, nearly every Southern State.

It is curious to see that in his many operations for lithotomy, and in his apparatus for fractures, he appears to have taken up the unfinished work of his father and carried it to the last degree of usefulness.

Wonderfully successful in his operations for stone, in his treatment of fractures, and in his ligations of the large arteries, he has left behind him a reputation which will probably never in this country be surpassed.

Another son of Dr. Nathan Smith was JOHN D. SMITH, who studied for the ministry at New Haven and Andover, and graduated at Yale in 1832. He ministered for several years in Charlemont, Franklin Co., and subsequently studied medicine. He represented that town in the Legislature.*

DR. JOSHUA FROST was born in Fryeburg, Maine, in 1767. He came of English stock. His grandfather, Samuel Frost, was one of three brothers who came from England at a very early date and settled, one in Maine, one in New Hampshire, and one in Massachusetts.

He studied at Hanover, N. H., where he probably graduated, though we have been unable to determine this fact. He settled in Longmeadow about 1795, and after a short time removed to Springfield, where he practiced until his death, in 1832. For many years he was also engaged in the drug business in connection with Dr. Daniel Chauncey Brewer. He was an eminent physician, and held many offices of honor and trust in a civil capacity, among others, that of State Senator.

His first wife was Sarah Lombard, of Springfield. After her death he married Mrs. Watson, a widow, of Hartford, Conn. His residence stood on ground now occupied by the opera-house.

DR. GEORGE FROST, son of the preceding, was born in Longmeadow in 1800. He read medicine with Dr. Nathan Smith for seven years, and accompanied that noted practitioner on his lecturing tours. He attended lectures at Yale College, and commenced practice in Springfield in 1823. He became an excellent surgeon, and practiced his profession until a short time previous to his death, which occurred in 1846.

He was a capable and faithful student, and his close application to his studies resulted unfavorably to a constitution never remarkable for vigor, and eventually developed pulmonary difficulties which terminated his life in the prime of his manhood. He was a member of the Unitarian Church in Springfield. His widow, Caroline A., daughter of Col. Roswell Lee, is living in Springfield, the last of her family.

Their son, George L. Frost, removed some years since to Madison, Wis., where he became prominent in the legal profession, and was a member of both houses of the State Legislature. He died in February, 1879, at the age of forty-eight years.

In this connection it may not be improper to speak briefly of Col. Roswell Lee, the father of Mrs. Frost.

Col. Lee was born in Canaan, Columbia Co., N. Y., in 1777. He early developed remarkable military taste and talent, and was for some time during the war of 1812-15 in command of Fort Griswold, at New London, Conn. He was also stationed at Sacket's Harbor, on Lake Ontario, for a short time. He held the office of major in the militia before that war. In 1815 he was placed in charge of the Springfield Arsenal, where he remained until his death, in 1834, at the age of fifty-seven years.

Mrs. Frost remembers her father as a man of magnificent physique,—every inch a soldier.† His son, Henry Washington Lee, was first Episcopal bishop of Iowa, which office he held at the time of his death, in 1875. Col. Lee was a prominent member of the Masonic fraternity. Roswell Lee Lodge, in Springfield, was named in his honor. The family is connected with the Virginia family of the same name.

DR. SAMUEL KINGSBURY was born in Tolland, Conn., in 1782. He attended medical lectures, but did not have the advantages of a collegiate course. His father was in ordinary circumstances, and he was obliged to depend upon his own exertions. He came to Springfield when quite young and engaged in practice, rising rapidly in his profession. His practice, which eventually grew to important proportions, extended over a period of some fifteen years or more, from about 1810 to 1828.

He married Mrs. Jemima Chapin, widow of Charles P. Lyman, who survived her husband until Jan. 20, 1846. Dr. Kingsbury died in June, 1828, at the early age of forty-six years, leaving a wife and seven children to mourn his loss. His children consisted of four sons and three daughters. During his residence in Springfield he lived in State Street.

DR. JOSEPH HENSHAW FLINT was born in Leicester, Worcester Co., Mass., April 20, 1786, and died at his father's house in Leicester, Nov. 11, 1846. He was the son of Austin Flint, who was also a physician, and graduated at Harvard.

He commenced practice in Petersham, where he married his first wife. After a few years he removed to Northampton, where he remained until about 1837, when he removed to Springfield and continued the practice of his profession until a short time before his death. He bore the reputation of a skillful surgeon and physician, and was a member of the Massachusetts Medical Association. He married for his second wife Amelia Dwight, of Northampton. Dr. Austin Flint, now of New York, is a son by his first wife.

Dr. Flint had a very extensive individual practice in Northampton, and an important consulting practice throughout the country. For some years Dr. Bela Jones was associated with him as a partner. He was by far the ablest physician of the name before or since his time.

Dr. Flint was one of the original or charter members of the Hampden District Medical Society.

DR. JEFFERSON CHURCH was born in Middlefield, Hampshire Co., Mass., in 1802. He was the son of Green H. Church. His knowledge of medicine was obtained at the Berkshire Medical Institution, from which he graduated in 1825.

His first experience as a practitioner was in the town of Peru, Berkshire Co., where he remained something more than a year, when he removed to Springfield, Mass., where he has since resided. Dr. Church married for his first wife, in 1823, Betsey, daughter of Joseph Little, of Middlefield. She died in 1826. In 1850 he married Eliza Houpt, daughter of Samuel Houpt, a farmer of Herkimer Co., N. Y. In company with Dr. Seeger he edited and published "Tully's Materia Medica" for some time. Dr. Church is a man of great resources, and possesses an extensive knowledge of medicine. At the advanced age of seventy-seven he has given up the practice of his profession, after an experience of fifty years.

DR. EDWIN SEEGER was born at Northampton, Mass., in 1811. His father was a native of Germany, and also a physician, who settled early in the present century. Dr. Seeger graduated from the Jefferson Medical School, of Philadelphia, in 1832, and began practice the same year in Springfield, where he remained until his death, September 26th, at the age of fifty-five years.

The following paragraphs are taken from a notice written by Samuel Bowles at the time of his death, and no doubt truthfully express the estimation in which he was held by the community where he lived:

"He had many noble qualities as a man and a physician,—simplicity, truth, and duty seemed as natural to him as breathing; there was no guile, no falsehood, no qualification in him or his acts. He prescribed for the patient, not for the family or friends. Not knowing how to placate as an art, without brilliant popular gifts, only simple and true to himself and to his knowledge, he never had a large practice; but all respected him, and those who knew him best revered and loved him.

"In all things he was as in his profession,—he saw simply and clearly, reasoned directly, and acted faithfully. He was one of the earliest of our citizens to act with the Abolition and Free-Soil parties, but he was never dogmatic and illiberal in expressing his convictions, though none held to them more firmly or would sacrifice more to sustain them. His religious life was equally positive and equally unobtrusive,—a submission as firm and restful as his devotion to truth and duty was its characteristic,—and carried him through a very painful and trying illness to a peaceful, welcome close.* His disease was an aggravated cancerous affection of the throat, closing its avenues, extending to all the neighboring tissues, and causing terrible sufferings, under which a firm life slowly wasted away. Dr. Seeger was twice married; his first wife was the sister of Mr. Homer Foot, of this city, and his second and surviving one the daughter of John H. White, of Lancaster, N. H., for many years in public life in that State.

"Springfield was but a village when he came to it; for thirty-four years he has lived and ministered among us in the tenderest and most sacred relations, an illustration and an example of intelligent patience, fidelity, truth, duty, and submission such as is rare to find in any community, such as we may all feel proud to have had with us, and such as we should preserve in grateful and honored memory."

Dr. Seeger was a very able man, both as a medical practitioner and writer, and, together with Dr. Jefferson Church, edited and published for some time "Tully's Materia Medica." He is well spoken of by the profession.

DR. C. C. CHAFFEE was born in Saratoga, Saratoga Co., N. Y., on the 28th of August, 1811. His father was a farmer. He studied medicine with Dr. William Atcheson, of Saxton's River, Windham Co., Vt.; who dying at the end of the first year, he went to Utica, N. Y., and finished his preliminary studies with Dr. Patrick McCraith. He graduated at the Vermont Medical College, at Woodstock, Windsor Co., in 1835.

He began the practice of his profession at the little village of Oriskany, in Oneida Co., N. Y., where he remained about one year, and removed to Allegany Co., N. Y., and practiced for ten years. In 1847 he settled in Springfield, Mass., where he has since resided.

In 1854 and 1856 he was elected to the Thirty-fourth and Thirty-fifth Congresses, where he served with fidelity and ability.

In 1836 he married Clara S., daughter of Daniel Nourse, of Rockingham, Vt., who died in 1848. In 1850 he married Irene, daughter of Alexander Sanford, of Missouri, a Virginia family.

Of Dr. Chaffee, a brother in the profession makes the following remarks:

"Dr. Chaffee came to this city in 1847, and at once made for himself name and place. Having been for years demonstrator of anatomy in a medical college, and for a long time in the constant practice of surgery, he came to this place terres atque rotundas.

"Of eminent mental gifts, ready for any emergency, he at once took a commanding position in the profession, divided the practice of surgery with Dr. J. M. Smith, and at his death assumed it all, until, feeling cramped and dwarfed by the straightness of his surroundings, and aspiring to 'green fields and pastures new,' he accepted a political nomination, was elected to Congress, and resigned the practice of his profession, giving up feeling for the pulses of his patients to take the pulse of the nation. He was a loss to the profession."

Dr. Chaffee was the choice of Secretary Stanton for surgeon-general of the army, and, in fact, his commission was being made out when the officers of the regular army, getting knowledge of it, made such an outcry that the President peremptorily ordered the appointment of the present incumbent of the office.

Dr. Chaffee was for ten years the confidential physician and surgeon of the Boston and Albany Railroad Company, and was succeeded in the position by Dr. W. G. Breck. He is also a member of the examining board for pensions.

Dr. Chaffee's son, Clemens Chaffee, was a graduate of West Point as lieutenant of engineers, but, preferring the ordnance department, entered that branch of the service. He entered the army when the Rebellion broke out, and was appointed on Gen. Grant's staff at Vicksburg, but during the siege was transferred to the staff of Gen. W. T. Sherman, as chief of engineers. He was attacked with dysentery, and finally sent to the officers' hospital at Memphis, where he remained for about a month, when he returned to Vicksburg, and took charge of all the ordnance stores accumulated at that point, amounting to many millions in value.

He left Vicksburg in March, 1864, under orders for the Allegheny Arsenal, at Pittsburg, where he remained until June, 1865, when he was ordered to New England, and at New Haven, Conn., received the ordnance turned over to the United States. After a few months' service at this point he was ordered to the United States Arsenal at Springfield, where he served as ordnance officer for two years, when he died of pulmonary disease, brought on by exposure in the service, July 6, 1867, at the age of twenty-six years. In April preceding his death he was promoted to the rank of captain. He was a promising young man, and his death fell heavily upon his parents and friends.

DR. WILLIAM GILMORE BRECK is a native of Franklin Co., Vt.—that land of robust and vigorous physical men, of industry and independence,—where he was born in November, 1818. He received his preliminary education at the celebrated school of Oberlin, Ohio, and graduated at Harvard University. He attended lectures in the city of New York, and established himself for a short time in the practice of medicine in New Orleans, La., in 1844-45.

In the spring of 1846 he located in Springfield, Mass., where he has since resided, and engaged in the practice of medicine and surgery.

Under the direction of Gov. Andrew he filled an important position in the Union army during the Rebellion, and saw a great amount of arduous service. He was present at the battles of Pittsburg Landing (or Shiloh), Antietam, the second Bull Run, and Gettysburg. He filled the important position of director of camps, and accomplished much as assistant and consulting surgeon in difficult operations and general practice.

In 1843 Dr. Breck married Mary, daughter of Jacob Van De Venter, of Penn Yan, N. Y.

For the past twenty-five years he has been in the employ of the Boston and Albany, and the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Companies, as surgeon and medical adviser.

He is a member of the Massachusetts Medical Association, and of the Hampden District Medical Society, of which latter body he has been president. During the civil war he examined nearly all the recruits from this region.

A member of the medical profession says of him, "Dr. William G. Breck came to Springfield in 1846, and, after several years of waiting, came prominently into notice upon the death of Dr. J. M. Smith and the removal of Dr. Chaffee from the city.

* Dr. Seeger was a member of the Unitarian Church in Springfield.

"About this time he went to Boston, where he became the private pupil of Dr. Warren for a considerable length of time, and on his return to Springfield at once assumed a prominent place in the profession.

"Gifted by nature with a very robust physique, cheerfulness of disposition, and a good knowledge of his profession, he very soon rose to eminence, and for a long time, especially during the absence of Dr. David P. Smith in Europe and in the army, substantially monopolized the practice of surgery in the river counties.

"He has carried the activities of youth into comparative old age, and now, beyond the age of sixty years, is active in the practice of his profession,—more so than the majority of young men."

THEODORE FRELINGHUYSEN, the son of Dr. William G. Breck, graduated at Harvard in 1866. In 1869 he visited Europe, where he remained two and a half years, studying the profession of medicine at Berlin, Vienna, Paris, and London. During the war of the Rebellion he was assistant surgeon in charge of the sanitary condition of the ports of Norfolk and Portsmouth, in Virginia, including the jails and prisons, being detailed for the position by Gen. E. O. C. Ord.

He commenced the practice of medicine in Springfield in 1869, making a specialty of surgery. He holds the position, by appointment from the Governor, of medical examiner of Hampden County, an office which takes the place of coroner.

DR. SAMUEL D. BROOKS was born in Pittsfield, Mass., in 1817. He studied with President Childs and others at the Berkshire Medical Institution, where he graduated in 1841. His first practice was in Norwich, Chenango Co., N. Y., where he remained about one year, when he removed to Norwich (now Huntington), Hampshire Co., Mass., where he practiced his profession until May, 1848, when he removed to South Hadley, where he was connected with Mount Holyoke Seminary. Here he remained until 1854, when he went to Monson to take charge of the State Almshouse. In this position he continued until June 1, 1858, when he removed to the city of New York, where he superintended the New York Juvenile Asylum, and continued until 1871. He subsequently was superintendent and resident physician of the New York Deaf and Dumb Institution. His health suffering severely from malaria, he resigned his position after two years, and settled in Springfield, Mass., where he has since been in practice. He is a member of the State board of inspection of the State primary school at Monson.

Dr. Brooks is the son of Reuben Brooks, a soldier of the Revolution, and who also served during the war of 1812-15 in the valley of Lake Champlain. He married Eliza Jane, daughter of Dr. Caleb H. Stickney, and sister of Dr. Horatio G. Stickney.

DR. ALFRED BOOTH was a son of Edwin Booth, a hat and cap manufacturer and dealer, and was born about 1825, in Springfield. He studied medicine in Philadelphia, and opened an office in Springfield, but his tastes were more for literary and scientific matters than for the practice of medicine. He was connected with a Springfield publication, and wrote many valuable articles upon various subjects, including interesting historical sketches and reminiscences of Springfield, its early inhabitants and institutions, many of which are preserved in the city library, to which he presented a copy of his "scrap-book." He removed to Boston a few years ago, where it is understood he is connected with a prominent newspaper. Dr. Booth is an able, expressive, and interesting writer.

DR. HORATIO GATES STICKNEY was born in Huntington, Hampshire Co., Mass., in 1834. He studied medicine with Dr. S. D. Brooks, attended lectures at the Berkshire Medical Institution, and at the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons, where he graduated about 1859. He commenced practice in the city of Providence, R. I. When the Rebellion broke out he was appointed surgeon of the 3d Rhode Island

Artillery, and served about two years and a half in the field, and six months on the marshal's staff at home. He settled in Springfield after the war, where he practiced until his death, Dec. 13, 1878, at the age of forty-four years.

DR. JOHN STONE* was born in the town of Rutland, Worcester Co., Mass., in 1763. He received a good academical education, and studied medicine with Dr. John Frink, of Rutland, a distinguished member of the Massachusetts Medical Society. He began the practice of his profession in Greenfield, Franklin Co., Mass. (then Hampshire County), and soon built up an extensive business. An attack of hæmoptysis obliged him to give up his practice in Greenfield, and he removed to the city of New York, about the year 1805, where he remained some two years, during which period he became an active member of the New York Medical Society, and established a considerable business. His health becoming re-established, he returned to Greenfield and resumed practice, continuing until 1819, when he sold his property and good-will to Dr. Seth Washburn, who died in 1825.

He removed to Providence, R. I., where he remained only a year or two, and then settled permanently in Springfield, Mass., where he continued in an extensive and lucrative practice until the time of his death, in 1838.†

He became a member of the Massachusetts Medical Society in 1803, and continued in active connection with it until his death. At the recommendation of his professional brethren, the honorary degree of Doctor of Medicine was conferred upon him in 1824, by Williams College. He instructed a number of students in the profession, among others Dr. Alpheus F. Stone, of Greenfield, a distinguished fellow and counselor of the Massachusetts Medical Society, and an only son, who afterward entered the army and died at the South. He had a large and valuable library, and his business as a consulting physician was very extensive.

His biographer, Dr. Williams, said of him: "In his manners Dr. Stone was a perfect pattern of a gentleman; and no one could approach him, however humble his sphere and condition, without receiving a share of his urbanity and particular attention. In his person he was tall and erect, and he was proverbially one of the neatest and most fashionable men in his dress in the country. He was always ready at the call of any one, and there are but few physicians living who could or did do a greater amount of business in a given time. His faculties continued bright to the close of life, and he was able to transact business till within a short time previous to his death. He died universally lamented."

DR. EZRA OSBORNE was a native of Springfield, and lived and died on what is known as Long Hill. He was not a regularly-educated physician, but possessed good natural abilities and had quite an extensive practice. He probably studied medicine with Dr. Joshua Frost. His practice extended over a period of some fifteen years, from about 1815 to 1830. He filled the civil position of tax-collector for many years.

DR. LORING also lived on the hill in Springfield, and practiced for a short time about 1825. It is not known to what place he removed.

DR. CHAPIN also practiced for a short time about 1827-30. He afterward gave up his practice and removed to Brattleboro', Vt., where he is supposed to be still living. He was something of a sporting-man, and a great admirer of fine horses. While in Springfield he enjoyed a good practice.

A DR. WM. BRIDGMAN, from Belchertown, was a resident of Springfield from about 1830 to 1840, and had quite an extensive ride. He died in the place probably about 1840.

There was at one time a DR. SWAN, who lived on Springfield Hill, where he practiced medicine for a number of years, and did a considerable business. He is remembered by some of the old residents as a man of many peculiarities, but possessed of considerable ability.

† In another connection his death is stated to have occurred in 1833. This therefore may be a typographical error.

DR. SAMUEL BELDEN, who practiced in Springfield for a number of years about 1840, came from Wethersfield, Conn., or its vicinity. His residence was on the corner of Main and Bridge Streets, where Gill's new block now stands.

A DR. SPARHAWK also practiced in Springfield for several years about 1820. He is remembered as a fine gentleman and a physician of most excellent reputation. He died in Springfield, probably previous to 1830.

DR. LEMUEL WHITTLESEY BELDEN was born in Wethersfield, Conn., in September, 1801. "He was the son of Dr. Joshua Belden, of that place, a very respectable physician and worthy man, who died of malignant spotted fever in June, 1808, in the midst of his usefulness."

Dr. Belden entered as a freshman at Yale College in 1817, when sixteen years of age. He obtained his first degree in 1821, and soon after took charge of an academy at New Canaan, in his native State, where he continued two years. In the autumn of 1823 he entered the office of Dr. Woodward, of Wethersfield, subsequently superintendent of the State Lunatic Hospital at Worcester, Mass. He attended medical lectures in Boston, in the winter of 1825. The following winter he passed in New Haven, attending lectures at Yale College, and in March, 1826, received the degree of Doctor of Medicine. His reputation as a scholar was high, and at his graduation he took the first rank in his class.

In the autumn of 1827 he settled in Springfield, Mass., and soon gained a respectable practice, including among his patrons many of the best families of the town.

He was always a close student, carrying his habits of reading and study into the later years of his life. He was a prominent member of the Massachusetts Medical Society, and introduced important changes into the practice of the profession. He died of malignant typhus fever, in Springfield, about 1840.

He married in May, 1829, Catherine, daughter of Stephen Chester, Esq., at one time sheriff of Hartford, Co., Conn.

DR. JAMES HENRY PIERREPONT, for many years one of the most distinguished physicians of Portsmouth, N. H., was a native of Springfield, Mass., but the date of his birth we have not been able to ascertain, though it was probably about the year 1780. He died in Portsmouth, in 1839. The Rev. Dr. Burroughs, of that town, at the special request of the medical profession, delivered an eulogy upon him and published a memoir.

DR. MARSHALL CALKINS was born Sept. 2, 1828, in the town of Wilbraham, Mass. He is the son of Luke and Polly Calkins. He was a student with Dr. Calvin Newton, of Worcester, and graduated at the Worcester Medical Institution in 1848; at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., in 1853, with the degree of A.B., and at Dartmouth Medical College, Hanover, N. H., in 1867. He also attended the Pennsylvania Hospital, at Philadelphia, in 1857. In 1856 Union College conferred upon him the degree of A.M.

He commenced practice at Monson, Mass., in 1848, and remained at that place a year and a half previous to entering the Wesleyan University, at Middletown, Conn., where he attended two terms in 1850. From 1854 to 1860 he was located in Philadelphia, where he practiced and attended the hospitals. In 1860 he settled in Springfield, Mass., where he has since resided. In 1862 he became a member of the Massachusetts Medical Association. He was a member of the examining board of pensions in 1871-72, during which years the board met at Northampton, and is at present one of the four physicians of the Springfield Home for Friendless Women and Children. He is an honorary member of the Vermont State Medical Society, corresponding member of the Gynecological Society of Boston, and member of the "Congrès Périodique International des Sciences Médicales," which held its last meeting at Brussels, Belgium. He is also a member of the American Medical Association.

From 1873 to 1878 he filled the chair of Physiology and Microscopic Anatomy in the University of Vermont, which he resigned on account of the pressure of professional duties at home, receiving, on his retirement, a complimentary acknowledgment from the faculty.

Dr. Calkins married, in 1855, Adelaide Augusta, daughter of Gen. E. M. Hosmer, of West Boylston, Mass.

Mrs. Calkins is a member of the State advisory board of women for inspecting and examining the State Primary School at Monson, the Westboro' Reform School, and the Tewksbury Almshouse. She was associated for a considerable period in this connection with Mrs. Robert C. Winthrop and Miss Georgiana Boutwell, daughter of Ex-Gov. Boutwell. At the present writing Mrs. Calkins is chairman of the board. She has also been recently appointed one of the three female trustees of the Springfield Hospital.

WEST SPRINGFIELD.

The following paragraphs concerning the medical gentlemen who have practiced in West Springfield are compiled from the remarks of Dr. P. Le B. Stickney, of Springfield, at the West Springfield centennial celebration, in 1874, called out by a toast—"The Medical Profession"—at the banquet:

DR. JOHN VAN HORN was the first practitioner after the town was incorporated as a separate organization. He was the son of Sumner Van Horn, and was born in Springfield in 1726. He was a graduate of Yale College in 1749. After attending the necessary course of medical lectures, he located in West Springfield, where he continued to practice his profession for a period of nearly sixty years. He had the reputation of being a well-educated and skillful physician for the times in which he lived. He was the first town clerk, and was a scholarly man, and considerably given to literary pursuits. In the later years of his life he became hypochondriacal, and imagined himself incapable of any physical or mental effort, taking to his bed, where he died in 1805 at the age of seventy-nine years.

DR. SETH LATHROP was a son of the Rev. Dr. Joseph Lathrop, and was born in 1762, in what is now West Springfield, then the second parish of Springfield, of which his father was pastor. He was a student of Dr. Van Horn, and afterward his partner, and succeeded him in practice. Dr. Bronson said of him: "He had a strong mind, sound judgment, and excellent common sense; was frank, social and fond of anecdote, and well read in the medical literature of the last half of the century; an able and acceptable practitioner. More than six feet high, with a large frame and straight, his figure was imposing, his very appearance inspiring in him a reliable confidence." He was very successful in his practice, a natural result of his strong common sense, which often takes the place of learning and accomplishments. He continued during his life in his native town, and was for many years in practice. He died in 1831, at the age of sixty-nine years.

DR. REUBEN CHAMPION (according to Dr. Stickney) was the first physician who was born in the town of West Springfield subsequent to its organization, having been born in 1784, ten years after that event. He was the second son of Reuben Champion. His grandfather was Reuben Champion, M.D., who removed from Springfield, Mass., to Saybrook, Conn., early in the Revolutionary war, in order that his family might be as far retired as possible from the turmoils of war. He served with distinguished success as a surgeon in the American army, and died while in service at Ticonderoga, in 1777, at the age of fifty years. He left two sons, Reuben and Medes, both of whom, though quite young, also served in the army.

DR. REUBEN CHAMPION (2d) was educated at the Westfield

Academy, and afterward studied medicine with Dr. Sumner, of that town. He attended medical lectures at the school connected with Dartmouth College, then under the charge of the celebrated surgeon Dr. Nathan Smith, who was the founder of the school. During attendance there he was a private pupil of Dr. Smith, who carefully instructed him in what was then termed the new method of treating typhus fever,—a method which, with few modifications, prevails at the present time.

After concluding his course at Dartmouth, he attended lectures in New York City, and subsequently, at the urgent request of his fellow-citizens, returned to his native town and commenced the practice of medicine in 1809.

He introduced the new fever treatment, though against strong opposition from not only the medical profession, but the community generally; but he continued, and by his great success established an enviable reputation. He was an ardent politician of the Jeffersonian school, and took an active part in local politics. His abilities were recognized, and he served his native town in many positions of honor and trust. He was a justice of the peace, and also served as a Senator in the State Legislature. He was a member of the Massachusetts Medical Society, and continued in the practice of medicine nearly fifty years. His death occurred in 1865, at the age of eighty-one years.

DR. HENRY BRONSON settled in West Springfield in 1827. After a preparatory course of study he entered the Medical Institute of Yale College, from which he graduated in 1827. His stay and practice in West Springfield were short. In 1830 he removed to Albany, N. Y. By his gentlemanly deportment and cultivation he rapidly grew into favor in his new field and gained a large practice. His tastes inclined greatly to literary and scientific pursuits, and much of his spare time was devoted to those subjects, and in this direction he soon gained an enviable reputation. In 1872 he was appointed Professor of Materia Medica in the Medical Institute of Yale College,—a chair which he adorned by his extensive and varied learning and admirable style of lecturing. He gave up the regular practice of medicine in 1860, since which time he has given his attention to more general and scientific subjects.

DR. EBENEZER JONES was born in West Springfield, where he settled in practice after the usual preparatory studies. After a residence of about twelve years he removed to the eastern part of the State.

DR. TIMOTHY HORTON was the son of a physician, and a practitioner of considerable ability. He was a man of abundant means, and particularly noted for the small charges made for his medical attendance. It is said that his regular fee in his own neighborhood was twelve and a half cents for each visit, rarely charging over thirty-three and a third cents (two New England shillings), no matter how difficult the case or how far he traveled. Frequently he would go a distance of four or five miles, hold a consultation with a brother practitioner, and charge one shilling (sixteen and two-third cents). He was much respected by his fellow-citizens.

Among the physicians of whom little is known was a DR. DUNHAM, who died about 1825. He practiced in what was then Ireland Parish, now in the town of Holyoke. He bore a good reputation among those who enjoyed his acquaintance.

DR. CALVIN WHEELER settled in Feeding Hills Parish, now in the town of Agawam. He served as a surgeon in the American army during the war of 1812-15. He was a man of limited education, but made up the deficiency by his strong mind and good sense, and had the respect of his friends and patrons. He died in 1851.

DR. EDWIN MCCREA settled in what is now Agawam in 1832, and practiced about twelve years. He had the reputation of an able practitioner and a genial neighbor and citizen, but his health was infirm, and he was unable to attend as faithfully to his practice as he wished. He died in 1859.

DR. CYRUS BELL settled in the parish of Feeding Hills about 1840, and is still located there. For an interesting account of him, see biography in connection with the history of Agawam.

DR. SUMNER IVES was born in Ireland Parish (then a part of West Springfield). He practiced in the town from 1826 to about 1831, when he removed to Suffield, Conn., where he continued until his death, in 1845.

DR. SOLOMON CHAPMAN succeeded Dr. Ives in 1832, in the parish of Ireland, where he practiced about ten years, when he removed to Easthampton, where he died.

DR. LAWSON LONG followed Dr. Chapman in 1850, and located in the same parish, now a part of the city of Holyoke, where he still continues.

DR. CHAUNCEY BELDEN was a graduate of the Yale Medical Institute in 1829. He was a private pupil of Dr. Woodward, of Wethersfield, Conn. After he left college he was for a time an assistant in the Hartford Retreat for the Insane. He settled in West Springfield in 1832, and remained until 1842, when he removed to South Hadley, where he died of consumption in 1845. He was well educated and fond of scientific pursuits. He was a practitioner of excellent judgment and great skill, and very successful in his practice.

DR. EDWARD STRONG was a native of Northampton, and settled in West Springfield in 1839. He graduated at Williams College in 1834, and afterward studied medicine at the Harvard Medical School, in Boston, where he graduated in 1838. He was in practice until 1845, when he relinquished it on account of ill health. He has since been engaged in the State Department of "Vital Statistics" in Boston.

The STICKNEY family is of Norman extraction, the earliest name on record being John de Stickney. William Stickney, the English ancestor of the name in America, was christened at St. Mary's Church, in the parish of Frampton, near Boston, Lincolnshire, England, in 1592. He sailed from the port of Hull, in Yorkshire, for Massachusetts, or at least some part of New England, in 1637.

Several of the family have been eminent in the medical profession in this country. The father of Dr. P. Le Breton Stickney was a captain of marines in the war of 1812-15. His name was David.

DR. P. LE B. STICKNEY settled in West Springfield in 1845. He was a graduate of Dartmouth College in 1839, and studied his profession at the Jefferson Medical College, in Philadelphia, Pa., where he graduated in 1842. He commenced the practice of medicine at the Blockley Hospital, in that city, where he filled the position of outdoor physician and surgeon.

Subsequently he returned and located in West Springfield, where he practiced six years, when he removed to the city of Springfield, where he now resides.

DR. NATHANIEL DOWNS graduated at Harvard School; settled in West Springfield in 1857. He remained only a few years, and removed to Harvard, in the eastern part of the State.

DR. EDWARD G. UFFORD settled in West Springfield in 1855. He remained in the town until 1872, and had a good practice, but on account of poor health was compelled to give up his profession. He removed to South Hadley.

DR. HERBERT C. BELDEN, son of Dr. Chauncey Belden, studied in New York, and was a graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of that city in 1867. He served a year as assistant surgeon in the Nursery Hospital, at Randall's Island, N. Y., and subsequently visited Europe, spending considerable time in Vienna, and, returning home, settled in West Springfield in 1871.

PHYSICIANS OF WESTFIELD.

The first physician, so far as we are able to find, who located in Westfield was DR. GEORGE FILER (or Fyler), who seems to have come from Northampton to Westfield about 1666. His residence was in Main Street. Subsequently he joined the Quakers and removed to Shelter Island, at the east end of Long Island, in 1674, after which we have no account of him.

DR. ISRAEL ASHLEY was born in 1710, in Westfield. He was the son of Deacon David Ashley and Mary (Dewey) Ashley. He graduated at Yale College in 1730-31, and died at Stillwater, N. Y., in 1758, while serving in Gen. Abercrombie's army as a regimental surgeon. His reputation was that of a distinguished and able physician, ranking with the first practitioners of his day. He also held the office of justice of the peace.

DR. SAMUEL MATHER practiced in the place about 1756, possibly succeeding Dr. Ashley when he entered the army. But little is known of him or of the length of time he resided in Westfield. It is not known that there were any physicians located here between the time of Dr. Filer and Dr. Ashley.

DR. WILLIAM ATWATER was a resident practitioner from about 1811-12 to about 1832. He was the son of Rev. Noah Atwater, of Westfield, born about 1787. He studied medicine, and graduated at Yale College about the year 1808. He was a shrewd and witty man, affable and kindly with his patients, and bore an excellent reputation among his brethren in the profession. He died about 1832.

Coincident with the last named was DR. JOSHUA SUMNER, who came from Windham, Conn., and settled in Westfield, where he remained until his death. He was somewhat celebrated as a surgeon, and was prominent in the profession.

DR. LUCIUS WRIGHT is probably the oldest living physician in Hampden County, having been born Jan. 18, 1793, near the Willimansett Bridge over the Connecticut in the town of Chicopee, and is consequently now in his eighty-seventh year. His residence is at Westfield Farms, where he has resided since 1830. He studied medicine with Dr. Joshua Day, of West Springfield, and also with Dr. Jacob Kittredge, of North Brookfield, Mass., whose daughter Mary he married for his first wife. He was a fine scholar for his day, having a knowledge of Greek, Latin, and Hebrew. He commenced the practice of his profession in West Springfield. Subsequently he practiced for about two years in Salem, Mass., from whence he removed to Willimansett, and soon after, about 1824, to Montgomery, where he practiced for about six years, when he removed to Westfield Farms, where he has since resided.

Dr. Wright was a prominent, able politician of the Jefferson school, and represented his district in the General Court for two terms. He was also a candidate for Congress in the celebrated campaign of 1840.

THE HOLLANDS.—The Holland family has been remarkable for the number of medical men which it has produced.

The first, DR. JAMES HOLLAND, was born in 1762. He studied medicine with Dr. Brewster, of Becket, and practiced for a short time in what was then Chester village, now Huntington, and subsequently in Worthington, from which he returned to Huntington, and remained one year. He settled in Westfield in 1815. His wife was Lydia Stow, of Chester, who bore him ten children, four of whom entered the medical profession. Dr. Holland died at Westfield, June 18, 1840.

DR. HOMER HOLLAND, son of the preceding, was born in Blandford, April 25, 1799. He read medicine with his father, attended lectures at New Haven, and graduated at the Berkshire Medical Institution. He settled in Westfield, where he practiced medicine from 1842 to 1856. He also practiced dentistry. His inclination was to the study of chemistry, in which branch of science he was quite celebrated. He married, in 1823, Lucinda Allen, of Enfield, Conn. He died in Charlotte, N. C., where he was interested in gold-mining in the capacity of physician and chemist.

DR. VIROIL HOLLAND, son of the first James Holland, was born at Norwich (now Huntington) in 1803. He studied medicine with his father, and graduated at the academical and medical departments of Harvard College, and had the reputation of a most excellent scholar, but he did not survive very long, dying in 1832, soon after his graduation.

DR. JAMES HOLLAND, another son, was born in Westfield in 1815. He studied with his father and brother Homer, and graduated at the New York University, soon after which he settled in Westfield, in 1843, where he has since remained. He has an extensive practice, and stands at the head of the profession in the thriving town, both by virtue of his age and extensive experience. He has also been honored with several offices in the county, and has been for many years an honored member of the Massachusetts Medical Association. The doctor married, for his second wife, Miss Leonard, of Feeding Hills, now in the town of Agawam. His medical experience extends over a period of fifty years.

CHARLES JENKINS HOLLAND, fourth son of the first Dr. James Holland, was born in Westfield in 1819. He had the advantage of his father's knowledge, and prepared himself for the practice of medicine, graduating at the Medical College of Montreal, Canada. But he did not live to see the meridian of his days, dying in 1855, at the age of thirty-six years.

DR. EUGENE HOLLAND, eldest son of Dr. Homer Holland, was born in Westfield in 1824. He studied with his father, and graduated at Harvard College in 1852. He practiced a short time, and in 1853 removed to California, and from thence to Colorado in 1860, where he now resides, at Idaho Springs. He has never married.

HENRY HOLLAND, second son of Dr. Homer Holland, was born in Westfield in 1827. He graduated from the New York College of Pharmacy in 1851. He engaged in the drug business in 1841, when a young man, and has continued to the present time (April, 1879). Mr. Holland is a man of good natural abilities, with an enthusiastic love for the study of archaeology, and his contributions in various ways to the current literature of the day and to the library of his native town have been valuable. Nothing of interest touching the early history of Westfield and the adjacent region escapes him, and his researches among the musty records of the past are doing much toward rescuing from oblivion some of the most interesting chapters in the early history of the valley of the Agawam.

WILLIAM HOLLAND, third son of Homer, lived to the opening years of manhood and died in 1861, at the age of twenty-four years. He was engaged in the drug business with his brother Henry at the time of his death.

DR. M. L. ROBINSON was born in the town of Pompey, Onondaga Co., N. Y. (which had also the honor of giving birth to Hon. Horatio Seymour, of Deerfield, N. Y.), June 29, 1818. He was a son of Millard Robinson, a farmer of that town, who died there about 1870, aged seventy-seven years. The family is of English origin. Dr. Robinson studied medicine in Cardiff and Tully, with Dr. Samuel Farnham, of the former place, and with Dr. Harmon Van Deusen, of Tully. Attended medical lectures at Geneva, N. Y., and received a diploma from the medical society of the State, June 15, 1843. He commenced practice in Westfield, Mass., in the same month, and has continued to the present.

He at first located at Westfield Farms, where he married Julia Ann, daughter of Dr. Lucius Wright. He remained at that place until March, 1868, when he removed to Westfield village, where he is still in practice. He married for his second wife Mrs. Rebecca K——, a widow and daughter of Luther P. Pellett, of Worcester County. The doctor has held the office of justice of the peace for the past twenty years.

On the 20th of May, 1864, he united with Mount Moriah Lodge, A. F. and A. M. He is also a member of Morning Star Chapter, Royal Arch Masons, the Council of Royal and Select Masters, and of the Springfield Commandery, Knights Tem-plar, all of Springfield; Chapter Rose Croix, Boston, the Massachusetts Consistory, and several minor organizations of the craft. He has held several town offices, and is at present physician to the poor of the town.

DR. JAMES MORVIN SMITH, father of Dr. David P. Smith, of Springfield, was a resident of Westfield for a short time previous to 1838.*

DR. SIMEON SHURTLEFF was born in Blandford. His early education was obtained at Rev. Dr. Cooley's school in Granville. He studied medicine with Dr. Hall, of Blandford, and graduated at Amherst College in the same class with Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. He was also a graduate of the University of New York.

He practiced medicine at Simsbury, Conn., a few years, and about 1835 married Mary Ann Phelps, of that town. About 1837 he removed to Westfield, where he practiced until about 1860, when he removed to Simsbury, where he died in 1864.

Dr. Shurtleff was somewhat of a naturalist, and made a special study of conchology. His collection of shells was said to have been one of the finest in America. It is now in the cabinet of Middletown (Conn.) University.

DR. JAMES HENRY WATERMAN, son of James H. Waterman, was born in Ware, Mass., Sept. 11, 1837. He was educated mainly at Monson Academy, and at the University of the City of Buffalo, N. Y. He studied medicine with Prof. Julius F. Miner, of Buffalo, and graduated from the medical department of the university in February, 1860. He commenced practice in Westfield, Mass., in March of the same year.

In November, 1862, he was appointed surgeon of the 46th Massachusetts Infantry Volunteers, and was in the service of the government, in the field and at home, for a period of two years. His present residence is Westfield village, where he has a large and increasing practice.

He is a great lover of fine horses, and probably no physician in the valley can take the road in better shape, or reach his patients with greater speed and promptness. Dr. Waterman has been twice married. His first wife was Miss Izetta, daughter of Hiram Harrison, who died in December, 1874. In December, 1876, he married Miss Louise Clark, of Greenfield, Mass. Dr. Waterman is a member of the Massachusetts Medical Association.

DR. WILLIAM ORTON BELL settled in Westfield in 1861. He was born in Chester, Mass., and graduated from the Berkshire Medical Institution. His first practice was in the town of Becket, in Berkshire County, from whence he removed to Huntington, in Hampshire County, where he remained until 1861, when he removed to Westfield. Here he continued practice until his failing health compelled the relinquishment of his profession. He died in 1877, with the reputation of an able physician and a good citizen.

DR. HARLOW GAMWELL was born in Washington, Berkshire Co., Mass., in 1834. He is the son of Martin Gamwell, who was a soldier of the Revolution. He studied medicine in Pittsfield, and graduated at the Berkshire Medical Institution in 1858, under President Childs. In 1859 he commenced practice at Huntington, where he remained until the breaking out of the war of the Rebellion, when he was appointed assistant surgeon of the 2d Massachusetts Cavalry, and was subsequently promoted to surgeon of the 5th Cavalry, with which he remained until his term of service expired, when he returned to Huntington, where he practiced until October, 1873, and removed to Westfield, where he still continues, and commands a good practice and an excellent reputation as a man and citizen.

Dr. Gamwell married, in 1859, Alice, daughter of Gilbert Lewis, of Huntington, who died in 1867. In 1868 he married a second time,—Sarah A., daughter of Dr. Thaddeus K. De Wolf, of Chester. He is a member of the Massachusetts Medical Association.

For notice of Dr. G. G. Tucker, see biography in another connection in this volume.

DR. ELLERY CHANNING CLARKE is a native of Winchester, N. H., where he was born in 1836. He is a son of Rev. Stillman Clarke, a Unitarian clergyman, who died at Concord, N. H., in 1871, aged sixty-two years. Dr. Clarke studied with Professor Albert Smith, of Peterboro', N. H., and subsequently attended Dartmouth College. He graduated at the State University of Vermont, at Burlington, in 1860, and afterward attended a course of lectures at Harvard. He began practice, in 1860, at Wilton, N. H., where he remained until the opening of the war of the Rebellion, when he entered the army as assistant surgeon in the 8th New Hampshire Infantry Volunteers. He was soon after promoted surgeon of the 2d New Hampshire Cavalry, in which capacity he served through the war. Upon leaving the army he located in Pepperill, Mass., and remained until 1867, when he removed to Holliston, Mass., where he continued practice until 1870, when he removed to Westfield, where he has since remained.

He married, in 1861, Sarah P., a daughter of Benjamin Kendrick, of Amherst, N. H., who died in November, 1866. He married a second time, in September, 1867,—Mrs. Carrie Loring McCammon, a daughter of John Loring, of Pepperill, Mass.

The earliest notice we can find concerning the practice of medicine in Southwick is in connection with DR. ISAAC COIT, who died in that town on the 25th of April, 1813, aged fifty-eight years. There is a brief notice of him in Barber's historical collections. It appears that he was a surgeon in the American army during the Revolutionary war, and probably settled in Southwick village soon after its close. The house occupied by him stood on the ground now occupied by the dwelling of Mrs. Asahel Granger. His widow survived him until about 1860. Her maiden name was Sally Stiles, and she was a native of Southwick. Dr. Coit held the office of justice of the peace for a number of years. The following is the epitaph on the doctor's tombstone in the centre burying-ground:

"In memory of Isaac Coit, Esq., an eminent physician, who died 25th April, 1813, aged 58.

"Reflection long shall hover o'er his urn,
And faithful friendship boast her power to mourn;
Peace to his shade; while truth shall paint the rest, Lamented most by those who knew him best."

There is in the possession of Dr. J. W. Rockwell, of Southwick, an old account-book which belonged to one of the earliest physicians of that town,—DR. JONATHAN BILL,—from which it appears that he began practice in November, 1796, and went away in September, 1797. He came from Connecticut, but we have not been able to find any record of his place of birth or of the antecedents of the family. It is probable that he removed to the State of New York. While residing in Southwick he boarded in the family of Capt. Reuben Clark, a mile south of the centre. He appears not to have been in very affluent circumstances, for we find a memorandum in his account-book of having his breeches and vest mended, and coat turned and repaired.

A DR. NORTON settled in Southwick soon after the death of Dr. Coit, and practiced until his death, about 1817 or 1818. He lived in the same house with Dr. Coit's family. He left a wife and one child.

DR. LEVI W. HUMPHREYS was born in Simsbury, Conn., April 28, 1792. He was the son of Levi Humphreys. Studied medicine with Dr. Bestor, of Simsbury, and located in Southwick in 1818. He was a graduate of a medical school, and rose to eminence in his profession. He practiced in Southwick village until within a few years of his death, which occurred April 2, 1850, at the age of fifty-eight years. He was a man of good natural abilities and a respected citizen. He served as representative to the General Court for one term. Was also a member of the Massachusetts Medical Society. Professor John Stoddard, of Smith College, Northampton, is a grandson of Dr. Humphreys.

DR. JOSEPH WILLIAM ROCKWELL was born July 22, 1810, about half a mile south of the village of Southwick, Mass. He was the son of Uzal Rockwell, a farmer, who was born in Colebrook, Conn., and settled in Southwick in 1792.

Dr. Rockwell studied with Dr. Humphreys, and graduated at the Berkshire Medical Institution in 1833. He first settled at Harrisville (now Lodi), Medina Co., Ohio, in 1835, where he remained until 1842, when he removed to Cabotville (now Chicopee), Mass., where he practiced until 1844, when, at the solicitation of Dr. Humphreys, whose health was failing, he settled in Southwick village, where he has since remained.

The doctor has filled several civil offices, among them justice of the peace (both in Ohio and Massachusetts), selectman, school committee, etc. He married, in 1834, Elizabeth Wells, daughter of Jared Wells, of Canton, Conn.

The first of the family to settle in New England was Deacon William Rockwell, who was one of the Massachusetts colony which settled Boston in 1630, from which he removed to Meriden, Conn., in 1635. Among the physicians of this name have been Dr. William H. Rockwell, of Brattleboro', Vt.; Dr. Rockwell, of Windsor, Conn.; and Dr. Samuel Rockwell, of Sharon, Conn.

There have been a number of physicians who practiced in the town of Granville, the earliest of whom we find any account being DR. VINCENT HOLCOMBE, who was born in East Granville about the year 1797. He read medicine with Dr. Benjamin, of Granby, Conn., and Dr. Humphrey, of East Hartland, in the same State. He began practice in East Granville about 1818, when only twenty-one years of age, and soon after removed to West Granville, where he remained until his death, in September, 1863.

He bore the reputation of an eminent physician and worthy citizen, and was quite prominent as a politician. He served one term as a member of the State Senate. In February, 1818, he married Susannah Wills, a sister of Mrs. Dr. Rockwell.

His eldest son, Dr. Hubert Holcombe, was a surgeon in the army during the Rebellion, and died in Bradford in 1874. Dr. C. C. Holcombe, another son, is also a prominent physician of Lee, Mass.

DR. BARLOW, now of New York, practiced medicine in Granville after Dr. Holcombe left the east village, about 1830 or 1832. He subsequently removed to New York City, where he changed his practice to the homœopathic system, and became quite distinguished in that school.

DR. DWIGHT, now of Lee, Berkshire Co., also practiced for a short time in Granville.

DR. JOHNSON succeeded Dr. Dwight, and practiced in the town and adjacent country until his death, about 1874.

DR. CALVIN KINO succeeded Dr. Holcombe, and practiced a number of years, when he removed to Otis, where he is now in practice. He was a native of Ware, where he studied with Dr. D. W. Miner. He was a college graduate, but we are unable to give the name of the institution he attended.

CHESTER.

The town of Chester has probably had as many and prominent medical men within its borders as any other lying west of Westfield. We find some interesting reminiscences of the early physicians in a series of historical articles written by Samuel Quigley about 1870, and published in the Hampshire Gazette.

From those letters it appears that one DR. SHEPARD was the first settled physician in the town; but the date of his settlement or the length of time in which he practiced is not known.

DR. WILLIAM HOLLAND commenced practice at Chester Centre during Dr. Shepard's lifetime, but did not long remain. It is said that he and Dr. Phelps, of Belchertown, Hampshire Co., exchanged places.

DR. MARTIN PHELPS was a remarkable man, from all accounts. He appears to have been a cultured gentleman, and was quite an enthusiast in the study and discussion of metaphysics. He was also an ardent and prominent politician of the Democratic school, and served at least one term in the Legislature. He was a prominent member of the Orthodox Church, from which, however, he subsequently withdrew, and united with the Baptists. His latter years were passed upon the banks of the Agawam River, a short distance above the village of Huntington. The Phelps family has been quite prominent in Massachusetts. Dr. Phelps died in 1838, aged eighty-two years.

DR. ANSON BOIES was a native of Blandford, from whence he removed to Chester, where he practiced his profession until his decease, in 1820. He married, at different times, two daughters of Rev. Aaron Bascom. His daughter, Charlotte, married Dr. William C. Bell, of Middletown, Conn.

DR. BALLARD, a dignified, thoughtful, and well-educated gentleman, succeeded Dr. Boies, but died after a short residence. He married Lavinia, a daughter of Rev. Samuel Clark. Dr. Ballard was in practice when Dr. De Wolf settled in the town.

PROF. EBENEZER EMMONS, the eminent geologist, now of Albany, N. Y., was an M.D., and practiced medicine in Chester for some time, about 1830-32. He subsequently removed to Williamstown, Mass., to take a chair as Professor of Chemistry in Williams College.*

DR. THADDEUS K. DE WOLF. (See his biography in another place.)

DR. ASAHIEL PARMENTER, a son of Deacon Parmenter, studied medicine with Dr. Anson Boies, but did not remain long in Chester. He removed to Pennsylvania, and subsequently to the State of New York.

DR. JOSEPH C. ABBOTT, the eldest son of Joseph Abbott, studied medicine, and became a very skillful and successful physician, but died at an early age.

DR. H. S. LUCAS, a resident of Chester village, is a well-known gentleman of scientific attainments, and particularly in connection with geology and mineralogy. He is at present extensively engaged in the manufacture of emery in Chester. Dr. Lucas practiced medicine from 1844 to 1878, when he gave up the business of his profession to devote himself to other duties.†

DRS. HALL and WRIGHT were practicing in Blandford in 1832, and for many years afterward. They were eminent in their profession, and bore the character of most estimable and valuable citizens. The earliest physician in that town is believed to have been DR. ASHLEY, who was there as early as 1745.

For notice of DR. AMOS TAYLOR, see another page.

* Prof. Emmons was born in Middlefield, Mass.

HISTORY OF THE TOWNS OF HAMPDEN COUNTY.

SPRINGFIELD.

It is not our purpose to give the cause of nor to refer in detail to that movement which, in the name of religion, led to the emigration to America of that sturdy band of pioneers who early in the seventeenth century left the mother-country and landed upon the shores of the old Bay State. It is our purpose, however, to trace the history of a town which reckoned among its founders a few of that noble band who, in what was then known as the western wilderness, first planted the standard of civilization and reared a home on the banks of the Quinnetticot.

In 1630 the settlements at Boston, Charlestown, Cambridge, Dorchester, and Roxbury were increasing in population with such rapidity that it required no prophetic vision to discern that the time was not far distant when the penetration of the wilderness would become a necessity in the founding of settlements farther west. In the words of Cotton Mather, "the Massachusetts colony is become like an hive overstocked with bees, and many of the new inhabitants entertain thoughts of swarming into plantations extending farther into the country."

The first of these adventurous colonists who threaded their way through the wilderness westward were John Oldham and Samuel Hall, together with two others whose names have not come down to us, all residents of Dorchester. These indefatigable explorers traversed the State as far west as the Connecticut River, and were without doubt the first white men who set foot on the soil of this charming valley. These explorers found the Indians in this vicinity friendly, who entertained them with much hospitality, made them presents of beavers, and in various ways rendered their stay pleasant and profitable. They also found the valley fertile, and, in the rich meadows, were surprised to find hemp growing in great luxuriance, some of which was carried with them upon their return to the Bay.

These men returned to the settlements with glowing descriptions of the country through which they had passed; and not much time elapsed ere little bands were leaving the parent settlement for the west, anxious to rear their homes in the valley of the "famous river," as Cotton Mather called the Connecticut.

In 1635, Mr. William Pynchon, the founder of Roxbury, received the consent of the General Court to remove to the Connecticut River, and dispatched two men, John Cable and John Woodcock, to the wilderness for the purpose of erecting a habitation and preparing for those who were to follow. These men erected a rude structure on the west side of the Connecticut, in the meadow which from this circumstance was subsequently called House-meadow. The house was doubtless occupied by Cable and Woodcock during the summer, but, being informed by the Indians that the site was subject to inundation, it was abandoned, and a new location selected and a house erected on the east side of the river. The location of the first house is described in an entry made by John Holyoke in the Registry of Deeds in 1779 "as that meadow on the south of Agawam River where the English did first build a house," and also where "the English kept their residence who first came to settle and plant at Springfield, now so called." As to the probability of Cable and Woodcock having been the first whites who came to this section after the exploration of Oldham and Hall, O. B. Morris, father of

Hon. Henry Morris,—to both of whom, father and son, the people of Springfield owe a debt of gratitude for their many contributions to the historic literature of the city and valley,—says: "From a somewhat critical examination of our ancient records and manuscripts, I am induced to believe that Mr. Pynchon, with his son-in-law, Henry Smith, and Jehu Burr, and perhaps others of Roxbury, visited this river in 1634, explored the valley, and selected a place for their future settlement."

April 26, 1636, Mr. William Pynchon, who was the "father of the settlement," shipped his goods from Boston to the proposed settlement on Gov. Winthrop's vessel, the "Blessing of the Bay," and with his devoted and resolute associates set out through the dense wilderness for their future untried forest abode. The persons who accompanied Mr. Pynchon were his son-in-law, Henry Smith, Mathew Mitchell, Jehu Burr, William Blake, Edmund Wood, Thomas Ufford, and John Cable. The exact date of their arrival is not known, but on the 14th of May of the same year they entered into an agreement for the government of the settlement, allotment of lands, etc. This in some respects remarkable document was signed by eight persons, and with the exception of the two concluding lines is in the handwriting of Henry Smith. The following is a copy of the document:

"May the 14th, 1636.—We, whose names are underwritten, being by God's Providence ingaged together to make a plantation at and over against Agaam, on Conecticut, doe mutually agree to certayne articles and orders to be observed and kept by us and by our successors, except wee and every of us, for ourselves and in oure persons, shall think meet appon better reasons to alter our present resolutions.

"1ly. Wee intend, by God's grace, as soon as we can, with all convenient speede, to procure some Godly and faithfull miniaister, with whome we purpose to joine in church covenant, to walk in all the ways of Christ.

"2ly. Wee intend that our towne shall be composed of forty families, or if wee think meete after to alter our purpose; yet not to exceed the number of fifty families, rich and poore.

"3ly. That every inhabitant shall have a convenient proportion for a house-lott as we shall see meete for every ones quality and estate.

"4ly. That every one that hath a house-lott shall have a proportion of the Cow pasture to the north of End brook, lying northward from the town; and also that every one shall have a share of the hasseky marish over agaynst his lott, if it be to be had, and every one to have his proportionable share of all the woodland.

"5ly. That every one shall have a share of the meddow, or planting-ground, over against them as nigh as may be on Agaam side.

"6ly. That the Longmeddowe called Masacksick, lying in the way to Dorchester,* shall be distributed to every man as wee shall think meete, except we shall find other conveniences for some for theyre milch cattayle and other cattayle also.

"7ly. That the meddowe and pasture called Nayas, towards Patnckett, on ye side of Agaam, lyeinge about fower miles above in the ridge, shall be distributed" [erasure of six and a half lines], "as above said, in the former order, and this was altered and with consent before the hands were set to it.

"8ly. That all rates that shall arise upon the town shall be layed upon lands according to every ones proportion, aker for aker of howse-lotts, and aker for aker of meddowe, both alike on this side and both alike on the other side; and for farmes that shall lye farther off, a less proportion, as wee shall after agree, except wee shall see meete to remitt one-half of the rate from land to other estate.

"9ly. That whereas Mr. William Pynchon, Jehu Burr, and Henry Smith have constantly continued to prosecute the same at grate charges and at grate personal adventure, therefore it is mutually agreed that forty acres of meddowe lying on the south of End brooke, under a hill-side, shall belonge to the said partys free from all charges forever. That is to say, twenty akers to Mr. William Pynchon and his heyres and assignes forever, and ten akers to Jehme Burr, and ten akers to Henry Smith, and to their heyres and assignes forever, which said forty akers is not disposed to them as any allotment of towne lands; but they are to have their accommodations in all other places notwithstanding.

"10ly. That whereas a house was built at a common charge which cost £6, and also the Indians demand a grate some to bye their right in the said lands, and also a greate shallope, which was requisite for the first planting, the value of which engagements is to be borne by each inhabitant at theyre first entrance, as they shall be rated by us till the said disbursements shall be satisfied, or else in case the said howse and boat be not so satisfied for, then so much meddow to be sett out about the said howse as may countervayle the said extraordinary charge.

"11ly. It is agreed that no man, except Mr. William Pynchon, shall have above ten acres for his house-plot.

"12ly. Annulled.

"13ly. Whereas there are two Cowe pastures, the one lying towards Dorchester, and the other Northward from End brooke. It is agreed that both these pastures shall not be fed at once; but that the time shall be ordered by us in the disposing of it for tymes and seasons till it be lotted out and fenced in severally.

"14ly. May 16, 1636.—It is agreed that after this day wee shall observe this rule about dividing of planting-ground and meddowe in all planting-ground, to regard chiefly persons who are most apt to use such ground. And in all meddowe and pasture to regard chiefly cattel and estate, because estate is like to be improved in cattel, and such ground is aptest for their use. And yet wee agree that no person that is master of a lott, though he hath not cattel, shall have less than three acres of planting-ground, and none that have cowes, steeres, or year-olds shall have under one acre a piece, and all horses not less than four akers, and this order in dividing meddow by cattel, to take place the last of May next, soe that all cattayle that then appeare and all estates that shall then truly appeare at £20, a Cow shall have this proportion in the meddowe on Agawam side, and in the large meadow Masacksick, and in the other long meddowe called Nayas, and in the pasture at the north end of the town called End brook.

"15ly. It is ordered that for the disposing of the hassaky marsh and the granting of home-lots, these five men under-named, or theyre Deputys, are appointed, to have full power, namely, Mr. Pynchon, Mr. Michell, Jehue Burr, William Blake, Henry Smith.

"It is ordered that William Blake shall have sixteen polle in bredth for his home-lott, and all the marsh in bredth abutting at the end of it to the next highland, and three acres more in some other place.

"Next the lott of William Blake, Northward lyes the lot of Thomas Woodford, being twelve polle broad, and all the marsh before it to the upland. Next the lott of Thomas Woodford lyes the lott of Thomas Ufford, being fourteen rod broad, and all the marsh before it to the upland. Next the lot of Thomas Ufford lyes the lott of Henry Smith, being twenty rod in bredth, and all the marsh before it, and to run up in the upland on the other side to make up his upland lott ten acres.

"Next the lott of Henry Smith lyes the lott of Jehue Burr, being twenty rods in bredth, and all the marsh in bredth abutting at the end of it, and as much upland ground on the other side as shall make up his lott ten acres.

"Next the lott of Jehue Burr lyes the lot of Mr. William Pynchon, being thirty rod in bredth, and all the marsh at the east end of it, and an addition at the further end of as much marsh as make the whole twenty-foure acres, and as much upland adjoining as makes the former howse-lott thirty acres,—in all together fifty-fowre acres.

"Next the lott of Mr. Pynchon lyes the lott of John Cabel, fowreteene rod in bredth, and fowre acres and halfe of marsh at the end of his lott.

"Next the lott of John Cabel lyes the lott of John Reader, being twelve rod in bredth, and fowre acres and a halfe in marsh at the fore end of his home-lot.

"The lotts of Mr. Matthew Michell, Samuel Butterfield, Edmund Wood, and Jonas Wood are ordered to lye adjoining to mill brooke, the whole being to the number of twenty-five acres, to begin three of them on the greate river, and the fowrth on the other side of the small river.

"It is ordered that for all highways that shall be thought necessary by the five men above named, they shall have liberty and power to lay them out when they shall see meete, though it be at the end of mens lotts, givinge them allowance for so much ground.

"We testifie to the order above said being all of the first adventurers and undertakers for this Plantation.

It is a singular fact that only three of the original settlers remained over three years, and what is still more strange is the fact that none of them died here. During a considerable period the settlement was known as the "Plantation of Agawam," and the court which granted the permission for the removal of these pioneers from Roxbury issued a commission to eight persons for the government of the new colony, of whom William Pynchon was the second named and Henry Smith the fifth. This commission was empowered to exercise jurisdiction for one year. The first on the list was Roger Ludlow, who settled in Windsor. The government of the embryo settlement was administered by this body during a period of two years, and when in 1638 the conflicting claims to territory between Connecticut and Massachusetts having been adjusted, and Springfield left within the jurisdiction of the latter State, before the General Court could issue a commission for the guidance of this settlement, the planters with one consent voted "to ordain Mr. William Pynchon to execute the office of magistrate in this our plantation of Agawam." The following is a copy of the resolution or article adopted:

February the 14th, 1638.—"We, the Inhabitantes of Agaam uppon Quinneticot, takinge into consideration the manifold inconveniences that may fall upon us for want of some fit magistracy amonge us: Beinge now by Godes providence fallen into the line of the Massachusetts jurisdiction: & it beinge farr off to repayer thither in such cases of justice as may often fall out amonge us doe therefore thinke it meete by a generall consent & vote to ordaine (till we receive further directions from the generall court in the Massachusetts Bay) Mr. William Pynchon to execute the office of a magistrate in this our plantation of Agaam, viz.:

"To give oathes to constables or military officers to direct warrantes, both process, executions, & attachementes, to heare & examine misdemeanours to depose witnesses & uppon prooff of misdemenor to inflict corporall punishment, as whipping, stockinge, hyndiege to the peace, or good behaviour, & in some cases to require sureties, & if the offence require to commit to prison, & in default of a common prison to commit delinquentes to the charge of some fit person or persons till justice may be satisfied, also in the Tryall of actions for debt or trespasse, to give oaths, direct juries, depose witnesses, take verdictes, & keepe Records of verdicts, judgmentes, executions; & whatever else may tend to the keepinge peace, & the manifestation of our fidelity to the Bay Jurisdiction, & the restraining of any that shall violate Godes laws; or lastely whatsoever else may fall within the power of an assistant in the Massachusetts.

"It is also agreed uppon by a mutuall consent, that in case any action of debt or trespasse be to be tryed; seeinge a jury of 12 fit persons cannot be had at present among us: That six persons shall be esteemed & held a sufficient Jury to try any action under the some of Ten pounde till we shall see cause to y^e contrary & by common consent shall alter this number of Jurors, or shall be otherwise directed from the generall court in the Massachusetts."

Under this resolution of the people Mr. Pynchon performed the duties of magistrate until June, 1641, when he was duly commissioned by the General Court with practically the same authority as that conferred by the people.

It is evident from the provisions of this document that due regard was made for the adjustment of whatever difficulties might arise among the inhabitants of the little settlement, and although neither the records nor tradition tell us that in this early period there were any Gamaliels of the law here, still, then, as now, there were

as the first record in the book kept by William Pynchon as magistrate was that of a litigation, and what is still more singular was an action brought by Woodcock against Cabel for services rendered in the erection of the first building in the settlement. The following is a copy of the record:

Nov. 14, 1639.—"A meetinge to order some Towne affairs, and to try causes by Jury.

"The Jury,—Henry Smith, Henry Gregory, Jo. Leonard, Jo. Searle, Samuel Hubbard, Samuel Wright.

"The Action,—John Woodcock complains against Jo Cable in an action of the case for wages due to him for certaine work he did to a house that was built on Agawam side for the Plantation.

"The Verdict,—The Jury finds for the defendant—But withal they find the promise that Jo Cable made to the plaintife to see him paid for his work firme & good. But as for the 5 dayes in coming up with John Cable we find them not due to be paid, for he came not up purposely, but in his coming he aimed at a lott, w^{ch} end of his he did attain. Moreover, we agree that Jo Cable is ingaged to the plaintif for work done about the house; yet we also judge that Jo Woodcock is fully satisfied; in regard he hath had the use of the ould (Indian?) ground & of the house all that summer as far as Jo Cable had himselfe."

Mr. Pyncheon evidently manifested a humane interest in the children of the forest who roamed about the shores of the Connecticut in this vicinity, always dealing fairly with them, ever showing them that consideration due from the white brother who invaded the wilderness seeking their lands and furs. To the lasting honor of Mr. Pyncheon, it may truthfully be written that he made no use of the demoralizing agencies in his intercourse with the Indians that characterized the transactions of Indian traders in later days, who dealt to the red man the accursed "fire-water," and took his lands and furs in return. Soon after arriving at the place, which had now taken on the dignity of a "settlement," he entered into negotiations with the Indians for a large tract of territory, embracing a portion of the present site of the city, and lands in the vicinity. This was the first deed from the Indians to lands in this commonwealth west of the bay. The accompanying is a facsimile of the original deed.

The following interesting document is a copy of the mortgage given by the Indians who executed the first deeds to the whites of lands in this section:

"April 2, 1661.—This writing declareth that I, Cuttomis, & I, Coo, & I, Mattagwa Manant, & I, Menis, & I, Wallny, & I, Jaguallough, do all of us jointly mortgage all our lands in this Town, both new and old, within the bounds of this Towne to Samuel Marshfield, of Springfield, his heirs or assigns, for several debts wh we owe Samuel Marshfield for goods already received, wh we did ingage to pay in bever, & we do still ingage to doe the same, if we can gett it any tyme this summer; or else we doe ingage to pay him in Corne, at 2s. ye bushel by Yeayrs, or if in wampum, then do allow the said Samuel six fathom for every five fathom due unto him, or if we can gett moose-skins, or otter, or good deer-skins, then to pay them unto him at a reasonable rate, or guns, wch the aforesaid Samuel hath in his hands, wch if he do send to any of us, we engage to return them to him when he shall call for them; and if we do not pay the aforesaid Samuel in any of those pays to his content, by Michelmaz next after the date hereof, then we give the aforesaid Samuel full power to seize on all our lands & come to his proper right, and if that we Indians, whose names are above written, doe ingage that if wee and the aforesaid Samuel cannot agree about the price of any of the above mentioned pay, then we will stand to what Captayne Pyncheon & Lientenant Holyoke shall appoynt.

"In witness whereof the said Indians have hereunto Sete there hands the day & years above written."

Here follow the signatures of the various Indians named in the body of the instrument. It was recorded by Elizur Holyoke, recorder, under date of May 2, 1661.

For the first few years the growth of the settlement was not rapid, and, although many of the first settlers removed, their places were supplied by others, and the "Plantation of Agawam," as it was at that time designated, was in a healthy condition. The inhabitants were industrious and law-abiding, and the chief magistrate and ruling spirit of the colony was a man well qualified for the position he held, and in whom the people reposed the utmost confidence.

The causes which led to their emigration from the Old World were still fresh in their minds, and in 1637 the little band of religious zealots organized a church society, and in 1645 erected a church building, "which," says Judge Morris, "stood near the southeasterly corner of Court Square, on ground now partly in the square and partly in Elm Street."* The people assembled for worship at the sound of the drum, as shown by the following record, under date of Jan. 8, 1646:

"It is agreed by the plantation with John Mathews to beate the drum for the meetings for a year's space at 10 of the clock on the lecture days, and at 9 o'clock on the Lord's days in the forenoons only, and he is to beate it from Mr. Moxon's† to R. Stebbins' house, and ye meetings to begin within half an houre after, for which his payus he is to have 4d. in wampum of every family in the town, or a peck of Indian corn of thay who have not wampum."

The settlement was known as the "Plantation of Agawam" until 1640, when by a vote of the people it was given the name of Springfield, in honor of Mr. Pyncheon, who had resided at a place of that name in England.

The date of the incorporation of the town is shrouded in obscurity, if in fact it was ever incorporated. Mr. Bliss, in his address delivered at the opening of the town-hall, in 1828, doubtless after diligent search, says: "After searching thoroughly in Massachusetts and Connecticut, I have come to the conclusion that the town was never incorporated."

"Were I to fix the date it would be 1641, as from that time it was recognized by the name of the town of Springfield by the Legislature."

Few events of importance happened, save those narrated above, until 1651, when one transpired which, had the inhabitants been possessed of less sterling qualities, would have demoralized and doubtless ruined the plantation. Mr. Pyncheon, who had been the father of the settlement, fell under the ban of disfavor with the government at the Bay, in consequence of a book* written by him, which had recently been issued in England, and found its way to Boston. The doctrines of this work were deemed heretical, and in the failure to extract a full renunciation from Mr. Pyncheon his commission was taken from him, and he left the settlement in 1652 and returned to England, where he died. He was accompanied to England by the Rev. Mr. Moxon, whose children had fallen under the baneful influence of that blot on the fair fame of this old commonwealth,—witchcraft,—and he did not longer desire to remain in the place. Johnson, in his "Wonderworking Providence," says: "There hath of late been more than one or two in this town (Springfield) greatly suspected of witchcraft, yet have they used much diligence, both for the finding them out, and for the Lord's assisting them against their witchery; yet they have, as is supposed, bewitched not a few persons, among whom, two of the reverend elder's children." Upon the revocation by the General Court of the commission of Mr. Pyncheon, it was issued to his son-in-law, Henry Smith, who, however, did not exercise any of its functions, but returned with Mr. P. to England.

William Pyncheon, who is properly styled the founder of the settlement here, came from England with Gov. Winthrop, and became one of the founders of Roxbury. He was a man of great strength of character, indomitable will, untiring perseverance, and in every particular was well qualified for the discharge of the duties which were subsequently thrust upon him. He was one of the patentees named in the colony charter of 1627, and also in that of 1628, and was appointed magistrate and assistant in October, 1629, before leaving England.

Henry Smith was a man well qualified to direct the affairs of the new settlement, and was appointed by the General Court in March, 1636, as one of the commissioners to administer the settlements on the Connecticut River.

Not of the least importance among the pioneers was Jehu Burr, a carpenter, who came from Roxbury, and, in the language of Judge Morris, "during the two or three years of his residence here was evidently a man of some consequence. He left Springfield in 1640, and went to Connecticut."

The agent of the settlement in the erection of the first building, mentioned on a previous page, was John Cable, who first officiated in the capacity of constable in the town.

John Woodcock, who appeared as plaintiff in the first case tried in the plantation, seems to have kept the magistrate exceedingly busy. He not only appeared as plaintiff in the first case tried in the new settlement, but he figured as defendant in a slander case brought against him by the Rev. Mr. Moxon, and later as plaintiff in a similar case, in which Henry Gregory was defendant. He was also engaged in a suit with the said Gregory in which a "pigge" and a "hogge" seemed to have been the bone of contention. There was also more litigation in which he played a prominent rôle. William Blake and Mathew Mitchell remained but a short time; the former returned to Dorchester, and the latter removed to Connecticut.

The loss sustained by the departure of three so prominent and influential citizens as Pyncheon, Moxon, and Smith, in the words of Judge Morris,

"although a very serious one, and at the time deeply felt, did not permanently check the growth and prosperity of the town. The place of William Pyncheon was soon filled by his son John, with distinguished ability and success, and the loss of Mr. Moxon was fully compensated by the arrival, in 1659, of Rev. Pelatiah Glover, who soon after succeeded to Mr. Moxon's pulpit, and occupied his dwelling-house. . . . John Pyncheon, although a young man at the time of his father's departure, was a person of very superior character and abilities, and fully qualified for the responsible stations to which he was immediately called.

He was at once placed at the head of a commission, with Elizur Holyoke and Samuel Chapin as his associates, with full authority to administer the government of this town. He was soon after elected lieutenant of the military company at Springfield, and so, in the absence of his brother-in-law, Henry Smith, who had been appointed captain before he left for England, became the chief military officer here, holding successively the offices of captain, major, and eventually of colonel and commander-in-chief of the forces in this part of the State."†

During the first forty years the settlement did not increase with much rapidity, and besides the church mentioned previously, there was but one public building erected here during that period,—the jail, or house of correction, built soon after 1662. Judge Morris states that it was "located near what is now the intersection of Maple and Temple Streets," and is of the opinion that it "stood not far from the site of the house of Mr. William Gunn."

In addition to these buildings, there was one other that is deserving of especial mention in this connection, which, from the fact of its having served as a place of refuge for the inhabitants in the memorable King Philip war, was sometimes called the "Old Fort." This was the private residence of John Pyncheon, a cut of which is shown below, and was the first brick building erected in the Connecticut Valley. It was located on the west side of Main Street, a short distance north of Fort Street, and remained in the possession of the Pyncheon family until it was demolished in 1831.

During the above-named period the history of the little colony was one of peace and prosperity. No internal dissensions marred the harmony of the people, and the friendly intercourse auspiciously begun with the Indians by William Pyncheon was continued by his son John. At last, however, the savage spirit of the Indians was aroused against the white settlers throughout the valley by Philip, chief of the Wampanoags, and in June, 1675, began what has gone down in history as King Philip's war.

In this connection Judge Morris, in his "Historical Address," says:

"Notwithstanding the defenseless condition of Springfield, and the tendency of current events to awaken anxiety, its inhabitants seem to have felt no serious apprehension of danger threatening this town. Philip and his warriors were understood to be engaged in operations against the towns up the river, where he had the sympathy and co-operation of the Indians of that vicinity.

"The Springfield Indians were their own neighbors, with whom for nearly forty years they had lived in daily and friendly intercourse. . . .

"Whatever anxieties the disturbances north of them may at first have occasioned, the people here felt that, so long as the Springfield Indians were true to them, Philip could do them no harm.

"Such was the feeling of security with which the inhabitants of this town retired to their rest on the evening of Monday, the 4th of October, 1675. Their sympathies were warmly enlisted for the settlers in other towns, less favorably situated, to whose relief their husbands and brothers and sons had gone, and they doubtless offered fervent prayers that they might be preserved from the dangers that threatened them. For themselves and their families here they felt safe, and so they laid themselves down on that memorable Monday night to a quiet sleep.

"While such was the feeling of composure here, twenty miles down the river, at Windsor, there was one person whose bosom was agitated with emotions so powerful that they could not be concealed. This person was an Indian, named Toto, who was domesticated in the family of Mr. Wolcott, and was friendly to the English. He was in possession of a secret that stirred the very depths of his nature. Upon being questioned by the family, and urged to explain the cause of his manifest distress, he at length revealed the fact, which had in some way become known to him, that a plot had been formed to destroy Springfield, and that for this purpose a large body of Philip's men had been treacherously admitted by the Springfield Indians to their fort. This fort was situated on Long Hill, about a mile south from the central part of the town. The precise location is supposed to have been at the head of a ravine, running down from the brow of the hill, west of the present Long Hill Street, toward the Connecticut River.

"Upon the disclosure of this plot by Toto, immediately a swift messenger was dispatched to warn the people here of their danger, and another sent to Maj. Treat with similar information. The messenger arrived here in the night. The alarm was immediately given to all the inhabitants, and a messenger sent to Maj. Pynchon, at Hadley, for help.

"At that time there were three fortified houses here. One was the brick house of Maj. Pynchon, already noticed, standing near the head of Fort Street. Two others were near the southerly end of Main Street, the lower one perhaps not far from Broad Street.

"Roused at midnight from their slumbers by notice of the impending danger, the villagers fled at once to these fortified houses, taking with them in their flight such of their more valuable effects as they could readily remove. Every preparation was made for defense that the nature of the case would admit of. But there was a painful consciousness that if an immediate assault was made by the Indians the issue would be doubtful. There were some brave men and heroic women within the forts. Some of the leading men of the town were there. Deacon Samuel Chapin, one of the associates of Maj. Pynchon in the magistracy, and ancestor of all of that name in this country, was one of this number. Jonathan Burt, for a time the town clerk, was another. There, too, was Thomas Cooper, the lieutenant of the military company, who had but a short time before led a party of soldiers that marched from Springfield to the relief of burning Brookfield. These were wise and courageous men, but they were considerably advanced in life. The young and able-bodied men, who composed the military force of the town, were mostly absent with Maj. Pynchon at Hadley. Elizar Holyoke, the captain of the company, although not a young man, was probably with his command, and his son, Samuel Holyoke, who distinguished himself so much the next year in the famous fight at Turner's Falls, undoubtedly was with the troops at Hadley. More than all, the people at Springfield felt the absence of Maj. Pynchon himself, who, beyond any other man, possessed their confidence. Under these circumstances the people in the fortified houses watched with sleepless anxiety for any indication of an enemy.

"The night wore away, and the morning of Tuesday, October 5th, dawned upon the watchers. It brought no confirmation of their fears; the risen sun disclosed no savage foes. The houses, stretched along the street, showed no signs of having been molested. Everything remained so quiet that the impression prevailed in many minds that the alarm was a false one. The Rev. Mr. Glover, the minister, was so certain that there was no real danger to be apprehended, that he removed back to his own house his library, which had been transferred for safety to Maj. Pynchon's house. This opinion of one so much respected doubtless tended much to shake the faith of others in the reality of the danger. Of the number that questioned the truth of the report from Windsor was Lieut. Cooper, who determined to test its accuracy by a personal visit to the Indian fort. Taking with him Thomas Miller, the two set out on horseback down the main street toward Long Hill. They had passed about a quarter of a mile beyond the most southerly house, and entered the woods, which then skirted the settlement in that direction, but had not crossed Mill River, when their further progress was suddenly arrested by a discharge of firearms from some unseen foes. Miller was instantly killed. Cooper was fatally shot, and fell from his horse, but, being an athletic and resolute man, he contrived to mount again, and turned and rode at full speed back to the nearest fort. Before reaching it he received a second shot from the savages, who were in full pursuit, and died as he reached the fort.

"The Indians then burst upon the town with the greatest fury.

"Unable to gratify their thirst for blood by the slaughter of the people within the forts, they began the work of destroying their undefended houses, barns, and other property. The whole number of dwelling-houses in the town was forty-five, and in a short time thirty-two of these dwellings and twenty-four or twenty-five barns were in flames.

"The house of correction was destroyed.

"Maj. Pynchon's corn-mill and saw-mill were burned, and in general the corn and hay, in store for the coming winter, were consumed.

"Besides Cooper and Miller, one woman, Pentecost Matthews, wife of John Matthews, the drummer, who lived near the south end of the street, was killed. Four other persons were wounded, one of them, Edmund Pringrydays, so severely that he died a few days afterward.

"From one end of the street to the other, this scene of havoc and devastation was exhibited. The beleaguered people looked out gnawedly from the windows and loop-holes of the fortified houses, and saw the Indians, whom they had known familiarly as neighbors and friends for years—to whom they had done no wrong—ruthlessly apply the torch to their dwellings, and consign them, with their furniture, their stores of food, and all those little provisions they had made for the comfort of their families during the approaching winter, to a remorseless destruction.

"In this diabolical work the Springfield Indians, some forty in number, were not a whit behind the strangers whom they had admitted to their fort. Indeed, first and foremost in this work, 'the ringleader in word and deed,' as Rev. John Russell, of Hadley, wrote the next day to Gov. Leverett, was Wequoguan, the chief sachem of the Springfield Indians, 'a man in whom as much confidence had been placed by the settlers as in any of the Indians.' Another chief, well known to our people, while actively engaged in this mischief, loudly proclaimed to them that he was one who had burned Quaboag, and would serve them the same way.

"The assailants did not go entirely unscathed in this work of destruction. Some of them were shot from the fortified houses. It is said that one of them, who had taken a large pewter platter from one of the deserted houses, received a mortal wound by a bullet through the platter, which he was vainly using as a shield. Hoyt, in his 'History of the Indian Wars,' states that at the time he wrote, this platter, with a bullet-hole through it, was still preserved in Springfield as a memento of that day."

The following is a copy of a letter written by Maj. Pynchon to Rev. John Russell, of Hadley, the day after the burning of Springfield:

"SPRINGFIELD, Octo. 5, '75.

The destruction of their dwellings, barns, mills, hay, grain, etc., was a severe blow, and in the following year they petitioned the General Court for leave to remove from the place. The following is a copy of the original petition:

"To ye Honorable Governor & Council at Boston or General Court Assembled:

"The Inhabitants of Springfield Humbly present your Honours with Sundry Grievances Craving your serious Consideration thereof, & Redres therein wch are as follow:

"First. The non allowance of pay For quartering Garrison Souldiers to lee considered: Whether they were for ye towne benefit, or ye Countries more principally; the Towne being the greatest part layd in ye ashes, & ye farms left to ye mercy of ye Indians, that had it not been thought of great Concernment for ye Country to have garisons here for ye releef of Armys Conveighing amunition, provision, &c., as the Army should stand in need; the inhabitants had deserted ye place & betooke yemselves elsewhere, where they might have secured themselves from y^t danger they dayly run in (which hath lost severall their lives) & have advantaged themselves more elsewhere, They being many Forced to hyre land here there own being so remote, & to be as garison souldiers themselves where they had no Concerns.

"2dly. Wee humbly Conceive (yt wee being detained in Garrison upon a Country Concerns as aforesayd in obedience to a law made to yt end) That all such as had no houses or Concerns in ye town ought rather to be allowed for keeping Garrison (as well as Garrison Souldiers) They being put of from their lands & having no way to get a livelihood, yet were detained in ye place by vertue of sayd law.

"3ly. No town in these parts have had ye Indians so Constantly skulking about them as wee have, which hath employed our townsmen in joynng wth ye souldiers in hunting after them a great part of ye summer, night & day, pursuing & hunting of them, killing some, & frighting others away.

"4thly. The great los wee have sustained in our cattle, wch wee had prevented had wee had liberty to have removed. The Indians having killed & driven away so many cattle & horses, that wee are much impoverisht thereby.

"5thly. Upon ye premised Considerations as wee Conceive in Justice we ought to be exempted from keeping Garrison sould. (viz) hearing their diet, & alsoe to have allowance some Measre for such of our inhabitants keeping Garrison yt had no Concerns in ye place. Otherwise many, nay, the Generality of the inhabitants are absolutely unable to defray such Country Rates as Legally shal bee layd upon them.

"6thly. Another Grievance is ye inequality yt is made by the Comitte between twixt disbursements and payments, & They allowing us but 4s. 6d. pr weeke ye usenall Rate for diet for pastoring horses, &c., which was usually given amongst us at our rates of corn (viz) wheat at 3s. 6d. pr bushel. & indian corn at 2s. 4d. pr bushel, & ordering for ye payment of thees disbursements wheat to passe at 6s. 4d. pr bushel, & Indian at 3s. 6d. pr bushel, when other counties have 5s. 4d. per weeke. Wee humbly Crave your serious Consideration of ye premises and yt such Redres may bee afforded as may incourag our people to stay & build up their ruins, otherwise wee shall be disinabled & discouraged either to stay or make payment of Legall demands.

"Wee are your Your Honours Huble suppliants,
The selectmen, by the towns appointment,

"JOHN HITCHCOCK."

This petition for removal was not granted, and when at the close of the war peace once more threw its charitable mantle over the valley, the inhabitants of Springfield sought to retrieve the great loss they had sustained, and in a few years marks of the desolation and ruin of that October day were obliterated, and prosperity again reigned among the persevering members of this unfortunate settlement.

ORIGINAL ALLOTMENTS.

During the first half-century the dwelling-houses of the town were all situated on the west side of what is now Main Street, with lots extending back to the river. There were forty-five grants of lots in the original settlement of the street, and were in width as follows: one, six rods; twenty-five, eight rods; twelve, ten rods; three, fourteen rods; while Mr. Pynchon's was thirty rods; Elizur Holyoke's, twenty rods; and Harry Smith's, twenty rods.

These grants were probably all made between the years 1636 and 1652, and it is evident that allotments were made to many who were not here until many years after the first settlement, for but thirteen persons were assessed when a tax was levied in 1639. Of this tax, which amounted to £41 4s., Mr. Pynchon paid more than half.

"Two years afterward allotments of planting lands were made to 17 persons, and in 1643 there were 22. In 1646, 42 persons were assessed to pay for the purchase of the Indians, and there were 6 vacant lots also assessed. In 1656 there were 52 who had taken the oath of fidelity. In 1664 there were recorded as admitted inhabitants, 74 persons. These were all there were in different parts of the town."

"The rule of allotting and dividing the lands in the town, before the year 1685, is nowhere laid down" (says Hon. George Bliss in his address), "except what is stated in the original agreement, in 1636. A power was, however, given to persons designated from time to time, to admit inhabitants and to make allotments of lands, according to the original agreement. This must have been done in very many instances without being entered on the town records. In regard to the greater part of the original settlers on the town street, the only evidence of their title is in the record of the town recorder, and there is commonly neither the date of the grant nor the time of recording mentioned upon record. The entry is usually in this form: A. B. is by grant of the plantation possessed of a house-lot, 8 rods broad and 80 rods long, extending from the street to the river, and of a piece of meadow, opposite thereto, of equal breadth, extending east from the street 40 rods, to the foot of the hill, and of a wood-lot in the rear thereof, in the same direction, of the same breadth, 80 rods; and also of a lot over against his house-lot on the west side of the river, extending from the great river to Agawam River, all bounded on the north by C. D., and on the south by E. F."

EARLY REGULATIONS AND BY-LAWS.

The early regulations of the settlement were as varied as they were extensive. In one of the earliest records, Oct. 17, 1638, an anxiety is manifested about the scarcity of timber.

"It is ordered, with the consent of the plantation, that from this day forward noe trees shall be cut down, or taken away by any man in the compass of grounds from the Mill River upward to John Reader's lott, which parsall of ground is appointed for house-lots, and in case any man shall trespass, contrary to this order, he shall be liable to the fine of five shillings."

Nov. 23, 1638.—"It is ordered that a foot-path and stiles be allowed at every man's lotts, and next the greates River."

Feb. 14, 1639.—"It is ordered that it shall be lawfull for any inhabitant to fall any canoe-trees and make them for his own use or for the use of an inhabitant, yt grow on ye common, but not to sell or anyways pass away any canoe out of ye plantation until it be five years old, and in case any transgress this order after this day he shall be liable to a fine of twenty shillings.

"It is also ordered yt it shall be lawfull for any man to put over horse, cowes or younger cattle, on the other side of the river at the first of November and to ake them away thence on the 14th of April, and if any shall trespass this order he shall be liable to pay any damages that shall appear to be done by his cattayle."

"It is ordered that all yt leave a ditch by the highway before their doors shall keep it well scoured for the ready passage of the water, that it may not be pent up to flowe the meadowe."

Nov. 14, 1639.—"It is mutually agreed on by the plantation that ye sealed Peck which Mr. Pynchon hath, shall be the ordinary peck to buy and sell by in the plantation, and whoever will may repaire to the constable and have his peck sealed, paying his 2d. for his labor with ye seal."

Particular attention was also given to the matter of training, as,

"It is also ordered yt ye exercise of training shall be practiced one day in every month, and if occasions doe sometimes hinder then the like space of tyme shall be observed another tyme, though it be two days after one another. And yt this tyme of training is referred to ye discretion of Henry Smith, who is chosen by mutual consent to be Seargant of the Company, who shall have power to choose a Corporal for his assistant. And whosoever shall absent himself without a lawfull excuse, shall forfeit twelve pence, and yt all above 15 years of age shall be counted for soldiers, and the time to begin the first Thursday in December next."

"It is also mutually agreed on yt no person in this plantation shall trade, give, or lend to any Indian any quantity of Powder, little or great, under ye penalty of 40s. for any tyme yt any person shall be found a transgressor in this kind."

It seems that in the early days "ye people" of the town jointly made arrangement for the grinding of their grain, as is shown by the following quaint record found in the old town book, under date of "June 4, 1666:"

"At a Towne meeting Purposely to settle something about ye mill. It is agreed that Mr. Holyoke, or his assignes, shall well grind what Corne of this Towne of Springfield shall be brought to his mill, and thereby furnish ye Towne wth good meale for Ten years; except something extraordinary doe intervene to hinder, as fire, or floods, or extreme drought, that makes ye water to fail thereby, when as ye drought is not by reason of ye Bank or ditches being faulty, and in case People are damaged to get meale from other Places by reason of this mill being defective, Mr. Holyoke shall allow for it. In consideration whereof ye towne doth engage to allow ye sd Mr. Holyoke ye eleventh part of whatever Corne shall be ground at ye sd mill for ye terme of Ten years, as aforesaid. And hertoe Mr. Holyoke did ingage himself in ye Towne-meeting, viz.: to performe what in the agreement concerns himself, his heirs, and assignes, And ye Towne did by a full and cleane vote declar their assent to what in the agreement concerns themselves. Moreover ye towne ordered this agreement to be then entered in ye Towne book, How that Mr. Holyoke should set his hand to it, thereby ingaging himself and his heirs. And ye Towne designated John Pynchon, Geo. Colton, Robt. Ashley, Miles Morgan, an Samuel Marshfield to set their hands to yt in yt behaffe of ye Towne, and their hands being to it, this ingagement is firme to all intents and constructions in Law. According hereunto ye aforementioned persons have hereunto set their hands the 4th day of June, 1662.

"For as much as order is beautiful, & especially in ye house of God, and ye want thereof is displeasing to God and breeds disturbance among men, And, whereas, it doth appear that Divers young persons, & sometimes others, Notwithstanding there being called upon, Doe yet neglect to attend unto such order as is inscribed them, either for their sitting in ye meeting-house, or for their reforming of disorders in & about ye meeting-house in tyme of God's Publick worship: It is therefore hereby ordered, that whosoever of this Towneship shall not, from tyme to tyme, in respect of their sitting in ye meeting-house, Submit themselves to the ordering of ye Selectmen & Deacons, or such as were empowered to seate and order persons in ye meeting-house; All such persons as shall refuse or neglect to attend unto order as aforesaid, Shall forfeite as is hereafter expressed, viz., Hee or shee that shall not take his or her seate ordered them from tyme to tyme, But shall, on ye days or tymes of God's publick worship, Goe into or alide in any other seat appointed for some other, Such disorderly person or persons, for ye first offence, shall forfeite three shillings four pence to ye Towne Treasury, which shall be exacted by warrant from ye Selectmen, directed to ye Constable to Levy ye same. And if afterwards Hee or Shee shall still persist in such disorder, they shall pay Sixe shillings eight pence, as a fine to ye Towne, to be exacted as aforesaid, and if a 3d tyme they shall persist in such obstinacy, such person to pay Ten Shillings to ye Towne, to be exacted as aforesaid; And if afterward they shall still persist in such obstinacy, ye Selectmen are hereby ordered to complayne of such person to ye Magistrate or County Court to deale with them as they shall judge meete.

"And, whereas, the seate which was made by ye Towne at a common Towne Charge (formerly called the Guard Seate) is now appointed by the Selectmen (who accordingly have ye disposing of that Seate) for Boys to sit in, & ye Selectmen having declared that the smaller Boys should sit there, that they may be more in sight of ye Congregation, & having warned all men out of ye sd Seate, both married and other growne persons, some and whereof doe still continue to sit there, and seeme as if they did it with a high hand,

"It is therefore hereby ordered, that noe person of this Towneship above ye age of 14 or 15 years shall sit in ye Seate aforesaid, formerly called ye Guard Seate, unless he be ordered to sit there to look to ye Boys. This order was Published on a lecture day, ye 31st of January, 1665."

"At a meeting of ye Selectmen, April 7, 1669, Miles Morgan and Jonathan Burt are ordered to sit up in ye gallery to give a check to disorders in youth and young men in tyme of God's Publick worship. Anthony Dorchester, to sit on ye Guard Seate for like end."

"Eliakim Hitchcock, of New Haven, desiring to be admitted into this Towneship to dwell, hath Liberty, provided he being certified from New Haven, if he is an orderly Liver there, & if his father there desires it, & appoint him on his remove, & provided also that he secure two sufficient men of this Towne to enter into 30£ Bond to secure ye Township by sd Hitchcock or any of his family."

At the meeting of selectmen in 1664 it was voted that a penalty be imposed upon persons absenting themselves from town-meetings, and 20s. was also the penalty for failing to serve in offices to which any person should be chosen.

The inhabitants of the little plantation, in 1664, evidently manifested a decided interest in the moral welfare of the place, it being ordered "that if any man of this township, or any proprietors of land in the Towne, or any that shall or may dispose of land here, shall, under color of friendship, or otherwise, entertayne any person or persons here to abide as inmates, or shall subdivide their house-lots, or any other of their lots, to entertayn them as tenants, or otherwise, for longer time than one month, or thirty days, without consent or allowance of the selectmen, shall forfeit 20s. to the Towne." Another regulation of this period was, that no persons should come into the settlement and there remain more than thirty days without the consent of the selectmen. Not only did the selectmen designate who should come into the settlement, but also who should not remain therein, as the records of 1692 show that about 60 families were ordered out of the place. These various persons were designated by name and occupation. Some were designated as laborers, barbers, gentlemen, etc., etc.

"Towne-meeting, Feb'y 4th, 1672:

"Whereas, by a late law of the country made, It is ordered that such persons as have liberty of voting in Towne affairs, must be of £20 estate, rateable to a single country rate, yet not to cutt off the said privileges from them that had liberty by a former law wherein is expressed, that if persons have £20 estate rateable to a single country rate, with other conditions, they shall have ye same privileges,

"This towne doth now order yt the Recorder for ye Towne shall joyn with ye Selectmen to examine by former rates to ye country what persons of this Plantation now residing amongst us have at any tyme had by law that privilege, And that then the Recorder shall enter their names in ye Towne Books.

BY-LAWS.

The following is a compilation of the ancient by-laws of the town, as given by the late Hon. George Bliss, Sr., in an address delivered at the opening of the old town-hall in 1828:

"Feb'y. the 5th, 1649.—A copy of such orders as are made and confirmed by the Inhabitants of Springfield the day and year above written.

"1. For the prevention of disorders in puttinge cattell to pasture at the other

"2. Whereas, the planting of Indian corne in the meddows and swamps on the other side of Agowam river, hath occasioned a long stay after mowing tyme, before men can put theyre cattell thither to pasture. Therefore, it is ordered (with the consent of all those that have plaoting ground there), that no more Indian corn shall be planted there either in the meddows or swamps that see the cattell that have allotments there may be put over by the 15th day of September yearly, provided they take a sure course to prevent theyre cattell from goinge over the river, either by fencing, or a keeper in the day tyme, and by securing them in some inclosure in the night. But there is liberty for calves to be put over thither by the 14th of August. And in case any person shall put cattell there before the day expressed, he shall forfeit 2*s.* 6*d.* by the head for every such default, and also be lyable to pay all damage that his cattell shall doe on either side of the river. [This order was soon changed, and the same rule adopted as in the first regulation.]

"3. It is ordered that if any Inhabitant shall desire to make a Canoe, he may have liberty to fell any tree or trees in the towne commons, and make it or them into Canoes for his own use, or for the use of any Inhabitant. And if any shall transgress this order, it shall be lawful for the selectmen to appoynt men to pull downe and demolish such building.

"6. For the prevention of sundry evils that May befall this Township, through ill-disposed persons, that may thrust themselves in amongst us against the likinge and consent of the generality of the inhabitants, or select Townsmen, by purchasing a lott, or a place of habitation, &c. It is therefore ordered and declared, that no inhabitant shall sell or in any kind pass away his house lot, or any part of it, or any other of his allotments to any stranger before he have made the select Townsmen acquainted who his chapman is, and they accordingly allow of his admission, under penalty of paying twenty shillings for every parcell of land so sold, or forfeitinge his land soe sold or passed away. But if the select Townsmen see gronde to disallow of the admission of the said chapman, then the town or the Inhabitants shall have 30 days' tyme to resolve whether they will buy the said allotments, which said allotments they may buy, as indifferent partys shall apprise them. But in case the Inhabitants shall delay to make a purchase of the said lands above 30 days after the propounding of it to the select Townsmen, then the said seller shall have his liberty to take his chapman, and such chapman or stranger shall be esteemed as entertained and allowed of by the towne as an Inhabitant.

"7. THE REVOLUTION.

As the Revolutionary period, so far as it bears upon the history of this valley, is presented in full in the general history, it is only necessary in this connection to refer to the arduous struggle.

The citizens of Springfield were alive to the exigency of the times, and, July 12, 1774, held a meeting, at which a long series of resolutions were adopted as expressive of the sentiment of the town. The following extract is clipped from the last resolution:

"And though we should injure no man in his person or property for a diversity of opinion, yet we shall not think ourselves bound to continue our favors to any gentleman who, lost to the sentiments of gratitude and humanity, can coldly sacrifice his country's liberties to his own private emolument."

The town clerk was directed to transmit a copy to the town clerk at Boston. At a meeting held Jan. 3, 1775, at "ye court-house," a committee was appointed to see "that a strict observance be had to the resolves of the Continental Congress," and another committee was also appointed to receive subscriptions for the suffering poor of Boston and Charlestown. Immediately after the Lexington alarm the following dispatch was received here:

"WATERTOWN, Wednesday morning.—To all the friends of American Liberty, be it known that this morning, before break of day, a brigade consisting of about 1000 or 1200 men landed at Phipps' farm, in Cambridge, and marched to Lexington, where they found a company of our colony militia in arms, upon whom they fired without any provocation and killed six, and wounded four others. By an express this moment from Boston, we find another brigade are now on the march from Boston, supposed to be about 1000. The bearer, Mr. Isaac Bissell, is charged to alarm the country quite to Connecticut, and all persons are desired to furnish him with such horses as they may be needed. I have spoke with several persons who have seen the dead and wounded. Pray, let the delegates from this colony to Connecticut see this; they know.

"Z. PALMER, one of the Committee of Safety.

A company of Minute-Men was immediately marched to Boston. This company consisted of sixty men, and was officered as follows: Captain, Gideon Burt; First Lieutenant, Walter Pynchon; Second Lieutenant, Aaron Steele. From this time until the close of the war heavy drafts were made on Springfield for men and stores. At one time the male portion of the town old enough to carry a musket was so nearly depopulated that many of the men who were drafted paid their fines, being compelled to this course, or leave their families in abject poverty.

The town responded promptly to the various calls, and Nov. 14, 1775, the sum of £52 14s. 6d. was appropriated for paying the Minute-Men and providing for the soldiers.

In January, 1776, the town was called upon to furnish 12 blankets. In the following June a call for 44 men was made. These each received, as bounty, £7.

In 1778, £780 were voted for bounty to 13 men. Under the call for troops June 5th, the following were appointed a committee to assist the militia officers in raising the men: Ensign P. Chapin, Capt. Thomas Stebbins, Thomas Williston, William Pynchon, Jr., Capt. David Burt, Maj. Gideon Burt, and Luke Bliss.

Jan. 29, 1780, $2400 in "hard money," or an equivalent in paper, was raised for men.

SPRINGFIELD IN 1776.

The village of Springfield in 1776 was but a collection of about 150 houses, a court-house, school-house, and a solitary church. Most of these were on the west side of the main street, and were on the "home-lots," reaching from the irregular main street back to the river, the rear of which was used for pasture-lands. On the east side of the main street was the town brook and the "hasseky marish." What is now State Street was known as the "causeway," from the fact that a corduroy-road was laid across the marsh. This road ran over the meadow, over Armory Hill, at that time but a pine plain, and through the woods to the Bay Path. Ferry Lane ran from the main street down to the ferry that was established in 1683. The common was a part of what is now Court Square. The court-house, built in 1722-23, stood in the middle of what is now Sanford Street and jutting out into the road, where it was occupied for many years, and about 1826, after the erection of the new court-house, was transferred to the parish. There were two whipping-posts near this temple of justice, one directly in front of it, the other an elm-tree which was desecrated by that use, in front of where now stands H. & J. Brewer's drug-store. Near the court-house and a little south-east stood the school-house. Near the buildings and on the corner, where stands the savings-bank building, J. & J. Dwight had a small red house that was used for a store. On the common near the large elm stood the celebrated Parsons tavern which afterward became famous for its peripatetic changes, and now finally rests on Court Street, having outlived its usefulness, and had the honor of sheltering Washington under its roof May 21, 1789. On the southwest corner of the common stood the church, built about 1750. The main entrance was toward the east. The square, straight-backed pews, high pulpit, huge sounding-board, broad galleries, and division line between the males and females, were all there, as was customary in churches of that day. The Rev. Robert Breck, pastor of the church, occupied the parsonage, where now is situated the Fallon Block. This old building is now on Millman Street, between Main and Dwight, and is doing duty as a laundry. Clustered around the old Parsons tavern, and not far from it, were the tavern kept by Moses Church, where Tinkham's store now stands, and the Worthington tavern, near the corner of what is now Bridge and Main Streets, the residences of Deacon Daniel Harris, Daniel Lombard, on the south corner of Pyncheon and Main Streets, Wm. Pyncheon, Jr., where the Haynes House now stands, and John Pyncheon, across the way. The lots on which these dwellings were built were mostly original home-lots. Hon. George Pyncheon lived on the site occupied by the Goodrich Block, and Dr. Chas. Pyncheon on the corner of Main Street and Ferry Lane, in whose building an apothecary-store was kept.

Nathaniel Brewer lived down Ferry Lane, on the bank of the river. The men whose names are here given are found prominently mentioned in the early legislation of the town, and connected with the important and statesmanlike views that were uttered and issued at the agitation of the Revolutionary war. A copy of the action of the several committees, as taken from the Springfield town records of that date, will be found in the general history.

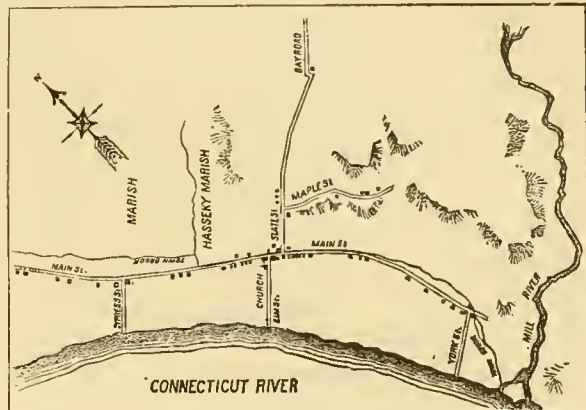

Above these residences, along the line of the street, on the west side, were situated the dwellings of Joseph Moores and Thomas Stebbins, the latter of whom had a pottery opposite his place.

Jonathan Dwight lived where Homer Foote & Co.'s block stands; next stood the Collins' homestead and the "Old Gaol" tavern, and the Moses Bliss place, and Josiah Dwight's house, with his distillery across the way.

Luke Bliss lived in a dwelling opposite the Dwight store, where the Webber drug-store stands. Scattered along the river-side toward Mill River lived the Elys, Warners, Burts, Ferrys, Cooleys, and Jedediah Bliss and others.

The village at this time had but six streets, the plan of which is shown below. Leading westerly from Main Street were three narrow lanes,—Ferry Lane (Cypress Street), Meeting-House Lane (Elm Street), and the Lower Landing, or York Street. Leading easterly from Main, there was but one street,—State. This was laid out early, across what was known as "hasseky marish," and was made passable by corduroy bridges. It was a toll road. In addition to these there was the beginning of Maple Street, or what was then known as the "road to Charles Brewer's."

MAP OF SPRINGFIELD, 1776.

WASHINGTON'S VISIT TO SPRINGFIELD.

The following are extracts from Washington's diary, referring to his visit to this town and its neighborhood in the fall of 1789:

"Wednesday, Oct. 21.—By promise, I was to have breakfasted at Mr. Ellsworth's, at Windsor, on my way to Springfield, but the morning proving very wet, and the rain not ceasing till past 10 o'clock, I did not set out till half-after that hour. I called, however, on Mr. Ellsworth, and stayed there near an hour; reached Springfield by 4 o'clock, and while dinner was getting examined the Continental stores at this place, which I found in very good order at the buildings (on the hill above the town), which belong to the United States.

"The barracks (also public property) are going fast to destruction, and in a little time will be no more, without repair.

"The laboratory, which seems to be a good building, is in tolerably good repair, and the powder-magazine, which is of brick, seems to be in excellent order, and the powder in it very dry.

"A Col. Worthington, Col. Williams, Adjt.-Gen'l of the State of Massachusetts, Gen. Shepherd, Mr. Lyman, and many other gentlemen, sat an hour or two with me in the evening at Parson's tavern, where I lodged, and which is a good house.

"About six miles before I came to Springfield I left the State of Connecticut and entered that of Massachusetts. The distance from Hartford to Springfield is 28 miles. At the latter the river is crossed in scows set over with poles, and is about 80 rods wide. Between the two places is a fall, and others above that, again,—notwithstanding which, much use is made of the navigation for transportation in flats of about five tons' burden. Seven miles on this side Hartford is Windsor, a tolerably pleasant but not a large village. Between Windsor and Suffield you pass through a level, barren, uncultivated plain for several miles.

"Suffield stands high and pleasant; the land good. From hence you descend into another plain, where the lands—being good—are much better cultivated. The whole road from Hartford to Springfield is level and good, except being too sandy in places,—and the fields inclosed with posts and rails generally, there not being much stone. The crops of corn, except on the interval lands on the river, are more indifferent (though not bad) in the eastern than we found in the western part of the State of Connecticut.

"There is a great equality in the people of this State. Few or no opulent men, and no poor. Great similitude in their buildings, the general fashion of which is a chimney (always of brick or stone), and door in the middle, with a staircase fronting the latter, running up by the side of the former; two flush stories, with a very good show of sash and glass-windows; the size generally from 30 to 50 feet in length, and from 20 to 30 in width, exclusive of a back shed, which seems to be added as the family increases.

"The farms, by the contiguity of the houses, are small, not averaging more than 100 acres. They are worked chiefly by oxen (which have no other feed than hay), with a horse, and sometimes two, before them, both in plow and cart. In their light lands and in their sleights they work horses, but find them much more expensive than oxen.

"Springfield is on the east side of Connecticut River, before you come to which a large branch of it, called Agawam, is crossed by a bridge. It stands under the hill on the interval land, and has only one meeting-house."

EARLY RESIDENTS.

In addition to William Pyncheon and his son John, Henry Smith, the Rev. Mr. Moxon, and others mentioned on a previous page, there were several other early residents, though at a later day than those noted above, who are entitled to especial mention.

Prominent among the number who figured conspicuously in the affairs of this section of the State at the beginning of the Revolution was Hon. John Worthington. He was a graduate of Yale College, and was bred to the Bar, was a member of the Governor's council, colonel in the militia, and a magistrate of distinction and ability. He was a wealthy man, and is said to have been of a haughty and imperious nature, and was called one of the gods of the Connecticut Valley. His sway seemed to be complete over this town, and Joseph Ferre once exclaimed, "John Worthington rules this town with a rod of iron!" It is said that at the breaking out of the Revolution his sympathies were with Great Britain, but whether this was true or not, certain it is that when questioned by the town committee in regard to his politics, he explained his position in so satisfactory a manner that the committee, by Nathaniel Brewer, its chairman, "recommended him to the favorable opinion of the public, and to the treatment and respect due to a friend of his country." "This town, having heard him on the same matters, voted themselves also satisfied therewith."

Col. Worthington owned the first umbrella in the town, —not, however, for use in rain, but as a sunshade. Of his daughters, one married Jonathan Bliss, one Col. Thomas Dwight, another the celebrated Fisher Ames, while the youngest became the wife of a Mr. Williams, of Wethersfield, Conn. He died in April, 1800.

A prominent representative of "ye olden time," and about the last of the "silk-stocking, short-breeches, and silver-shoe-buckle gentry," was Jonathan Dwight. He was a native of Dedham, Mass., although he came here from Halifax, Nova Scotia, at about the age of ten years. As mentioned on a previous page, he was one of the firm of J. & J. Dwight, whose store was located on the site now occupied by the savings-bank building. "He was of small stature," says Dr. Alfred Booth, in his sketches of Springfield, "active habits, nervous temperament, a great smoker, lighting his pipe in summer with a burning-glass, and described by many who remember him as often crossing the street in such a cloud of smoke as to be nearly invisible." After speaking of his custom of wearing short breeches and silk stockings, Dr. Booth adds: "Rather scant clothing, the boys thought, who knew of his practice of going out to fodder the cows before daylight or breakfast, cold winter mornings, with his stockings down about his heels, and rubbing his legs when he came in to get up a circulation, as he said." He was the chief mover in the organization of the Unitarian Church, and built the church edifice and presented it to the society. He died in 1831, aged eighty-eight years. He was grandfather of George Dwight and Mrs. Homer Foot, both of whom are residents of this city. Another grandchild, now deceased, was the wife of Hon. George Bancroft, United States Minister to Prussia, who at one time was a resident of Springfield. The other member of the old-time house of J. & J. Dwight was Josiah Dwight, a cousin of Jonathan, through whose influence the latter came to this place. He was here in the mercantile business as early as 1753.

One of the ablest lawyers prior to the Revolution was Jonathan Bliss, who studied his profession with Col. John Worthington. He represented the town at Boston several times, and in 1768 was stigmatized as one of the famous "rescinders." It seems that a measure which was regarded as revolutionary in its character had been passed by the General Court, and when the king and council called for the rescinding of the action, 17 voted aye,—Bliss being among the number,—to 90 in the negative. This course rendered him somewhat unpopular, and he went to England, and subsequently located in Fredericton, New Brunswick, where he was chosen king's attorney, afterward chief-justice of the Court of King's Bench. He married a daughter of Col. Worthington, in 1791. One of his sons became a lawyer in London; another, chief-justice of the Court of Queen's Bench in Nova Scotia.

Luke Bliss, brother of Jonathan, was also prominently identified with the interests of Springfield, and at various times represented the town in the General Court at Boston.

Among other early residents, most of whom were prominently identified with the affairs of the old town, are mentioned the names of Moses Church, Maj. William, Maj. William, Jr., Walter, Edward, and Dr. Charles Pynchon, Rev. B. Howard, Rev. Robert Breck, Nathaniel Brewer, Samuel Lyman, Joseph Stebbins, Thomas Stebbins, Elizur Williams, Col. William Smith, numerous members of the Chapin family, etc.

Among the prominent men who have been residents of Springfield, other than those whose names appear in the chapters on the war, press, medical profession, and churches, may be mentioned the names of Enos Hitchcock, D.D., Calvin Chapin, D.D., William Harris, D.D., Hon. Benjamin F. Wade, United States Senator from Ohio, Francis Warriner, an able writer, Worthington Hooker, M.D., and Hon. David A. Wells.

INITIAL EVENTS.

During the Revolutionary times the inhabitants were debarred of many of the conveniences of life which had heretofore been supplied from the mother-country, and not among the least of these was the common red earthenware, and it was no trivial event in the history of the little hamlet when a pottery was established by Capt. Thomas Stebbins. It was located at the east side of the town street. The clay, which was brought from Long Hill, was pulverized by a mill similar to the old bark-mills, and was then moulded into crocks and baked.

It is evident that clocks were not among the household goods of the first settlers. There was but one in the place as late as 1753. It was owned by Josiah Dwight, and was a great curiosity to the people, who used to stop and hear it strike.

It was as late as 1810 when the first piano was brought in the village. It belonged to David Ames, and it seems was quite a wonder, as the people would stop and listen to the sounds. The second one in the village, in 1822, was that of James S. Dwight.

Cooking-stoves were introduced here in about the year 1810, but did not come into general use until many years later. About ten years ago the plates of an old cooking-stove, which for a long time had been in the possession of Justin Ely, in West Springfield, were in the possession of Mr. W. L. Wilcox. The stove was doubtless one of the earliest in this section, as one of the plates bore the stamp of "Philadelphia, 1774." The castings of this stove probably weighed 800 or 900 pounds.

One of the first dealers in stoves was Daniel Bontecon. Philip Wilcox was also an early dealer in and inventor of stoves.

The first dentist who administered to the wants of the people was Dr. Appleton, in 1825. He was followed, in 1826, by Dr. Darrah. Otis H. Cooley made the first daguerreotypes in 1843.

EARLY TAVERNS.

One of the earliest taverns in this place was known as the Parson's Inn, and stood near the centre of what is now Court Square. Here Gen. Washington lodged upon his visit to the town in 1789.

Another of the representative inns of "ye olden time" was that kept by John Worthington, father of Col. Worthington, who was styled one of the "River Gods." This was located on lands between Bridge and Worthington Streets, originally allotted to Jehu Burr. In this building Col. Worthington died. After his death it was closed for a time, but during the war of 1812 was reopened and kept by Elijah Goodrich.

One of the places of "entertainment for man and beast" prior to the Revolution was the tavern of Maj. Joseph Stebbins, which was located on the west side of the "town street," nearly opposite the present Carew Street. The old tavern and its hospitable landlord figured somewhat conspicuously during the Revolution. It is said that at one time Maj. Stebbins had his cellar full of rum and molasses, the plunder of American privateers. It was stored far inland to avoid seizure by the British. An army paymaster once left several thousand dollars with Maj. Stebbins, in Continental money, until he should return, and the landlord rested uneasy as the custodian of so much wealth, until its depreciation rendered it worthless. During Shays' insurrection a party under the command of Parsons were at one time quartered in this old house.

The old building known in 1774 as the Hitchcock House occupied the present site of Emery Court. A barn in the rear of this building was used as a laboratory for the manufacture of cartridges. This house was purchased in 1774 of Moses Church by Ebenezer Stebbins.

The "Old Gaol Tavern" was another famous resort. The jail was built of logs, and was annexed to the rear of the tavern. In 1792, when the courts were removed to Northampton, the jail was abolished, but the tavern was still open as late as 1810, and was kept by William Colton. Another old hostelry of this period was the Bates Tavern, which was located on the site now occupied by the Fort Block. This was one of the most noted hotels in all New England, rendered famous by the royal entertainment given travelers by "Uncle Jerry" and "Aunt Phebe," as the host and hostess were familiarly called.

In 1821 the "Hampden Coffee-House" was erected. It stood on the north side of Court Square. Below is given a cut of the building.

HAMPDEN COFFEE-HOUSE.

As time passed on, and the city grew in wealth and population, it soon became evident that the importance of the place demanded additional hotel accommodations of a better class, and in 1841 the Massasoit House enterprise was started. The Judge Hooker property was purchased by Israel M. Parsons and Marvin Chapin, in 1841, for the sum of $8000, and in the same year a contract made with Capt. Chas. McClallan, of Chicopee, for the erection of a building. The financial depression of 1842 came, which seemed to paralyze the enterprise for a time, and finally Mr. Chapin purchased Mr. Parsons' interest, and took into partnership with him his brother, Ethan S., at that time keeping a hotel at Chicopee. Under this firm the erection of the building was commenced, and the first room completed was the barber-shop, in the basement, early in June, 1843. During the same month the hotel was opened. Some difficulty was experienced in securing a name for the building, and finally a gentleman from Boston suggested Massasoit, and soon after the barber inquired the name of the house, as he wanted to advertise his shop, and, upon being told that the name of Massasoit had been mentioned, announced the opening of his shop under the Massasoit House.

Thus was the name given to a house which has since become famous both in this country and Europe, and much credit is due to its enterprising progenitors, and those through whose labor and influence it has reached its present enviable reputation. Numerous locally-famous banquets have been served at the Massasoit, and Kossuth once held a reception here. Among the distinguished men who have spoken from the balcony may be mentioned Daniel Webster, Edward Everett, Jefferson Davis, Wendell Phillips, Andrew Johnson, Kossuth, Gen. Benjamin F. Butler, Stephen A. Douglas, Gen. McClellan, and Gen. Sherman. Gen. Grant has also bowed his acknowledgments from this balcony, and in addition to other distinguished men Secretary Seward and Charles Dickens have been housed under its hospitable roof.

HAYNES' HOTEL.

This large and commodious hotel was erected by Tilly Haynes. In 1876 it was purchased by Emerson Gaylord and E. C. Goodman. Its present proprietors are C. H. Goodman & Co.

THE COOLEY HOTEL.

was erected by J. M. Cooley in 1849, and he has since been its proprietor.

Other hotels are the Belmont, Evans House, Mansion House, Converse House, Marshall House, Pyncheon House, etc.

SLAVERY IN SPRINGFIELD.

"Slaveholders" lived in Massachusetts during the Revolutionary period, as well as in the sunny South, but they were few in number. Jonathan Dwight was a slaveholder to the extent of one genuine negro, named Andrew. Mr. Dwight, it is said, was among the number who doubted the policy of arming against Great Britain, and, hearing that his cattle were to be seized by the colonists, he dispatched the negro Andrew with them to Stafford, Conn. It is also said that he removed his best furniture thither.

In the early part of the present century a runaway slave woman from Schenectady, N. Y., came to this town, bringing her son, then a small boy. She subsequently married old Jack, a negro, who is said to have been a slave in Longmeadow. In February, 1808, her old master, Peter Van Geyseling, hearing of her whereabouts, came and arrested her. She was arraigned before John Hooker, and, says Dr. Alfred Booth, "when asked by her master if he had not always used her well, replied, 'yes, but her mistress hadn't.' Old Jack cried, and Oliver B. Morris, then a young man, finding out what was going on, gave the master a sharp lecture on his conduct."

The case doubtless created considerable excitement in the town, as a subscription was started by the Rev. Mr. Howard, for the purpose of raising $100, for which amount Mr. Van Geyseling agreed to relinquish his title to the "property." Charles Howard, son of the parson, circulated the paper, the money was raised, a bill of sale given to the selectmen of the town, John Hooker, Thomas Dwight, and George Bliss, "of a negro woman, called Jenny, about thirty years of age." The sums subscribed were as follows: Bezaleel Howard, Jas. Byers, Jr., Thomas Dwight, and Daniel Lombard, $10 each; O. B. Morris, Ebenezer Tucker, James Byers, Mary Lyman, Daniel Bontecou, Solomon Warriner, Mrs. Worthington, Mrs. Dwight, Geo. Bliss, $5 each; W. Cooley, Mary Smith, Sarah Hooker, Jemima Lyman, $3 each; William Pyncheon, and Simon Negro, $2 each. The original bill and subscription paper are in the City Library. The master subsequently came for the boy, but he fled to the mountains in Wilbraham, where he was living with a Mr. Beebe, and the pursuit was abandoned.

The spirit of abolition which manifested itself at such an early period assumed definite shape about the year 1840, when the first political abolition organization in the town was effected, and was known as The Liberty Party. The following is a copy of the original document:

"We, the subscribers, legal voters of the town of Springfield, hereby pledge ourselves to sustain the principles of the liberty party by our votes at the polls: James Coolidge, George W. Callender, Benj. Rathbun, Horace Gerome, James Sanderson, F. F. Rider, Chauncey Chapin, James Guild, Lyman Hitchcock, Luther Bliss, George A. Croset, B. A. Private barns are insured in amount not to exceed $500, and these are not taken unless with dwellings. No agents are employed, the business being done directly with the assured. When the fact is stated that for fifty-two years an average dividend has been returned of seventy per cent. of all the premiums paid, and from the twenty-five per cent. retained all the losses and expenses have been paid, and cash assets to the amount of $100,000 accumulated (of which sum $67,000 is surplus over all liabilities), it is proof sufficient of the very careful and judicious management of the company, both in the selection of risks and care of the funds.

SPRINGFIELD FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

In the month of March, 1849, the Springfield Fire and Marine Insurance Company, of Springfield, Massachusetts, received its charter from the Legislature upon application of Edmund Freeman, George Dwight, and John L. King, the persons named in the act of incorporation. During the twenty-seven years since the organization of the company, five of the original directors have been removed by death, namely, Huntington, Southworth, King, Morgan, and Merrick, and three only remain in the direction, Messrs. M. Chapin, C. W. Chapin, and D. L. Harris. The vacant places in the board from deaths and other causes have been filled by men honored and esteemed in their respective positions, having the same spirit of enterprise, cheerfully working with the executive officers in the various plans proposed from time to time to promote the interests and welfare of the company,—such men as William Birnie, Samuel S. Day, Willis Phelps, James Brewer, George C. S. Southworth, Dwight R. Smith, William Stowe, A. D. Briggs, C. L. Covell, F. H. Harris, Lombard Dale, Charles Merriam, N. A. Leonard, George A. Hull, and Henry E. Russell.

Messrs. Stowe and Dale remained in the board until they died, the former in November, 1871, and Mr. Dale in October, 1876. Messrs. Birnie, Briggs, Covell, Harris, and Leonard are members at this time.

Mr. Freeman, above mentioned, was chosen first president, and continued in office until 1874, when failing health compelled him to resign the position, which was filled by Dwight R. Smith, the then acting vice-president; the continued prosperity of the company under his management showing the wisdom of the board in electing him to that office. Mr. Freeman's record at the head of the company was a noble one, covering a quarter of a century, and a period of development in insurance rarely paralleled in any business. His associate, Mr. William Conner, Jr., held the office of secretary from the organization of the company until 1866, when he resigned to take a similar position in the New York and Yonkers Insurance Company.

The company was quite prosperous during the fifteen years he was connected with it, no great conflagrations having occurred during that period save the one at Troy, N. Y., in 1862. The "fiery trials" came after this, as did also the strong competition for business. Mr. J. N. Dunham succeeded Mr. Conner as secretary, and was a very efficient officer, but, having private business at his home in Berkshire County which required his attention, he resigned in 1868, when Mr. S. J. Hall, who commenced the insurance business as far back as 1851, was elected in his place, and holds that position at the present time, proving himself a worthy officer. Mr. A. J. Wright, the treasurer, came to the company as clerk in 1864, but was soon promoted to the position of book-keeper, and in 1872 was elected treasurer.

It will be seen that few changes have been made in the executive officers during the history of the company. In all these years a wonderful degree of harmony has prevailed in the board; not a ripple of discord has ever occurred to mar its proceedings, which fact has contributed in no small degree to the success of the company.

If space permitted, mention might be made of the general and special agents of the company, and especially of the local agents, many of whom have served the company from the beginning, and in a most devoted and faithful manner, caring for its interests as they would for their own. The original capital stock was $150,000, which has been increased from time to time up to $750,000, $250,000 having been added from the surplus funds. The premiums for the first year's business were $38,695.28. From these small beginnings the company has not only advanced and taken a position at the head of all other Massachusetts companies, but stands in the very front rank of the strongest companies in the country, and has an enviable reputation for fair and honest dealing with its patrons.

The great fire at Chicago in 1871 drew heavily upon the funds of this company, as did also the great fire at Boston, one year later. The board of directors did not for one moment hesitate in either case as to the course to be pursued, and that was to pay the losses promptly, and assess the stockholders to make good the deficiency, and their views were unanimously adopted at the stockholders' meeting, the assessment in both cases amounting to ninety-five per cent. of the capital stock.

The subsequent success of the company has proved the wisdom of this decisive act. Jan. 1, 1876, a Western department was established, with headquarters at Chicago, Ill., A. J. Harding, Esq., being appointed general agent and manager, who was well qualified from long experience in the business of underwriting to take the position. Active measures were at once taken to establish agencies at all desirable points not already occupied by the company, and the result of the business thus far has been very satisfactory.

The total premiums received from the commencement of business amount to $10,087,741; amount of losses paid, $6,763,740; interest received on capital and surplus, $1,193,034. The cash dividends paid to stockholders amount to $1,242,041, and stock dividends from the surplus fund amount to $250,000, leaving a clear surplus now in hand, above all liabilities, of more than $300,000.

THE MASSACHUSETTS MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, an institution which has recently completed its first quarter of a century of business, was incorporated May 15, 1851, and its first policy was issued August 1st of the same year. It has been a settled principle of Massachusetts insurance legislation that life companies should begin with a guarantee capital of $100,000, so that in the reports of this company up to 1867 allowance has to be made for this item. With this explanation, we can now turn to the consideration of the organization and progress of the company.

As in the case of the other Massachusetts companies, we find that there have been few official changes in the Massachusetts Mutual Life. The scanty list of officers is as follows:

Presidents.—Caleb Rice, elected July, 1851; retired March 1, 1873 (died). E. W. Bond, elected March 4, 1873.

Vice-Presidents.—E. D. Beach, elected July, 1851; retired September, 1867 (died). E. W. Bond, elected October, 1867; retired March 4, 1873 (elected president). C. McLean Knox, elected March 4, 1873; resigned January, 1874. H. Fuller, Jr., elected January, 1874.

Secretaries.—F. B. Bacon, elected July, 1851; retired January, 1870 (died). C. McLean Knox, elected January, 1870; retired March 4, 1873 (elected vice-president). Avery J. Smith, elected March 4, 1873.

Actuaries.—James Weir Mason, elected 1869; resigned 1872. Oscar B. Ireland, elected 1872.

In the preceding list, embracing all who have in the 25 years of the company's existence filled the four principal offices, we find but nine names, five of whom are still in the service of the company. Of these, one held his position 22 years, another held his 19, both dying while in office; two vacated their positions on account of election to the next higher office; one, Charles McLean Knox, dissolved official connection with the company for the purpose of entering its service in the agency field; and the present secretary had for some years prior to his election to his present office held the position of assistant secretary.

The first administration of the company, that of Caleb Rice, extends from 1851 to 1873, a period of 21 years and 7 months. For all purposes of comparison we shall assume that it closed with the year 1872, and that Mr. Bond's administration began with 1873, as the figures for these dates are the more easily accessible. During 19 years of this period the secretary of the company was F. B. Bacon, an earnest worker and able coadjutor of the president. For most of the period Mr. Bacon discharged the duties of secretary and actuary, and much of the future success of the company was due to the thoroughness with which he performed the work that fell to him. All know with what skill and thorough integrity Mr. Rice discharged the duties of president; and by the faithful labors of these two officials, it may be safely said, the foundations of the company were laid strong and unshakable.

The beginnings of the company were small. During its first year it wrote but 312 policies, and during the second but 223. The assets at the close of the first year were but $105,031, and at the close of the second but $108,397, while during the first five years of business the premium income was but little in excess of $100,000; yet in these years were laid the foundations of the company's success, the basis which made the after-building comparatively easy, and without which no building would have been possible. Mr. Rice's management was conservative, but not in unwise directions. The natural, healthy growth of the company he never aimed to check, but rather always to provide for and to foster by such means as could be wisely and safely employed; and if it sometimes seemed as if the company was slow in comparison with some of its rivals, the end has proved that it was the slowness of sound growth, and the management has been fully justified in its course by its success in keeping the company clear from those numerous complications in which an eager rush for new business and an eager desire for rapid growth have involved so many promising companies during the past few years. Many a man who adopts the wise course adopted by Mr. Rice does not live to see it bear fruit. Mr. Rice was happily more fortunate. For many years before his administration closed, the Massachusetts Mutual Life transacted a business satisfactory in magnitude and excellent in quality, and the last report to which he subscribed his name presented results which he could but have felt were an ample reward for his labors and a full justification of the course he had steadfastly pursued. At the time that this report was made the assets had grown to $4,120,410.14, the annual income to $1,571,461.02, the annual payments to policy-holders to $775,625.37, and the amount at risk to $33,196,008. The policies issued during the last year of Mr. Rice's administration had been 3204 in number, covering $7,130,000 of insurance, the largest new business done by any Massachusetts company.

With Mr. Rice's death Mr. E. W. Bond, who had been for many years vice-president of the company, became president, and his administration of its affairs extends to the present time, beginning in 1873.

Mr. Bond was succeeded in the vice-presidency by Charles McLean Knox, who had been secretary since the death of Mr. Bacon, in 1870, and Mr. Knox was succeeded in the secretaryship by Avery J. Smith, who for some years past had been assistant secretary. Mr. Oscar B. Ireland, who had been elected actuary in 1872, retained that position; so that there was, in reality, the smallest possible change in the administration of the company's affairs.

The report for the year 1875 shows the company's assets to amount to $6,102,914.63; its annual income to $1,512,783.43; its total payments to policy-holders to $776,267.34; its policies in force to $14,744; and its insurance in force to $35,029,074.

As showing its annual growth in assets, the following is also of interest:

quality, and in quantity amply sufficient for the demand. The impetus given the city by the completion of the Western Railroad in 1839, and the rapidly increasing population in the vicinity of the depot, soon revealed the fact that no good water could be obtained on the lowlands east of Main Street. Notwithstanding this no move was made by the town in the matter, and in June, 1843, the late Hon. Charles Stearns, a public-spirited and energetic citizen, undertook to supply the need by private enterprise. The immediate result of this scheme is shown by the following extract from the report of the water commissioners in 1874:

"In June, 1843, he commenced building a reservoir on the site of the present Lombard Reservoir, and in September laid a line of log pipes therefrom to the depot, down Main as far as Howard Street, and in lateral streets leading from Main; putting in altogether three miles and 814 feet of pipe; the first 100 feet being of seven-inch caliber, then 200 feet of six-inch, and the remainder to Main Street of four-inch caliber. The capacity of the reservoir was estimated at 2000 hogheads, and in December of the same year it supplied the Western Railroad depot, the American and Massasoit Hotels, besides thirty other houses and stores. It was considered of great benefit as a protection against fire, though the Niagara Fire Engine Company, upon a challenge from Mr. Stearns, proved their ability to dispose of more water than could be supplied from his hydrants.

"In the winter of 1848, Mr. Stearns and his associates applied to the Legislature for an act of incorporation for the purpose of supplying the 'village of Springfield with pure water.' After much opposition a charter was granted, May 10th; and in June, 1848, 'The Springfield Aqueduct Company' was organized, with a capital of $25,000, all of which was paid to Mr. Stearns for land, reservoirs, rights of way, pipes, fixtures, and the privileges under the charter. These included the Lombard, Heywood, Stebbins, Chapin, and Worthington Reservoirs and springs, and about eleven miles of pipe. The number of families and concerns taking water at the time was 700, and the amount of rents was $2700 per year."

The rapidly increasing demand for water compelled the company to enlarge its capital and increase its facilities. In July, 1864, the capital stood at $36,000, which, in 1867, had increased to $137,800. Soon after the east Van Horn reservoir was constructed, with an estimated capacity of 45,000,000 gallons; the Lombard reservoir was enlarged; the west Van Horn reservoir built; the capital increased in 1870 to $184,800, and July 1, 1872, when the property was sold to the city, it stood at $211,200. Although the purchase dated from July 1, 1872, actual possession was not taken until June, 1873.

Although various plans had been suggested by different persons in the matter of supplying the city with water, no municipal action was taken until 1860, when the council appointed a committee, consisting of D. L. Harris, Mayor; William Hitchcock, Alderman; and N. A. Leonard, H. S. Noyes, and Charles Woodman, "to make investigations regarding a supply of water from the 'hill,' estimate the cost of water-works, and communicate such facts to the council as they may deem appropriate." About this time a well twenty feet deep and ten feet in diameter was sunk at the intersection of State and Stebbins Streets for fire purposes, and it was estimated that water flowed into it at the rate of fifty gallons per minute. The surface of water in Lake Como, then known as Goose Pond, stood five feet above the water in this well, and as the sand plain was estimated at three square miles, while only a few feet below its surface an abundance of water was obtained, the committee reported that the hill would "supply an abundance of the purest and best water for all domestic, mechanical, industrial, and sanitary purposes." The result of this report was an organization, Sept. 10, 1860, of the City Aqueduct Company, composed of R. A. Chapman, P. B. Tyler, G. R. Townsley, and D. L. Harris. On the 20th of the following November 1950 feet of seven-inch pipe had been laid, and for more than six months the flow down the State Street pipe averaged forty gallons per minute. This enterprise is thus spoken of in the report of the water commissioners for 1874:

"The project encountered strong opposition from persons residing on the hill, who claimed that their wells were drained by the new works, and a remonstrance against further effort in this direction was sent to the City Government, representing that such a diminution of water had been caused as led to fears of 'the ultimate destruction of all shade trees and vegetation in the neighborhood,' and praying for a restoration of the former condition. In June, 1861, a report upon this remonstrance and petition was made to the City Council (Hon. S. C. Bemis, Mayor). This report recommended that the City purchase the works as they then stood, and accordingly, on the 10th of June, 1861, the City Aqueduct Company was paid the sum of $2921.12, and turned over its property to the City. On account of the continued and bitter opposition to the 'Harris plan,' as the hill drainage scheme was called, nothing further was done with that system, and in August, 1861, the flow of water suddenly and mysteriously stopped, though the well was full, and, so far as is known, has been in that condition ever since."

The question of a more adequate water-supply was agitated from time to time, and, in 1862, Mr. W. E. Worthen, an engineer from Brooklyn, N. Y., instituted a careful investigation of the various sources of supply. No action was, however, taken on his report, and, in 1871, Engineer Clemens Herschell, of Boston, made an examination of the supply, and, at a later period, George Raymond, of Fitchburg, Mass., also made examination. The celebrated "Holly system" of water-works, manufactured at Lockport, N. Y., was also investigated.

At the conclusion of all the examinations, it was decided that Higher and Broad Brooks, tributaries of Chicopee River, in the town of Ludlow, were the most available and valuable sources of supply. Accordingly, the necessary steps were taken, and a reservoir at Ludlow was completed in 1875, and conveyed to the city through pipes by gravitation. This is known as the high service. The low service supply is taken from the reservoirs purchased of the Springfield Aqueduct Company.

The capacity of the Ludlow reservoir is 2,132,817,000 gallons; of the lower Van Horn reservoir, 73,655,095; the upper Van Horn, 27,952,720; and the Lombard reservoir, 8,970,262. The water commissioners' report for 1878 shows that the total length of pipe laid throughout the city is 61,241 $\frac{1}{10}$ miles. The gravitation system has proved a success in every respect, affording an abundance of water unsurpassed by the water-supply of any city in the State for clearness and purity.

The works are under the management of a board of water commissioners, at present constituted as follows: Charles O. Chapin, N. W. Talcott, and Samuel W. Porter. Mr. Chapin is president, and Mr. Porter secretary.

LEADING MANUFACTURING INTERESTS.

THE WASON MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

The founder of this immense industry, Thomas W. Wason, was born in Hancock, N. H., Dec. 28, 1811. He worked at the carpenter's trade until thirty years of age, when he became foreman of the Cabot Manufacturing Company, at what was then known as Cabotville, now Chicopee, Mass. In 1845 he removed to Springfield, where he formed a copartnership with his brother Charles, for the manufacture of railway-cars. It is said that their first shop was so small that a single finished car would more than fill the building. The first year they manufactured six single and two double freight-cars, for the Connecticut River Railroad, for which they received the sum of $4700. In 1846 the firm built a brick block in Liberty Street, where the business was continued until 1848, when it was moved to a part of a large building which had been erected for the Springfield Car and Engine Company. Here the business was continued under the firm-name of T. & C. Wason until 1851, when Charles Wason removed to Cleveland, O., and Thomas carried on the manufacture two years alone, until 1853, when George C. Fisk, L. O. Hanson, and Josiah Bumstead became associated with him, and the firm became T. Wason & Co. The business rapidly increased, and in 1859 the firm purchased the premises occupied by them, also adjoining lands, amounting to nearly four acres. Mr. Wason also carried on a foundry, under the firm-name of Wason, Ladd & Co., where the iron-work used in the car-shop was cast.

The Wason Manufacturing Company was organized in 1863, with Thomas W. Wason, President; George C. Fisk, Treasurer; Henry C. Hyde, Secretary; Levi O. Hanson, Superintendent; and Josiah Bumstead, Assistant Superintendent. The business of Wason, Ladd & Co. was consolidated with the company in 1868, and in the same year Messrs. Hanson & Bumstead retired.

The steadily increasing business of the firm necessitated more commodious quarters, and in 1871 the company purchased 16 acres of land lying along the Connecticut River, in the northern suburbs of the city, where commodious, substantial, and elegant buildings were erected. These buildings, which are in all their appointments the most complete and perfect of their kind in this country, were designed and arranged by Mr. Fisk, the present president of the company. Without entering into detail, the magnitude of the establishment may be seen by the following dimensions of the various buildings: The foundry is 170 feet in length by 62 in width, 32 feet high, with a daily capacity of 100 car-wheels and 10 tons of other castings. The foundry supply-shed is 83 by 33 feet; coal-shed, 83 by 40 feet; machine-shop, 96 by 45 feet, two stories high; smithery, 150 by 45 feet, 35 feet high; passenger-car shop, 117 by 75 feet; building for setting up trucks, 60 by 45 feet; building devoted to wood-working machinery and cabinet-work, 200 by 62 feet, two stories; lumber-shed, 420 by 40 feet; paint-shop, 500 by 75 feet, 35 feet high.

In this last building thirty-two of the largest-sized passenger-coaches can be undergoing decoration at the same time. There are also two other buildings devoted to the construction and painting of freight-cars, each 180 by 42 feet. The machinery of this mammoth establishment is driven by a 150-horse-power engine.

The quality of cars manufactured by this company has not only attracted the attention of our own country, but produced a foreign demand. They recently filled a contract with Egypt for sixty passenger-cars and one hundred freight-cars, and for the royal car of the khedive. Numerous manufactories and residences have been erected in the vicinity of the company's shops; a post-office has been established, a depot built, and the village has received the name of Brightwood.

Aug. 21, 1870, Mr. Wason, the founder of the establishment, died, and was succeeded in the presidency by Geo. C. Fisk, a native of Hinsdale, N. H., born March 1, 1831. He entered the employment of Mr. Wason in 1852 as book-keeper and cashier, and soon after became a partner. On the organization of the company in 1863, he was elected treasurer, and in 1869 became vice-president, and, as stated above, in 1870 he was chosen president. Mr. Fisk has general charge of the business at the home office.

The secretary and treasurer of the company, Henry S. Hyde, was born in Mount Hope, N. Y., Aug. 18, 1837, and while yet a small lad went to Detroit, Mich., of which city his father was elected mayor three terms. Mr. Hyde was educated for the Bar, but, upon uniting in marriage with Jennie S., daughter of Thomas W. Wason, he became associated with Mr. Wason in business, and upon the organization of the company was chosen its secretary, and in 1869 succeeded Mr. Fisk as treasurer. In addition to being the financial manager of the Wason Company, he is largely identified with various interests in Springfield, being president of the Agawam National Bank, the Springfield Clearing-House, vice-president of the Hampden Savings-Bank, etc., etc.

The present officers and working-staff are as follows: George C. Fisk, President; Henry S. Hyde, Secretary and Treasurer; Wm. H. Paige, General Superintendent of Manufactory; A. C. Reed, Foreman of Passenger- and Freight-Car Body Building; A. Nutting, Foreman of the Cabinet-Room; Chas. H. Wheeler, Foreman of the Paint-Shops; S. D. Wilson, Foreman of the Blacksmith-Shop; Wm. T. Parker, Foreman of the Machine-Shop; P. O'Connell, Foreman of the Foundry; G. Goodwin, Foreman of the Yard; E. C. Pierce and Elisha Childs, Decorative Painters; Louis C. Hyde, Book-Keeper; and Charles A. Fisk, Purchaser and Cashier.

SMITH & WESSON REVOLVER MANUFACTORY.

This establishment was founded in 1857, by Smith & Wesson, by whom it was continued until 1874, when Mr. Smith retired, and the business has since been conducted by Mr. D. B. Wesson. The value of the annual product at the beginning of business was $150,000. The present annual product amounts to $800,000. The number of persons employed in the beginning was 75, and has now increased to 450. The arms manufactured in this establishment are unsurpassed in quality and beauty of workmanship. It has ever been a leading characteristic of Mr. Wesson to manufacture none but the very best quality of goods, and the result is the building up of one of the largest institutions of its kind in existence, and one that reflects great credit upon its enterprising proprietor, and does its share in rendering Springfield famous at home and abroad.

THE HAMPDEN WATCH COMPANY.

A comparatively new but representative industry in this city is the manufacture of watches. This company is the successor of the New York Watch Company, which was organized in 1867. The business was continued under this organization with varied success until 1877, when the present company was formed, with a capital of $210,000. Homer Foot, President; Chas. D. Rood, Treasurer; and John C. Perry, Superintendent. At the present time, after meeting with numerous discouragements,—fire and financial depression,—the establishment is in a prosperous condition, and the Hampden watches are acknowledged equal in every respect to those manufactured by the more extensive and older companies.

The establishment of this institution and its present prosperous condition are due chiefly to Homer Foot, Esq., who has lavishly bestowed both time and money upon it. It is an industry which the citizens of this city may well be proud of.

G. & C. MERRIAM.

Prominent among the leading business firms which have rendered Springfield famous, both in this country and in Europe, is that of G. & C. Merriam, publishers of Webster's Dictionary. The Merriams inherited the business of book-making, for, as early as 1795, Ebenezer & D. Merriam—the former an uncle and the latter father of the three brothers, George, Charles, and Homer, the present firm—established a job-printing office and book-store in Brookfield, Mass., which they conducted for more than half a century.

In 1831, George and Chas. Merriam came to Springfield and established a book-store and printing-office, and in the following year took the firm-name of G. & C. Merriam, which has since continued, although a younger brother, Homer Merriam, joined the firm in 1856, he having previously been engaged in book-selling in Troy, N. Y. Thus the name has stood for forty-six years, and is a synonym for honorable dealing, keen business foresight, and energy. Their business was established by the publication of a series of law-books, one of which was Chitty's Pleadings. The house has also published more than 200,000 copies of the Bible, a series of readers known as the Springfield series, and many other publications.

The work, however, the publication of which has given them the world-wide reputation they so justly merit, is Webster's Dictionary. Dr. Noah Webster, up to the time of his death, was virtually the publisher of his own works. After his death the right of publication and the works then unsold were disposed of to J. S. & C. Adams, of Amherst, Mass., who in turn sold them to the Merriams. They saw at a glance that the work, both in a pecuniary and literary sense, might be greatly benefited by the adoption of modern improvements in book-making; and, although the enterprise seemed too hazardous to such firms as Harper & Bros., and other metropolitan publishers, the Merriams invested a large amount of money, and bent their energy to the task, believing that in the end financial remuneration would result. As mentioned above, in 1844 they purchased the stock remaining unsold at Dr. Webster's death, and the right to publish the large dictionary. The revision which was projected by the author was carried forward by Prof. Chauncey A. Goodrich, of Yale College, a son-in-law of Dr. Webster, to which he devoted three years. It was issued in 1847, and proved a success. Two other editions were issued, in 1856 and 1859, under the direction of Prof. Goodrich, the latter containing illustrations.

These editions, notwithstanding the immense amount of labor and expense involved in bringing them out, were considered minor affairs when compared with the great revision which was printed in 1864. The labor on this occupied more than ten years, involving an aggregate of more than thirty years of literary labor, distributed among nearly fifty individuals. Dr. Mahn, of Berlin, an eminent European scholar, spent five years upon the etymologies alone. This revision was also undertaken by Prof. Goodrich, but he died in 1860, and Prof. Porter, of Yale College, succeeded to the editorship. Among the many learned men who assisted in the work may be mentioned the names of William G. Webster, a son of the author, Rev. C. Goodrich, son of the first editor, Profs. C. S. Lyman, Gilman, Whitney, Hadley, and Mr. William A. Wheeler.

The Merriams also publish the national pictorial edition, and have a proprietary right in all the series. It is said that the sales of Webster's Dictionary exceed those of any other printed in the English language. Since the death of Dr. Webster, in 1843, the publishers have paid his family over a quarter of a million dollars as their share of the copyright money. The work is printed at the "Riverside Press" of Houghton & Co., Cambridge, Mass.

THE MORGAN ENVELOPE COMPANY

was organized in 1865, by E. Morgan & Co., Mr. Chester W. Chapin being the special partner, and began the manufacture of envelopes on Hilman Street. In 1866 the business was moved to Taylor Street, occupying a number of rooms in Emerson Wright's extensive buildings. A stock company was formed in 1869, and a year later the works were moved into Wright's buildings, on Worthington Street. The firm manufactures envelopes of every description, employs, when running full, from 150 to 200 hands, and made the first postal-card used in this country. Since 1874 it has had half the contract for making the stamped envelopes sold by the government, which are turned out at the Plympton works, in Hartford, the present contract for which will expire Oct. 1, 1882. The postal-card manufacture was carried on from 1873 to 1877. Ex-Mayor Emerson Wright is president of the company, and Elisha Morgan treasurer.

THE AMERICAN PAPETERIE COMPANY.

While engaged in the manufacture of envelopes, the Morgan company turned its attention to putting up note-paper and envelopes in attractive boxes, and from that business sprang the present extensive trade in papeterie. Emulating their example, other similar concerns started up, and the result is the well-known American Papeterie Company. The first papeterie thrown upon the market in the United States was sent out by the Morgan Envelope Company, in 1866.

In March, 1878, the American Papeterie Company was organized by the consolidation of the papeterie departments of the Morgan Envelope and the Powers Paper Company, of Springfield, and the Plympton Manufacturing Company, of Hartford. Besides manufacturing elegant toilet-cases, glove- and handkerchief-boxes of delicate workmanship, and a hundred and one articles containing paper, the company has recently commenced publishing magic toy-books. Elisha Morgan is president and treasurer of the company.

THE NATIONAL NEEDLE COMPANY,

the largest establishment for the manufacture of sewing-machine needles in the world, was organized September, 1873, with John S. Abbott, of Boston, President, and John F. Trow, of New York, Treasurer. Work was commenced in the Burbank spectacle-building, at the corner of Willow and Stockbridge Streets, with six employes. Since that date the business has increased rapidly, principally through the management of George H. Blelock, and to-day, at the works on the corner of Emery and Fulton Streets, to which they were removed in 1874, 110 hands find steady work, at good wages. The first year there were 2,551,000 needles, for all known kinds of sewing-machines turned out. In 1878 the production was 5,663,000; and the product for 1879 will be 6,000,000. It is a noticeable fact that no traveling salesmen are ever employed by the company, and when this is considered the rapid growth of the business is certainly remarkable. When the works were first started England controlled the market of the world; to-day the National Company's needles do so, and are known in every quarter of the globe where the sewing-machine is heard of. Most of the stock of the company is held by Springfield parties. The superintendent of the works is John Berry, formerly of Barney & Berry, skate manufacturers.

R. F. HAWKINS' IRON-WORKS.

Few establishments are more widely known than R. F. Hawkins' Iron-Works, on Liberty Street. Mr. Hawkins came to this city from Lowell when a child, and has devoted the best portion of his life to his business, which embraces the manufacture of steam-boilers, pumps, iron- and brass-castings, machinery, mill-work, and bridges. The works were established by Stone & Harris, in 1846, for the especial manufacture of the Howe truss bridge. To them have been added from time to time the other branches.

Mr. Hawkins went into the office of Stone & Harris when sixteen years old; became a partner of D. L. Harris, their successor, in 1863, and took the business for himself in 1868. Most of the earlier railroad and highway bridges, engine-houses, car-houses, and turn-tables in New England were built by this establishment. The boiler-making and extensive foundry business of the concern make an important element in the business of the city, and bring in a large amount of work from abroad.

E. H. BARNEY, MANUFACTURER OF THE FAMOUS BARNEY & BERRY SKATE, is located at the foot of Broad Street. This skate business was first started by Barney & Berry in 1864, Mr. Berry retiring from the firm in 1869. The first skates made were manufactured at what is now the Papier-maché Works, at Pecowsic; but in 1865 the works were moved up to Main Street, near the junction with Mill River, and on the site now occupied by the Bemis & Call Company. The first season there were 500 pairs of skates made, all the work being done by hand by eight employes. In 1872, Mr. Barney built the present extensive works, at the foot of Broad Street, and in the season of 1878 turned out 80,000 pairs of skates, the number of men employed being 35. The skates made at this establishment, the most famous of which are the Ice King, are known all over the globe where water freezes, and have taken prizes at the Vienna, Philadelphia, and Paris Expositions.

W. H. WRIGHT, THE CIGAR-MAKER, who has undoubtedly revolutionized the cigar trade of New England since his connection with the business, started in 1858, in a wooden building, where Patton's block now stands, on Main Street, with Calvin Loomis for a partner. In 1864,

George Margerum's stand, opposite the Exchange Hotel, was purchased, and, two years later, Mr. Loomis dying, Mr. Wright continued the business alone. His cigars have always commanded a market, because manufactured of the best imported material, and about 50 bales of choice Havana stock is used a month by the 85 employes when business is fair. Out of his business Mr. Wright has amassed a fortune, and he may be considered a self-made man in every respect.

SERPENTINE PAINT AND FIRE-BRICK COMPANY.

Rather a queer name, but that was the first title the present Hampden Paint and Chemical Company had. This company was organized in 1852 by special charter, the original corporators being the late Chief-Justice R. A. Chapman, Hon. C. C. Chaffee, Heman S. Lucas, and Charles Phelps. The paint was manufactured from the product of a mine at Chester, which the company still own, but which is unused. The name of the company was afterward changed to its present title, and paint has since been manufactured from chemicals at the works, at the junction of Armory Street with the Boston and Albany Railroad. This company was the first to manufacture a green paint to take the place of Paris green, which, from its poisonous nature, was falling into disrepute, and in that way was the celebrated "Hampden Green" started. The company also makes the green used for printing the government greenbacks. About five tons of colors are turned out at the establishment daily, and the company officers have been, President, E. Southworth, and E. W. Bond Secretary and Treasurer; George T. Bond and E. P. Chapin.

THE TAYLOR & NICHOLS PAPETERIE COMPANY

manufactures first-class goods, and was organized in January, 1876, the firm being J. E. Taylor and Elijah Nichols. The business is steadily increasing, and from 75 to 100 hands are employed.

D. H. BRIGHAM & CO.

The manufacture of paper collars in this city was begun by D. H. Brigham & Co. in 1863, the firm being D. H. Brigham, Charles Brigham, and George W. Ray. D. H. Brigham sold out his portion of the business to the other two members of the firm, and, in 1865, Varnum N. Taylor bought out Charles Brigham, and the firm-name was changed to Ray & Taylor. The business, which had been commenced in Kibbe Brothers' building, at the corner of Main Street and Harrison Avenue, was removed to Hillman Street in 1866, and built up and strengthened, until it soon became one of the most important interests in the city. Such a steady increase of business soon demanded larger accommodations, and the firm built a large and commodious building on Worthington Street, which they occupied in 1870. George W. Ray sold his interest to V. N. Taylor in 1874, and in July, 1878, the establishment was moved to Taylor Street. In its busiest time the works produce 150,000 collars a day, and keep 25 persons at work, with the best and latest improved machinery.

THE SPRINGFIELD COLLAR COMPANY

was started by George Harrington, who for nine years had been in the employ of Ray & Taylor, and a stock company with $40,000 capital was organized, Oct. 15, 1872. The works were first located in Carr's block, in Worthington Street, but in 1877 a building at the corner of Worthington Street and Stearns Park was purchased. About 100,000 collars are turned out daily, and from 50 to 75 hands are employed.

DWIGHT & HOYT IRON-WORKS.

The extensive iron-works on Hillman Street of Dwight & Hoyt are the outgrowth of the American Corrugated Iron Company, which was brought to this city in 1871 by George Dwight, Jr. The work is principally the manufacture of corrugated iron buildings, cornices, etc., a specialty being made of fire-proof work and the building of railroad depots. Mr.

Dwight's partner is J. W. Hoyt. As many as 500 men are employed at times in putting up work turned out at the establishment, and which is a credit to the firm engaged in its manufacture.

THE NEWELL BROS.' BUTTON-FACTORY, located at the foot of Howard Street, is a large institution, and is doing a flourishing business.

MASONIC.

The Freemasons of Springfield first held their meetings in the building now standing on the southeast corner of Main and State Streets (over Webber's drug-store), in what was called Hampden Hall. May 15, 1827, the corner-stone of the town-hall building, on State Street, was laid by Past Master Oliver B. Morris, Rev. Bro. Samuel Osgood, D.D., delivering the address on the occasion. The third story of the building is owned by and was dedicated to the use of the fraternity on its completion. The premises now occupied by the Masons, in the building of the Massachusetts Life Insurance Company, on Main Street, were dedicated June 24, 1874, the lower hall by M. W. Grand Master Sereno D. Nickerson, and the upper hall by Past Grand Commander Rev. Charles H. Titus. A procession composed of—besides the local commandery and lodges—Newburyport, Washington (of Hartford), Connecticut Valley (of Greenfield), Northampton, Trinity (of Hudson, Mass.) commanderies, and Chicopee and Ionic (of Easthampton) lodges, under the chief marshalship of Sir Kt. E. P. Chapin. A collation for the Templars at the City Hall, and for the Masons in the south store under the Masonic Hall, signalized the occasion. We give a brief sketch of each of the Masonic organizations in the city, in the order of their formation.

ELIJAH BLAKE, the oldest living resident of the city of Springfield in 1878, was born in Torrington, Litchfield Co., Conn., June 26, 1784. He was one of a family of ten children of Elijah and Sarah (Hamlin) Blake, who were married Sept. 27, 1779. The former, a native of Middletown, removed to Torrington in early life; afterward he went to Winchester. He was a tanner by trade, and died Oct. 2, 1833, aged seventy-seven. The latter was a native of Middletown, and died Oct. 27, 1811, aged fifty-three.

Mr. Blake spent his minority at home, learning the trade of a tanner and also of a shoemaker, and received a very limited opportunity for getting an education from books. After three years spent as a journeyman at his trade, upon reaching his majority he came to Springfield, which, by including Chicopee and the surrounding country, numbered some four thousand inhabitants. Soon after coming to Springfield, in 1808, he was married to Amelia Bronson, of Winchester, Conn., with whom he lived until the year fire department of the village and city for some thirty-one years; and upon his retiring from the active duties of the department, as a permanent token of respect for his daring and courage, and his long-continued connection with it, the citizens presented him with a silver pitcher, on which was engraved, "Presented by Citizens of Springfield to Elijah Blake, in token of their regard for his long devotion to the duties of Chief Engineer of the Fire Department, July 4, 1844."

Mr. Blake was wholly given to a business life. He was, in the days of the Federal party, a supporter of its principles, and represented Springfield one term in the Massachusetts Legislature. He was president of the Mutual Fire Insurance Company for twenty years, and is now a director.

He has always taken a deep interest in the improvements of the city, and in the support of its churches and kindred institutions. As he looks over the living of the city, he Blake, collector of internal revenue, New York; Hamliu Blake, of New York; and Charles Blake, broker, and financial editor of the New York Tribune.

Mr. Blake opened a store in Springfield, in 1808, in the shoe and leather business, which he began in a small way, and with very limited means. Industry and economy, with integrity of purpose in all his business transactions, soon won the confidence of the citizens; his trade increased, and he remained a merchant in Springfield for over half a century, with a steady and successful business career.

Mr. Blake refers with pride to his connection with the can find only one—Edmund Allen—who contributed with him to the erection of the First Church.

Mr. Blake is now in his ninety-fifth year, and resides on State Street, where he built his residence in 1819. For his second wife he married, in the year 1854, Miss Chloe Bliss, of Springfield, who is some fourteen years his junior.

Few men live to be as old, and fewer at such an age are able to give facts in detail for a sketch.

Mr. Blake deserves notice for his valor in the capture of some burglars who had made several depredations in Springfield, and had eluded the officials. In this matter he planned and carried into execution the arrest of the thieves, —Stevens and Ball,—both of whom were sent to State-prison for life.

Roswell Lee Lodge, Free and Accepted Masons.—At a meeting held March 21, 1864, in answer to a petition drafted at a meeting of Master Masons, held on the 29th of February, 1864, a dispensation was received from the Grand Master authorizing and empowering the petitioners to wit: E. regular quarterly communication of the Grand Lodge in March, A.D. 1865, and appointing E. W. Clark to be the first Master, I. D. Gibbons to be the first S. W., and W. T. Ingraham to be the first J. Brothers Lee, Smith, and Granger, whose names appeared in the warrant of dispensation, did not become charter members of the lodge, but remained affiliated with Hampden Lodge. ODD-FELLOWS.

The first lodge of this ancient and honorable order in this city was Hampden Lodge, No. 27, instituted Feb. 7, 1844, under a dispensation issued by E. H. Chapin, Grand Master. A charter was granted at the next session of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts. The charter members were Addison Ware, James M. Thompson, Albert C. Cole, Josiah Hunt, Thomas Hassard, Jr., and James Henry. The officers installed were Addison Ware, N. G.; James M. Thompson, V. G.; Thomas Hassard, Jr., Sec.; and Josiah Hunt, Treas.

In 1845, Thomas Hassard, Jr., with others, withdrew, and established a lodge at Pittsfield, Mass., as Berkshire Lodge, No. 57. In the same year the Grand Lodge granted a charter to Samuel Wells and others as Nonotuck Lodge, No. 61, at Northampton; also one to A. A. Folsom and others as St. John's Lodge, No. 62, at Cabotville, now Chicopee, but at that time part of Springfield.

At the May session, 1845, a charter was granted to W. T. Davis and others, who had withdrawn and established a lodge at Greenfield, as Pocomtuck Lodge, No. 67.

At the February session, 1870, of the Grand Lodge the charter of St. John's Lodge, No. 62, which had been surrendered to that body some years previously, was returned to some of the old members.

Through the influence of R. W. Ball and others, who withdrew for that purpose, a charter was granted, in 1871, to Le Roy S. Drew and others, as De Soto Lodge, No. 155. The present (1878) officers of the lodge are George Smith, N. G.; Ira Harvey, V. G.; Wm. Gray, P. S.; J. Miller, Jr., R. S.; John Lobsitz, Treas. Subsequently the Grand Lodge granted a charter to F. THE CITY LIBRARY ASSOCIATION OF SPRINGFIELD.*

The earliest library in Springfield of which any record can be found is the collection of the Springfield Library Company, which published a catalogue in 1796. It seems to have been a small library, to which only the proprietors had access. The catalogue contained the regulations of the library and a classified list of books. The regulations were as follows:

"The hours in which the Librarian delivers books to the Proprietors are from four to seven o'clock on the last Saturdays of the months of April, May, June, July, August, and September, and from two to five o'clock on the last Saturdays of the months of October, November, December, January, February, and March. Each proprietor is allowed by the by-laws of the company to take out each day of delivery for each share he may own two folios or three quartos, or one quarto and two octavos, or one quarto and four duodecimos, or three octavos, or two octavos and three duodecimos, or one octavo and four duodecimos, or six duodecimos."

The catalogue contains the titles of 320 volumes, classified under the following divisions: divinity and ethics; history, biography, voyages, and travels; poetry; novels; and miscellaneous. What became of this library is unknown.

The second library organization of which any record remains was the Franklin Library Association, which was composed of the workmen in the United States Armory. The date of the establishment of this library is unknown. It existed as a separate library until the year 1844, when it was made over to the Young Men's Institute.

In January, 1824, the Hampden Mechanics' Association was established. It founded a library called the Apprentices' Library. It had for a time, also, a weekly evening school for apprentices and annual courses of lectures. This association continued in existence until 1849, but in 1845 its library was transferred to the Young Men's Institute. A catalogue of the Apprentices' Library, published in 1834, gives 627 as the number of books.

The Young Men's Institute was founded in 1843. It was an association for the improvement of its members. It established a library and reading-room, and had its debates and courses of literary and scientific lectures.

In 1854 the Young Men's Literary Association was organized. Its objects were similar to those of the institute. It also established a library and reading-room, and had its debates and lectures.

The libraries belonging to these various institutions were comparatively small, and they were accessible only to the members. The desirableness of a public library, however, began to attract attention and awaken popular discussion in connection with the efforts to increase the interest in these associations. As the result of these discussions a petition of 1200 citizens was presented to the city government in 1855, asking for the establishment of a city library. The petition was referred to the committee on education, who reported in favor of the object, and on October 15th the report was adopted by both branches of the city council, but it was found that by reason of some technical informalities the appropriation could not be made that year. The following year the city hall was erected, and in the plans which were adopted a room was set apart for a public library, but no action was had by the city government making provision for its establishment. The following year the subject was introduced to the notice of the city council in the inaugural address of Mayor Ansel Phelps, who stated that he had been requested to call attention to this subject, and to recommend that an appropriation of $2000 be made for a library, but that he did not deem it expedient to recommend the appropriation at that time, in view of the heavy indebtedness of the city, and concluded with the suggestion that "the creation and maintenance of a city library be deferred till a more convenient season." This suggestion of the mayor was approved by the city government, and no appropriation was made.

The friends of the city library enterprise, disappointed in this direction, determined to make a vigorous effort for the establishment of a public library by means of a voluntary association, and by seeking private subscriptions. For this purpose the City Library Association was organized, Nov. 27, 1857. The members of the Springfield Institute and the Young Men's Literary Association united in the new enterprise, and their libraries were made over to the City Library Association. A committee was also appointed to solicit subscriptions among the citizens. A considerable sum was raised, and accessions were also made to the library by donations of books.

In 1859, Mayor W. B. Calhoun in his inaugural refers to the association, and recommends that the city should stand forth as the acknowledged patron of the library by an appropriation for its support, and argues "that, in view of the benefits of a public library as the fruitful source, not of the ordinary and acknowledged blessings of intelligence merely, but of an efficient and all-pervading economy, it would be literally an institution of saving." But in view, probably, of the continued heavy indebtedness of the city, and the necessity of large appropriations for the current expenses, no action was had upon this recommendation.

During the year, however, the library of the association, now numbering about 1500 volumes, with the consent and approbation of the mayor and the committee on city property, was removed to the library-room in the city hall. From the period of removal the city furnished rent, and during most of the time fuel, lights, and the services of a janitor, free of charge to the association.

Simultaneously with the occupancy of these rooms commenced an earnest and persistent series of efforts to increase the resources and extend the usefulness of the library. A subscription of about $8000 was raised, and in the following year a fair was held by the ladies of the city for the benefit of the association, the result of which was a gain to the funds of the association of about $1800.

* By Rev. William Rice, D.D.

William Rice

A reference theological department was commenced, and donations, either in money or books, were secured from various religious societies. The agricultural department was also largely increased by the addition of the Hampden Agricultural Library, which was transferred by vote of the stockholders to the City Library Association. Donations of books from individual citizens were also received, and among these donations may be found some of the most expensive and valuable works in the library. A special effort was made to increase the number of annual subscriptions, and the small fee of $1 per year, which was charged for the use of books, became the source of considerable revenue. A course of lectures was also given for several years, which resulted in a considerable income. Subsequent to 1864 the city also made an annual appropriation. The aggregate receipts of the association from all sources from 1857 to 1871, when the library was removed to the new building, amounted to about $50,000, and a large portion of this amount was expended for books. To this sum should be added at least $6000,—the value of books donated to the library during the same period. As the result of these efforts, the number of volumes in the library increased during these years from 1500 to 30,000 volumes.

A museum of Ethnology and Natural History was founded in 1859, under the auspices of the association, in which were gathered collections of much interest and value, especially in some departments of local zoology.

The rooms in the city hall, ample at first, soon became crowded by the rapid growth of the library and museum, and the necessity for more commodious quarters became obvious. It was now apparent that the library was an established institution, and it was felt that provision should be made for its permanent accommodation and its continued growth. The association was therefore reorganized under a new charter, which constituted it a corporation for the purpose of "establishing and maintaining a library for the diffusion of knowledge and the promotion of intellectual improvement in the city of Springfield." The corporation was authorized "to hold real and personal estate to the amount of $150,000, exclusive of the books in its library, and the collections of natural history and works of art in its museum." And all its real and personal estate were to be held in trust "for the uses and purposes appropriate for a public and social library and museum, to be used and enjoyed by the inhabitants of Springfield, under such regulations as the corporation might from time to time prescribe." The city of Springfield was authorized to make appropriations for its maintenance so long as the corporation allowed the inhabitants of the city free access to the library at reasonable hours, for the purpose of using the same on the premises.

The new organization was effected in May, 1864, and the following board of officers were elected: John L. King, President; D. L. Harris, Vice-President; Wm. Rice, Clerk and Librarian; J. D. Safford, Treasurer; George Bliss, C. W. Chapin, J. M. Thompson, Chas. Merriam, Geo. Walker, E. W. Bond, J. G. Holland, J. B. Stebbins, James Kirkham, and P. B. Tyler, Directors; O. H. Greenleaf and Henry Smith, Auditors. The officers of the society at this first meeting received a communication from Hon. Geo. Bliss offering to donate a lot of land for a library building. A committee was at once appointed to confer with architects and to obtain plans for a building. The president of the association was also requested by the directors to secure subscriptions. Many of the citizens responded liberally to this appeal, and in February, 1865, the sum of $77,000 was raised, more than half this amount having been subscribed by the board of officers. Considerable delay was occasioned by the difficulty of obtaining a plan for the building, but the one finally accepted was by George Hartborne, of New York. The building committee, in October, 1867, contracted for the erection of the building with Amariah Mayo. It was completed in the spring of 1871, at an expense of $100,000, and the library was opened to the public in the fall of the same year.

The library building is on State Street. It is 100 feet long and 65 feet deep, standing some 12 or 15 feet above the general level of the street, and 60 feet back from the front of the lot. Two flights of broad granite steps ascend from the street to an arched stone porch before the central tower. The building is of Monson gneiss to the height of the water-table; above, it is constructed of good faced brick, relieved by strongly contrasting and richly cut and carved light sandstone, from quarries at Amherst, O. The graceful porch, the bay-windows on the west and east ends, the arch-stones, panels, moldings, bands, dormers, and tracery are all of this delicate-tinted stone. The roof is the most peculiar and picturesque feature of the building, and is trimmed with light iron finials and railings, decorated and gilded. The architecture is the modern adaptation of the Gothic, prevalent in the Middle Ages on the continent, and in England at the present time, and is known as the mediæval revival.* It is admirably adapted to isolated public buildings like this, by its free and varied outline and its opportunity for elaborate ornamentation.

The entrance-hall is 25 feet wide, extending from front to rear of the building. Opening from the hall on the right is the museum-room, 20 by 50 feet, furnished with alcoves and cases. On the west is a similar though smaller hall, to be used as a reading-room, while beyond, and also entered from the entrance-hall, is the janitor's room.

Entering the library proper by the spacious stairway, the visitor stands in one of the most beautiful library interiors in this country. It occupies the entire building above the first floor, extending therefrom to the oblong dome. A clear space of 60 feet by 20 on the floor, and 50 feet in height, is surrounded by alcoves 15 feet deep. A series of clusters of columns encompass this open space, and from their carved, leafy capitals, each different and all beautiful, spring arched ribs, which meet and intersect beneath the glass dome. From these columns radiate in every direction the alcoves and galleries of the library. In the centre and front of the building, opposite the stairway, occupying the room of two alcoves, is the distributing centre, faced with a counter for the librarian and attendants. A winding iron staircase connects this with the galleries, with the floor above, and with the tower.

The centre alcoves at each end extend beyond the line of the building in a bay-window, which gives additional apparent length to the room and space for a table and chairs. Each alcove has a height of 17 feet, with two divisions, the upper accessible from a light gallery, from which in each corner alcove a circular staircase leads to the floor below. The galleries form an unbroken connection one with the other, and entirely surround the library.

A remarkable feature of this library is the abundance of light,—a rare thing in such structures. The dome is a large central skylight, some 50 feet in length, of ground glass; this is covered above at a height of six or seven feet by a larger frame-work containing an outer skylight. By this arrangement the heating and ventilation are more thoroughly controlled in winter, the direct rays of the sun tempered in summer, and at all times a softer and better light secured. In addition to the centre light, the alcoves have also a more direct light, one or more windows being arranged in each alcove. A great defect largely experienced in most existing libraries, namely, dark alcoves, has been entirely remedied by this arrangement. The shelves throughout are movable, secured by square-headed oak pins, which are let into the under side of the shelves flush, the divisions and also all other portions of the cases having been carefully fitted, so that there are no projecting corners or edges to mar the books.

But the crowning beauty of this fine interior is the artistic excellence of the fresco-painting. It is the work of Mr. Giuseppe Garibaldi, of New York, and its brilliant and harmonious combinations of color have added the very touch needed to meet the architect's ideal and lift the arches, columns, and carved capitals into definite grace and ornate splendor. The city may well be proud of so beautiful a repository for its treasures of the wisdom and wit of the world.

The association was about $25,000 in debt at the completion of the building, and measures were immediately taken to secure subscriptions to meet the indebtedness. Hon. D. L. Harris, who was elected president on the death of Mr. King, was appointed to solicit subscriptions, and devoted himself with such enthusiasm and persistence to this work that at the annual meeting in 1873 he was able to report that the entire amount had been obtained.

In 1869 a donation of $6000 was made to the association by Miss Mary Bryant, of Boston, with the condition that this amount be invested, and the interest only be used for the purchase of books. This was the first donation made to the association looking toward an endowment. In 1878 a donation of $1000 was also made to the permanent funds by Charles Merriam, on condition that the interest on the investment should be used under the direction of the librarian, for the issue of free subscriptions to worthy persons.

Simultaneously with the opening of the library in the new building a catalogue was published, prepared by the librarian. The catalogue is upon what is called the dictionary plan. The books are entered under the name of the author and title, and they are arranged also under subjects, where the nature of the title will admit of it. To add to the value of the catalogue for practical purposes, the scientific, philosophical, and theological departments are thoroughly classified, and appropriate cross-references are made. For the further convenience of the reader lists of authors and titles of anonymous works are given, under poetry, fiction, and juveniles; and lists of authors also, under religion and drama. The library was opened in the new building with 31,400 volumes upon the shelves. Since that period there has been an annual increase, and it now numbers (1878) 42,000 volumes.

In addition to the volumes belonging to the association, the library contains a collection of the public documents of the United States, placed on deposit for reference, by the trustees of the State Library. This collection now numbers more than 2000 volumes, and is one of the most complete in the United States. The library also contains the "Reports of Drawings and Specifications," published by the United States Patent-Office. The reading-room department connected with the institution is well supplied with papers, magazines, and reviews.

There have been but few changes in the board of officers. The present list is as follows: D. L. Harris, President; E. W. Bond, Vice-President; William Rice, Clerk and Librarian; J. D. Safford, Treasurer; J. M. Thompson, Charles Merriam, Chester W. Chapin, John B. Stebbins, James Kirkham, Charles O. Chapin, Horace Smith, O. H. Greenleaf, George E. Howard, and Samuel Bowles, Directors; R. F. Hawkins and J. H. Appleton, Auditors.

By a change of the by-laws, adopted at the annual meeting in 1873, the mayor of the city, the president of the common council, and the chairman of the school committee are also constituted members ex-officio of the board of directors.

Rev. William Rice, D.D., was elected librarian a few months after the establishment of the library in the city-hall, and has remained in charge until the present time.

The affairs of the association have been conducted on a broad and liberal basis. The directors have steadily adhered to one purpose, that of building up a valuable public library, which should furnish means not only for the gratification of taste, but also for the acquisition of substantial knowledge. They have not been content to establish a mere circulating library, provided with the current literature of the day, but have labored for a far higher and nobler end, viz., the accumulation of a library of permanent value, which would supply the most earnest and serious needs of the community, and furnish ample scope for research and investigation in the various departments of literature, science, art, philosophy, and religion.

They have been eminently successful in this work, and the City Library of Springfield may be regarded as one of the best-selected and valuable libraries of its size in the State, or in the country.

THE CONNECTICUT VALLEY HISTORICAL SOCIETY.*

The Connecticut Valley Historical Society was organized by the adoption of by-laws and the choice of officers at a meeting held at the City Library in Springfield on the 21st of April, 1876. A charter was secured from the Secretary of the Commonwealth under Chapter 375 of the Acts and Resolves of 1874, and the society thus became a corporation legally established under the laws of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, May 9, 1876. The officers of the corporation elected at its organization were the following: President, Judge Henry Morris; Vice-Presidents, Judge A. L. Soule, Hon. William L. Smith, and Samuel Bowles; Clerk and Treasurer, Rev. Wm. Rice, D.D.; Executive Committee, Rev. S. G. Buckingham, D.D., Rev. E. A. Reed, Homer Merriam, Joseph C. Pynchon, Henry S. Lee, Charles Marsh.

The reasons which led to the organization of this society and the importance of the objects which it contemplates are so admirably set forth in the opening address of the president, Judge Henry Morris, that we cannot do better than to present a considerable part of that address as a portion of this brief history:

"The valley of the Connecticut presents a field for historic research equaled by few, surpassed by none. True, we have no Revolutionary battle-fields consecrated in the great struggle for independence. The armies of England never penetrated so far into the interior. The only British soldiers who came here came as prisoners, and some of these took so kindly to our valley that they settled among us as citizens, married wives, established homes, and raised families. Some of their descendants are with us at this day, filling positions of responsibility and usefulness.

"But while we have in the valley no battle-grounds famous in Revolutionary annals, we are rich in memorials of earlier trials. We can point to many a spot where the war-whoop of the savage has echoed in peaceful villages and startled the settler by his fireside, or at his labor in the field, to seek protection for his wife and children.

"The tomahawk and the torch were active instruments in those days in the work of destruction. Here, too, is soil that has witnessed the fierce and protracted conflict with the savage foe, and been wet with the mingled blood of white men and red men. The horrors of that early warfare have had few parallels in later times, unless it be in the atrocities recently perpetrated in the Old World upon a professedly Christian people.

"These early wars have been to a large extent chronicled by writers whose works have been published. I apprehend, however, that there are many interesting details to be gathered and localities marked which have never yet been preserved in a form that will secure their transmission to those who shall come after us.

"Aside from the annals of Indian warfare, this valley has been the scene of many important events that merit a fuller record than they have yet received. How little is known of the part taken in the old French war by the people residing in this valley! Yet it is a fact that in the single year 1745 eighteen of our young men of Springfield met with death during the siege and at the capture of the fortress of Louisburg. How many incidents connecting the valley with the American Revolution have failed of any permanent record! And yet it is safe to say that there is not a town in this part of the State that did not send its sons into our armies to fight the battles for independence, numbers of whom perished on the field or fell victims to the diseases and hardships of camp-life. Is it too late to rescue the names of these heroic men from oblivion? And then that trouble known as Shays' rebellion, which followed so soon after the war of the Revolution,—are there not some traditions to be gathered concerning it which have found no record in the pages of Minot or any other annalist?

"It is not, however, in wars and tumults alone that the true antiquarian will seek subjects for his diligent study. The multifarious transactions of civil life, in which the men who have passed away from among us took part,—transactions which in their time attracted general attention and interest; nay, the very men themselves, the actors in these transactions, who in the two centuries before the present, and some even in the present century, planned and organized our civil institutions, inaugurated and conducted the various enterprises of their time, and gave shape and tone to its social life,—is there not much to be collected and preserved concerning them, that those who may come after us may not be left in profound ignorance that such men have lived and acted their part here?

"It is one of the marked peculiarities of this centennial era that it has drawn the attention of our countrymen so much to the past, and has awakened so strong a desire to preserve the fragmentary memorials that yet remain. Everywhere is manifested an anxiety to secure the local annals. Writers are busy investigating records and documents that have been neglected and forgotten for years. Many town histories have been published. Others are in course of preparation. Historical discourses have been delivered by clergymen in their various parishes. The addresses before the various professional and social organizations existing among us have largely taken on a historical type, and the public mind generally is becoming more inquisitive, and so better informed, about the past. It was in sympathy with this sentiment that this society had its origin. Deeply impressed with the importance of preserving our local annals, and appreciating in some degree the value of the field for investigation afforded by the valley of the Connecticut, a few gentlemen associated themselves as the Connecticut Valley Historical Society, and organized as a corporation under the laws of this Commonwealth. A good degree of interest has been manifested in the object, which, considering the general depression in almost every kind of business at present prevailing, is an encouraging omen of success in our enterprise. Whether this success shall be achieved depends mainly upon the spirit with which the members of the society engage in the work contemplated by our constitution. One very important part of this work is the collection and preservation of ancient records and documents of every kind that may in any way illustrate ancient transactions and the habits of life and modes of business that characterized years long past. Many an important historical fact has been derived from some old letter which has been preserved among the family treasures, or from some entry made in some court record, or in the diary of some individual made for a very different purpose. For instance, it has been regarded as an interesting fact, in connection with the early history of Springfield, that the pioneers who first came to this valley purposed to locate their settlement on the west side of the river, and actually built their first house there. The evidence of that fact rests almost entirely, as I suppose, upon the entry made in the old Pynchon record of a lawsuit about the building of that house. There are many similar cases. I have no doubt that if all the old account-books, newspapers, and documents of various kinds which had lain dormant in the garrets of our old houses for many years before our late civil war, but which were hunted up and sold for paper-stock when paper-stock was high, were now in existence, and could be subjected to a careful scrutiny by persons skilled in antiquarian lore, very many valuable facts illustrating the past history of our land, and the characters of the men and women who were conspicuous actors on the stage of life before the beginning of the present century, would be brought to light. Much, very much, that would have been valuable has been lost in this way within the last fifteen years. Much, however, yet remains and may be saved. Let us endeavor to gather from their dark and dusty depositories these relics of the past and place them in the archives of this society, where they will be carefully preserved and made available to future historians, who shall undertake the office of recording in a permanent form the transactions of a past age.

"In this enterprise we invite the co-operation and solicit the aid of all gentlemen residing in the Connecticut Valley who feel an interest in the object. We should gladly welcome them to our membership. Nor do we confine this invitation to our sex. Remembering what has been wrought by women in this department of research, we extend to the ladies of this valley a cordial invitation to encourage and assist us in this enterprise. Are there not women scattered up and down the old county of Hampshire who will do for the towns where they reside what has been done by Miss Calkins for the city of Norwich, and by Miss Jones for the town of Stockbridge, in writing out the annals of their towns? Nor is there anything in our organization that excludes from our society those who have not the privilege of living in the valley of the Connecticut. While we regard this as our peculiar field, we are happy to receive into our membership the dwellers in the regions on either side of this valley. Wherever there is an individual who sympathizes with our purposes, and desires to aid us in historical research, we shall gladly welcome him as a co-laborer."

The society commenced its operations with 11 members. It has steadily increased in the number of its members, and now comprises many of the most intelligent and cultivated citizens of the Connecticut Valley. Its history has been brief, eight regular meetings only having been held since its organization.

These meetings have been well attended, and have been exceedingly interesting. Valuable papers have been presented and discussed upon the following topics, viz.: "Shad and Salmon in the Connecticut River in the Olden Times," by Dr. A. Booth; "Rev. Stephen Williams and his Journal" (three papers), by Rev. J. W. Harding; "The Old Fire Department of Springfield," by J. K. Newell; "The Old Prison on Main and Bliss Streets, in Springfield," by Judge H. Morris; "The Breck Controversy in the First Parish in Springfield in 1735," by M. A. Green; "The Derivation of English Names," by Hon. Joseph White; "Early Navigation of the Connecticut River," by T. M. Dewey; "Major Elizur Holyoke," by Judge H. Morris; "Springfield during the Rebellion of 1786, known as the Shays Rebellion," by Hon. William L. Smith; "The Beginnings of the Common School in America," by Rev. A. D. Mayo; "Rev. Samuel Peters and his History of Connecticut," by Rev. C. Hammond; "Biographical Sketch of the late William Russell," by Rev. M. C. Stebbins; "The Old Pynchon House and its Builders," by Judge H. Morris; "Count Rumford during the Revolution," by E. A. Thompson; "Slavery in the Connecticut Valley during the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries," by Judge H. Morris; "Dartmouth College and the State of New Connecticut," by John L. Rice; Col. D. M. Bryant's "Reminiscences of Ancient Matters of Local Interest" (read by the president).

Several of these papers are in possession of the society, and it is hoped will hereafter find a permanent record in its printed proceedings.

EDUCATIONAL.*

To the early settlers of Massachusetts no subject was dearer than the careful training and education of their children. This is apparent in the early history of the Plymouth and the Bay colonies, and is equally true, also, of the pioneers who began the settlement of Springfield. The first records of the town are evidence of their early attention to this subject. In a memorandum which is supposed to belong to 1641, the year of the town's recognition by the General Court, there is an enumeration of "Acts app. [uppertaining?] to ye selectmen by order of court," among which are the following: "To see that all children be taught to read and learn a chattechisme, to place forth unruly children and servants, to take account of their sittings, to see schools erected and maintained."

In 1644, on the "26 of ye 7 m.," some of the duties of the selectmen were defined by a "generall vote of ye towne," by which it was incumbent upon them, in addition to other duties, "to see to ye scouring of ditches, and to ye killing of wolves, and to ye training of ye children."

It does not appear upon the records at what particular date the first school was established, but there were early appropriations for the payment of teachers and for other school purposes. The town took action "March ye 13, 1653," concerning "A parsell of land over ye grate river, at ye lower end of Chickkuppy plaine." This tract of land consisted of 30 acres, and it voted "that ye towne do hereby order that ye aforesaid land shall be reserved in ye towne's hands, as ye Towne's land for ye Towne's use, either for ye helping to maintain a school-master or ruling elder, or to help bear any other towne charges, according as it shall be hereafter concluded." The proceeds of this land were for some time devoted in part to the support of schools, but were subsequently diverted to other uses.

May 2, 1677, the town "voted the admittance and entertainment of Wm. Maddison as schoolmaster, he taking three pence of those per weeke whom he teaches to read English, and four pence per weeke of those he teaches both to read and write, as also four pence of those whom he teaches writing wholly, the parents or persons being to allow no more; but the towne for this year, as an Incouragement for Him in ye work, do agree to allow Him ye Rent of ye towne land in Chickupy."

The next teacher employed received a stated salary, as appears from the following:

"April 10, 1678.—At a meeting of the inhabitants wherein they were desired to remain after lecture, It was voted and confirmed to give to Mr. David Denton twenty pounds salary for his encouragement in the worke of schoolmaster."

The record then states that it was stipulated that in case a school could not be kept open for him all the time, he was to have "half of said pounds, and time to plant and dress two acres of Indian corn." As the accounts of the town show that he was paid only £10, it is presumed that he had time to "plant and dress" his corn.

* By A. P. Stone.

In 1682, "The selectmen agreed with Goodwife Mirricke, to encourage her in the good work of training up of children and teaching children to read, that she should have 3*d*. a weeke for every child that she takes to perform this good work for."

In 1683, John Richard was engaged as schoolmaster, and was employed in that capacity for several years. Although the salary of £20, mentioned above, may be regarded as a very fair compensation for the time, it would seem probable that some difficulty was experienced in obtaining a suitable teacher for that sum, for in March, 1690, instructions were given to the "selectmen to engage a schoolmaster, and they may give or engage to give more than £20, the sum by which they are stinted."

The moral training of children was carefully attended to, and a strict watch was kept over young persons when in public assemblies. In 1679 the town records say, "It is also ordered by ye selectmen that all youths and boys under the age, 12 years of age, sit on that seat under the deacon's seat, and also on that seat against, and on the stairs, only they must not block up the stairs when minister Glover comes." "Deacon Parsons" and others were ordered "to have an eye on the boys."

The following extract from the records of the same year would seem to imply that there were some persons whose moral training had not been successful, and that the town resorted to other means than schools and tithingmen for their correction: "The Towne is Dr. To Goodman Marshfield, by mending the stockes, and a staple, 3*s*. 6*d*."

It is supposed that the first schools were kept in private houses, or in rooms hired for that purpose. In 1679 there was paid "to Goodman Merricke for his house for schooling, 10*s*. 6*d*;" and, soon after, to "Samuel Ely, £1 10*s*. 9*d*., of which 9*s*. is for a school in his house." There was also a school in the tower of the meeting-house, as appears from the record of a town-meeting, bearing date of Oct. 9, 1678.

The first school-house, properly so called, was erected in 1679, and the action of the town in relation to the same is recorded, with considerable minuteness, as follows:

May 7, 1679.—"At a town-meeting, being a legal meeting, It was voted and consented that there should be an house erected for that noble design and use of learning in those so necessary pieces or parts of learning, videl, reading, and writing, and that this house should be twenty and two foot in length and eighteen foot in breadth."

June 2, 1679.—"At a meeting of the Selectmen, being Gent. Deacon Benj. Parsons, Jno. Dumbleton, Henry Chapin, Jno. Holyoke, it having been formerly at a Town-meeting propounded to ye Towne that they would set up a school-house for ye town, and they concluded that such a house should be erected, and appointed to ye selectmen to bargain with any meet person or persons to build such an house for such a use; accordingly, they have bargained with Thomas Stebbins for to get timber for such a building and frame it, whose length is to be twenty-two foot, and breadth seventeen foot, and stud six foot and halfe; and he, the said Thomas Stebbins, is to carry the frame to place and nail the clapboards close on to both sides, and to lath it, and shingle the roofe, and to make three light spaces on one side and two on one end, and to set up a mantle-tree, and set up a rung chimney and daub it, and the said Thomas is to have for his worke so done fourteen pounds paid by the Towne, and in case it so prove that the said Thomas Stebbins shall have a hard bargain, it is hereby agreed that he shall have 10*s*. more of the Towne.

"THOMAS STEBBINS."

Aug. 4, 1679.—"It was voted and concluded that the school-house shall be set somewhere in the lane going to the upper wharfe, and the Selectmen to agree about and determine the particular place."

The lane spoken of above was the Ferry Street of the early town, now Cypress Street, north of the railroad, and leading from Main Street to the river. The school-house was erected soon afterward, as the following accounts show:

"Dec. 20, 1679.—The Towne is Dr.:

"To Thomas Stebbins, Jun., for his worke about ye school-house.....	10	0	0
"To Goodman Lamb, carting, 1 day, clay for ye school-house.....	0	5	ii
"To Sam. Ely, for entertaining the school-house raisers..	0	3	8"

The location of this school-house was almost at the northern extremity of the population as it was then distributed in the main settlement of the town, and it is not improbable that it was unsatisfactory in that respect, for at a town-meeting held Feb. 1, 1680, it was proposed to have the building removed to the "middle of ye town," provided any person would do so "without any charge to ye town."

It is not recorded, nor known, whether such a removal took place, but there is a tradition that the house was removed to the south side of Elm Street, near Main, in the rear of the present location of the Chicopee National Bank. But it is more probable that a building was purchased there and used for a school; for, Oct. 21, 1685, it was voted to purchase a house built by Edward Stebbins, on the land of Samuel Ball, "for a school-house, for twenty-five pounds."

The early residents of Springfield believed in compulsory education, for, "April 24, 1685, It was voted that all parents and householders be enjoined to send their children and servants to school, and that all persons from the Round Hill to the Mill River who do not send such children as are over five years and under nine years shall pay at the rate of two pence per week for the space of half a year." Very similar action was again taken May 19, 1692.

The following action of the town is more formal in its character, and shows a deep interest on the part of the people in the education of their children:

"To the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, sitting for Springfield, May 20, 1707.

"Rules & orders made & agreed on by the Freeholders & Inhabitants of the town of Springfield, qualified for voters in town affairs, at their meeting May 9, 1707, duly warned for that end & agreed on to be presented to the General Quarter Sessions, sitting at Springfield, May 20, 1707.

"Inasmuch as the law of the Province obliges this town to keep & maintain a Grammar school, writing school, & reading school, & that the schoolmasters be suitably Incouraged & paid by the inhabitants of said town, Now, for ye better support of s'd school & Incouragement of learning, It is agreed & voted that the Parents of every scholar going to said school shall pay three pence per weeke in town pay; & for the enabling the town to recover such dues for each scholar, It is agreed that the schoolmaster that shall be hired from time to time shall keep an exact account of every scholar's coming to said school & leaving said school; and upon the demand of the selectmen such schoolmaster shall deliver to said selectmen, under his hand, an account of the scholars as aforesaid said account shall be obliging as to the time of said scholar's attendance, & the selectmen or assessors from time to time are hereby ordered & Impowered to assess the said sum or sums upon the Parents & masters of said scholars, & to affix or add the said sum & sums to their town rates that shall be granted from time to time by the town, for assessing and raising such further sums for completing the schoolmaster's ful dues, & that shall be due to him; & it is further ordered & agreed that the selectmen consider who are such children or scholars as to be privileged and that the selectmen do exempt their parents & masters from paying for such children going to school, in whole or in part.—Approved May 20, 1707."

A vote was passed, Nov. 30, 1708, requiring "Each person sending a child to school to send a load of wood within two weeks, or pay enough to buy a load."

Dec. 1, 1709, the salary of John Sherman, "Grammar-school master," was fixed at "£40 in grain, viz., Pease, Rye, Indian Corn, & Barley, at the town price."

In 1716 the town was divided into precincts (in addition to the main village) as follows: "1. The west side of the greater river. 2. The Longmeadow. 3. The west side of Agawam River. 4. The Upper Chicopee. 5. The Lower Chicopee. 6. Skipmuck." Each precinct was required to support one school, and in case of neglect the money raised was to return to the town treasury. The amount of money raised for schools this year was £82.

From the above date during the remainder of the century there is recorded little of special interest concerning the schools. A grammar school was maintained, except at short intervals, until about 1820, and some of its teachers were men of ability. These grammar schools, like those before mentioned, were not like the schools now known by that name, but were of a higher grade, embracing, in part at least, the work of high schools, and were maintained in accordance with the law of 1647, requiring towns of 100 families or more "to set up a grammar schoole, the master thereof being able to instruct youth so far as they can be fitted for y^e university."

The schools were usually under the oversight of the select-

James E. Russell

The subject of this sketch, son of Stephen O. and Mary McCray Russell, was born in Ellington, Conn., in 1821. When he was four years of age his parents removed to Springfield, and his father became prominently identified with the interests of the town, and occupied many positions of trust and responsibility. James E. received his education at the city schools, and by his diligence and application acquired an education that well qualified him for his subsequent active business career. He early developed traits of character that stamped him as a forthcoming active business man, and while he was attending school he turned an honest penny by carrying the mail from the post-office to the neighbors residing in the vicinity of his home. Every morning at eight o'clock he appeared at the office for the mail, and was prompt and methodical in the discharge of his duty.

At the age of sixteen he assisted in running the line for the Hartford and Springfield Railroad, and also that of the Boston and Albany, between Springfield and Westfield. Two years later he accepted a position in the Springfield post-office, under Albert Morgan. He remained here about three years, and was then appointed mail-agent on the Boston and Albany Railroad, and was one of two first appointed in this State, and probably first in the United States. He occupied this position until 1845, when, in consequence of an accident wherein he came near losing his life, he resigned his office, and upon recovering his health accepted a position as conductor on the Boston and Albany road, and run the first passenger express train on the New York line from Boston to Springfield. In this business he displayed the same watchful care and method that marked his previous life, and was considered one of the most trustworthy and popular conductors on the road. Honorable with his employers, and popular and gentlemanly with the public, he officiated in this capacity until 1857, when he came to Springfield and took charge of the old American House, remaining there but a few months, when, in 1858, he was elected to the office of register of deeds, and has held that office continuously since, and discharged the duties with great credit to himself and the entire satisfaction of the people.

It is evident that Mr. Russell commands the respect of his fellow-citizens in a remarkable degree, from the fact that he has been successively chosen to this important office for nearly a quarter of a century, and received the votes of all classes irrespective of party.

Although Mr. Russell has confined himself closely to the discharge of his duties as a public officer, he has manifested a lively interest in matters tending to promote the welfare of the city and county. Honorable and upright in business, genial and social in nature, ever ready to assist with means within his power all those who ask, he has won the confidence, and justly merits the universal esteem in which he is held by the people.

Philip Wilcox

PHILIP WILCOX was born Sept. 2, 1800, at East Berlin, Conn. He was a lineal descendant of the fourth generation from Daniel Wilcox, who emigrated from England and settled in Middletown, Conn., then an unbroken wilderness. His son Daniel, Jr., subsequently settled at Berlin, then a part of New Britain. He died at the age of seventy-four, and on his tombstone is found the following inscription:

"I gave this ground, I'm laid here first,
Soon my remains will turn to dust;
My wife and progeny around,
Come sleep with me in this cold ground."

At the time of his wife's death she was the mother of children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren to the number of two hundred and ninety-two. His wife died in 1807, aged ninety-two.

Philip Wilcox came to Springfield in 1823, and started the tinware business on State Street opposite the United States armory, that being a favorable location at that time for business. After a few years he followed the direction of the business centre of the village, and moved down on State Street near Main. His brother Philo F., having learned his trade of him (Philip), established himself in the same business on Main Street.

The Wilcoxes were the first to manufacture stoves in this vicinity, which was for many years an important branch of trade; but upon the completion of the Boston and Albany Railroad, the cheapness of coal and iron at the latter place led to unequal competition, and Mr. Wilcox abandoned the manufacture of stoves. He was very much interested in the construction of that railroad, impressed with the idea that it would be a great benefit to Springfield, as its construction has since proved to be the making of the city. His death came at about the time of its completion and in the midst of his most active and successful business career, he being only forty-two years of age. Mr. Wilcox was interested in all enterprises tending to build up and beautify Springfield, and in the various associations here, among which was the Hampden Mechanics' Association. He was connected with the South Congregationalist Church, of which he was one of the original trustees. In his death Springfield lost one of its most enterprising and esteemed citizens; a man of strict integrity of purpose in all his business relations, and uniformly respected by all who knew him.

He was married to Eliza Parmelee, of Middletown, Conn., June 26, 1823. She died Nov. 19, 1842, aged forty-two. Their children were William L., Mrs. C. M. Lee (deceased), John P., and Mrs. J. K. Dexter, of Holyoke. The sons are in business in the old stand occupied by their father prior to his death, having charge of the same at an early age in life. They are among the leading business men of the city, and have carried to a successful and profitable completion the trade opened by their father over half a century ago.

Philo F. Wilcox

PHILO F. WILCOX was a native of East Berlin, Conn., and came to this city when less than twenty years of age, following his elder brother, Philip, founder of the stove and tinware trade conducted by his sons (William L. and John P.) to this day. Philo served his brother at this trade for some time; was subsequently associated with him, and afterwards purchased a branch of the business and carried it on in a store opposite Foote's Block, on Main Street. From this he retired about the year 1840, having secured a sufficient competence to place him beyond the apprehension of want.

Soon after the Chicopee Bank was organized Mr. Wilcox was chosen one of its directors, an office he held until his death, being also for more than twenty years its president, and for about ten years vice-president of the Springfield Institution for Savings. He was also vice-president for many years of the Springfield Mutual Insurance Company. He was a Republican in politics, and represented the city for two terms in the State Legislature of Massachusetts just prior to the war. Mr. Wilcox was largely interested in the interests of the city, and upon his retirement from business invested much of his capital in real estate, which by the rapid rise in value proved a profitable investment. He was a man of keen judgment, possessing a business sagacity and a will to carry forward whatever he conceived to be right. His father being a farmer, both he and his brother Philip enjoyed only limited opportunities for education from books, but while young men they laid well the foundation for successful business careers, and were men of stability and prudence in all the relations of life.

In the year 1826, November 9, he married Miss Orpha J., daughter of Asa Wood, of Springfield. They had seven children, all of whom are deceased but one, Mrs. Utley Cadwell, of New York. One son, E. P. Wilcox, died Sept. 13, 1870; another son, Frank P., died April, 1876. Mr. Wilcox died Jan. 1, 1871, aged sixty-five.

W. C. Sturtevant

HON. WARNER C. STURTEVANT was born in Keene, Cheshire Co., N. H., Jan. 23, 1809. His grandfather, Cornelius Sturtevant, was a native of Belfast, Me., settled in Keene, N. H., about the year 1787, where he lived as a farmer during the remainder of his life, and died at the advanced age of ninety-one, in the year 1822. His father, Luther Sturtevant, was a ship carpenter by trade, and spent the time until he was fifty years of age at that business, when he bought a farm and followed agricultural pursuits the remainder of his life. He was married to Azubah Claflin, formerly of Hopkinton, Mass. She was a cousin of H. B. Claflin, of New York, and also of Governor Claflin, of Massachusetts.

Their children were four sons and three daughters, of whom the subject of this narrative was the youngest. The father died at the age of eighty-nine, in the year 1867; the mother died about 1858, aged seventy-six.

At the age of fourteen Mr. Sturtevant apprenticed himself to learn the business of the manufacture of crackers. At the end of seven years he was engaged as journeyman in the same business, and continued for six years, when he commenced business for himself in Bath, N. H. After some four years' business in that place, he spent five years in Hanover, N. H.

In the year 1844 he came to Springfield and established himself in the same business, opening a wholesale and retail house, with a trade reaching to various parts of this State, and the States of New York and Connecticut. This he continued for some sixteen years, and retired from the business. Since that time he has built a fine brick block on Main Street, Springfield, and a residence on the corner of Spring and Pearl Streets.

During the past nine years Mr. Sturtevant has been president of the Springfield Mutual Fire Assurance Company, and he was one of the guarantee capitalists of the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Company upon its organization, and a director ever since. Upon the organization of Springfield as a city he was for two years following a member of the city council, and for one term alderman. In 1864 he represented wards One and Two of the city in the State Legislature, and in 1872 he was chosen to the Legislature from wards Four and Six.

Mr. Sturtevant has never been considered in any sense of the term a professional politician, but always interested in the great political questions of the day. He was identified in politics with the Democratic party from his first vote until 1852, when upon the agitation of the slavery question he favored the opposition to human bondage, and upon the formation of the Republican party became a supporter of its platform. He has been a subscriber to the educational interests of the city, and always favors public enterprises tending to promote the well-being of society. Although his opportunities for education were limited while young, he cultivated a taste for reading, and during his life he has made himself familiar with the best authors of history.

In the year 1833 he married Abigail, daughter of Captain Lyon, of Northborough, Mass. By this union there were born three children,—Hannah L., died young; Warner F., a merchant, of Springfield; and Albert L., at the head of the Stationery Bureau, at Washington. Mrs. Sturtevant died in 1842. For his second wife he married Nancy H. Ricker, of Bath, N. H. Their children were Mary (died at the age of six), and Abbie Martica.

men, who were the general managers of town affairs. Sometimes special committees were appointed to look after them; but school committees as now known date only from 1826-27.

Until the early part of the present century there were few private schools in the town, except for girls, and those were of a temporary character.

In 1812 an academy for both sexes was opened in a building, now used as a dwelling-house, on the north side of Elm Street, a few rods west of the First Church. This school continued until about 1824, and its list of teachers included the names of Benjamin Day, Mr. Lusk, Mr. Olmstead, Mr. Morley, Miss Martha Ely, and J. W. Crooks. Many persons are now living who were pupils at that school. Some written lists of the pupils still preserved contain the names of Maj. E. Ingersoll, of the United States Armory, Henry and James Brewer, many bearing the names of Bliss and Chapin, and others. A Lancasterian or Monitorial school was attempted in 1827, but continued only a year or two.

In 1829 a private school of a high order, for young ladies, was opened, under the direction of an association of gentlemen, in a building, still standing, on the east side of Maple Street, between Union and High Streets. Miss Julia Hawkes, the first teacher, left in 1833 to open a school in Philadelphia, and was followed by Rev. Mr. Eaton. In 1835 this school was succeeded by one taught by Rev. George Nichols and wife, in a building at the southeast corner of Main and State Streets. In the following year it was removed to the building next west of the court-house, on Court Street. In 1840, Mr. Nichols died, and the school, which has continued to the present time, was subsequently taught by Mrs. Nichols, Miss H. S. Avery, Miss Elizabeth Stebbins, Misses Celia and Mary Campbell, Mr. E. D. Bangs, and Mr. C. C. Burnett, the present principal. For many years it has been a school for both sexes, and has been known as the English and Classical Institute.

In April, 1825, the town appointed a committee "to enquire into the existing administration of the town schools, and to digest such improvements in the same as in their judgment may be proper." This committee presented, August 15th, through their chairman, William B. Calhoun, a lengthy and able report, in which they stated that they had pursued their investigations under twelve heads. They complain of limited appropriations, want of system and of supervisory power, and that "none of the schools have kept pace with the improvement and advancement in the science of instruction." As to the statute regarding morals and manners, they were "unable to find a single instructor who had ever read the statute or was even aware of its existence." The town chose William B. Calhoun, George Colton, Joseph Hall, Jr., Joshua Frost, Frederic A. Orchard, James W. Crooks, and Justice Williams a committee, "to be joined by the stated clergymen of the town," to have charge of and conduct the schools.

For a quarter of a century following this action the schools constituted a subject of much discussion and legislation in town- and district-meetings. It was emphatically the revolutionary period of the schools. There are many people now living who have a vivid recollection of the stirring debates of those times, and of the very able advocacy of advanced views of education by leading citizens.

In 1827 the town voted "that it is expedient to establish a high school, to be kept permanently in one place." Land was purchased of Simeon Sanborn on School Street, and a house was erected, in which a school for boys was opened in 1828, and continued until about 1837. The principal teachers of the school were Storey Hebard, S. H. Calhoun, Mr. Morley, Mr. Knox, Henry R. Vaille, J. N. Sikes, and C. C. Burnett. Many of the leading citizens of Springfield for the past forty years were pupils of that school.

Springfield was the first place in Massachusetts to employ a superintendent of schools, having elected to that position, in 1840, Mr. S. S. Green, now professor in Brown University, who entered upon his duties in August of that year. After the second year, the office was discontinued for the want of an appropriation. Mr. Green's two annual reports show him to have been an intelligent educator and an efficient worker in the schools.

In 1841 a high school for the centre district of the town was opened in the school-house on Elm Street, on the site of the present court-house. Rev. Sanford Lawton, who since 1835 had taught a private school in the building now occupied as a book-store, at the corner of Main and State Streets, was the first teacher. He was succeeded, in 1844, by Ariel Parrish. A new building for the school was erected on Court Street, and dedicated Sept. 9, 1848.

In 1849 the school committee, Josiah Hooker, chairman, called the attention of the town to the law—then recently passed—requiring towns of 500 or more families to support a high school for the benefit of the whole town. Immediate action was taken, and an arrangement was made with the centre district by which such a school was opened May 5th, occupying a part of the school-house on Court Street. The first formal graduation from the school was in 1856, by a class of nine pupils.

Mr. Parrish continued in charge of the high school until August, 1865, when he was succeeded by Rev. M. C. Stebbins, who continued its principal until July, 1874. The growth of the school having rendered the building on Court Street insufficient for its accommodation, a new and spacious building was erected on State Street, and dedicated Aug. 31, 1874, at which time Mr. W. W. Calhoun, the present principal of the school, entered upon his duties. The cost of the building was $142,000; of the lot, $28,000; total, $170,000. The number of pupils enrolled in the school during the school year ending July, 1879, was 418; graduates, 54.

For several years subsequent to 1850 the school authorities urged the importance of a superintendent of schools. Josiah Hooker, Esq., was unceasing in his efforts in that direction until 1865, when the office was re-established, and E. A. Hubbard was elected to the place. Mr. Hubbard's administration was one of activity, reconstruction, and progress. A new code of regulations and a course of study were prepared for the schools, and much attention given to methods of instruction and management. The accommodations for the school had become insufficient in extent and kind. During Mr. Hubbard's term of service five spacious and convenient grammar-school buildings were erected,—the Hooker school-house on North Main Street; the houses on Elm, Oak, Central, and Worthington Streets; and the house at Indian Orchard village. The new high-school building was also commenced. Mr. Hubbard resigned in 1873, and was succeeded by A. P. Stone, the present incumbent.

In addition to the private schools heretofore mentioned, two others have been more recently established,—a day- and boarding-school for young ladies, by the Misses Howard, at the corner of Union and School Streets, and the Collegiate Institute, which prepares young people for college and for business, established by Rev. M. C. Stebbins in 1874, and now located in the old court-house, on the west side of Court Square.

There has been a steady growth of the schools in numbers and character. In 1840, 1950 different pupils were taught, at an expense of $8947; while in 1875, probably the year of the city's greatest population, there were 5690 pupils, taught by 133 teachers, and the current expenses were $115,788. The present value of the school-houses, lots, and furniture is $550,000.

The character and scope of the instruction given in the schools will compare favorably with those in any portion of the State. In the primary schools, covering a period of four years, and in the grammar schools, five years, instruction is given in reading, spelling, penmanship, arithmetic, geography, English grammar and language, United States history, book-keeping, music, and drawing. The high school, four years, has a classical course preparatory to college, and an academic course, comprising mathematics, the sciences, English language and literature, metaphysics, and political economy, with the ancient and modern languages as optional branches. Evening schools for adults have been supported since 1850, and there is an evening school for instruction in industrial and mechanical drawing.

In the long list of teachers employed in the public schools there are many who have done a noble work for their schools and for the community; and there are some who have had a fitting recognition of their labors by a long term of service. Mr. Charles Barrows, principal of the Oak Street Grammar School, began his duties in 1839, and has taught forty years. Miss Margaret Bliss taught thirty-six years, at first in the lower grades and then as assistant in the high school, from its organization until her resignation, in 1877. Mr. Parrish was principal of the high school for more than twenty years. Mr. E. F. Foster, of the Worthington Street School, has taught twenty-five years, and Mr. Stratton, of the Hooker School, more than twenty years.

The history of the Springfield schools is a creditable feature in the development of the town and city; but the necessary limits of this sketch preclude the introduction, from the records, of much material of intense interest. Good schools have been appreciated, and liberal appropriations made; the teachers have found fair social recognition, and many of the ablest citizens have been unwavering friends and advocates of a high order of schools, and have been selected to take part in their management. In the large list of persons who have served upon the school committee there are some whose names are prominent in the records. Among these are William B. Calhoun, Henry W. Lee (late bishop of Illinois), Rev. Samuel Osgood, C. A. Winchester, Rev. W. B. O. Peabody, Josiah Hooker (especially active and efficient), Rev. M. G. Clark, S. McNary, Marcellus Pinney, John E. Taylor, Henry R. Vaille, J. E. McIntire, John L. King, Rev. William Rice, Rev. S. G. Buckingham, and others. The committee for the current year are John E. Taylor (chairman), A. D. Mayo, William Rice, S. Lawton, Jr., T. M. Brown, L. H. Cone, J. G. Chase, A. M. Copeland, Charles J. Goodwin.

THE UNITED STATES ARMORY.

The United States Armory located in this city is the representative institution of its kind in the United States, and, with the exception, perhaps, of railroads, no element has contributed so largely to the material development and prosperity of Springfield.

The establishment dates its origin back to 1776. In that year Col. David Mason, of Boston, who had distinguished himself in the service of the colonial army, was ordered by Gen. Washington to select a site somewhere in New England for the founding of works for the manufacture of such ammunition, etc., as might be wanted. Gen. Washington and the Continental Congress were inclined to locate the works at Hartford, and in fact preparations had already begun at that place for this establishment, when, upon Col. Mason's representation to Gen. Knox that Springfield was the most suitable place, being easy of access both by land and water, Congress was induced to change the location from Hartford to this place. Col. Mason superintended the starting of the work, and remained in charge five years.

He was well qualified for the duties assigned him, having been an artillery officer in the French war, and the founder of an artillery company in Boston in 1763. He was appointed by the committee of safety, with title of engineer, Nov. 17, 1774, as the most proper person to collect military stores, etc. The cannon which the British endeavored to secure at Salem in February, 1775, had been purchased by him, and were in his keeping. Fearing further trouble of the same kind, he ordered collections to be stored at Lexington and Concord, which resulted in the battles at those places. Col. Mason died in Boston, Sept. 16, 1794, aged eighty-nine.

Immediately after the location of the works was definitely settled, a laboratory where cartridges and fireworks were manufactured was started in a barn belonging to Ebenezer Stebbins, located a short distance north of the present railroad depot. Col. Mason purchased 10 acres of land on the hill, and within two or three years the "laboratory" was transferred from its down-town quarters to the commanding eminence now occupied by the armory buildings. The oldest record in the armory books relates to work done in this "laboratory" in April, 1778, the product of the first week's work being 7584 cartridges. The armory was established by act of Congress, passed in April, 1794, and the first deed of land to the United States was recorded in 1795, and was the sale of one and one-half acres of land near the lower water-shops by Nathaniel Patten, of Hartford, for the sum of $400.

The State granted the general government the right to take 600 acres of land, and in 1800 the town of Springfield appointed George Bliss, John Hooker, and William Ely a committee to sell the government such land as might be needed. The whole grant, however, has not been appropriated. The lands now comprise 300 acres.

As stated above, the armory was established in 1794, and, although the works had been in operation on the hill eight years, in making cartridges, etc., it was not until 1795 that arms were first manufactured. The records of that year show that 40 hands were employed, and that 245 muskets were manufactured.

The armory was now upon a sure basis, and its history from that time to the present is that of rapid development in the manufacture of small-arms. As valuable improvements from time to time in this manufacture sprang into being they were adopted by the armory, and from the old musket to the present perfect breech-loading rifle the Springfield arms have occupied the front rank both in Europe and America.

The following valuable table exhibits the number of arms manufactured annually from 1795 to 1878: 1795, 245; 1796, 838; 1797, 1028; 1798, 1044; 1799, 4595; 1800, 4862; 1801, 3205; 1802, 4358; 1803, 4775; 1804, 3566; 1805, 3535; 1806, 2018; 1807, 5692; 1808, 5870; 1809, 7070; 1810, 9700; 1811, 12,020; 1812, 10,140; 1813, 6920; 1814, 9585; 1815, 7279; 1816, 7199; 1817, 13,015; 1818, 12,000; 1819, 12,000; 1820, 13,200; 1821, 13,000; 1822, 13,200; 1823, 14,000; 1824, 14,000; 1825, 15,000; 1826, 15,500; 1827, 14,500; 1828, 15,500; 1829, 16,500; 1830, 16,500; 1831, 16,200; 1832, 13,600; 1833, 12,400; 1834, 14,000; 1835, 13,000; 1836, 13,500; 1837, 14,500; 1838, 15,000; 1839, 10,000; 1840 (to September 30th), 5967; 1841 (to September 30th), 10,700; 1842 (to September 30th), 9720; 1843 (to June 30th), 4601; 1844, 7690; 1845, 12,077; 1846, 14,265; 1847, 11,293; 1848, 15,018; 1849, 15,215; 1850, 18,155; 1851, 21,000; 1852, 19,800; 1853, 14,500; 1854, 11,000; 1855, 8624; 1856, 3723; 1857, 2015; 1858, 11,198; 1859, 11,500; 1860, 9358; 1861, 13,802; 1862, 102,410; 1863, 217,783; 1864, 276,830; 1865, 195,341; 1866, 200. 1866, cadet rifles made, 500. 1866, rifles altered to breech-loaders (cal. .50), 2259; 1867, 23,880; 1868, 27,848; 1869, 18. 1869, cadet made new, 500. 1870, rifles altered to breech-loaders (model '66), 500; 1870 (model '68), 45,937. 1870, cadet made new (model '69), 310. 1871, rifles altered to breech-loaders, 31,992; 1872, 14,047; 1873 (cal. .45), 10,015; 1874, 28,839; 1875, 26,902; 1876, 15,144; 1877, 7050; 1878, 13,005.

There have been seventeen superintendents of the armory, as follows, viz.:

David Ames, from 1794 to Oct. 31, 1802; Joseph Morgan, from Nov. 1, 1802, to Oct. 31, 1805; Benjamin Prescott, from Nov. 1, 1805, to Aug. 31, 1813; Henry Lechler, from Sept. 1,

David Ames

DAVID AND JOHN AMES.

Among the prominent manufactures which have conduced most to New England wealth and repute, that of paper stands high.

It began in the very infancy of manufacturing in the Connecticut Valley, and to this day is continued with ardor and success. For more than fifty years, D. & J. Ames' paper was known and used, far and wide, in the United States.

They were sons of David Ames and Rebecca Johnson. The father, first superintendent of the U. S. Armory at Springfield, appointed by President Washington, and holder of the office for nine years, came to Springfield from West Bridgewater, Mass., in 1795, and founded the business in a little factory on Mill River.

The elder son, David, born at West Bridgewater, Aug. 25, 1792, married Mary Orr Mitchell, of East Bridgewater, daughter of Hon. Nahum Mitchell.

At maturity he espoused with zeal the occupation he was bred to inherit and advance. To his comprehensive judgment and indomitable energy the success of the firm was in a great measure due.

Paper of their manufacture was unsurpassed in quality. A lady one day exhibited at his house a specimen of beautiful French note paper, purchased in New York. He held it to the light, and, to her great astonishment, pointed out the water-mark of his firm indelibly impressed thereon.

John Ames, the junior partner, was born at Springfield, Sept. 2, 1800, and was distinguished for his inventive faculty.

All kinds of paper were then made by hand. His cylinder-machine, patented in 1822, revolutionized the method, and introduced economy, speed, and power.

He brought out the cylinder washer, the calendar finishing-machine, as well as new ruling- and stamping-machines. What is commonly known as the "Fourdrinier" trimmiug-machine was also of his invention, but he neglected to patent it, and the glory was assigned to the foreigner.

David and John both yet live, fit and striking representatives of that early generation of great manufacturers which served mankind well by its skill, and set example of thrift and enterprise, by which its followers have amassed colossal fortunes and lined the streams of New England with happy villages; the products of whose industry commerce bears to every spot on the globe where civilized man has a home.

Mulligan

JOHN MULLIGAN was born in Hartford, Conn., Jan. 12, 1820, and was the first child born of Irish parents in that city. His father, John Mulligan, was a native of the North of Ireland; came to this country in the year 1819, and settled in Hartford, where he lived the remainder of his life, dying in 1841, aged forty-three. His mother was also a native of Ireland, coming to this country soon after her marriage. She lived to the advanced age of eighty, and died in 1875.

Their family consisted of five sons and two daughters, of whom only four are living. Mr. Mulligan was the eldest son of this family, and had the advantages of the common schools of Hartford until he was sixteen years of age, when he was apprenticed to Daniel Copeland, of Hartford, a manufacturer of steam-engines and machinery, remaining with him about three years. He was subsequently with Guild & Douglas, of Middletown, Conn., also manufacturers of steam-engines and machinery, and spent some two years in Philadelphia with William Norris, the celebrated locomotive manufacturer. During these years he became strongly impressed with the idea of being an engineer, and in 1841, returning to Hartford, engaged as such on a tow-boat called the "William Hall," plying between Hartford and Willimansett Falls. The following season he ran a passenger boat between Springfield and Hartford, called "Phoenix," for Hon. C. W. Chapin.

From 1842 to 1852 he was employed as locomotive engineer on the Boston and Albany Railroad; from that time until 1868 as master mechanic of the Connecticut River Railroad; from the latter date until 1872 he acted as master mechanic, and also as superintendent, of the same road, and still retains the latter position.

He has been called to fill important offices for many years past, having served in the Springfield city government,—two years as alderman and five years as councilman. In 1878 he was chosen one of the trustees of the Hampden Savings Bank.

Mr. Mulligan owes his present position to his own exertions, his perseverance, integrity, and uprightness in all his business relations; retaining the confidence, since his start in business life, of all with whom he has been associated.

In the year 1845 he married Lydia A., daughter of Hastings Bridges, of Worcester Co., Mass.

Their children are Mrs. J. M. Fuller and Charles H., superintendent of the Hawkins Foundry, Springfield.

1813, to Jan. 15, 1815; Benjamin Prescott, from Jan. 16, 1815, to May 31, 1815; Lieut.-Col. Roswell Lee, from June 1, 1815, to Aug. 25, 1833; Lieut.-Col. George Talcott,—acting,—to Oct. 31, 1833; John Robb, from Nov. 1, 1833, to April 15, 1841; Lieut.-Col. J. W. Ripley, from April 16, 1841, to Aug. 16, 1854; E. S. Allin,—acting,—from Aug. 17, 1854, to Oct. 18, 1854; Gen. James S. Whitney, from Oct. 19, 1854, to March 1, 1860; E. S. Allin,—acting,—from March 1, 1860, to June 27, 1860; Col. I. H. Wright, from June 27, 1860, to April 25, 1861; George Dwight, from April 25, 1861, to Aug. 21, 1861; Capt. A. B. Dyer, from Aug. 21, 1861, to Oct. 27, 1864; Col. T. T. S. Laidley, Oct. 27, 1864, to May 14, 1866; Capt. C. C. Chaffee, Jr.,—acting,—from May 14, 1866, to June 14, 1866; Col. James G. Benton, June 14, 1866, present incumbent. The present commanding officers are as follows: Col. James G. Benton, Commandant; Capt. George W. McKee and Lieuts. John E. Greer and David A. Lyle, Assistants; Maj. Edward Ingersoll, Ordnance Storekeeper and Paymaster; E. S. Allin, Master-Armorer.

During the Rebellion the works were run day and night; 3400 men were employed and 1000 muskets made daily, and the pay-roll amounted to $200,000. The present production is about 100 carbines and rifles per day. The breech-loading model was adopted in 1873, and is said to be the most perfect breech-loading firearm in the world.

The main building, where the arms are stored, was commenced in 1846, and completed a few years later. The last building erected was the west building, fronting State Street. The buildings east were originally erected for arsenals, but were subsequently enlarged and made into workshops. The present arrangement of the office building was effected in 1863-64, although the building proper was erected previously. The small dwellings and Maj. Ingersoll's home were built in 1834, and the residence of the commanding officers in 1846. The storehouse was built during the administration of Col. Ripley, and two wings were subsequently added,—one in 1861, and the other in 1863. In the latter year, also, the forge-shops were completed, and in the following year the carpenter-shops and stocking-department were built. The water-shops, where the heavy casting is done, are located on Mill River, and the present main building was erected in 1857. The additions were made in 1862-63.

But one attempt was ever made to capture the armory, and that was by Daniel Shays, Jan. 25, 1787. At this time the arsenal was occupied by Gen. Shepard with a force of 1100 men. The capture of the armory was planned by Luke Day, who, with a force of 400 men, was across the river in West Springfield, and Shays, with a force of over 1000, was at Chicopee. The following message was sent to Gen. Shepard by Day:

"The body of the people, assembled in arms, adhering to the first principles of nature,—self-preservation,—do, in the most peremptory manner, demand: 1st. That the troops in Springfield lay down their arms. 2d. That their arms be deposited in the public stores, under the care of the proper officers, to be returned to the owners at the termination of the present contest. 3d. That the troops return to their homes on parole."

On the morning of the 25th of January, without the co-operation of Day, Shays marched toward Springfield, and upon arriving near the armory was met by messengers from Gen. Shepard, demanding his intentions, with a declaration that if he continued a forward movement he should fire upon the column. Shays' reply to the messenger was, "I propose to capture the hill, and to-night I shall sleep in the barracks!"

The invading columns pressed forward, and finally, thinking to frighten them, Gen. Shepard ordered a discharge of cannon at their right and left and over their heads. This did not, however, in the least check their forward movement, and Gen. Shepard, convinced at last that Shays was determined on the consummation of his plot, brought his artillery to bear upon the advancing forces and fired. One discharge was sufficient to convince the mischief-working Shays that

Shepard intended to hold the arsenal at any hazard. Three men were killed, and the ranks broke in utter confusion and fled to the hills of Luddlow, ten miles distant, and no further attempt was made to capture the armory.

The following history of the Springfield gun is copied from the columns of the Springfield Republican, and may be relied upon as accurate:

"Among the most important improvements in the manufacture of the gun is the machine for making the stocks, invented by the late Thomas Blanchard, of Boston and this city, and the present method of making the barrels, which, for a wonder, was introduced from England. The old process was to take a scalp or plate of iron, two feet long and three inches wide, roll it over an iron bar while heated, and then weld the edges together under a heavy hammer. A few years before the last war an officer returned from England and reported that they had a machine there for rolling barrels, when the late James T. Ames, of Chicopee, was sent over by the government to look at it. He brought home with him a set of rollers, and an Irishman named Union to operate it. With this machine a scalp only one foot long is used, which is heated almost to the melting-point and passed through the rollers. These force it to its proper shape and size, and the metal is made entirely homogeneous throughout the length of the barrel. Down to the breaking out of the war, Union was the only man in the country who knew how to operate the rollers, as he guarded the secret very closely; but when the work increased so fast, other machines had to be made and men taught to run them. But England has had more than one machine from us. In 1855, Jefferson Davis, then Secretary of War, allowed agents of the British government to take draughts of the entire establishment here, in order to duplicate the machinery for their works at Enfield, and copies of the most novel machines were made for them at Chicopee, while an American mechanic was taken over to superintend their operation. It is said that Prince Albert used to sit hours watching them, being especially interested in the machine for making the stocks. Another very important improvement in the manufacture of the musket was the system of making all the parts interchangeable. This was introduced during the time of John Robb, mainly through the skill and enterprise of Thomas Warner, still living in this city, and father of Thomas Warner, Jr., cashier of the Chicopee National Bank. Although the improvement had been used at Harper's Ferry for some years, the matter was kept so secret that the officers here did not know of it until it was fully in operation at this armory.

"The history of the arm itself and of the changes that have been made in it is an interesting one. From the establishment of the armory down to 1742 the smooth-bore, flint-lock muskets were made, and, although they were superseded then by the percussion-cap, Gen. Scott used them in the Mexican war, five years afterward, in preference to the new guns, which, he said, had not been tried. It is said, too, that the people of Mexico and Texas preferred the flint-locks for many years, because flints are so plenty there they can pick them up almost anywhere to repair the locks. The next radical change was made in 1855, when the old smooth-bore gave way to the rifled musket, though the system had been used for many years in Hall's rifled carbine, which was made at Harper's Ferry. During the Rebellion the government bought a good many breech-loading guns of different make, and in 1865 the historic Springfield musket, which had aided so materially in carrying the country through the war, was voted obsolete, and the more modern breech-loader was ordered to be made in its place. This gun—the latest model being that of 1873—is the one now manufactured, and it is considered the best single-loader in the world, having been adopted by a competent board of officers, after a long series of experiments with all the best guns they could get. But even this is likely soon to be displaced by the magazine gun, and the officers say it is not safe, in these days, to get many of any kind of firearm made ahead of present needs. Col. Benton and Capt. Greer have been very much interested, for some time, in experiments with magazine guns, and a small amount was allowed by the last appropriation to make some of them and put them into the field for trial. The Hotchkiss gun, which is thought to be the best there is, has been selected for the trial, and, to save the expense of altering the machinery here, most of the parts are bought from the Winchester Repeating-Arms Company, of New Haven, and brought here to be put together and finished. The magazine holds five cartridges, and the gun can be used as a single-loader if desired, leaving the magazine full for an emergency. If the gun is as successful in the field as the officers here expect it to be, it will probably be adopted and manufactured in place of the single-loader. But it is stated by some that the present gun can be fired about as fast as one with a magazine, and that the many objections to a magazine gun as an arm for every-day service will prevent its adoption for general use, though some regiments of an army, on special service, might use it with profit. All the European nations use at present the single-loader, except Switzerland, whose entire army is furnished with a magazine gun.

"Through all its changes the Springfield musket has had a world-wide reputation, and the government has generally succeeded in making a more perfect arm than any other nation, by taking advantage of every improvement which the inventive genius and mechanical ingenuity of the country have been able to suggest. During the war the Scientific American once said that the government demanded such perfection in making the Springfield muskets that, for accuracy and general beauty of workmanship, they would bear comparison with any mathematical instruments ever made."

The armory grounds proper embrace 74 acres, delightfully located on an elevated plateau overlooking the city. The various buildings are pleasantly located, and a handsome park adds to the beauty of the location. It consists of a few acres nicely shaded by trees, but devoid of ornaments save here and there a cannon. From the tower of the arsenal building is afforded a commanding view of the surrounding country. To the north and only three miles distant lies the village of Chicopee, while five miles farther in the same direction rise the spires of the manufacturing city of Holyoke, and in the distance the peaks of Mounts Tom and Holyoke rise against the blue horizon. To the west may be seen the villages of West Springfield, and Agawam, while at your feet lies the pleasant city of Springfield, with the grand sweep of its noble Connecticut wending its way oceanward, presenting, all in all, a panoramic view unsurpassed in beauty and grandeur by any in the Connecticut Valley.

THE CITY HOSPITAL.

The City Hospital property was purchased in 1869, and consisted of a dwelling-house and two acres of land. Since the building was erected it has been remodeled and added to, and is now complete in all respects, and will accommodate ten or twelve patients. It is located on the Boston road, about one and a half miles from the centre of the city. Superintendent, S. P. Roward; Matron, Mrs. S. P. Roward.

THE CITY ALMSHOUSE

and Farm are located on the Boston road, two miles from the city-hall. The almshouse is a brick structure, and was erected in 1873, at a cost, including the land, of $59,488. The house and farm are under the management of A. S. Pease.

THE SPRINGFIELD GAS-LIGHT COMPANY

was organized in 1848, and commenced the manufacture of gas from rosin, which method was continued until 1850, when coal was substituted. This was one of the first companies organized in the State outside of Boston. At first there were 75 consumers, which number has now increased to 2500. The first gasometer had a capacity of 6000 feet, and the present one has a capacity 300,000 feet.

The first officers of the company were as follows: Lyman Merrick, President; Theodore Stebbins, Clerk, and George Dwight, Treasurer. Mr. Merrick was succeeded by James D. Brewer. Mr. Brewer was followed by Marvin Chapin, who was succeeded by the present president, Col. James M. Thompson. Mr. Stebbins was succeeded by the present clerk, George Dwight, who is also superintendent. Mr. Dwight, the first treasurer, was followed by James D. Brewer, the present incumbent. The present board of directors are James M. Thompson, Charles W. Chapin, Marvin Chapin, J. D. Brewer, Wm. Merrick, George Dwight, and Elisha Gunn. The company is in a flourishing condition, and thirty miles of pipe are now being operated. The works are located on Water Street, foot of State.

THE STREET RAILWAY COMPANY.

This corporation was organized in 1859, with a capital stock of $100,000, only $50,000 of which has been issued. The route of the railway extends from Brightwood along Main Street and Locust to Mill Street, and from Main up State Street to Winchester Park. The present officers of the corporation are John Olmsted, President; G. M. Atwater, Homer Foot, C. L. Corell, James Kirkham, and John Olmsted, Directors; F. E. King, Superintendent; A. E. Smith, Cashier; and Gideon Wells, Clerk.

ECCLIASTICAL HISTORY.

THE FIRST CHURCH.

The following account of the First Church of Springfield is abridged from a history written by Judge Henry Morris, and published by permission of Messrs. Whitney & Adams, proprietors of the "Old Corner Book-Store," Springfield, Mass.:

"When the first settlers of Springfield, under the lead of William Pynchon, came here from Roxbury, in 1636, and founded a new town, they brought with them the religious principles which had induced them, years previous, to forsake their native land and seek a home in America. Appreciating the importance of a Christian church and a Christian ministry to the prosperity, both spiritual and temporal, of their new community, they early made provision for their establishment.

"Accordingly, they drew up and signed an agreement containing fifteen articles for the regulation of their town affairs, the first of which is in these words: 'Wee intend by God's grace, as soon as we can, with all convenient speede, to procure some Godly and faithfull minister, with whom we purpose to joyne in church covenant to walk in all the ways of Christ.' This agreement bears date May 14, 1636, and was signed as an original document by eight of the twelve settlers who first came here.

"Precisely at what time this purpose was accomplished by the organization of a church, no record informs us. If any separate record was kept of the transactions of the church in that early period of its history, it was long since lost or destroyed. None can now be found relating to transactions earlier than Jan. 27, 1735. There can be little doubt that the church was organized about the time when Rev. George Moxon, its first minister, settled here, in 1637. In that year he came to this country from Yorkshire, England, bringing with him a wife and two daughters. He had been educated at Sidney College, in the University of Cambridge, where he took his degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1623. He went first to Dorchester, perhaps with the intention of making that place his home, but after a brief sojourn there, he was induced by his attachment to Mr. Pynchon, with whom he was intimate, to follow that gentleman to Springfield, and to become the minister of the church here. He had received ordination in England, and, on his arrival here, at the age of thirty-five years, was prepared at once to enter upon the work of his ministry with this people. He remained here the pastor of this church fifteen years, till the year 1652, when he accompanied Mr. Pynchon to England, from which neither of them ever returned.*

"At this distance of time, and in the absence of any ecclesiastical records, it is exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to form any adequate conception of the character of Mr. Moxon, or of the value of his ministerial labors in this church. From the declared purpose of the first settlers to procure 'some godly and faithful minister,' and from the fact that he had been long and intimately known to Mr. Pynchon, it may fairly be inferred that Mr. Moxon was a man of that stamp. That he enjoyed the confidence and respect of the people here is manifest from the fact that in April, 1638, they chose him a deputy to represent them in the General Court at Hartford, within which jurisdiction Springfield was then thought to fall. Another token of their regard is found in the circumstance that they assigned him a home-lot of nearly double the usual width, and in 1639, by a voluntary assessment, built him a house 35 by 15 feet in size, having a porch and study. In this house, located on the westerly side of Main Street, near what is now Vernon Street, the minister lived during the last thirteen years of his residence here, and in the first meeting-house, erected in 1645, about where the large elm stands, near the southeasterly corner of Court Square, he met his people, as they assembled on the Sabbath at the sound of the drum, and proclaimed to them the words of eternal life. This meeting-house was forty feet long and twenty-five feet wide, and faced south on the one-road leading to the training-field and burial-ground, since made wider and called Elm Street. It had two large windows on each side, and one smaller one at each end; one large door on the southerly side, and two smaller ones; it had a shingle roof—a rare thing in that day—and two turrets, one designed for a bell, the other for a watch-tower. Among the people to whom Mr. Moxon ministered, and whose confidence he enjoyed, there were some eminent not only for their piety, but for their intelligence. William Pynchon and his son, John Pynchon, his two sons-in-law, Henry Smith and Elizer Holyoke, and the two deacons of the church, Samuel Chapin and Samuel Wright, were all men of more than ordinary capacity, capable of conducting the worship of the sanctuary or the municipal concerns of the town. In those days there was accorded to the clergyman, as incident to his office, a degree of respect and consideration, amounting almost to reverence, rarely manifested at present.

"There is recorded in the private record, which William Pynchon kept of various matters that came under his cognizance as a magistrate, an entry in his hand under date of Sept. 24, 1640, of a trial before him, and a jury of six men, which is interesting, not only as illustrating the primitive character of litigation in those days in this remote settlement, but as also showing the kind of supervision which the minister exercised over his people. It seems that John Woodcock, one of the early settlers, of a litigious turn, had a controversy with Henry Gregory, another early settler, about some hogs, and had brought two suits against Gregory to recover damages. The two cases were tried before Mr. Pynchon and a jury of six, comprising Deacon Samuel Wright and five other respectable inhabitants. The jury rendered a verdict against Gregory in each action for some 20 shillings and costs. The record says, 'Henry Gregory, after the verdict, was much moved, and said, "I marvel with what conscience the jury can give such damages; seeing in the case of John Searles I had of him but twenty shillings for three slanders;" and he added, "But such juries—" He was about to speak more, but Mr. Moxon bid him "take heed, take heed," and so gave him a grave admonition. Presently, after the admonition, Henry Gregory acknowledged his fault and earnestly craved pardon, and promised more care and watchfulness for time to come; and so all the jury acknowledged satisfaction in hope of reformation.'

"It was not always in the character of a spectator, or to give grave admonitions to unsuccessful but irritated litigants, that Mr. Moxon attended these primitive courts. He was himself at one time an interested party, seeking to vindicate

John Goodrich

JOHN GOODRICH was born in West Springfield, Oct. 22, 1802. His grandfather Goodrich was a native of Sharon, Conn., where he resided for many years, and removed to Delhi, N. Y., where he lived to be nearly one hundred years of age. The ancestors in America of the Goodrich family first settled in Wethersfield, Conn., where they landed upon coming to this country. They are of Scotch and English descent. His father, Elijah Goodrich, was born at Sharon, Conn.; settled in West Springfield about the year 1796; was married to Rachel, daughter of Major John Lloyd, of New York (who served through the Revolutionary war, and died in West Springfield, at the house of his son-in-law, Mr. Edmund Palmer, Aug. 11, 1817, at the age of eighty-four), and raised a family of four sons and five daughters, of whom only the subject of this narrative is now living (1878). His father, Elijah, was among the first in the staging business between Albany and Boston before the days of railroads. He kept a public-house in Springfield for many years, and occupied the corner of Main and State Streets, and also the corner of Main and Worthington Streets; the latter he occupied during the war of 1812-14. Mr. Goodrich spent his minority at home and until the death of his father, in 1835, engaging most of the time after reaching his majority in the livery business. On the same day that the Boston and Albany Railroad was opened, Oct. 16, 1839, he opened a public-house on the corner of Main and Hampden Streets, which, however, he continued only some two years.

Since leaving the public-house he has been engaged in a general business way, mostly in dealing in real estate. His life has been one of activity and industry, and characterized by such integrity of action in all his dealings and sagacity in business transactions as to secure the confidence of the citizens of Springfield.

Mr. Goodrich has never been an active politician, but supported the old Whig party, and upon the formation of the Republican party became one of its members.

In the year 1826, September 18, he married Miss Betsey, daughter of Elisha Curtis, of Springfield, Mass. She was born June 7, 1806.

His children were Henry (killed in 1853, in his twenty-sixth year, by a railroad accident in Indiana, the cars going through a bridge); James W.; and Mrs. E. B. Vinton, of Springfield.

Horace Jacobs

HORACE JACOBS was born in Royalston, Worcester Co., Mass., April 5, 1816. His paternal grandfather was a native of Connecticut; in early life moved to Oneida Co., N. Y., and was one of the pioneers of that section of the State. For some forty years he was an active laborer as a clergyman of the Baptist Church, and preached his last sermon on his seventy-fifth anniversary, at Floyd, in that county, and died at the age of seventy-seven.

His maternal grandfather, Enoch Kenuy, was also a Baptist clergyman; was supposed to be a native of Royalston, Mass., where he preached many years, and died in the place of his nativity.

His father, Simeon Jacobs, was a native of Royalston, Mass.; was married to Mary Kenney, of that place; spent his life as an agriculturist. There were nine children of the family, all sons, and all grew to manhood, of whom only three are living in 1878,—Simeon, of Columbia, Conn.; Enoch, of Sacramento, Cal.; and the subject of this narrative.

Dr. Jacobs spent his boyhood until he was ten years of age at home, at which time his father died, and thenceforward until he reached his majority he lived with his uncle, Dr. Isaac Jacobs, of Exeter, Me., for several years, and the balance of the time taught school winters and labored on a farm summers. While with his uncle, Dr. Jacobs became accustomed to the preparation of bills of medicine, and then first became impressed with the idea of being a physician.

At the age of twenty-one he began the study of medicine with his brother, Sumner Jacobs, of South Hadley, Mass., and after two years entered into the practice of medicine with him, which partnership continued for five years, when Dr. Jacobs removed to Chicopee Falls, and afterward to Chicopee, where he practiced as an eclectic physician for some fifteen years. After two years' partial respite from practice, residing in Westfield, he removed in the year 1857 to Springfield, where he opened an office for the practice of his particular theory of medicine, and was the first representative of the eclectic practice in Springfield, as his brother, with whom he studied, had been in the Connecticut Valley of Massachusetts.

As is usual with any new theory, Dr. Jacobs met with strong opposition from the practitioners of other schools of medicine; but time alone has not only developed the feasibility and benefit of this new theory, but has gradually overcome all opposition, and deservedly commanded the confidence of the public. From a meagre support, Dr. Jacobs has, by his integrity of purpose and skill in his profession, for many years enjoyed the support of a large circle of friends, including in its numbers many of the most intelligent families of the country.

In the year 1849, Dec. 23, he married Emily L., daughter of Abijah Owen, of Westfield. By this union there were born five children, now living,—Chauncey A., a practicing physician, of Boston; Mary L.; Mrs. Charles Rice, of Neponset; Rachel B.; and Horace H.

his own good name from the aspersions of a slanderer. It was on this wise: The same John Woodcock had had a lawsuit at Hartford, in which Mr. Moxon was a witness against him. Probably Woodcock was defeated in this Hartford suit, and, being an unprincipled fellow, sought his revenge by circulating a report that the minister had taken a false oath. This produced a decided sensation among the good people of this plantation of Agawan, as Springfield was then called. Woodcock was summoned by a warrant to appear before Mr. Pynchon, the magistrate, to answer for this slander. Desirous, if possible, to avoid a trial before a jury of their neighbors, to whom they were both well known, he 'desyred,' as the old Pynchon record states, 'that this difference might be tried by a private hearing below in the River,' meaning at Windsor or Hartford, these being then the nearest settlements down the river. 'Mr. Moxon,' continues the record, 'referred himself to the judgment of ye plantation present whether it were fitter to be heard by a private reference below in the river, or tried here publicly by a Jury. The general voat of the plantation is that, seeing the matter is publikk, it should be publikkly heard and tried here by a Jury. Liberty is granted to John Woodcocke to produce his witnesses against this day fortnight, being the 26 of December. Also at the said tyme Jo. Woodcocke is warned to answer for his laughinge in sermon tyme,—this day at the Lecture. Also he is then to answer for his mislamente of idleness.' The trial of this important suit was afterward deferred to the 2d of January, at which time Mr. Moxon produced the testimony of five witnesses, and the jury rendered a verdict in his favor for £6 13s. 4d.

"In the absence of any church records, there exist no materials for a biography of the first minister of this church for the next eleven years. It may fairly be presumed that he was engaged during this period in the ordinary duties of a pastor, enjoying the respect of his people, sharing in their joys and sympathizing in their sorrows, preaching to them on the Sabbath, morning and afternoon, besides delivering the usual lecture every Thursday, at half-past ten in the forenoon. In addition to the family which he brought with him when he first came here, he had three children born to him here—all sons. He had certainly three older children, one a son, bearing his father's Christian name, and following his father's vocation afterward in England. There were also two daughters, Martha and Rebeckah. These two girls passed through an experience that was remarkable even in their day, and appears stranger still to us. In fact, they became the early, if not the very first, victims, as was supposed, of that delusion which for a time created an intense excitement in the Massachusetts colony, and culminated in the most fearful tragedies, connected with the famous Salem witchcraft. One Mary Parsons, wife of Hugh Parsons, who lived quite at the south end of Main Street, was suspected of having bewitched these two girls. She had killed her own child, and was probably deranged. Her strange conduct was ascribed to her familiarity with the evil one, and some disorders, real or imaginary, with which Mr. Moxon's daughters were afflicted, were imputed, in accordance with the prevailing superstition, to Mary Parsons, as an agent of the devil. She was accordingly committed to prison, charged with witchcraft and the murder of her own child; for both which offences she was tried before the General Court at Boston.

"What part Mr. Moxon took in this prosecution is not known. That he sympathized with his children in their sufferings, and believed in the reality of the demoniacal influence, to which the common superstition of the times ascribed them, can hardly be doubted. It was a weakness that infected some of the strongest minds of that age. A poet of that day has left to us the following tribute to Mr. Moxon's character, written shortly before his departure, in which may be detected an allusion to the peculiar domestic visitation that made the last year of the minister's residence in Springfield so unhappy:

"As thou with strong and able parts art made,
Thy person, stout with toil and labour, shall,
With help of Christ, through difficulties wade.
Then spend for him; spare not thyself at all.
When errors crowd close to thyself and friends,
Take up truth's sword, trifle not time, for why?
Christ called his people hither for those ends
To tell the world that Babel's fall is nigh,
And that his churches through the world shall spread
Mangle the might of wicked men and devils.
Then Moxon thou need'st not at all to dread,
But be avenged on Satan for his evils.
Thy Lord Christ will under thy feet him tread."

"The departure of three such men as William Pynchon, Henry Smith, his son-in-law, and Mr. Moxon was a serious loss to the church and the town. There is a tradition, mentioned by Mr. Breck in his century sermon, that it came near to breaking up the settlement. But the shock, though severe, was not fatal. Neither the temporal nor the spiritual prosperity of this people suffered any permanent check. The wise leadership that had been exercised by the elder Pynchon was devolved upon his son John, then a young man of twenty-six, of sterling qualities, who, through all that century and down to the time of his death, maintained an influence, not only in Springfield, but in all this region, that justly entitled him to the appellation by which he is distinguished in the record, 'the worshipful.' Nor were the religious interests of the people neglected. The deacons, Chapin and Wright, with Elizur Holyoke, son-in-law of William Pynchon, were pious and capable men, and the people gathered in their sanctuary as they had been accustomed to do before, to hear the word of God expounded by them. In February, 1653, less than five months after Mr. Moxon's departure, Rev. William Hosford was preaching here as a supply. Precisely when his labors here began and when they ended is not known. His stay did not exceed one year at the longest. He was succeeded by Rev. William Thompson, who graduated at Harvard College in 1653, and is supposed to have been the son of a minister of the same name at Braintree. He was here in November, 1655. On the 15th of that month the town records say, 'At a town-meeting it was voted and concluded ye Mr. Thompson, during his continuance a preaching minister in Springfield, shall possess and enjoy ye Towne house-lot and housing . . . which formerly ye towne bought of Mr. Moxon.' 'As also they intend by ye help of God to continue Mr. Thompson's maintenance £50 pr annum, and to give him a parcel of ground by reason of the inability of ye town to increase his maintenance.'

"This, although perhaps a liberal salary for those days, did not insure Mr. Thompson's 'continuance as a preaching minister' for a very long period. He left his people under such circumstances as led the town, on the 24th March, 1656, to pass the following vote to provide for the supply of its spiritual needs: 'It is agreed by joyn't consideration of ye Plantation that seeing Mr. Thompson hath deserted this Plantation and soe we are left destitute in respect of any ministry of ye word for continuance, that therefore these persons under witten shall take counsel among themselves what course may be taken for a supply in ye work, and that they shall take that course that to them shall seem good by sending abroad for advice in this matter; and soe accordingly they shall give information to the town w^t they have done or think convenient to be done. The persons hereunto chosen are Mr. Pynchon, Deacon Chapin, George Colton, Benjamin Cooley, Deacon Wright, and Elizur Holyoke. It was further voted and agreed,' continues the record, 'that whereas yesterday being the Lord's day, Deacon Wright was chosen to dispense the word of God in this place till some other should be got for yt worke, yt deacon Wright shall have for his labor in ye employment 50th ye month for such tyme as he attends on ye said work.'

"Good Deacon Wright, who had settled here in 1633, and had been one of the deacons of this church through all the subsequent years of Mr. Moxon's ministry, did not continue long to 'dispense the word' in Springfield. Soon after the passage of this vote he emigrated with his family to Northampton, where, on the 17th of October, 1655, he died, as the record says, 'when asleep in his chair.' Deprived of the ministrations of Deacon Wright by his removal to another field of usefulness, the town voted in February, 1657, 'that Mr. Holyoke and Henry Burt should carry on the work of the Sabbath in this place; but in case that through any providence of God either of them should be disenabled, that deacon Chapin should supply that present vacancy.' A little later, in November, 1657, the record says, 'Mr. Holyoke is made choise of to carry on ye work of ye Sabbath once every Sabbath-day, which he accepts of. Mr. Pynchon is made choise of for one part of ye day once a fortnight, w^h he will endeavor to in tyme by reading notes and somewhat of his owne meditations till March next. Deacon Chapin and Henry Burt are made choise of to carry on ye other pt of ye day once a fortnight.'

"However profitable, in a spiritual point of view, the labors of these intelligent laymen may have been, the church still aimed at securing the services of some 'Godly and faithful minister,' who should become its permanent pastor. Nor was it long before a young man was found whose ministrations were so acceptable that the people, with great unanimity, extended to him a call. This was Mr. Samuel Hooker, a son of Rev. Thomas Hooker, of Hartford, whom Cotton Mather styles 'the Light of the Western Churches and Pillar of Connecticut Colony.' Mr. Hooker was first employed to supply the pulpit for a period of three months, with especial reference to his settlement. The record is very complimentary to the candidate. It reads as follows: 'At a Towne-meeting Feb. 7, 1658' (or 1659, according to the present division of the year), 'There was a full and unanimous acceptance of Mr. Hooker to dispense ye word of God to us; and whereas he at present will not certainly ingage to us longer than 3 months, the Towne doe agree and ingage to give or allow him 20th pr ye sd Three months, & wth all manifest thei e desires & hopes of his further continuance among us, & being willing to continue, ye like further allowance up on his further continuance wth us. And Mr. Pynchon, Mr. Holyoke, & Deacon Chapin were appointed to signifie ye Towne's mind & desires to Mr. Hooker, who accordingly did it, & Mr. Hooker manifested his willingness to help us three months, as aforesaid, & for ye present could resolve noe further, but his coming to a resolution should take rise from this tyme.' It is said of Mr. Hooker that he was 'an animated and pious divine, an excellent preacher, his composition good, his address pathetic, warm, and engaging.' In preparing his sermons, as he told a friend, he made it a rule to do three things, 'write them, commit them unto his memory, and get them into his heart.' But, in the providence of God, Mr. Hooker was not to be the pastor of this church. For reasons which do not appear he preferred another field of labor, and went to Farmington, Conn., where he was installed pastor of that church in July, 1661.

"The summer of 1659 found this church still without a pastor. Seven years had elapsed since the departure of Mr. Moxon, and all the efforts of the people to secure a settled ministry had proved abortive. It cannot be doubted, however, that with every new failure they recurrd to their well-qualified laymen, and that the word of God was 'dispensed' and the work of the Sabbath 'carried on' as before. According to Mr. Breck, Mr. Pelatiah Glover was here early in July, 1659, and preached his first sermon July 3d, from Jer. iv. 11. He was at first engaged for one year, but afterward accepted a more permanent relation. According to that learned antiquary, James Savage, Mr. Glover was ordained as the second minister of Springfield, June 18, 1661. But as the town, as early as Dec. 12, 1660, made provision for his maintenance here, as for its settled minister, as giving to him the use of the ministry house and land, and stipulating for his support the payment of a yearly salary of £50, to commence from the 29th of September, 1660, to this last date, perhaps, his settlement should be referred. Mr. Glover was the son of John Glover, an early and prominent settler of Dorchester. He received his education at Harvard College, but did not take his degree there. He was not far from twenty-four years of age when he commenced his labors as the minister of this town. He was settled, as all ministers then and for many years afterward were settled, for life, and for more than thirty years he performed here the duties of the pastoral office. There now exist no materials for a personal biography of Mr. Glover, or a detailed history of the church while he was its minister.

"There were some stirring events during this period, events the like of which have never been witnessed here during the ministry of any other man. It was a day of terror and trouble when, on the 5th of October, 1675, old style, the Springfield Indians, till then peaceful and friendly, having admitted to their fort on Long Hill a body of King Philip's hostile Indians, united with them in a sudden and murderous attack upon this settlement. Notified by a messenger from Windsor, who arrived at midnight, that this place was to be attacked, most of the inhabitants fled to the fortified houses, but, seeing no immediate movement, the first alarm had partially subsided, and some had returned to their own houses. Of this number was Mr. Glover, who had moved his family and his 'brave' library, as Hubbard calls it, to a place of safety, but, deeming the alarm groundless, and 'being impatient for want of his books,' had moved the latter back again to his own house. Comparatively few of the settlers lost their lives, but the destruction of buildings and property was great. About 30 houses and 25 barns, with their contents, were burned. The house of Mr. Glover, with his valuable library, was consumed. The meeting-house, which was fortified, escaped the conflagration. Great distress prevailed. The people were discouraged and entertained the idea of abandoning the settlement altogether, as too much exposed to the incursions of the savages. Some actually left, but the greater part of the inhabitants, encouraged by the sympathy and aid of the colonial government, and trusting in the care of an overruling Providence, determined to hold on. A letter of John Pynchon to his son, then in England, written about two weeks after this calamity, breathes a spirit of fervent piety and submission to the divine will. Jonathan Bart, then or soon after a deacon of the church, in a brief narrative of the facts entered upon a fly-leaf of the records, which is signed 'Jonathan Bart, an eye-witness of the same,' recognizes devoutly the good providence of God in preserving the lives of the people.

"An event of importance to the church, that occurred a few days after the burning of the town, was the death of Deacon Samuel Chapin, which took place on the 11th of November of the same year. From a very early period he had been one of the deacons of this church, one of its most useful and influential members. Savage calls him 'a man of distinction,' and when we consider the responsible trusts reposed in him by the church and the government, the appellation seems highly appropriate. He was not only associated with Mr. Pynchon in the administration of the temporalities of the town, but he was one whom the church designated often to carry on the work of the Sabbath. The loss of such a man, occurring as it did so soon after the great calamity, must have been deeply felt. The deacons during the remainder of Mr. Glover's pastorate appear to have been Jonathan Bart, already named, and Benjamin Parsons. Deacon Parsons died in 1689, and was succeeded in office by John Hitchcock. Deacons Bart and Hitchcock survived Mr. Glover more than twenty years. Hitchcock held the military office of ensign and lieutenant, in addition to that of deacon. He and Deacon Bart were both men of some note. Both have representatives in this church among their descendants.

"Soon after the destruction of the town by the Indians, in 1675, the original meeting-house, which had escaped the flames, was taken down and a larger and more commodious structure erected farther west, mostly if not wholly within the limits of what is now Court Square, very near its southwestern angle. It was built in 1677. A very strong attachment subsisted between Mr. Glover and his people. In 1669, finding himself straitened in his means of living, on account of the smallness of his salary, yet aware of the inability of the people to increase it at that time, he addressed to them a communication in which he expressed his desire to remove to another field of labor on that account.

"To this the town, by the hand of Mr. Holyoke, sent the following reply:

"Sr.—We are much affected with this sad providence by this motion of yours for leaving us, and the rather being sensible of our general inability to increase your stipend at y^e present by reasons of God's hand upon us by the flood and blast, and at such a time as we have taken in hand the building of a house for you, which through the help of God we shall go on with, the cost whereof will be near one hundred pounds to us, besides the £80 of y^e stipend, web by the Lord's assistance we shall endeavour punctually to present and make good in y^e best manner we can, notwithstanding all the difficulties of the year we doe retard our doing further or more at present; but yet, if the Lord enable us, we shall for future, according as y^e needs call for it, enlarge and doe to our utmost ability, and that according as God shall bless us; that see you may live honorably and without distraction in your employment. And we intreat your acceptance of these our synere intentions, and the manifestations of your love and affections to us by y^e cheerful going on in y^e ministerial work in this place, which we take soe much content in, and cannot neither dare quitt our interest in, but must according to God hold it fast to our utmost, all words of parting being like darts, for ill the thoughts of change.

"ELIZUR HOLYOKE, Recorder,

"in the name and by y^e appointment of the town.

"SPRINGFIELD, month 4, 18th, 1669."

"In regard to the character of Mr. Glover as the pastor of this church and people, Hubbard, a contemporary historian, says: 'He was a great student, and much given to books;' and Breck adds, 'he lived in great harmony with our fathers, and highly esteemed.' John Pynchon, who knew him better and more intimately than either of them, and whose judgment was unsurpassed, in his private book of records calls him 'the Reverend Teacher of y^e church of Springfield,' 'a faithful minister of the gospel and teacher of y^e church of Springfield.' This is surely high commendation for this servant of God. It needs no expansion or addition. But there is a touching expression in the entry upon our public record of his death which must not be omitted. It is in these words, 'The Reverend Mr. Peletiah Glover fell asleep in Jesus, March 29, 1692.'

"It is not strange that, after the death of their revered pastor, Mr. Glover, his people should have sought for his successor one who was nearly allied to him. Accordingly, Mr. John Haynes, who became the husband of Mr. Glover's youngest daughter, Mary, soon after her father's death, was invited to fill the vacant pastorate; but this call, although persistently urged, was unsuccessful. A spiritual teacher and guide was, however, soon found, as the record reads. The town 'voted to send Captain Thomas Colton and Sergeant Luke Hitchcock to the Bay for the procuring a minister to preach the word of God to this town; and that they apply themselves to the Rev'd the President of the College, with the rest of the elders in Boston, for their help for the obtaining a minister that may promote conversion among us.' Mr. Daniel Brewer, a native of Roxbury, a graduate at Harvard College of the year 1687, came here in response to this appeal. The town voted to give him 'an invitation to carry on the work of the Gospel in this place,' and offered him a salary of £80 and the use of the ministry land. The committee by whom this call was communicated to Mr. Brewer, in their report say that he answered that 'provided we were unanimous, he was inclinable to compliance with the town's proffer, and in order to continuance with us, if he shall further find God leading him to doe so.' And thereupon Col. John Pynchon, Esq., and Deacon Jonathan Bart were appointed to declare to Mr. Daniel Brewer the town's good resentment of Mr. Daniel Brewer his answer to the town's invitation, and to give him thanks for the same.' With a candidate thus 'inclinable to compliance,' and this 'good resentment' on the part of the people, a settlement was sure to come, and on the 16th day of May, 1694, Mr. Daniel Brewer was ordained minister of this church and people. He was at the time of his ordination twenty-five years of age, and unmarried. About five years afterward he married Catharine Chauncey. From this union sprang all of the name of Brewer in this town and vicinity, including two deacons of the church, one of whom united in his person both these names. Rev. Daniel Brewer's ministry here continued till his death, on the 5th November, 1733, nearly forty years.

"Compared with the stirring times of Mr. Glover's ministry, this was a time of quiet and growth. The settlers, at first limited to a narrow space, had now spread themselves in every direction, and laid the foundation of new parishes, soon to require each their own separate pastors. This condition of things led to the most important event of which the records take any notice during Mr. Brewer's ministry, to wit: the formation of a new parish on the west side of the river, and the subsequent, although not immediate, separation of this first parish from the town, which had before transacted both municipal and parochial affairs under one and the same organization. There had been for some years a feeling among the settlers on the west side of the river that they were subjected to peculiar inconveniences, if not dangers, in being obliged to cross the river to attend public worship on this side. As early as May, 1674, they had brought before the town this subject, and a committee was appointed to consider the propriety of the town's furnishing, at the common charge, a boat to convey them across the river, to attend worship on the Sabbath and other public occasions. There is a tradition that several persons had lost their lives in attempts to cross.

"In the year 1695 the people on the west side of the river presented to the General Court, at Boston, their petition for leave to procure a minister for that part of the town. Those living on this side did not feel willing to part with so large and substantial a part of the ecclesiastical body, and, being a majority, they passed a vote in town-meeting that 'something' should be drawn up to send to the General Court to answer this petition of their neighbors on the west side of the great river,' and they appointed Deacon Bart and Lieut. Abel Wright to draw up this 'something.' At a subsequent meeting in May, 1696, Sergt. Luke Hitchcock was chosen the agent of the town to 'give in reasons and objections' against said petition, and, that there might be a good understanding and unanimity of sentiment on this important question among the dwellers on the east side, a committee was appointed to meet the people at the school-house and acquaint them with the objections. Whatever may have been the objections, they were unavailing against the petition from the west side of the river. The petition was granted by the General Court, and a second parish or precinct established in what is now West Springfield, in 1696, over which the Rev. John Woodbridge was ordained pastor in 1698. The creation of a new parish legally dissolved the relation of the town to the old parish. They were no longer identical organizations. The inhabitants of the town, as such, could not properly transact the business of the original parish as they had heretofore done in town-meetings. But this was not at once realized. The town books continued for some time to record the transactions of the first parish. The meetings, however, purport to have been of 'the inhabitants of Springfield on the east side of the river,' and when soon afterward a third parish was created in what is now Longmeadow, the style was further changed, and the record reads: 'At a meeting of the inhabitants of the town on the east side of the river, the precinct of Longmeadow excluded,' it was voted, etc. The latest record of this kind upon our town records is under date of Jan. 1, 1717. The oldest parish record (properly so called) begins Aug. 7, 1731, after the death of Mr. Brewer and the ordination of his successor. The earliest church record now in existence bears date Jan. 1, 1736, and is, with one or two exceptions, merely a record kept by the pastors of admissions to the church, marriages, baptisms, and deaths.

"At the time of Mr. Brewer's ordination, in 1694, one of the deacons of the church was Jonathan Bart, who had served in that capacity under the ministry of Mr. Glover. He undoubtedly continued in that office until his death, Oct. 19, 1715, at an advanced age. He was a man of some prominence, and served for a time as clerk of the town. Another deacon in the early part of Mr. Brewer's ministry was John Hitchcock, already named, who held various civil and military offices, and at one time represented the town in the General Court. The successors of Deacons Bart and Hitchcock were James Warriner and Nathaniel Munn. Deacon Warriner died May 14, 1727, before the close of Mr. Brewer's ministry. Deacon Munn survived Mr. Brewer about ten years, and served in that office under his successor till the last day of December, 1743, when he died at the age of eighty-two. Before the close of Mr. Brewer's pastorate the deaconship passed again into the Burt family, in the person of Henry Burt, son of Deacon Jonathan.

"The harmony which had subsisted in this church and parish during the ministry of Mr. Brewer was destined soon to a serious interruption. The settlement of a successor was attended with unusual difficulties, and produced an excitement not only here, but very extensively throughout this region. In May, 1734, Mr. Robert Breck, a young man then not quite twenty-one years of age, a son of Rev. Robert Breck, of Marlboro', Mass., was invited to preach here with reference to a settlement. He had graduated at Cambridge in 1730, at the early age of seventeen. Before he was invited here he had been preaching at Scotland, a parish of Windham, Conn. He preached his first sermon in Springfield, on the 26th of May, 1734. On the 30th of July following the church made choice of him for its pastor, and on the 7th of August the parish concurred in this choice, and proposed to him terms of settlement, which, although at first declined for other reasons, were ultimately accepted. Soon after Mr. Breck commenced preaching here as a candidate, reports prejudicial to his character for orthodoxy began to be circulated in this town and among the neighboring clergy. The authority for these reports was Rev. Thomas Clap, of Windham, afterward president of Yale College. The effect of these rumors was to disaffect a minority of the parish with Mr. Breck, and to create so strong an opposition among the ministers of this vicinity that, for the time, the project of his settlement was abandoned, and a call extended to Mr. Joseph Pyncheon. This being declined, the attention of the church and parish was again directed to Mr. Breck, and he was again invited to preach as a candidate. At the parish meeting in March, 1735, a committee was appointed to wait on the reverend ministers of the county, at their next meeting in April, to get what information they could relating to the charges exhibited against Mr. Breck by the Rev. Mr. Clap and others, and to ascertain the sentiments of the ministers. It does not appear from the parish records that this committee ever made a report. Probably they never acted under their appointment. The opposition of so large and respectable a number of ministers as the association of the old county of Hampshire did not deter this church and parish from their purpose. With all their reverence for the clergy, they appreciated their own right as Congregationalists to choose their own pastor, and their hearts were fully set upon Mr. Breck as the man. Accordingly the church, on the 17th April, 1735, formally renewed their call to him, and the parish, one week afterward, concurred in the call.

"All his endeavors to remove the obstructions to his settlement having failed of success, Mr. Breck, on the 28th of July, 1735, in a letter which is recorded at length in the parish records, accepted the call.

"Arrangements were made for his ordination on the 14th of October following. On that day a council assembled for this purpose, consisting of seven clergymen, namely, Messrs. Chauncey, of Hadley, Devotion, of Suffield, Rand, of Sunderland, Cook, of Sudbury, and Cooper, Welstead, and Mather, of Boston, with their delegates. Then ensued a scene such, perhaps, as never occurred in an ecclesiastical council in New England before or since. In the midst of its deliberations, a civil officer entered the council armed with a warrant from a magistrate, arrested Mr. Breck, and carried, or attempted to carry, him off to Connecticut, 'there to answer to such things as should be objected against him.' The church and parish were justly indignant at this flagrant attempt to deprive them of their chosen pastor. At a meeting of the church, held two weeks afterward, two of its leading members were appointed to go to Boston and present to the General Assembly of the province the remonstrance of this church and precinct against these proceedings, and to assert the rights and privileges of the church and parish to choose their own minister and have a council ordain him. The result was that the council was again convened, and Mr. Breck ordained on the 27th of January, 1736. Rev. Dr. Cooper, of Boston, preached the ordination sermon, which was published.

"The opposition to Mr. Breck in his own church and parish did not at once subside after his settlement. A few leading men, who had failed to secure his rejection by the ecclesiastical council, appear to have been guilty of the folly of seeking to defeat his settlement by an appeal to a legal tribunal. It was in this way: A provincial statute made it obligatory upon every parish to be provided with an orthodox minister, under penalty of being liable to a prosecution for non-compliance. Complaint was made that the parish was not provided with such an orthodox minister, and a summons was served upon it to appear before the Court of General Sessions of the Peace for the County of Hampshire to answer to this complaint. The parish appointed a committee of five to represent and defend the parish, authorizing them 'by all ways and means, with the best advice that may be had in the law, to answer to this complaint, and at the charge of the Precinct to appear, defend, and pursue the said cause from court to court, and to carry the same before any proper authority whatsoever, and where they may think it necessary in order to a final issue and determination of the matter. And that they have power to prosecute and defend as aforesaid, in any cause or action that may arise by the virtue of the said complaint or controversy, or in the management thereof.' William Pyncheon, Sr. (a great-grandson of the first Pyncheon), was made chairman of this committee.*

"The severe ordeal through which Mr. Breck passed at the commencement of his ministry here undoubtedly exerted a very favorable influence upon his character. If he had been rash and imprudent before he was ordained, he was prudent and discreet afterward. By his careful and conciliatory course he soon disarmed all opposition among his own people, and established himself firmly in their confidence and affection. One of the first measures adopted by him to ingratiate himself with his flock was prompted probably more by his heart than by his head. Within a few weeks after his ordination he took to wife Ennice Brewer, the daughter of his predecessor, with whose widowed mother he had boarded while preaching as a candidate. Another method that he adopted to conciliate his opponents in the parish was this, which proved to be quite effectual. If he wished any favor, he would be careful to ask it of some one of his people whom he had reason to believe unfriendly, rather than of those regarded as his staunch supporters. This expression of his confidence in them soon won their confidence in him, and in a short time harmony and mutual regard marked all their intercourse. He was a man of uncommon talents. Dr. Lathrop, of West Springfield, who studied theology with Mr. Breck, says of him, 'His intellectual powers, which were naturally superior, were brightened by his education, and enlarged by an extensive acquaintance with men and books. As he accustomed himself to a close manner of thinking and reasoning, and filled up his time with diligent application, so he acquired a rich furniture of the most useful knowledge.' 'He was easy of access, given to hospitality, faithful in his friendships, tender and attentive in all domestic relations, compassionate to the distressed, and a lover of mankind. In a word, he was an accomplished gentleman and exemplary Christian.' Mr. Breck entered upon his ministry with a church of sixty-seven members,—thirty-two male and thirty-five female members. Nathaniel Munn and Henry Burt were the deacons. In the course of his ministry of forty-eight years there were admitted to full communion, by letter and by profession, three hundred and thirty-one.

"Deacon Munn died on the last day of December, 1743, at the age of eighty-two, and Deacon Henry Burt about five years later (Dec. 11, 1748), at the age of eighty-five. Contemporaries with them during the latter part of their lives was Deacon Nathaniel Brewer, a son of the former minister, and brother-in-law of Mr. Breck. He was by trade a carpenter, and much employed as such in the repairs of the meeting-house, and the house owned by the parish and occupied by the minister. He appears to have been a man highly respected in the church and parish. He survived Mr. Breck, and died on the 8th of March, 1796, at the age of eighty-five years. Jonathan Church was a deacon early in the ministry of Mr. Breck. He is mentioned in that capacity in May, 1747. He was admitted from the church in Longmeadow, March 3, 1742, and died Oct. 27, 1761. Josiah Dwight united with this church by letter from the church in Hatfield, Sept. 25, 1743, and was afterward chosen a deacon. The date of the choice is not stated. He is more frequently mentioned in the records by his military title of colonel and his civil title of esquire. He died Sept. 28, 1768, aged fifty-two years. Probably he was elected after the death of Deacon Church, and if so, his term of office was comparatively brief. Daniel Harris joined the church by profession Feb. 24, 1765. He was a deacon of the church certainly as early as March, 1773, as he is so called in connection with his election at that time as parish assessor. He had previously served several years as parish clerk. He was one of three deacons who, after the death of Mr. Breck, took an active part in extending a call to his successor. Deacon Harris died on the 22d of June, 1785, at the age of fifty-three. Moses Bliss was admitted to the church Oct. 13, 1754, being then a student at Yale College. There is no record of his election as deacon. In fact, there is none of any election to that office at so early a period. But he is spoken of as a deacon in August, 1780, when his daughter was baptized. He continued to hold the office until his death, on the 3d of July, 1814, at the age of seventy-nine years. He was by profession a lawyer, and was for many years a judge of the local court in the old county of Hampshire.

"The first record of the church now extant is one kept by Mr. Breck. With the exception of two or three cases of discipline, the entries in it are only of admissions to the church, baptisms, marriages, and deaths. In a female hand, perhaps of his wife or daughter, is entered under date of April 23, 1784, 'Died, the Rev^d Rob^t Breck, Pastor of the First church in Springfield, in the 71st year of his age and 49th of his ministry.' At his funeral a sermon was preached by Dr. Lathrop, from II. Timothy, 4th chapter, 6th, 7th, and 8th verses. An important event during the ministry of Mr. Breck was the building of a new meeting-house. The parish passed the vote to build it in April, 1749. It was erected the same year or the year following, so far as to be ready for use, although not entirely finished until 1752. It was 60 feet long by 46 wide, and 26 feet high between joints. This house, the third built, was the immediate predecessor of the present meeting-house, and stood directly east of the ground now occupied. The principal entrance was on the east side, but there was also an entrance through the tower. Some of our older inhabitants remember well this house, with its high pulpit and square pews.

"On the 8th day of November, 1784, the church 'voted unanimously to choose Mr. Bezaleel Howard to be their minister. On the same day the parish voted to concur in this choice, and to offer Mr. Howard one hundred and fifty pounds for a settlement, and one hundred pounds lawful silver money annually for his salary, together with the use and improvement of the parsonage house and lands, so long as he should continue in the office of a gospel minister.' The answer of Mr. Howard, accepting this call, was communicated on the 27th January, 1785. The satisfaction with which the new pastor looked forward to his future residence in Springfield was strongly in contrast with his first impressions of the place. He came here at first an entire stranger to the village and its inhabitants, sent by the president of his college to supply the vacant pulpit for six Sabbaths. His journey was on horseback. The road was solitary, and the approach to the town from the east far from attractive. He rode down the hill to the main street, then the only settlement, and looked up and down the street. The buildings were mostly unpainted, and many of them dilapidated. The aspect was chilling to the young minister, and he said to himself that the day when the six weeks of his engagement should be ended would be a happy day to him. Directly opposite the road by which he entered the village he saw one white house of a more cheerful aspect. At the door of this mansion he presented himself, and announced his name and errand. 'You have come to the right place,' replied the proprietor, and at once extended to him the hospitalities of his house. The six weeks were spent pleasantly. The call to settle followed, and in that white house the young pastor found his future wife. It was to him indeed 'the right place.' Mr. Howard was a native of Bridgewater, a graduate of Harvard College in 1781, where he was afterward a tutor, and was ordained pastor of this church April 27, 1785. The ordination sermon was preached by Rev. Timothy Hilliard, from Titus, 2d chapter, the last clause of the 15th verse,—'Let no man despise thee.'

"In the year 1803 the health of Mr. Howard failed, and the parish was obliged to provide for the supply of the pulpit by other clergymen. His disability proved to be of a more serious and permanent character than was at first anticipated, and at its meeting in April, 1805, a committee was appointed to confer with him, and consider the expediency of dissolving his relation to the parish, and the terms upon which it should be done. At an adjourned meeting in May, 1805, this committee, through their chairman, the Hon. John Hooker, reported that they had made an agreement with Mr. Howard, by which he was to be relieved from pastoral labor, relinquish all claim for his salary and for the use of the parsonage house and lands, and was to be paid the sum of $2000 in three annual installments. The pastoral relation, however, was to continue until the settlement of another minister, and then be dissolved without further terms or conditions. This agreement was duly confirmed by the parish, and Mr. Howard continued to be nominally the pastor of the church until the ordination of his successor, in 1809.

"Mr. Howard received the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity from Harvard College in 1824, and was usually spoken of as Dr. Howard in the later years of his life. He died in 1837, at his house on Elm Street, close by the church,—the same now owned and occupied by Mr. Henry Fuller. At the commencement of his ministry, in 1785, the membership of the church was 117. At the time of the settlement of his successor, in 1809, it was not far from 177, showing an increase of 60 in twenty-four years.

"The deacons at the commencement of Mr. Howard's ministry, as already stated, were Nathaniel Brewer, Daniel Harris, and Moses Bliss. The vacancy caused by the death of Deacon Harris, in 1785, was filled the same year by the election of William Pyncheon, Esq., to that office. Mr. Pyncheon was a lineal descendant from the original founder of Springfield, and from his distinguished son, John Pyncheon. He was for thirty years the parish clerk, and most of that time its treasurer. He also held the offices of town clerk and treasurer and register of deeds. He died March 4, 1808, at the age of sixty-eight years. Chauncey Brewer, son of Deacon Nathaniel Brewer, and grandson of Rev. Daniel Brewer, was a deacon of the church during the pastorate of Mr. Howard. He was a physician, and attained considerable eminence in his profession. He died in March, 1830, at the advanced age of eighty-seven. His venerable form is well remembered, as he appeared when he occupied his pew on the Sabbath, on the south side of the pulpit, in the present meeting-house.

"On the 24th of November, 1808, the church, by a unanimous vote, invited Mr. Samuel Osgood to settle with them in the work of the gospel ministry, and Chauncey Brewer, George Bliss, and John Hooker (then the deacons of the church in active service) were appointed a committee to inform him of the vote. This call was given after he had preached here two Sabbaths, and, considering the fact that he was the thirty-seventh minister who had been preaching here, either as a candidate or a supply, since the resignation of Dr. Howard, it was certainly a very complimentary vote. Mr. Osgood—or, as he is more frequently called, Dr. Osgood—was born at Fryeburg, Me., Feb. 3, 1784. He completed his studies, preparatory to entering college, under the instruction of Daniel Webster, who, in after-years, was accustomed, whenever in this town on the Sabbath, to attend this church, and listen to the preaching of his former scholar and lifelong friend. Dr. Osgood graduated at Dartmouth College in 1805, having joined his class during his junior year. He at first inclined to the law as a profession, and actually commenced the study in a lawyer's office. He soon, however, abandoned it, and commenced a theological course with Rev. Dr. Harris, of Dorchester. He was licensed to preach in 1806, and preached his first sermon in Roxbury; his second in Quincy, where he had for hearers ex-President John Adams and his son, afterward President John Quincy Adams. He soon after went to Princeton, where he completed his theological studies. Returning to Massachusetts, he was a candidate in three different places for settlement, including this, toward which the scale eventually turned. He was ordained here on the 25th of January, 1809. His former theological instructor, Dr. Harris, preached the sermon, Dr. Lathrop, of West Springfield, gave the charge, and Rev. Ezra Witter, of Wilbraham, the right hand of fellowship.

"The ministry of Mr. Osgood commenced under most auspicious circumstances. He was then in the vigor of youthful manhood, with a constitution that gave promise of uniform health,—a promise that had a remarkable fulfillment for more than half a century of his after-life. His mental powers were solid and strong rather than showy. He had a church of 225 members. His parish (then territorial) embraced the whole population of the town,—from Chicopee River on the north to Longmeadow on the south, and from Wilbraham line on the east to the Connecticut River,—comprising about 2200 souls. The officers of the church were men of fervent piety and cultured intellect, and held stations in the church and in the world of wide and commanding influence. One of them, Judge Moses Bliss, had reached an advanced age, which disqualified him in a measure from the active duties of the deaconship. Dr. Chauncey Brewer, not yet threescore-and-ten, was still able to officiate at the Lord's table on communion Sabbaths, and to perform other services pertaining to the office.

"George Bliss and John Hooker, both men of large culture, high standing, and influence, were then in the full vigor of middle life. Of the times of their election to the office of deacon the record makes no mention. But there can be no question that they held the office at the very beginning of Mr. Osgood's pastorate, and probably before. They were both of the legal profession, and ranked among the first of its members. Mr. Hooker was for eighteen years the judge of probate for this county, and one of original corporators of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions.

"At the time of Mr. Osgood's settlement many of the ministers and churches in this commonwealth were drifting away from Trinitarian orthodoxy toward Unitarian views. Mr. Osgood, although holding in the main with those who adhered to the Trinitarian doctrine, was at first regarded as more liberal than many of his ministerial brethren; but as the breach widened between those who claimed the appellation of Liberal Christians and those who held the old orthodox standards, Mr. Osgood had no hesitation in ranging himself with those who adhered to the tenets of John Calvin.

"When the old meeting-house was found too strait and too uncomfortable for the congregation, and the parish decided to build the present edifice, the storm, which had been for some time gathering, burst. In August, 1819, about 25 members of the church, comprising some of its most respectable and influential members, including the venerable ex-pastor, made application for a certificate of their regular standing, and a recommendation to the people of God as in full communion, that they might be formed into a separate church. It was known that there were others who stood ready to join in this movement when it should be successfully inaugurated. The result was a secession, formidable, not in numbers, but in the standing and influence of those concerned in it. In the language of Dr. Osgood, uttered thirty years afterward, 'This was a trying time to me and to many of my parishioners. Families, who had long worshipped in the same sanctuary, and who had enjoyed most familiar and delightful intercourse, and some of whom were united in the tenderest bonds of consanguinity, were sundered for a time. If no speeches of recrimination were made, there were bitter feelings with some on both sides.' In this crisis it was fortunate for the stability of this church and its pastor that the officers of the church were not only good men, but wise men. They stood firm, and the pastor felt that his hands were strengthened. It was also fortunate that the minister who was settled over the new Unitarian Society was a gentleman of peculiar amiability and disposed to peace. The era of ill feeling gradually passed away, and forbearance and courtesy eventually characterized the intercourse of the parties.

"In 1827, Mr. Osgood received the honorary degree of D.D. from Princeton College, and was afterward usually addressed and spoken of by that title. The active pastorate of Dr. Osgood continued down to May, 1854, a period of forty-five years. At that time, when he had reached the full period of threescore-and-two years, he retired from the active duties of the pastoral office, although continuing still to retain the pastoral relation to the end of his life. His death occurred on the 8th of December, 1862. It might have been said of him, 'His eye was not dim, or his natural force abated.' It is rare that the death of a minister, or indeed of any citizen, leaves so wide a gap in the community where he has resided as did that of Dr. Osgood. For more than half a century he had taken a prominent part in the moral and religious movements of this town. No man was so universally known to the people as he. Few had so strong a hold upon their respect and sympathy. He was ever prompt to extend a helping hand to the suffering poor who came under his observation; his hospitality was unstinted, although often severely taxed. Occupying as he did the position of minister of the first parish of the largest town in Western Massachusetts, at the confluence of travel from every quarter of the compass, his house was pre-eminently a minister's tavern. He was a genial man, social in his tastes and habits, fond of conversation, and ready to take an active part in it. He possessed an immense fund of anecdote, with which he was accustomed to interest and amuse those in whose company he chanced to be. His own peculiar traits of character have made him the subject of many anecdotes. Dr. Osgood enjoyed, to a remarkable extent, the most robust health during the whole of his ministerial life. In reviewing his ministry at the end of forty years, he claimed, and with justice, that he had never been detained from his pulpit a single Sabbath on account of sickness. His person was manly, indicating uncommon physical strength. I have heard it said of him that in his prime he was the most athletic man in Springfield. Many anecdotes are told of him in this regard, some of them quite amusing. In any notice of Dr. Osgood, as the pastor of this church and minister of this parish, a position affording a field of great usefulness so long filled by him with acceptance, it is proper that there should be some mention of the invaluable aid which he derived from his wife. She was, indeed, an exemplary woman, one who may be safely held up as a model to the wives of ministers all over the land. This parish appreciated her usefulness in the station she filled here, and as some expression of its respect for her continued to her during her life a considerable part of the annuity which had been paid to her husband. She survived him between eight and nine years. Although Dr. Osgood wrote more than two thousand sermons, some of them of rare ability, and delivered on occasions of unusual public interest, yet, with only one or two exceptions, none of them were ever published. He had an almost invincible repugnance to having his sermons printed. At the close of the fortieth year of his ministry he preached a discourse from Acts, 20th chapter, 26th and 27th verses, in which he reviewed his ministry from his settlement down to that time. It was a discourse of great interest and power, and the church strongly solicited and obtained his consent to its publication.

"It has been already stated that the deacons officiating during the earlier portion of Dr. Osgood's pastorate were Chauncey Brewer, George Bliss, and John Hooker.

"Deacon Hooker died on the 6th of March, 1829, at the age of sixty-seven. Deacon George Bliss survived him one year, and died on the 8th of March, 1830, at the age of sixty-five. Eight days afterward Deacon Chauncey Brewer died, on the 16th of March, 1830, at the age of eighty-seven. Owing to his age and infirmities he had retired from active duty in the office for some years, and, about the year 1822, Col. Solomon Warriner was chosen a deacon to take his place. Col. Warriner was a native of Wilbraham, from which place he removed to Springfield about the year 1800. From Springfield he removed to Pittsfield, and resided there until December, 1820, when he returned to Springfield, and resided here during the remainder of his life. Before leaving Springfield he had been the leader of the choir, and upon his return he was reinstated in the same position, and continued to preside over the music of this church for more than a quarter of a century. During nearly the same period of time he held the office of deacon. He was also for many years superintendent of the Sabbath-school. In September, 1849, he took a dismission to the South Church in this city. He died June 14, 1860, at the age of eighty-two. Boardman Hubbard was chosen a deacon April 5, 1826, thus increasing the number of deacons performing actual service, from three to four. Deacon Hubbard was employed in the United States Armory, and resided on the hill. He united with this church by letter from a church in Middletown, in March, 1824, and was dismissed to the Fourth Church, now the Olivet Church, at some time between 1836 and 1844, probably about 1841. Daniel Bontecou and George Merriam were elected deacons March 5, 1833. Mr. Merriam held the office until March 6, 1842, when, with thirty-two other members, he was dismissed to unite in the organization of the South Church. Deacon Bontecou continued to officiate until May 2, 1845, when he, too, was dismissed to the South Church. He died Nov. 24, 1857.

"To fill the place vacated by Deacon Merriam, Benjamin Eldridge was elected April 13, 1842, and still retains the office of a deacon of this church, although, by reason of infirmity, he has for several years retired from all active service. At this period it was the usage of the church to have four deacons, but it was rare that the office was filled by that number. Lay members were often called upon to officiate at communion seasons. There being but three incumbents in November, 1843, the church attempted to secure a sufficient number of officers by electing three additional deacons, but only one, Elijah W. Dickinson, accepted the office. He held it until he was dismissed to join the North Church. Channcey Chapin united with the church by profession May 5, 1844, being then past middle life. Three years afterward he was chosen the clerk of the church, and, on the 21st of April, 1848, he was elected a deacon. Both of these offices he held until his death, which occurred May 6, 1851, at the age of sixty-two.

"About this time there was an important change in the policy of the church as to the tenure of the office of deacon. From the earliest period of its existence this office had always been regarded as one to be held for life. For some years great difficulty had been experienced in finding men qualified who were willing to undertake its duties. Vacancies were frequently occurring, and most of those whom the church selected to fill them were unwilling to accept the office. In the hope to obviate this difficulty, it was decided, at a meeting held July 12, 1850, to elect two deacons for the term of five years. Daniel Reynolds was elected, and accepted the office. Two others were successively chosen, but both of them declined. From that time to the present the church has adhered to the policy of electing its deacons for limited terms, sometimes for five years, sometimes for three years. By a permanent rule of the church, adopted in 1871, the tenure is now fixed at six years. Under the limited-term system thirteen different persons have held this office.

"Upon the retirement of Dr. Osgood from the active duties of his pastorate, the church and parish with great unanimity extended a call to Rev. Henry M. Parsons, then a student in the Theological Seminary at East Windsor, to be his successor. That call was accepted, and Mr. Parsons ordained on the 15th of November, 1854. He continued here just sixteen years, enjoying the affection and confidence—ever increasing—of this church and people, when, from a conviction that duty called him to another field of labor, he sought and obtained the reluctant consent of his people to a dissolution of his pastoral relation to this church. The history of his labors here must be left to later times. To him succeeded Rev. Edward Allen Reed. Mr. Reed was dismissed July 11, 1878, at his own request, very much against the desire of his people. Rev. Dr. Edward P. Terhune was installed April 30, 1879.

"Having now brought down this history of the church and parish as far as I propose, I now recur briefly to an earlier period, in order to state some matters of interest that could not be conveniently introduced in the regular course of the narrative. There are some things in our early parochial history which appear strange to our modern ideas. One of these is the practice that, from the time of the erection of the first meeting-house down to the present one, seems to have prevailed, of a periodical assignment of seats to the congregation. Thus, in 1664, when the town and parish were identical, a vote of this kind is recorded: 'Dec. 30, 1664. It is ordered y^e the Selectmen and Deacon or deacons shall from time to time seat persons in y^e meeting-house either higher or lower according as in their sound discretion they shall judge most meete.' What a strange jumble of officials here, selectmen and deacons, uniting in this delicate and difficult duty of seating persons 'higher or lower,' at their discretion! A month later, in January, 1665, is found recorded an order of the selectmen, which I transcribe in full as a curious specimen of the way in which the parochial police of those days was administered. It is in these words: 'Forasmuch as order is beautifull, & especially in y^e house of God, & y^e want thereof is displeasing to God & breeds disturbance among men; And whereas it doth appear y^e divers young persons and sometimes others, notwithstanding their being called upon, Doe yet neglect to attend unto such order as is prescribed theru, either for their sitting in y^e meeting-house, or for their reforming of disorders in & about y^e meeting-house in tyme of God's Publike worship; It is therefore hereby ordered that whosoever of this Township shall not, from tyme to tyme to their sitting in y^e meeting-house, submit themselves to the ordering of y^e Selectmen & Deacons, or such as are empowered to seate & order persons in y^e meeting house, All such persons as shall refuse or neglect to attend unto order as aforesaid shall forfeite as is herein after expressed, viz.: Hee or shee that shall not take his or her seate ordered y^e fro tyme to tyme, but shall in y^e days or tymes of God's Publike worship Goe into & abide in any other seate, appointed for some other, Such disorderly person or persons for y^e first offence shall forfeit three shillings four pence to y^e towne's treasury.' By the same authority it was ordered that the seat formerly called the guard seat should be for the smaller boys to sit in, 'that they may be more in sight of y^e congregation.' In this seat none were permitted to sit 'above y^e age of 14 or 15 years.'"

"It appears that in the earlier period of our parochial history care was taken that the men and women should be seated in separate seats. The first innovation upon this practice appears to have been in the year 1751, when the parish 'voted that the committee for seating the meeting-house be directed to seat the men and women promiscuously.' But in order that those of tender sensibilities should not be shocked by so great a departure from long-established custom, the committee were directed, upon application being made to them by any person or persons desiring 'not to be seated promiscuously, to "gratify" them as near as they can.' It is not surprising that the parish selected John Worthington, Esq., and Mr. Luke Bliss, two of the wisest and most popular men of the town, to perform this delicate duty under this new condition of things. After a time this matter of new-seating the meeting-house came to be attended with a good deal of difficulty. At a parish meeting in December, 1790, the parish voted to choose a seating committee of five persons. Twenty-two were chosen to the office, all of whom refused to serve. The meeting was then adjourned two days. At the adjourned meeting it was voted to reconsider the vote providing for a committee of five, and as a substitute, it was determined that a committee of three should nominate a committee of twenty-one persons, of which the nominating committee should be themselves members, and from these twenty-one seven persons were to be drawn (by lot I suppose), who should seat the meeting-house, and report an adjourned meeting about one month later. This was done, and the report of this committee, charged with this delicate duty, was finally accepted. This seating held good for four years; but in 1794 it was found necessary to re-seat, and substantially the same process was repeated. The practice of seating the meeting-house continued until the erection of the present house, in 1819. A record of a parish meeting held April 5, 1737, indicates the rule by which the assignment of seats was then regulated. It was 'voted that the age of Persons and their own Estates, as they stand upon the list (Negros Excepted), are the Principal Rule that said Com^{tes} are to be governed by in their proceedings, and any other Dignity that any Parsons may be Clothed or attended withall shall be Left Discretionary with sd Committee.'

"In these modern days, when our city maintains with so large, and yet at so reasonable and proper, an expenditure its organized and paid fire department, with all its equipment of fire-steamers, reservoirs, hydrants, and telegraphic fire-alarms, but few, if any, among the present inhabitants of our city are aware how largely the means for extinguishing fires, not a century since, were provided and controlled by this parish. Yet the record shows that in November, 1792, the parish granted for the purpose of defraying the expense of building the engine-house the sum of six pounds eleven shilling two pence and two farthings; and in March, 1794, voted to pay the expense of five poles for the fire-wards, and also to pay for two fire-hooks and six leather buckets for the use of the fire-engine. And the same year Pitt Bliss was paid two pounds twelve shillings and six pence for the six buckets, and for repairing the hose to the engine.' Not content with repairing the old hose, the parish, in 1798, voted that 'Jonathan Dwight, Esq., William Ely, and Pitt Bliss be a committee to examine the hose belonging to the engine, and, if they judge it necessary, to procure a new one at the expense of the Parish.' Precisely how the extinguishing of fires came to be regarded as a parochial duty may not be quite clear, but certainly there can be nothing in it inconsistent with practical Christianity.

"Looking back from the stand-point we now occupy upon the past history of this church, and tracing it through all the vicissitudes of two hundred and thirty-eight years down to the present moment, we can see that while it has had its alternations of prosperity and trial,—sometimes depressed by disasters the most discouraging, at other times rejoicing in the consciousness of vigorous growth,—the tokens of a kind Providence, watching constantly ever and protecting it, have ever been conspicuous. Many colonies have gone out from it that have become strong and prosperous churches. To some of these in their infancy this church extended a helping hand, until they ceased to need help. All of them, without exception, have become centres of influence, diffusing Christian light and love through the community around them. To all these this church can point with maternal affection and pride, and say, 'These are my jewels.' These repeated drafts that have been made upon the numbers of this ancient church have not in any degree exhausted its resources or impaired its strength. It stands to-day—on the spot where it had its birth, and where, through almost two centuries and a half, it has ever stood—with a larger membership than ever before. United in itself, and united in a pastor whom it loves and honors, it can with reverent gratitude to God exclaim,—

"How are thy servants blessed, O Lord!
How sure is their defense!
Eternal wisdom is their guide,
Their help, Omnipotence!"

THE OLIVET CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

This church was organized Jan. 8, 1833, with 19 members, only 5 of whom are now living. The first pastor was Rev. Abram C. Baldwin, who was ordained Dec. 4th of the same year. He remained until January, 1839, and was succeeded by Ezekiel Russell, of South Wilbraham, ordained May 15, 1839. He officiated until 1849, and was followed by Rev. Samuel Strong, of Somers, who was installed in 1850, but, in consequence of ill health, resigned in 1852. H. B. Elliott then served for a time as stated supply. The pastors from this time to the present have been as follows, viz.: Geo. D. Folsom, W. W. Woodworth, Geo. H. Soule, W. K. Hall, James A. Hamilton, and the present incumbent, Rev. L. H. Cone, who was installed Oct. 30, 1867. The church edifice was erected in 1834, remodeled in 1854, and is at the present time (November, 1878) undergoing repairs. The church is in a prosperous condition, and has a membership of about 325.

* This passage, through inadvertence, appears twice in the history of Springfield.

The officers are as follows, viz.: Deacons, William A. Spooner, Geo. B. Kilboon, S. D. Brooks, and Chauncey K. Camp; Parish Committee, Dr. S. D. Brooks, Benj. Hannis, Edward R. Lee, William M. Gray, and Alexander B. Fobes; Clerk, P. H. M. Brooks. Location, State Street, opposite Armory Grounds.

THE SOUTH CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

This church is an offshoot from the First Church of this city, and was organized at the parish house of the First Church by an ecclesiastical council, called by letter for this purpose, March 23, 1842, and consisted of the following members: Rev. Sanford Lawton, Mrs. Mary Ann Lawton, Ashley P. Graves, Mrs. Mary A. Graves, Mrs. Lucy Graves (Searle), Henry Woodman, Jr., Mrs. Mary A. Woodman, Charles K. Crocker, Mrs. Julia Ann Crocker, William Stowe,* Mrs. Hannah E. Stowe,* Charles Merriam, Mrs. Sophia E. Merriam,* George Merriam, Reuben A. Chapman,* Mrs. Elizabeth Chapman, Mrs. Mary M. Sargeant, Henry Brewer, Jr., Mrs. Cynthia A. Brewer, James Brewer, Samuel E. Bailey, Mrs. Huldah T. Bailey, Philip Wilcox,* Mrs. Eliza P. Wilcox,* Hannah A. Fuller (Severance),* Andalusia F. Fuller,* Mrs. Naomi C. Grant (Miller),* Elijah W. Bliss,* Mrs. Orphana Bliss,* Mrs. Sally Elliot,* Augusta C. Elliot, Asa F. Cowles, Mrs. Lucy A. Cowles,* David C. M. Rupp, Mrs. Martha Hunt, Silas Hibbard, Mrs. D. B. Nichols (Knapp), Abel Sweetzer,* Mrs. Eunice M. Sweetzer, Mrs. Mary Chase.*

From the December prior to the formation of the society, services were held in the old parish house, which was given them by the mother-church. This old building was the first court-house in Springfield, and stood on Sanford Street, where it is now crossed by Market. The first church edifice was erected on Bliss Street, at a cost, including chapel, of $8813, and was dedicated June 12, 1843, by the Rev. Noah Porter, the first pastor. The present church edifice was completed in 1874, at a cost of about $145,000. Both its exterior and interior present a model of beauty and elegance seldom surpassed. It is said to be one of the most complete religious edifices in New England,—convenient in its arrangement and perfect in its decorations.

As stated previously, Rev. Noah Porter was the first pastor of the church, who remained four years, when, having received a call from Yale College to the professorship of mental and moral philosophy, which he accepted, he resigned his pastorate, and was succeeded by Rev. Samuel G. Buckingham, D.D., who has since remained in charge of the church, and is the present incumbent of the pastoral office. Dr. Buckingham's pastorate has been a long and successful one. More than thirty years he has labored among this people, and with the best results. He has witnessed the growth of the South Church from a few followers to a large and influential body, which is annually extending its sphere of usefulness; and it may truthfully be written that much of its present prosperity is due to the untiring efforts put forth in its behalf by Dr. Buckingham.

The following is a list of the deacons, from the organization of the church to the present time: George Merriam,† Abel

Sweetzer,* Daniel Bontecou,* Erastus Hayes,* Henry A. Robinson,† Alexander S. McClean,† Ariel Parish,† Asa F. Cowles, Obadiah W. Wilcox, Eli H. Patch, Charles Marsh, George H. Deane, James Brewer.

Location of church, corner Maple and High Streets.

Among those who were first interested in the organization of this church and who rendered it valuable service were Rev. Sanford Lawton, who is still living in the city; the late Chief-Justice Chapman, and William Stowe, an editor, and for a number of years clerk of the Massachusetts House of Representatives; also G. & C. Merriam, the publishers of Webster's Dictionary, as well as H. & I. Brewer, both of which are still well-known business firms here. Other valuable helpers came to their aid, who have since died, among whom may be mentioned Thomas Bond, Daniel Bontecou, Edward Morris, Samuel Reynolds.

The results of the enterprise have justified their wisdom, and the wisdom of those who were associated with them, in founding such a church, while all who have aided in building it up have the satisfaction of seeing it well established and another strong church added to the many in this city, whose Christian teachings and mission work and charities and healthful influence are making this a good community wherein to reside.

THE NORTH CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

Meetings for consultation on the religious wants of Springfield, held at frequent intervals from May, 1846, till the October following, resulted in the adoption by 10 brethren of the constitution and articles of faith of a proposed new church, with a view to whose organization the ministerial services of the Rev. Robert H. Conklin, of Warsaw, N. Y., were secured; and the first public service was held Sunday, Sept. 20, 1846, in "Frost's Hall," the third story of a building on the corner of Main and Sanford Streets.

The church thus contemplated was organized Oct. 28, 1846, by a council of churches convened at the South Church, of which the Rev. Dr. Samuel Osgood, then pastor of the First Church, was moderator, and the Rev. Dr. Ezekiel Russell, then pastor of the Olivet Church, was scribe. The Rev. Dr. John Todd, pastor of the First Church, Pittsfield, preached the sermon. 22 persons—11 men, 11 women—were organized into the new church.

The Sunday-school was organized Nov. 1, 1846; and George H. White was the first superintendent.

The church, then acting also in capacity of a parish, voted in September, 1847, to purchase a lot of land on the southeast corner of Main and Worthington Streets and build its chapel thereon; and in the month following it hired for temporary use through the winter the edifice then known as the "Free Church," in Sanford Street. In November following it was voted to sell the lot above mentioned, and purchase a site on the west side of Main Street, north of Bridge Street. In March, 1848, the temporal business of the church was transferred to the parish, which had then become legally organized.

The Rev. Dr. Raymond H. Seeley, of Bristol, Conn., was installed as the first pastor by a council which met March 1, 1849, for deliberation in the chapel of the First Church, and which held the public service of installation in the evening, in the new church, then first opened for divine worship. Dr. Seeley, having resigned his pastorate to take charge of the American Chapel, Paris, France, was dismissed by a council, Jan. 26, 1858.

The Rev. James Drummond, of Lewiston, Me., was installed pastor by a council, June 16, 1858. His pastorate was ended by death, December, 1861.

The Rev. L. Clark Seelye was ordained pastor by a council, Jan. 20, 1863. Having resigned to accept a professorship in Amherst College, he was dismissed by a council, May 31, 1865.

* Deceased.

† Resigned.

A colony of 55 members of this church was organized into "The Memorial Church" by a council held in the vestry of the North Church, Oct. 27, 1865. The new organization erected a stone house of worship on North Main Street during the year 1867, and has reached a high degree of usefulness and power.

The Rev. Richard G. Greene, of Brooklyn, N. Y., after supplying the pulpit from May 13, 1866, was installed pastor by a council, Sept. 19, 1866.

The society, at its annual meeting, March 6, 1871, appointed a committee to sell the church property on Main Street and select a site for a new edifice. On May 29th of the same year the committee reported the purchase of a lot on the corner of Salem Street and Salem Avenue, at a cost of $26,000. The property on Main Street was subsequently sold for $46,000.

June 6th of the same year Charles S. Ferry, George W. Ray, George H. Deane, Edwin McElwain, and Joseph Stone were appointed a building committee.

October 3d of the same year the report of the building committee, with plans, was accepted, and the committee was authorized to proceed with the erection of the church edifice.

Religious services were held for the last time in the old church the last Sunday in 1872. For the next six months the congregation worshipped in the Opera-House.

The new church was dedicated Sept. 18, 1873, the sermon being preached by the Rev. Joseph Parker, D.D., of London.

The designs for the building were furnished by Messrs. Gambrill & Richardson, of New York, and the builders were Norcross Brothers, of Worcester. The material is freestone, the style is Norman, and the shape is cruciform, with a massive tower in the angle between the nave and the south transept. It is, in all its appointments, a complete church edifice, and was erected, including the chapel, at a cost of $53,398.28.

The Rev. Richard G. Greene was dismissed by a council, October, 1874.

The Rev. Washington Gladden was called to the pastorate Jan. 2, 1875. Having supplied the pulpit from Dec. 13, 1874, he entered, Feb. 1, 1875, upon the active duties of the pastorate, and was installed by a council September 20th of the same year, and is the present official pastor.

The officers of the church for 1878 were as follows: Deacons, Ephraim G. Norton, Oliver D. Morse, L. Sterns Stowe, Samuel K. Foster; Clerk, Harlan P. Stone; Treasurer, Ephraim G. Norton; Auditor, L. Sterns Stowe.

The parish officers for 1878 were as follows: Parish Committee, William S. Marsh, P. P. Kellogg, William M. Pomeroy, Charles J. Blackstone, Samuel N. Heywood; Clerk and Treasurer, William C. Warren.

HOPE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

Hope Congregational Church is the outgrowth of a mission Sunday-school begun on Quincy Street, east of Hancock, in June, 1865, by Messrs. William Kirkham, Henry S. Lee, and Markham Moody, under the auspices of the South Congregational Church.

There were 16 scholars the first Sunday. Mr. Kirkham was the first superintendent. After several changes in location, from an upper room on Quincy to a kitchen on Adams Street (now East Union), and then back to Quincy, a barn, standing on the site afterward occupied by Hope Chapel, on East Union Street, near Eastern Avenue, was purchased in 1867, and occupied by the school till the completion of the chapel.

In 1870 a chapel was built by the friends of the enterprise, at a cost of about $1500.

HOPE CHAPEL—the name having been proposed by Mr. Charles Merriam—was dedicated in July and occupied by the school, with Mr. H. S. Lee as superintendent. The barn which served as a school-room for three years now stands on Colton Street, at the head of Quincy. During the next five years the progress of the school was very encouraging, averaging over 200 in attendance.

Preaching services were held in the chapel as a supply could be furnished. In the winter of 1873, under the conduct of Mr. Earle, the evangelist, a revival of great power was experienced, resulting in the hopeful conversion of many members of the school. About 25 united with the South Church.

In June of 1875, Mr. Charles L. Morgan, a graduate of Yale Theological Seminary of that year, and of Beloit College, 1871, was called by the Hope Chapel committee of the South Church to take charge of the chapel work for one year.

During the ensuing winter of 1875-76 a deep religious interest prevailed, resulting in so many conversions that it was decided to organize a church and settle Mr. Morgan as pastor. The usual steps having been taken, a council was called for March 15, 1876, consisting of the Congregational Churches of Springfield, of East and West Longmeadow, also Dr. Leonard Bacon, Rev. William Rice, and Rev. S. P. Wilder.

This council met on March 15th, reviewed the action taken, examined the candidate, and proceeded in the afternoon to confirm the organization of 81 persons into a body to be known as the Hope Congregational Church, 40 presenting letters from other churches, 41 uniting on profession of their faith. Mr. Henry S. Lee, one of the founders of the Sunday-school, received in behalf of the church the right hand of fellowship from the pastor of the parent church, Dr. S. G. Buckingham. Rev. Washington Gladden addressed the church. In the evening the council assisted in ordaining Mr. Morgan, a member of the church, to the office of pastor and teacher. The ordaining prayer was offered by Rev. L. W. Cone; sermon by Rev. J. M. Eustis; charge to pastor by Rev. E. A. Reed; to people by Rev. John W. Harding; right hand of fellowship by Rev. S. P. Wilder.

During the summer of 1876 the failure of various sources of past help made apparent the necessity of removing the chapel to a more central and inviting location. The use for five years of a favorable site, on the corner of State and Winchester Streets, was offered the church by friends. This offer was accepted, and by vote of the church the chapel was removed to the site offered and since occupied.

In October of 1877 a parish society was organized, and a strong effort made to enlist the co-operation of all the families of the chapel vicinity. The result was greatly increased interest and rapid progress.

Hope Church was organized upon a broad evangelical basis, with a creed to which every Christian accepting the Bible can subscribe. Although Congregational in government, in faith, Hope Church is simply Christian, and therefore in the truest sense a union church.

At its organization the officers were Rev. Charles L. Morgan, Pastor; Andrew J. Plummer, Horace E. Bugbee, Deacons; A. H. Dodge, H. Dwight Bugbee, Committee; Jacob Easley, Clerk. In 1878 the officers were Rev. Charles L. Morgan, Pastor; Andrew J. Plummer, Horace E. Bugbee, Deacons; William E. Smith, John Henry Robbins, Committee; H. Dwight Bugbee, Clerk. Membership at organization, 81; membership in November, 1878, 126.

SANFORD STREET CHURCH

was founded in 1849 as a Methodist Church. Pastors, while it was connected with that denomination, were Revs. Leonard Collins, John N. Mars, George Spiwood, Daniel Vandever, John A. Williams, Samuel Grauf, Robert R. Morris, Wm. Butler, and James A. Jones. In 1864 the church was reorganized as Congregational, with the pastor Rev. W. W. Mallory. The Rev. Mr. Mallory was called to labor in the South shortly after the close of the war. Since then the church has had no settled pastor, until June 21, 1877, when Rev. John H. Docher was installed as pastor. This church has about 80 members, with 3 deacons,—W. Francis, Eli S. Baptist, and George H. Green. The Sunday-school numbers over 60 scholars and teachers.

THE MEMORIAL CHURCH.*

Steps were taken for organizing the Memorial Church, Oct. 15, 1865, in the upper rooms of the dwelling of the late Horatio Sargeant, on the corner of Main and Sargeant Streets, by persons whose names appear in the list hereafter given. Joseph D. Stratton, Melvin M. Tracy, and Horace Rude were chosen deacons; George M. Atwater, Horace J. Chapin, William Dearden were the standing committee of the church; J. G. Holland, O. D. Adams, S. H. Mosely, A. F. Niles, and D. W. Crosby were the business committee. The parish committee were as follows: George M. Atwater, William Dearden, C. K. Wilkinson. The first minister was Rev. Mark Trafton.

The following is a list of members at the organization: G. M. Atwater, Mrs. H. R. Atwater, Solomon B. Davis, Mrs. S. B. Davis, Miss Susan Allen, Luther Clark, Horace Rude, Mrs. M. M. Rude, Horace J. Chapin, Mrs. Lydia S. Chapin, J. G. Holland, Mrs. E. H. Holland, Mrs. Anna Holland, Mrs. Sarah J. Knight, Miss Frances Drummond, A. C. Hunt, Mrs. A. C. Hunt, William Dearden, W. H. Allis, Mrs. Mary H. Sheldon, Miss Hannah L. Clark, William Sidney Dearden, Mrs. Eliza Dearden, Horace Putnam, Mrs. Louise Putnam, Mrs. Mary E. Ross, Martin L. Childs, Mrs. Mary H. Childs, Augustus L. Childs, Miss Julia E. Childs, Tyler Childs, Mrs. Nancy Childs, Miss Carrie A. Brackett, Levi Graves, Charles H. Hill, Mrs. Jane Hill, Mrs. Angie Thomas, Mrs. H. S. Lawrence, Levi B. Coe, Mrs. Mary L. Coe, A. D. Miller, Mrs. Martha Miller, Mrs. Electa M. Graves, Edwin W. Shattuck, Fred S. Hazen, Mrs. Mary A. Morton, Mrs. Levi Graves, Mrs. Mary S. Kemp, Dwight Clark, Mrs. Decia M. Clark, Elizabeth F. Needham, Mrs. Sarah L. Shattuck, Mrs. Sarah A. Cate, Mrs. Harriet Niles, Mrs. Jane Jones.

The first services were held in the upper chambers of the Sargeant Street house, afterward in the Auburn Street school-house and in the hall of the Hooker school-house. The corner-stone of the church edifice was laid July 7, 1867, followed by consecration services, held in the city-hall, conducted by Rev. William T. Peet, D.D., Rev. William Adams, D.D., of New York, and representatives from the neighboring churches.

The building was completed in 1868, at a cost of about $80,000. It is in the Gothic style of architecture, cruciform plan, and built of unhewn granite. It has about 1000 sittings. Richard Upjohn was the architect.

The reasons for organizing the church are set forth in the records of Oct. 29, 1865, as follows:

"Believing that the interests of religion require the formation of a church in Ward One, we, a company of believers who profess faith in Christ and acknowledge him to be the Saviour of mankind, to effect this purpose in connection with the society which has been formed to build a house of worship in said ward, do hereby organize ourselves into a Church of Christ."

The characteristics of the church are clearly set forth in the following resolutions, as shown by the records, Oct. 29, 1866:

"1. Resolved, That the Memorial Church of Springfield, having declared in its creed its belief in the Holy Catholic Church, welcomes to its membership and communion all who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth, and who agree with it concerning the essential doctrines of the Christian religion, by whatever name they may be called.

"2. That the success of the church upon this basis during the first year of its history—a success which has brought at least five denominations into a happy communion of personal feeling and action—is our sufficient justification for reaffirming this basis as a ground of Christian liberality, a guide to a wise and sound policy, and especially as the true basis for organized Christian effort in the ward in which our church is located."

By a unanimous vote of the church, and also of the congregation, a plate bearing the following inscription was deposited in the corner-stone:

"Inscription: From love to God and good-will to men a company of believers who profess faith in Christ, the Saviour of mankind, by the aid of the churches in Springfield and other friends of the enterprise, build this house of worship for the Memorial Church.

"This church, constituted by the fellowship of Christians of different denominations, was organized Oct. 29, A.D. 1865, and named the Memorial Church, in memory of deceased ministers of Christ in New England.

"'Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ,' 1st Corinthians, 3d chap., 2d verse.

"'The Lord be with us as he was with our fathers: let him not leave us nor forsake us,' 1st Kings, 8th chap., 57th verse."

The present deacons of the church are Joshua Grant, J. D. Stratton, A. F. Niles, D. J. Bartlett, E. W. Shattuck, and E. Dewitt; Standing Committee, G. M. Atwater, J. H. Foulds, and Dwight Clark. The church has a membership of 350. The present pastor, Rev. Wm. T. Eustis, was settled in the year 1869.

CHURCH OF THE UNITY.

The Third Congregational Society, styled the Church of the Unity, had its origin in a disaffection of a part of the members of the First Congregational Church with the teachings of the Rev. Dr. Osgood. It was claimed by the seceders that the tenor of Dr. Osgood's teachings had changed since he preached as a candidate; and, in the memorial presented to the Legislature by them, June 15, 1815, praying for the organization of a new church, they set forth that they were dissatisfied and could not profit by Dr. Osgood's ministry. This petition to the Legislature was signed by 54 members. A clause in this petition, which doubtless added fresh fuel to the ill feeling already engendered on the part of the First Church, prayed that a part of the funds of the first parish might be assigned them. The Legislature served an order on the first parish to show cause at the winter session why the order of the petitioners should not be granted. December 24th a meeting of the first parish was held to take the matter into consideration. The disaffected were willing to remain in the church provided the services of some other than Dr. Osgood were secured. It is said the meeting was a stormy and unpleasant one.

"Many grievous words and hard speeches were uttered, and a spirit of oppression and hostility to the petitioners seemed to pervade the minds of the majority. They treated the aggrieved as a company of unprincipled men, who had no claim to the rights and privileges of brethren and Christians. Dr. Howard,† being very anxious to prevent a division of the parish, and being unable to speak in the meeting by reason of the weakness of his voice, presented to the moderator, in writing, a conciliatory address; but one of the leaders of the majority objected to its being read, and they voted not to hear it."

It at once became evident to the petitioners that further consideration of the matter with the first parish was useless, and, within a week after this parish-meeting, Jonathan Dwight, Esq., who had been foremost among the petitioners, made them the following generous proposition: "That he would build a meeting-house of such dimensions and elegance as they should direct, wholly at his own expense, and present the same to them as a free gift, provided they would establish an ample fund for the permanent support of a minister." The proposition was at once accepted, and a fund of $16,000 was raised, and Rev. Bezaleel Howard, Joshua Frost, and Robert Emery, Esqs., were appointed a committee to advise with Mr. Dwight respecting the building of the meeting-house.

The society was incorporated as the Second Congregational Church of Springfield, Feb. 15, 1819, and the following individuals were named in the act of incorporation: Jonathan Dwight, Bezaleel Howard, Samuel Orne, James S. Dwight, Jonathan Dwight, Jr., Joshua Frost, Daniel Lombard, Festus Stebbins, James Wells, Robert Emery, Benjamin Day, John Howard, Eldad Stebbins, Samuel Benton, Daniel M. Leonard, Ira Mede, Austin Peck, Harvey Benjamin, Joseph M. Sanborn, Samuel Kingsbury, Samuel Lyman, Charles Rice, Judah Ely, Ezra Osborn, Jr., Simon Sanborn, Daniel Pease, John Rice, Jonathan Strickland, Solomon McQuivey, Seneca Cooley, John M. Hendrick, Elihu Collins, Henry Dwight,

The church building was dedicated Jan. 5, 1820, and on the 31st day of the same month the name of the society was changed to the Third Congregational Society, as it was found that the society in Chicopee, which at that time was a part of Springfield, had of right the designation "Second Congregational Society." The church building was repaired in 1842, and again in 1852. In January, 1866, a movement was started for the erection of a new church, and on March 1, 1867, the corner-stone of the present edifice was laid, and the name "Church of the Unity" given to the building. This was just forty-eight years from the laying of the corner-stone of the old church. The church was dedicated Feb. 17, 1869, the dedicatory address being delivered by Rev. Charles A. Humphreys. The building is of Gothic architecture, with solid walls and spire of Longmeadow sandstone, and in beauty of interior and exterior is perhaps unsurpassed by any religious edifice in this section.

The pastors of the church from its organization to the present time have been as follows, viz.: Rev. Wm. B. O. Peabody,* D.D., 1820-47; Rev. Geo. F. Simmons, 1847-51; Rev. Francis Tiffany, 1852-63; Rev. Chas. A. Humphreys, 1865; Rev. A. D. Mayo, 1874, present pastor. The parish committee for 1878 was as follows, viz.: J. R. Smith, Samuel Bigelow, James E. Russell, Chas. Hall, and Homer Foot, Jr.; Oscar B. Ireland, Clerk; and John C. Griswold, Treasurer. Location, State Street above Maple.

CHRIST CHURCH (EPISCOPAL).

The first Episcopal service in this place was held as early as 1817, by Rev. Titus Strong, of Greenfield, Mass. A year or two previous to this, Col. Roswell Lee, an earnest and devoted churchman, who was at that time superintendent of the U. S. Armory, obtained permission of the government to fit up one of the upper rooms in the armory buildings for a chapel. This room was set apart for religious worship, with appropriate services, by the clergyman already named, about the time we have specified. Springfield was then comparatively a small village, and, with one exception, this was the only place of worship in the whole town.

From 1817 to 1821 services were held occasionally in the chapel as clergymen could be procured. Among those who officiated at intervals during this time we find the names of the Rev. Mr. Doane, then professor in Washington College, which is now Trinity, who afterward became bishop of New Jersey; the Rev. Mr. Chase, now bishop of New Hampshire, and the Rev. Messrs. Fuller, Marshall, and Pinney.

In February, 1821, Rev. Edward Rutledge entered upon his duties as minister of the parish. May 24th of the same year the church was organized, and in all probability Col. Roswell Lee and Dr. John Stone, or Diah Allin, were elected wardens. Mr. Rutledge resigned in January, 1822, and from that time until 1835 no regular services were held. In this latter year, Rev. Samuel McBirney was sent here as a missionary, and services were held in the old court-house one year. In 1838, two years after the resignation of Mr. McBirney, Rev. Mr. Lee resumed the services, and November 28th, in the same year, the parish was reorganized under the name it now bears, with the following officers: Diah Allin and Samuel McNary, Wardens; Erasmus D. Beach, Maj. Goodsell, Ezra Kimberly, Reuben T. Safford, and Marcus Talmage, Vestrymen; William W. Lee, Clerk; Lucius Allin, Treasurer.

A church edifice was soon after erected, and was consecrated April 1, 1840. The following day Rev. Henry W. Lee was installed as rector of the parish, and remained as such until 1847. In 1854 he was consecrated bishop of the diocese of Iowa. He was succeeded by Rev. Henry W. Adams, who remained until 1848. Rev. A. N. Littlejohn† became rector in January, 1850, and in the following year resigned. Sept. 29, 1851, Rev. William S. Child was chosen his successor, and remained until April, 1859. During the rectorship of Rev. Mr. Littlejohn the enlargement of the church edifice was commenced, and completed soon after Mr. Child became rector.

In September, 1859, Rev. Geo. H. McKnight became rector of the parish, and remained until June 14, 1869, when he was succeeded by Rev. Alexander Burgess, who officiated in that capacity until May 15, 1878, when he was consecrated bishop of Quincy, Ill. The church is now (Nov. 16, 1878) without a settled rector. A new church edifice was completed in 1876, at a cost of about $75,000. It is mainly of the Norman style of architecture, built of Longmeadow stone, with a rich variety of cut-stone trimmings. It is one of the finest church edifices in New England. The present membership of the church is about 500. Location, Chestnut Street near State.

FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH.

This church was organized in 1819 with 19 persons. Meetings were held in churches and private houses until 1821, when a church edifice 26 by 30 feet was erected on Central Street, east of Pine. The ministers during this time were Elders Rand, Hubbard, Niles, Sawyer, and Atwell. In 1832 the society had increased to about 50 members, and Rev. Allen Hough was appointed regular pastor, and soon after a new church edifice was erected on the corner of Maple and Mulberry Streets. In 1846 the present church building was built on the corner of Main Street and Harrison Avenue, and was dedicated in the following year.

The following have officiated as pastors from the organization to the present time, viz.: Allen Hough, Joseph Hough, Nicholas Branch, Benj. Putnam, Dwight Ives, Hiram A. Graves, J. W. Eaton, Humphrey Richards, M. G. Clark, E. E. Cummings, George B. Ide, Geo. E. Merrill, and C. W. Anable, present pastor.

The church has a membership of over 500. The present deacons (1878) are as follows, viz.: Harvey Foster, John E. Taylor, Isaac E. Williams, and H. C. Martin.

THE STATE STREET BAPTIST CHURCH.

This church was organized in 1864, and services were held in Union Hall until the chapel of the present elegant church edifice was dedicated, July 8, 1866. The first pastor of this church was Rev. A. K. Potter, installed in January, 1865, and is the present incumbent of the pastoral office. The present (1878) officers of the church are as follows, viz.: Nathan G. Corning, John H. Lawton, Alpheus Hawkes,

* Died May 28, 1847.

† Now bishop of Long Island.

Jonas H. Hastings, D. M. Chapin, and Andrew Titus, Deacons; E. F. Foster, Clerk and Treasurer. Location, State Street, opposite Dwight Street.

THE PILGRIM BAPTIST CHURCH.

This church was organized in 1872. The old South Church building, on Bliss Street, is occupied as a house of worship. The pastors have been Revs. Spencer Harris and Peter Smith. The latter is the present incumbent, and was installed in 1874. The deacons are William Clark, James Branch, and Albert W. Parker; standing committee, J. B. Nellis, William Tutten, and M. Mathews.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH (UNIVERSALIST).

The Universalist Church in this city dates its origin back to 1827, when services were held in the armory chapel, which at that time was occupied by the Episcopalians as a place of worship. The society afterward worshiped in Military Hall until 1844, when a new building was erected. The present church edifice was dedicated in 1869.

The first regular pastor was Rev. D. J. Mandell. The following have served as pastors successively from that time to the present, viz., A. A. Folsom, R. P. Ambler, J. W. Ford, J. Twiss, J. Marvin, H. R. Nye, O. F. Safford, J. L. Seward (supply), A. H. Sweetser, Benton Smith, and George W. Perry, present pastor.

The deacons of the church (1878) are as follows: William S. Davis, George S. Lewis, Sr., W. H. Winans, J. M. Currier, and W. B. Sibley. Henry V. Lewis, clerk.

The present officers of the society are as follows: Eliphalet Trask, President; Dr. W. W. Gardner, Vice-President; H. S. Hyde, George S. Lewis; J. H. Lewis, Clerk; and H. F. Trask, Treasurer.

The Methodist denomination owes its origin to John and Charles Wesley, who, with their associates, began a religious movement in Oxford (Eng.) as early as 1729. The first Methodist sermon in the United States was preached in New York in 1766 by Philip Embury, an Irish emigrant. The first chapel was erected in John Street, New York, and was dedicated in 1768. The first General Conference was held, and the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States was organized, in 1784. The denomination then numbered 84 ministers and 15,000 members. The various Methodist bodies in the United States now number more than 18,000 ministers and 2,500,000 communicants.

The early history of Methodism in Springfield is somewhat obscure. It is known that Bishop Asbury visited this town as early as 1791, and preached his first sermon here July 15th of that year. He makes this record of the service in his journal: "The people were moved, and one individual was under deep conviction." Bishop Asbury was soon followed by other Methodist itinerants. The earliest of these whose names can now be gathered, who visited Springfield between the years 1791 and 1797, were A. Hunt, Joshua Hall, Thomas Cooper, Menzies Raynor, Joseph Lovel, H. Smith, George Pickering, N. Snethen, Hope Hull, and John Finnegan. It is probable also that Jesse Lee, the apostle of New England Methodism, visited Springfield during this period.

Preaching services were held in the houses of Mr. Sykes and Deacon John Ashley, and a class of about 15 members was organized.

In "Stevens' Memorial of Methodism," we are informed that in 1796 a daughter of this Deacon Ashley, who had married Mr. John Langdon and removed to Vermont, received a letter from her father stating that "a new sect of preachers had visited Springfield, called Methodists, and that they went out two and two like the apostles of old, traveled circuits, and preached free salvation to all men." Langdon became so interested to know something of this new sect that he immediately started for Springfield, and traveled over two hundred miles that he might hear the new preachers for himself. Through their preaching he was converted to the new faith, and became himself a Methodist minister.

A little later than this period we find the names of Rev. Messrs. George Roberts, Henry Eames, and Augustus Joselyn among the ministers who visited Springfield. Owing to deaths and removals to the West the little society subsequently dwindled, and Springfield ceased to be visited by the circuit preachers. We find, however, that from 1801 to 1815 occasional services continued to be held by local preachers living in the neighboring towns.

In 1815 the society was reorganized by Rev. Wm. Marsh, and connected with the Tolland (Conn.) circuit, to which the following ministers were appointed: in 1815, William Marsh and Orrin Roberts; in 1816, S. Winchester and Nathan Paine, and probably Timothy Merritt for a portion of the year; in 1817, Benjamin Sabin and S. Winchester; in 1818, Leonard Bennett and Hezekiah Davis.

Springfield became a separate station in 1819, and Rev. Daniel Dorchester, father of the present pastor of the State Street Methodist Church, was appointed preacher. The meetings were held alternately at the "water-shops" and in the armory chapel on the "Hill." At the "water-shops" the meetings were held in the old school-house, which stood near the corner of Hancock and Central Streets, until it was closed against them by vote of the district; then in private houses, sometimes in the barn of David Rice, and sometimes in a grove. In the winter of 1819, Mr. Dorchester, in addition to the duties of his pastorate, taught a school in the old block-house on the armory-grounds. In the spring of 1820, 77 members were reported to the Conference.

In the summer of 1820, Rev. Moses Fifield was appointed to this charge. He held services at the "water-shops," at the armory chapel, and also at the old court-house. During this year a chapel was erected at the "water-shops," which was subsequently called Asbury Chapel. This chapel was 28 feet by 36, a plain structure, unpainted in the interior. The subscription for its erection was signed by 27 persons, and the amount subscribed was $300. The members in those days were few in numbers and feeble in their pecuniary ability, as indeed at that time was the denomination they represented. In all Massachusetts, the year this chapel was erected, there were but 15 Methodist churches.

Mr. Fifield was reappointed in 1821, and was assisted by Rev. Thomas Asbury, a local preacher, who was employed by the presiding elder. During this year preaching services were held by them in the surrounding towns also, and a society was organized at Warehouse Point, in Connecticut, which became the next year a separate church. Mr. Fifield was followed in 1822 by Rev. Thomas C. Pierce, and in 1823 and 1824 by Rev. John W. Hardy.

In 1823, during the ministry of Mr. Hardy, a new church was erected on Union Street, and to this new house the old organization was transferred, although meetings were occasionally held at the "water-shops." In 1825, Rev. D. Dorchester was once more stationed over this society, which then numbered 131 members. He was followed in 1826 by Rev. Daniel Webb; in 1827 and 1828 by Rev. Timothy Merritt; and in 1829 by Rev. Orange Scott. Under the labors of Mr. Scott a great revival occurred, and about 75 persons were added to the church. In 1830, Rev. Thomas C. Pierce was reappointed to this charge, and was continued in the pastorate in 1831. In 1832 and 1833, Rev. Hiram H. White was the pastor.

Preaching was resumed at Asbury Chapel, and Mr. White was assisted in 1832 by Rev. Sanford Benton, and in 1833 by Rev. M. Dwight. In 1834, Rev. Bartholomew Otheman was the pastor, and Rev. George F. Poole was the assistant. During these years preaching was maintained in both houses, but there was only one church organization, and the ministers exchanged pulpits, preaching half of the day at each chapel. Another great revival occurred in 1834, and the membership was increased to 346. The following year the society was divided into two separate churches, and a pastor was appointed to each.

We have now traced the history of the society down to the time when a second separate church was organized. We find, by a reference to the old records, that the salaries paid to the ministers during this early period were very small. In 1826 the estimate for the preacher was $200, and the same estimate was made in 1828, and at no period down to 1834 was it probably more than $350 or $400.

This church became interested at an early date in the temperance movement. One of the first temperance societies in the United States was the American Temperance Union, organized in Boston in 1826. We find that the Quarterly Conference of the Methodist Church in Springfield in the same year voted to discountenance the use of intoxicating drinks, and appointed a committee to make arrangements for the formation of a temperance society. The early records of the church show also that provision was made for the formation of Sunday-schools connected with the congregation, and in the remote districts of the town; and that an interest was taken in the great benevolent enterprises of the church. At a very early date, Missionary, Tract, and Bible Societies were organized auxiliary to the parent societies of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Careful and systematic provision was also made for the relief of the poor connected with the congregation.

About the close of this period the anti-slavery discussion began to agitate the Northern churches. We find at a Quarterly Conference, in July, 1835, at Asbury Chapel, the following resolution was passed: "Voted, to close the house to all lectures on Colonization and Abolition, unless a majority of the society shall vote to have it opened to the same." As an indication of the rapid progress of anti-slavery sentiment, we find that before the year closed this action was rescinded. Henceforth the Springfield Methodist Church, in common with the Methodist Churches of New England generally, was in sympathy with the anti-slavery movement.

The presiding elders of the Springfield district of the New England Conference from 1815 to 1834 were Rev. Asa Kent, Rev. E. Otis, Rev. J. A. Merrill, Rev. John Lindsey, Rev. D. Kilbon, and Rev. O. Scott.

ASBURY CHAPEL (NOW FLORENCE STREET) METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The pastors at Asbury Chapel from 1835 to 1844 were the following: 1835, Rev. Ebenezer Blake; 1836 and 1837, Rev. Hiram H. White; 1838, Rev. Jonathan D. Bridge; 1839, Rev. W. H. Richards; 1840 and 1841, Rev. E. Potter; 1842, Rev. J. Fleming; 1843, Rev. Edward A. Manning.

In 1844 a new church was organized (now Trinity Church), and a new church edifice was erected on Pyncheon Street, and the membership of Asbury Chapel was transferred to the new organization. About the year 1856 preaching was resumed at Asbury Chapel, and the pulpit was supplied by Rev. Miner Raymond, D.D., principal of the Wesleyan Academy, at Wilbraham.

In 1860 the society was constituted once more a separate church, and Rev. Samuel Jackson became pastor. He was reappointed in 1861. Rev. John C. Smith was appointed to the church in 1862 and 1863, Rev. Pliny Wood in 1864 and 1865, and Rev. N. Fellows in 1866. In 1866 a new church edifice was erected on Florence Street, which was dedicated in November, Bishop Simpson preaching the dedication sermon. The name of the church was now changed from Asbury Chapel to Florence Street. The pastors from 1867 to the present time have been the following: 1867, Rev. N. Fellows; 1868-69, Rev. Samuel Roy; 1870-72, Rev. Charles D. Hills. In 1871 the church edifice was remodeled and beautified, and a new and convenient chapel was erected. In 1873-75, Rev. F. K. Stratton was the pastor; 1876-77, Rev. W. C. High. In 1878, Rev. Joseph Scott, the present pastor, was appointed to the charge. The present number of church members is 207. The Sabbath-school numbers 23 officers and teachers and 268 scholars, and has a library of about 500 volumes. The church edifice is valued at $25,000. The board of trustees are Horace Smith, Amos Crosby, C. V. R. Austin, A. J. White, J. M. Foster, George Nye, Marcus Mills, Marcellus Pinney, Samuel Chapin.

John Rice; 1840, Rev. Charles K. True, D.D.; 1841-42, Rev. Mark Staples; 1843, Rev. Daniel Wise, D.D.; 1844, Rev. R. S. Rust, D.D.; 1845, Rev. A. D. Merrill; 1846, Rev. W. R. Joseph H. Mansfield; 1872, Rev. John C. Smith; 1873-75, Rev. R. R. Meredith. In 1871 an effort was begun for the erection of a new church edifice on State Street. The building was completed in 1873, and was dedicated Nov. 25th of that year. The dedication sermon was preached by Bishop Wiley. The new church is a convenient and beautiful structure, especially in its interior arrangements, and was erected at a cost of $70,000. It seats about 1000 people. In 1876, Rev. M. Hulburt became the pastor, followed in 1877 by Rev. J. H. Twombly, D.D. In 1878 the present pastor, Rev. Daniel Dorchester, D.D., was appointed to the charge. The present number of church members is 320; probationers, 16. There are two Sabbath-schools connected with the church, with 42 officers and teachers and 362 scholars, and about 600 volumes in the library. The trustees are Willis Phelps, Henry W. Phelps, Amaziah Mayo, J. Q. A. Sexton, C. M. Mather, M. Houghton, J. S. Carr, A. G. Bennett, A. P. Leshure.

PYNCHON STREET (NOW TRINITY) METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The Pyncheon Street Church was organized in 1844, and numbered at its organization about forty members. Some of the first services of the society were held in the Worthington Street grove. The church on Pyncheon Street was completed and dedicated in March, 1845. The dedication sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. Olin, president of the Wesleyan University. Rev. Jefferson Haskell, D.D., was the first pastor. He was followed in 1845 by Rev. George Landon, who was reappointed in 1846. In 1847-48, Rev. Mark Trafton, D.D., was pastor. In 1849-50, Rev. Isaac A. Savage; in 1851-52, Rev. J. D. Bridge; 1853-54, Rev. Fales H. Newball, D.D.

During the pastorate of Mr. Newhall the church edifice was enlarged and improved. In 1855, Rev. J. Haskell, D.D., was appointed, and remained through 1856. In 1857 and 1858, Rev. Mark Trafton, D.D., was pastor. In 1859-60, Rev. N. Stutson; 1861, Rev. J. S. Barrows; 1862-63, Rev. A. McKeon, D.D.; 1864-66, Rev. W. R. Clarke, D.D.; 1867-69, Rev. Chas. D. Hills.

In 1869 the Pyncheon Street Church erected a new church edifice on Bridge Street. The new church is of the Romanesque style of architecture, 122 feet long and 74 feet wide, with a tower and spire 185 feet high. It is admirably lighted and ventilated, has a vestry-room 68 by 70, a juvenile Sunday-school room, and various other conveniences for social and business meetings. The new edifice cost, including the land, $73,000. The name of the church was changed, on its removal to the new building, from Pyncheon Street to Trinity Church. The pastors in the new church have been the following: 1869, Rev. C. D. Hills; 1870-75, Rev. J. O. Peck, D.D.; 1873-75, Rev. Merritt Hulburd; 1876-78, Rev. S. F. Upham, D.D.

The membership now numbers 481; probationers, 44. There are two Sunday-schools connected with the church, with 50 officers and teachers, 425 scholars, and 600 volumes in its library. The trustees are L. E. Ladd, Dr. Horace Jacobs, G. B. Treadwell, Wm. H. Smith, Milton Bradley, L. C. Smith, George L. Wright, and Warner F. Sturtevant. The society owns a parsonage on Elliot Street, valued at $12,000.

GRACE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The Grace Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in 1867, with 29 members, who had previously been connected with the Pyncheon Street (now Trinity) Church. The first services of the new organization were held in Union Hall, where the society worshiped for two years. They then removed to Institute Hall, where they remained for six months. They then removed to the old Universalist Church, on Main Street, where they remained until the completion of the vestry of the new and beautiful church edifice erected by the society at the corner of Main and Winthrop Streets. The new church is 68 by 110 feet, with a tower 182 feet high. It is of the Romanesque style of architecture, and was erected at an expense of about $70,000. The vestry was opened for public worship in October, 1874, and the church was completed the following winter, and was dedicated Jan. 19, 1875, Bishop Bowman preaching the dedication sermon.

Before the erection of the new building, the church was known as the Central Methodist Episcopal Church. The pastors have been as follows: 1867-68, Rev. Chas. A. Merrill; 1869, Rev. Miner Raymond, D.D.; 1870-71, Rev. Charles T. Johnson; 1872, J. R. Liddy; 1873-75, Rev. J. A. Cass; 1876-77, Rev. E. A. Smith; 1878, Rev. J. O. Knowles.

The present number of members is 219, and probationers 29. The Sabbath-school connected with the church has 28 officers and teachers, 302 scholars, and 500 volumes in the library. The trustees are A. J. Pease, Elijah Nichols, C. W. Horsington, W. B. Crook, O. K. Merrill, Alonzo Converse, Wm. H. Smith, G. P. Stebbins.

The presiding elders of the Springfield district of the New England Conference from 1834 to 1879 were Revs. J. A. Merritt, D. Dorchester, R. Ransom, A. D. Sargeant, Amos Binney, P. Crandall, Charles Baker, Thomas Marcy, William Gordon, R. W. Allen, David Sherman, D.D., L. R. Thayer, D.D., G. Whitaker, and D. H. Ela, D.D.

UNION AMERICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH (COLORED).

This church was organized in 1865, and during the same year the "Soldiers' Rest" building was purchased, and moved to Loring Street and fitted up for worship. The first pastor was Rev. George Bailey. Other pastors have been as follows: Wm. H. Thompson, Wm. Walker, and J. H. Cook, present pastor.

The present membership is about 24. The trustees for 1878 were as follows: I. J. Wilmore, Wm. H. Thompson, Chas. Rhodes, Chas. L. Lawson, Geo. Washington, Edward J. Williams, and Samuel Debtor.

ST. MICHAEL'S CATHEDRAL (CATHOLIC).

Mass was first said in this city in about the year 1856. Services were first held in Military Hall, and in 1847 the Baptist Church building, corner Maple and Mulberry Streets, was purchased, and moved to East Main, where it was refitted and dedicated in April of the same year.

The church was called St. Benedict's, and G. T. Riorden was first pastor. He was followed by J. J. Doherty, M. Blenkinsop, and M. P. Gallagher. The rapid increase of the society soon necessitated the erection of a much larger church edifice, and a lot was purchased on the corner of State and Elliott Streets, and a new building commenced, which was dedicated Sept. 29, 1866, as St. Michael's Cathedral. This church building is beautifully located on State Street, and is one of the finest and largest cathedrals of the Roman Catholic Church in New England. Father Gallagher died in 1869, and from this time until the arrival of the bishop, in 1870, the parish was under the charge of Very Rev. Patrick Healey, Vicar-General.

The cathedral is under charge of Right Rev. P. T. O'Reilly, D.D., bishop of Springfield, who, as mentioned above, assumed control in 1870. Bishop O'Reilly is assisted by Revs. C. E. Burke and J. McCarty. The congregation numbers nearly 6000.

THE CHAPEL OF THE SACRED HEART (CATHOLIC).

This church was founded in 1874, and is an offshoot from St. Michael's Cathedral. It is located on Everett Street, and is under the charge of Rev. J. J. McDermott, assisted by Rev. James F. Fitzgerald. It has a congregation of about 4500 and a Sunday-school of 700.

ST. JOSEPH'S CHURCH (FRENCH CATHOLIC) is located on Howard Street, near Water. There is a large French population in the city, of whom 700 are communicants here. The present pastor is Rev. L. G. Gagnier.

THE SECOND ADVENT SOCIETY

was organized in about the year 1860, and its first pastor was J. G. Adams. The society at present worships in Central Hall.

THE NEW JERUSALEM CHURCH, OR SWEDENBORGIAN, was founded in 1853. The pastor and the services of this church are supported by voluntary offerings. The present pastor is Rev. Stephen Jepson.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF SPIRITUALISTS holds meetings in Sovereigns' Hall. Membership, 100.

is located at the south end corner of Pleasant Avenue, and was formerly connected with the South Congregational Church, but for the past four years has been self-supporting. S. Warner, superintendent of Sabbath-school.

BURIAL-PLACES.

THE SPRINGFIELD CEMETERY.

Not only did the stout-hearted pioneers of 1636 early manifest an interest in educational and religious matters, but a desirable location for the burial of their dead was immediately sought, and what was known as the old burying-ground, on the river-bank, was doubtless opened in the first years of the settlement.

The first death recorded in the early records of Springfield is as follows: "John Noble [or Noble] dyed 2 mo. 24 day, and buried y^e 25th, 1641." This was five years after the settlement of the town; and it seems improbable that, in a colony at that time numbering 27 families, no death should have occurred during that period.

It is not a little singular that none of the twelve persons to whom allotments of land were made in 1636 died or were buried here, and none, it is believed, except Mr. Pyncheon, left descendants who died here.

The oldest monument found in the old grounds, and removed to the new cemetery, was to the memory of Mrs. Mary Holyoke, a daughter of William Pynchon, a fac-simile of which, with its inscription, may be found on page 32.

In 1834 the subject of providing a new cemetery was first presented to the people of the then thriving village of Springfield by Rev. William B. O. Peabody. It required no prophetic vision to see that the day was not far distant when the resting-places of the "forefathers of the hamlet" would be encroached upon by the march of progress, as the village at that time was extending its limits and rapidly increasing in population. The movement thus inaugurated by the venerable divine assumed no tangible form until Oct. 4, 1840, when an informal meeting of a few citizens was held to consider the feasibility of purchasing grounds and organizing a cemetery association. At this meeting committees were appointed to select and report a location, and to prepare articles of association.

At a meeting held March 28, 1841, it was voted to purchase of Alexander Bliss that portion of the present premises known as "Martha's Dingle," being about 20 acres in extent. Suitable access to the same was provided for, and measures taken to perfect a legal organization.

At a meeting, over which Hon. George Ashmun presided, a committee, consisting of John Howard, Justice Willard, Elijah Blake, Chester W. Chapin, and Asa Flagg, presented substantially the present system of organization, and it was adopted. A board of seven trustees was provided for and chosen, and the Rev. W. B. O. Peabody elected president,—an office which he continued to fill till his death, in 1847. Elijah Blake was elected treasurer, and the following gentlemen composed the first board of trustees, to wit: Chester Harding, Philip Wilcox, George Dwight, Joseph Weatherhead, George Eaton, Samuel Raynolds, and Walter H. Bowdoin. Subscriptions were opened for shares at $10 each, which, on the 1st day of June, 1841, amounted to $3070.

Sept. 5, 1841, the cemetery was appropriately consecrated, the dedicatory address being delivered by Rev. Mr. Peabody. The work of laying out, grading, planting, ornamenting, and fencing was commenced at once, and has been continued to the present time. The grounds have been enlarged by several subsequent purchases, and by the annexation of the old burying-ground belonging to the Union Street Methodist Episcopal Society, at a nominal price, in 1858, after negotiations extending through thirteen years, and they now contain about 39 acres of land, at a total original cost of about $10,300, and include the premises on Mulberry Street, occupied by the superintendent. The Methodist burying-ground, adjoining the cemetery, contained about three and one-fourth acres. It was dedicated and first used for burial purposes in 1825. The first person buried therein was an infant child of Samuel McNary, who died on the 12th of December, 1825.

A receiving vault was constructed in 1841, and was enlarged in 1856. In 1873 the present vault was built, at a cost, aside from the necessary grading, of $11,505.58. It was constructed in the best manner and upon the most approved model,—that of Forest Hills Cemetery, Boston.

In 1848 the title to the old burying-ground was conveyed to the proprietors of the new cemetery, and 2404 bodies were removed to the new grounds. Five hundred and seventeen old monuments and tablets were also removed. All remains having no monuments and not recognized were deposited together, and a common monument erected designating the fact. The whole inclosure was surrounded by a hedge, and a monument commemorative of these removals and reinterments was erected near the entrance on Pine Street.

The whole number of lots sold from 1841 to 1878 is 2037; to which adding the number of lots in the Methodist ground at the time of its annexation makes the total number, May 1, 1878, 2300. The total number of burials to Jan. 1, 1878, was 9902.

While, perhaps, it cannot be said that any of those buried in the Springfield Cemetery have "controlled the destinies of the nation," yet there are many who have exercised not a little influence, especially in this locality, in the various walks of life, and left the impress of their character upon the times in which they lived.

A beautiful and appropriate monument to the memory of the soldiers and sailors of the late Rebellion who were buried in the cemetery was completed and placed in a conspicuous position near the Maple Street entrance, and dedicated on "Decoration Day," 1877. The expense of it, $4200, was paid from the balance of what is known as the "Soldiers' Rest Fund," which had its origin in a fair held in this city in 1864, on December 19th to 24th inclusive, to establish a "soldiers' rest" near the railroad station, where soldiers going to or coming from "the front," and needing rest or medical assistance, could receive it. After the close of the war the income of the fund so far as needed was used in various ways in alleviating the wants of soldiers and their families, and finally the balance in the hands of the treasurer, Henry S. Lee, Esq., was expended as above. The four bronze cannon and the shot placed on the lot near the monument were presented by the United States government, at the solicitation of Hon. C. C. Chaffee and Hon. H. L. Dawes.

The history of the cemetery would be incomplete without mention of those who labored for its organization and development, and aided to make it an institution worthy of the support and an object of pride to the citizens of Springfield,—notably of Rev. Wm. B. O. Peabody, the founder and steadfast friend of the institution; Hon. George Bliss, to whom the association is indebted for much of the labor in perfecting and conducting the enterprise; and of George Eaton, who, in its early days, devoted himself with untiring assiduity to the laying out, planting, and ornamenting of the grounds; and of Apollos Marsh, who so faithfully discharged the difficult duties of superintendent for a period of more than 28 years, to the entire satisfaction of all who had to do with the affairs of the association.

The following is a list of the officers of the association from its organization to 1878: Presidents: William B. O. Peabody, 1841-47 (died in office); George Bliss, 1847-73 (died in office); Albert D. Briggs, 1873. Treasurers: Elijah Blake, 1841-42; Lewis Warriner, 1842-50; Lewis Gorham, 1850-68 (died in office); Frederick H. Harris, 1868. Clerks: Lewis Warriner, 1841-50; Lewis Gorham 1850-68 (died in office); Frederick H. Harris, 1868. Superintendents: Apollos Marsh, 1841-69 (died in office); Joseph Marsh, 1869-70 (died in office); James C. Shamp, 1870.

While the natural beauty of the cemetery is unsurpassed, it seems that Art has vied with Nature in rendering it one of the most enchanting burial-places in the States. What Mount Hope is to Rochester, Greenwood to New York, or Laurel Hill to Philadelphia is the Springfield Cemetery to this beautiful and famous city. (The above history was compiled from the excellent "Historical Memoirs of the Springfield Cemetery," written by the president of the Association, Mr. Albert D. Briggs.)

THE PRESS.

The first paper published in Western Massachusetts was the Massachusetts Gazette or The Springfield and Northampton General Advertiser, established in Springfield in May, 1782. It was issued by Babcock & Haswell, and had for its motto, "Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more,—deserve it." In August, 1782, the name of the paper was changed to Massachusetts Gazette and General Advertiser. In 1784, Mr. Haswell had retired, and some time during the same year Mr. Babcock disposed of the concern to Brooks & Russell, and on the 1st of January of the following year the name of the Massachusetts Gazette was changed to the Hampshire Herald and Weekly Advertiser. In June the paper appeared with the name of John Russell only, and in August, 1786, it bore the imprint of Stebbins & Russell. It was discontinued in 1787.

The Hampshire Chronicle was established in March, 1787, by John Russell, of the firm of Stebbins & Russell, the publishers of the Advertiser, mentioned above. It passed into the hands of Welds & Thomas in 1788, their printing-office occupying the present site of the Chicopee National Bank, corner of Main and Elm Streets. In 1790, Mr. Welds issued the sheet alone, and in 1792 it appeared as the Hampshire and Berkshire Chronicle. In 1793 it was issued by Edward Grey, and soon after discontinued.

The Federal Spy was established by J. R. Hutchins, in January, 1793, and, like its predecessors, its change of proprietorship was frequent. It was successively published by John Worthington Hooker & Francis Stebbins, Francis Stebbins alone, Timothy Ashley, Henry Brewer, and Thos. Dickman. Mr. Dickman changed its name to the Hampshire Federalist, and continued its publication until 1819, when he sold it to Frederick A. Packard. About this time A. G. Tannatt became a partner, and the paper was issued by A. G. Tannatt & Co., and changed to the Hampden Federalist. It was afterward published by Mr. Packard alone, then by Wood & Tyman, who changed its name to Hampden Journal. It was resold to Mr. Packard, and subsequently passed into the hands of Packard & Tannatt. In 1829, Mr. Tannatt became sole editor and proprietor, and remained as such until 1835, when it again came into the possession of Mr. Packard, and was, in the same year, sold to Samuel Bowles, and merged with the Republican.

The Hampden Patriot was started in 1818, by Ira Daniels. In about two years it passed into the hands of a company of gentlemen, with Justice Willard as editor. In 1822 it was issued by Mr. Tannatt, and about two years later was discontinued.

HISTORY OF THE SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN, AND SKETCH OF THE LIFE OF SAMUEL BOWLES.

Intimately associated with the history of the Connecticut Valley during the last half-century is the growth of The Springfield Republican. The rapidly-increasing population and great industrial development of this period have afforded in liberal measure that sustenance and life-blood without which no newspaper can flourish, and in return The Republican has mirrored with a completeness and faithfulness rarely equaled the richly-varied and busy life of all this region. Wrapped up in the paper is the story of two men's lives,—that of Samuel Bowles, its founder, but far more conspicuously still that of Samuel Bowles, his son, whose whole life-energy was lavishly given to the upbuilding of a character and reputation for The Republican. Briefly stated, the chronology of the paper is as follows: The Weekly Republican was established by Samuel Bowles, the second of that name, Sept. 8, 1824. He was born at Hartford, June 8, 1797, and died in Springfield, Sept. 8, 1851. The Daily Republican, substantially the creation of Samuel Bowles third, was started April 1, 1844, Mr. Bowles having been born Feb. 9, 1826, and dying Jan. 16, 1878. The publication of The Sunday Republican, the latest concession made by the paper to the growth of modern journalism, was begun Sept. 15, 1878, by Samuel Bowles, the fourth to perpetuate the name of Samuel in the family, and who is the present publisher and general manager of The Republican.

The Republican came into existence as the doubtful venture of a man who had hitherto met with discouragement and failure in other places. In 1824, at the age of twenty-seven, Samuel Bowles sailed up from Hartford, bringing with him the first lever-press ever set up in Springfield and a young family to support by his exertions. At sixteen he had apprenticed himself to a printer, after serving his father a year in the store kept by him at Hartford. Having acquired his trade, he had worked as a journeyman printer and foreman, at times achieving proprietorship in a small way, both in Hartford and New Haven. Business misfortunes, however, persistently pursued the young printer, largely owing, it is said, to the poor character of his associates. The Republican began life in the face of the discouraging circumstance that the Hampden Patriot, the only Whig paper of Springfield, had lately been discontinued for lack of patronage. The paper started out with a subscription-list of three hundred and fifty, and thenceforward it met with a steadily-increasing prosperity. In naming his journal The Republican the founder builded better than he knew; for in place of the ephemeral significance of the term at that early period, it eventually grew to be the distinctive title of the long-lived and dominating party with whose best aims the paper has for more than twenty years been in sympathetic accord. In its very germ may be discovered some of the chief characteristics which have won for The Republican its peculiar influence and reputation as one of the foremost journals of the country. A disposition toward fair play and toleration in all the questions of the day, for instance, is perceptible from the first. The young editor announces in one of the earliest numbers of his paper that his columns are open to both sides for temperate and dignified political discussion; while, turning from politics to religion, he assures the bitter controversialists of those days that The Republican will not be allowed to become the mouthpiece of any one sect for the attack of others. Mr. Bowles' antagonism to the waning Federalists was, however, of a pronounced character, and found a somewhat amusing expression in the publication for several successive years, upon its anniversary, of the names of the members of the famous Hartford Convention, holding them up as "a beacon to the present and future generations, to remind them that the people frowned indignantly on a combination against the government in time of national calamity." Dr. J. G. Holland, who became connected with The Republican a year or two before the death of Mr. Bowles, at the age of fifty-four, thus fittingly and briefly touches upon the personality of the founder of The Republican in his "History of Western Massachusetts."

"His parents were not rich in worldly goods, and in some memoranda of his early life he has chronicled the fact that all he received of any importance from his father's estate was his gold watch and the family Bible. In the obituary notice of him from the pen of Hon. Wm. B. Calhoun, this fact is shaped into a beautiful tribute in the words, 'Few have been the men who have fallen in our way who have kept truer time, and have been more loyal to the Bible than Samuel Bowles.' As one who knew him well, and who in a brief business connection had occasion to learn the principles which guided him, and the considerate kindness which actuated him, the writer would be ungrateful to refuse to record a tribute to the honor, candor, honesty, probity, and thorough Christian principle that characterized his daily walk. Of his ability let his success tell."

Meanwhile had been growing up the lad who was to give The Republican that impetus which acquired for it national fame. With no particular education save that afforded by "Master" Eaton's school, and that unconsciously imbibed in the atmosphere of his father's printing-office, the youth had already attracted attention while yet in his teens for the piquant quality of his occasional writing. On the 21st of March, 1844, the late Samuel Bowles, then arrived at the age of eighteen, persuaded his somewhat reluctant father, who felt strong doubts of the success of the enterprise, to start The Daily Republican.

The experiment of publishing a daily paper in Springfield thirty years ago was a hazardous one. No other town in Massachusetts outside of Boston had made the trial of a daily issue, and men of business who were consulted declared that the time had not arrived for such a paper in Springfield. But the sanguine younger Bowles was clear in the conviction that the time had already come, and the result justified his faith. "The first and second years of its existence," says Dr. Holland in his "History of Western Massachusetts," "the circulation was very small, but by economical management the publisher, Mr. Bowles, sustained for the first year a loss of only $150 or $200. The circulation, if it increased slowly, still increased steadily, until, at the end of the fourth year, its subscription list reached 800, with sufficient advertising patronage to insure its support and place it on a permanent footing. The Daily Republican was commenced as an evening paper, but it was changed to a morning paper on the 4th of December, 1845. In April, 1846, it was enlarged to a sheet 21 by 28 inches (its original dimensions having been 17½ inches by 24, with four columns to the page). Previous to that time its circulation had not exceeded 300. On the 1st of September, 1848 (the Springfield Evening Gazette having been merged with The Republican), the size of the paper was increased to 23 by 32½ inches. Its regular circulation was then full 1000. On the 1st of July, 1851, the paper was again enlarged."

In 1855, The Republican introduced the double sheet, printing its weekly and Saturday daily in this form, with single sheets on the other five days. Nine years later a second double sheet a week, on Wednesdays, was begun, though it did not become a permanency until 1865. During the following years one double sheet after another was added during the week, till on the 1st of April, 1871, it adopted that form as a permanency, fulfilling a prediction, which then seemed very wild, on the first appearance of the Saturday double sheet, that this would be the final regular form of the paper.

When The Daily Republican was started only the Western Railroad had reached Springfield, then a town of 11,000 inhabitants. A line of telegraph was opened about the same time, but its utility to the press was yet to be developed. It was all pioneer work. Says one whose memory goes back to the office routine of those times:

"Mr. Bowles slept on a sofa in the office, gathered and prepared the general and local news of the paper, marshaled the compositors at four o'clock every morning for the late copy, directed the make-up of the paper, took his turn at the wheel of the Adams press that worked it off, dispatched the town carriers and prepared the mail and railroad packages, and then went home to breakfast."

He plunged into the work with all the ardor of youth, the spur of natural talent, and the zeal of intense devotion to the new profession. This ceaseless, unsparing assiduity wrought its natural and customary effect. During his nineteenth year the over-worked, nervously-exhausted young man made a winter journey South for rest and recuperation, the first of a series of widely-extended travels which at subsequent intervals varied and eased the activities of his journalistic career. The letters written from Georgia and Louisiana in the course of this first vacation were of a quality to make more apparent than ever the young man's genius for his chosen profession. At twenty-two years of age Mr. Bowles was married to Mary S. D. Schermerhorn, of Geneva, N. Y., a granddaughter of James S. Dwight, in former years a leading Springfield merchant.

In 1849, a year later, Mr. Bowles' first editorial assistant, Samuel Davis, having died, Dr. J. G. Holland bought a share in the paper, and became associate editor. The young doctor, growing impatient of the medical profession, started a literary paper of his own in 1847, called the Bay State Weekly Courier, which he gave up, however, at the end of three months as altogether unprofitable. Afterward drifting South, he became superintendent of schools at Vicksburg, Miss. Opportunely returning to Springfield on the very day of Mr. Davis' funeral, he immediately attracted the notice of Mr. Bowles, who shortly secured him as his assistant. Upon the death of his father, in 1851, the management of the paper came entirely into Mr. Bowles' hands. In 1853, Mr. Clark W. Bryan, a practical Berkshire printer, bought an interest in the establishment, and the business was thenceforth conducted under the firm-name of Samuel Bowles & Co. Mr. Bryan's attention shortly became entirely absorbed by the rapidly-increasing growth of the printing and publishing department connected with the paper, of which he retained charge until the division of the firm's business in 1872, when Mr. Bowles, retaining The Republican itself, sold out his other interests in the concern to Messrs. Bryan and Tapley, a later partner, who purchased the Evening Union, and set up separately for themselves. Benjamin F. Bowles, who died in Paris, while on a pleasure tour, in 1876, was also for a number of years associated with The Republican, relieving his older brother to a great extent of the details of the financial and business management.

In the matter of politics, by which every newspaper so largely lives and has its being, The Daily Republican presents a record embodying, perhaps, fewer mistakes and loftier purposes than most journals. It has from the start been in warm sympathy with the principles of the truest democracy, ever championing what it conceived to be for the best interests of the many; often, especially in later years, ahead of public opinion, which it sought to lead to higher standards, and the first to break away from the trammels of mere partisanship and inaugurate a new era in progressive journalism.

Of strong Whig proclivities in its earlier career, its young editor's receptive mind was readily open to the inspiration which created the Republican party. Indeed, he may be said to have presided at the great party's earliest cradling. This was in 1855, when Mr. Bowles, by virtue of his name heading the list calling a conference at Boston to break down Know-Nothing supremacy in Massachusetts, became the presiding officer of the convention which inaugurated the Republican party in this State. It was about the only time in his life that Mr. Bowles ever personally entered politics outside of his paper.

Down through the progress and triumph of the party, at the making of which its editor so conspicuously assisted, until the close of the war, The Republican was consistently partisan. There was little occasion for variance. With the era of Southern reconstruction began its first marked divergence from the bitter narrowness of sentiment which characterized the dominant class of Republican politicians in their treatment of the South. The Republican was the first paper in the country to advocate universal suffrage, irrespective of race and color, while the breadth of its insight and magnanimity in treating the Southern question from the very first is displayed in this extract from a prospectus of the paper, written more than ten years ago, during the perturbed administration of President Johnson:

"And now we want that our representatives should be calm and generous in spirit, though firm and true in principle and purpose, in dealing alike with the President and the South, patient and indulgent in non-essentials, and exacting only for that which is necessary to insure a lasting peace to the nation and a true prosperity to the South. Thus only can the ascendancy of the Republican party be maintained, the perils of practical disunion, not yet over, be escaped, and the great principle of equal rights and fair play for all men secured. For this we are willing to labor and to wait, to yield prejudices and to bear with infirmities, to forgive enemies and to be misunderstood and misrepresented by friends."

The occasion for independence of party dictation grew steadily from this period on, till, in the Presidential contest of 1872, the paper severed all mere party connection and pronounced for Mr. Greeley as more nearly representing the reform movements and principles of government which Mr. Bowles believed ought to prevail. By this divorce from the traditions of all previous journalism, The Republican pioneered the way to that rarer independence which, still more in the future than now, it may be conjectured, will lend to the press of the country its truest and greatest power. In 1876, recognizing in President Hayes' fair professions of a liberal policy toward the South and of a reformed civil service the very things for which it had so long and earnestly striven, the paper again became a hearty supporter of the Republican nominee. The Republican was among the first advocates of woman suffrage, subscribed to the doctrine of a gradual and judicious introduction of free trade as early as the development of the country seemed to warrant such a policy, and has generally been characterized by broad and ripe views on questions of finance and political economy.

Mr. Bowles was par excellence the journalist. He possessed the news instinct in the highest degree, and the ability of newspaper organization. He also had the special knack and inspiration of the educator, which found ample opportunity for exercise upon the scores of young men who within the past generation have begun their careers as journalists under his training. The office, indeed, acquired the reputation of being a practical college of journalism, and nowhere else could the would-be editor so quickly and thoroughly acquire a varied knowledge of the profession. The paper has ever been fortunate, too, in attracting to its columns the budding efforts of literary talent. It has introduced to the world not a few writers who have become widely famed. The most conspicuous of its literary protégés is Dr. Holland, who for sixteen years was associated with Mr. Bowles in the editing of the paper. With his connection began that marked literary career which has ever since been ably maintained, and has lent to The Republican one of its most attractive charms. Mary Clemmer wrote poetry and bright letters from New York for the paper while still a girl in her teens; Alice Cary contributed a novel; energetic, piquant Kate Field wrote under the nom de plume of "Straws, Jr.;" Miss Trafton, who has lately developed into one of the most brilliant story-writers of the country, made up her first book, "The American Girl Abroad," from her foreign letters to The Republican. Bret Harte appeared in its columns and received hearty appreciation long before he escaped his California environment and became known in the East; Rose Terry, Norah Perry, and a host of minor magazinists and writers have at one time or another found in The Republican that recognition and encouragement so sweet to the beginner in literary composition. A few among the many editorial writers and outside contributors who have served to add character to the paper are Joseph E. Hood, who lent it for many years the grace of his wide and varied culture; Gen. Francis A. Walker, who left a tutorship at Easthampton to become an office editor; Edward King, the versatile magazinist and correspondent, whose pen acquired its nimble grace in The Republican's service in Springfield and abroad while he was yet hardly more than a boy; Charles H. Sweetzer, the founder of the New York Evening Mail; W. S. Robinson, who, above the signature of "Warrington," for many years wrote so trenchantly of men and things from Boston; Frank B. Sanborn, who has lavished upon its pages, and still continues to, a wealth of the best literary criticism and the most accurate and interesting information upon the topics embraced under the comprehensive term of "social science;" George Walker, Prof. Perry, and David A. Wells.

Aside from the persistent, exhaustive toils incident to the prosperous establishment and upbuilding of The Republican, the life of Samuel Bowles was comparatively little varied by notable events. The first and only diversion of his energies from The Republican itself was when, in 1857, Mr. Bowles, in connection with others, attempted to give Boston a live newspaper through The Traveller. After several months of adverse battling with associates who were either incapable or unwilling to help forward his ideals, he abandoned the experiment in disgust and returned to Springfield, to throw himself with renewed devotion into the accomplishment of his ambition of earning for The Republican recognition as the representative newspaper of New England. An episode which did much to bring the paper into national prominence was the unwarranted and vindictive arrest of Mr. Bowles at New York, in 1868, and his confinement in Ludlow Street jail, at the instigation of Jim Fisk, who was then roughly flourishing amidst his corruptions. This was in consequence of the aggravating truthfulness of a sketch of Fisk's early career appearing in The Republican; but "Prince Erie's" revenge served only to more quickly awaken the moral sense of the community to the utter reprehensibility of his character and deeds. Some time after, and somewhat in the same connection, was the notable and rather acrid controversy between Mr. Bowles and David Dudley Field, whose most profitable client Fisk was, concerning the responsibility of lawyers for the character of their clients or their causes, and in which Mr. Bowles urged a stricter accountability than Mr. Field was willing to concede. Three times since the Fisk affair The Republican has stood trial for libel, and in every case the moral vindication has been complete, and the right of newspapers to fulfill their high office as protectors of the welfare of the public made apparent.

Although Mr. Bowles never had the opportunity or inclination to write books, three or four exceedingly interesting and salable ones were made up at intervals, mainly from his letters of American travel to The Republican. The first of these, "Across the Continent," was the fruit of a journey to California overland by stage in 1865, before the days of the Pacific Railroad, in company with Hon. Schuyler Colfax, Lieut.-Gov. Bross, and others. Another book, entitled "The Switzerland of America," vividly and picturesquely described a vacation tour among the mountains and peaks of Colorado during the summer of 1868. Still another book, "Our New West," was brought out under the auspices of a Hartford subscription publishing house in 1869, and latest of all was the little brochure entitled "The Pacific Railroad—Open," composed of a series of articles contributed to The Atlantic Monthly, celebrating the completion of the great trans-continental railway. "Across the Continent" had a sale of 15,000 copies, "The Switzerland of America" 8000, and "Our New West" 28,000.

The remote portions of our national domains, so faithfully portrayed in these books, were then little written of or known in the East, and Mr. Bowles' efforts to enlighten the public concerning them proved valuable pioneer work. He visited both California and Colorado several times, and once penetrated into Oregon and Washington Territory. Four times in his life Mr. Bowles went abroad, first in 1862, in company with his brother, Benjamin, spending several months upon the Continent; while other and briefer trips were made in 1870, 1871, and 1874. All these travels were pursued with the keenest relish, and made largely to subserve an educational purpose. They led, besides, to acquaintance and friendship with many of the most distinguished men of all pursuits in this country, and with not a few in England. These associations kept him abreast of the highest and best thought of the time and inspired him to its worthiest expression.

The last of these many journeys for mingled recuperation and observation was made in the spring and early summer of 1877, and included a brief stay at Washington, during which Mr. Bowles made the acquaintance of President Hayes; and afterward a run into the blue-grass region of Kentucky as the guest of Mr. Henry Watterson, editor of the Louisville Courier-Journal. But the trip had not that beneficial effect upon Mr. Bowles which had attended previous excursions of the kind. His nervous energies had become so prostrated by the over-arduous toils of thirty years and more that the capacity for elasticity had departed even when the grind of work was omitted. Thenceforward, through the summer and fall, the waning of the vital forces was slow, but marked and inexorable. Apparently loath to recognize the fact, Mr. Bowles continued as intent upon his labors for The Republican as ever. In addition to his journalistic burdens, he also devoted, during the last year of his life, no inconsiderable time and thought to aiding in the elaboration of the proposed new charter for the city of Springfield, and to promoting the success of the Union Relief Association,—a valuable local charity which he was largely interested in establishing. Even during the prolonged illness which led to his death Mr. Bowles was keenly alert to the varying phases of State and national politics, and dictated articles from his sick-bed, as well as scores of letters to his many friends. The immediate cause of his death—occurring Jan. 16, 1878—was several recurring strokes of paralysis. The remoter cause was the mental wear and nervous exhaustion proceeding from more than thirty years of an over-eager, over-intense, over-worked life.

The informal memorial services in the Church of the Unity, several days after the funeral, were remarkable for the wealth of appreciative tribute spontaneously offered by many notable men with whom Mr. Bowles had been on terms of friendly intimacy during his life. Gen. Hawley, Dr. J. G. Holland, Francis Tiffauy, Frank W. Bird, Charles Francis Adams, Jr., Murat Halstead, Francis Wayland, Charles Dudley Warner, and George M. Stearns gave addresses; and letters were read from Secretary Schurz, Senator Dawes, Charles Francis Adams, Horace White, Gov. Hubbard, of Connecticut, and others; while among those present were Gov. Talbot, Gov. Rice, Gov. Jewell, Gen. F. A. Walker, Lieut.-Gov. Knight, President J. M. Seelye, David A. Wells, Clarence A. Seward, and Postmaster James, of New York. The press of the country also gave generous recognition of Mr. Bowles, lamenting in his death the loss of the last great personal force in American journalism,—a man worthy to rank with Greeley of the Tribune, Raymond of the Times, and Bennett of the Herald.

The Republican has the reputation of being at the head of provincial journalism in the United States. Its achievement is unique in that, notwithstanding its publication in a small inland city, it has attained a circulation unequalled save in the largest cities, and there by comparatively few papers; while the frequency and wideness with which its opinions are quoted in other journals are hardly matched by any other newspaper. In merely technical journalistic science, also, The Republican has long been a model which other newspapers have studied and followed. For systematic condensation of news and its best classification, for preserving the proportions of things,—journalistic-perspective, so to speak,—and for typographical taste, it is unexcelled by any other daily newspaper. These qualities bid fair to be perpetuated in the future in undiminished degree by the men bred up through long and careful apprenticeship under Mr. Bowles' training. Indeed, saving the master-hand, The Republican was never more ably and thoroughly edited than at the present time.

was born in Belchertown, July 24, 1819. His father, Harrison Holland, came from Petersham. His mother, Anna Gilbert Holland, was born in Belchertown. Dr. Holland's grandfather, Luther Holland, of Petersham, was a soldier of the Revolution, and was present at the surrender of Burgoyne. He had three brothers,—Jonas, Park, and Ivory. His sons were Luther, Park, Harrison, and Sidney. The first three of these, with their uncle, Jonas, settled in Belchertown, and Sidney at North Adams. Luther Holland manufactured fire-engines. His son, Ashley Holland, resides at Greenfield. W. J. Holland, of Springfield, is a grandson of Jonas. Park Holland, brother of Jonas, settled in Maine, and was a prominent land surveyor in the employ of the State. One member of the Holland family was for many years the treasurer of Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., and another was an officer in the war of 1812, and fought at Lundy's Lane. Harrison Holland had seven children, of whom Dr. Holland alone survives. One died in childhood, and is supposed to be the "Little Charlie" of Dr. Holland's poem, "Daniel Grey." Three daughters in the family died young. Two sons, Goodrich and James H., were, for many years before their death, well-known manufacturers of silk at Willimantic, Conn. Harrison Holland owned a carding-machine in the west part of Belchertown, and his dwelling was a small wood-colored house near the present station,—"Dwight," on the New London Northern Railroad. This was the birthplace of Dr. Holland. In 1822 his father removed to Heath, and settled in what is now known as "Holland Dell." Here, on a small farm and in a shop for making "spokes" and "felloes," he supported his family, training his children in the virtues and the industries of a New England home. In this romantic place, with the grandeur of mountain scenery around him, the future editor and poet passed his boyhood. The sweet memories of this secluded dell inspired the following passage in one of his works:

"I recall a home like this long since left behind in the journey of life. It was a humble home among the mountains, but priceless in its wealth of associations."

In 1834 the family returned to Belchertown, removed in a short time to South Hadley, then to Granby, and finally to Northampton. During these years Dr. Holland's father was interested in various inventions, one or more of which proved successful. Besides the advantages of the district schools in Heath and elsewhere, the son now had the benefit of the excellent schools of Northampton, and made rapid progress. From these schools he was graduated at the age of nineteen, and began to teach penmanship. He had large classes in Chesterfield and Hinsdale, N. H., and in a score of other New England towns. Some of his pupils still preserve with care their old "copies" "set" by Dr. Holland. After this he studied medicine, and received the diploma of the Berkshire Medical School in 1844.

The same year he commenced practice in Springfield. His attention was, however, soon attracted to journalism, and his professional work was continued for only a short time. In 1847 he established The Bay State Weekly Courier, but sold out his subscription-list to the Gazette at the end of six months. He went South, taught in Richmond, Va., and was superintendent of schools in Vicksburg, Miss. Sickness in his family obliged a return North, and he came again to Springfield somewhat discouraged, and his future way uncertain. Passing the office of the Republican, on his way from the depot, he met Mr. Samuel Bowles. It is said to have been a mutual idea that arose in the mind of each at the same time. Mr. Bowles thought, "I would like to have Holland on my editorial staff." Holland thought, "I would very much like a place on the Republican." These thoughts found their expression in words, either then or later, and in May, 1849, Dr. Holland became an associate editor of the paper. This was the real beginning of his public career,—a career that has made his name a household word throughout the Union. He remained as one of the editors of that journal for seventeen years, doing steady work and writing voluminously. His name and style and influence, joined to the untiring energy of Samuel Bowles, gave to the Springfield Republican the broad national reputation which it still vigorously maintains. Meanwhile, Dr. Holland extended his labors in authorship, and brought out many volumes. These are so well known that a brief mention will suffice for the purposes of this sketch.

In 1858 he published the "History of Western Massachusetts." The work was a great success, and was about the first of those pioneer town and county histories for which there is now so strong a public demand. A series of letters from "Max Mannering to his Dear Sister Jane" in the country proved the power of Dr. Holland's satiric blade. "Letters to Young People, Single and Married," by Timothy Titcomb, first appeared in the Republican. Though they were received with great favor, and Dr. Holland's talents were highly appreciated in Springfield, yet he met with several distinct refusals in the cities when he proposed to put the "Letters" in book form. Finally, provided with a letter of introduction, he called upon Mr. Charles Scribner, who appreciated the work at once, received the author kindly, accepted the book, and a life-long friendship was formed at that time. The success of the volume surprised both author and publishers; thirty thousand copies were sold in a short time. "Gold Foil" soon followed, also "Letters to the Joneses" and "Lessons in Life." In the midst of all these labors Dr. Holland, under repeated solicitation, filled a large number of appointments upon the lecture-platform. During the same year with the "Titeomb Letters" he gave to the world the poem "Bitter-Sweet," proving that to his titles of editor and author the people might justly add that of poet.

When the war of the Rebellion had closed and the tragedy of Abraham Lincoln's death was thrilling the nation, Dr. Holland was selected to deliver a commemorative address. His words, inspired with grief and patriotic love, rose to the full sublimity of the subject, and his eloquent discourse is recalled as the best funeral oration ever pronounced in Springfield. This led to his next book, "The Life of Abraham Lincoln," which had an immense sale. Then he entered once more the field of poetry and published "Kathrina." This poem was subjected to severe criticism, but the sale of the work was largely increased thereby.

Dr. Holland's earlier literary labor was done in his old home on High Street, Springfield. "Kathrina" was written at his new and elegant residence, Brightwood, one mile north of Springfield. Here, too, about this time, his mother died at the age of seventy-six, and was buried beside her husband at Northampton, who died in 1848, aged sixty-four. Dr. Holland then went to Europe for two years, returning in May, 1870. In the autumn of that year Scribner's Monthly Magazine was commenced, the owners being the Scribners, Roswell Smith, and Dr. Holland. The latter became the editor, and brought to this new enterprise the advantage of his already acquired fame, his matured ability, and active energy. In this position he remains at the present time. Besides his magazine work he has published in book form, since 1870, "Sevenoaks," "Arthur Bonnicastle," "Nicholas Minturn," and others. His entire works comprise eighteen volumes. It is a pleasure to know that with him authorship has not only produced meritorious works, but has resulted in substantial financial success.

Dr. Holland is now in the maturity of his powers at the ripe age of sixty, and full of vigor. His magazine work has taken him from the people of Springfield, who esteemed him highly as a neighbor and townsman. He resides in New York City, but has a delightful summer home among the "Thousand Islands" of the St. Lawrence.

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION, and the Printing and Binding Establishment of the Clark W. Bryan Company.

The Springfield Daily Union was started by the late Edmund Anthony, of New Bedford, who came to Springfield for that purpose, and the first number was issued Jan. 4, 1864. In the autumn of the same year Mr. Anthony admitted as partners in his enterprise A. D. Bullock, who had been connected with the Full River News, and Benjamin Weaver, of New Bedford, his son-in-law. In December, 1865, Mr. Anthony retired from the Springfield newspaper field entirely, and the paper was handed over to the Union Printing Company, the principal stockholders, besides Messrs. Bullock & Weaver, being the late Rev. E. G. Sears, J. D. Bowley, and E. S. Sears. This company running behindhand financially, the firm of Taylor & Olmsted bought the paper, and, after conducting it a few months, on the dissolution of that firm, the Union was taken by L. H. Taylor in the division of the assets, John Olmsted taking another branch of the firm's business. Previously, the Weekly Union had been started, and there was also by this time a considerable job-printing office conducted in connection with the newspaper. Mr. Taylor soon vested the proprietorship in another company, in which the partners, besides himself, were J. D. Bowley, Rev. E. G. Sears, Benjamin Weaver, and Myron D. Allen. Other changes speedily followed,

E. D. Richardson and A. D. Dyer at one time having some interest in the concern, till, Jan. 1, 1872, L. H. Taylor and his brother, C. C. Taylor, became the sole proprietors, and conducted the newspaper and the printing business connected therewith till May 1, 1872.

SPRINGFIELD UNION BUILDING, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

As may be conjectured from this brief record of the numerous changes of proprietorship in less than ten years, the Union, like most other journalistic ventures, was not at first a financial success. The original proprietor, Mr. Anthony, though an experienced and capable newspaper man, was new to this particular field, and not well acquainted with its special needs. Some of those who succeeded him were also comparatively strangers and inexperienced in the business as well, and the paper had to struggle against a good many adverse influences without the office as well as within. But it met a real want in the community. The only daily paper then published in the city was the Springfield Republican. The Union, young and small as it was, boldly entered the field in competition. In spite of all discouragements there were several persons of ample means in Springfield who were determined it should live, and who were always ready to lend it a helping hand when in financial straits. Prominent among these was John Olmsted, who, though an actual owner only a short time previous to 1872 (when he again assumed an interest as a stockholder in the Clark W. Bryan Company), helped the paper over a good many rough places and through numberless dark days. Under the management of Taylor & Olmsted the Union first began to pay its way, and finally, in 1872, was a good property. In this year occurred the most important event in the career of the paper up to that time,—its sale, with all its appurtenances, to the Clark W. Bryan Company for $50,000.

The Clark W. Bryan Company was a newly-formed corporation, its three principal stockholders being retiring partners of the firm of Samuel Bowles & Co., publishers of the Springfield Republican, with which all of them had been connected for many years. Two of these partners—Clark W. Bryan, long the business manager of the firm, and J. F. Tapley, the head of the bindery—took with them, in the division of assets, the extensive book- and job-printing office and bindery of the old firm of Samuel Bowles & Co.; and to conduct this business the Clark W. Bryan Company was formed, with $200,000 capital, ten or twelve of the most enterprising business-men of Springfield and vicinity taking from $5000 to $10,000 of stock each. The capital was purposely made large enough to permit the purchase of The Union; and the contract was made and the new proprietors took possession May 1, 1872. W. M. Pomeroy, the third largest stockholder in the company, who was formerly a partner in the firm of Samuel Bowles & Co., had been for several years the managing editor of the Republican, “having risen,” as that paper said at his departure, “from the lowest place in its editorial-room to the highest.” He left the Republican subsequent to the change, disposing of his share by sale, and, with the transfer of his interest, became editor of The Union, which position he has since held without interruption.

Fresh life and vigor, as well as new capital, were infused into the paper under its new management, and for the first time it took its proper and natural place in the estimation of the public. It was speedily enlarged, dressed in new type, and the circulation of the daily—less than 3000—was more than doubled in a few months, while the increase of the circulation of the weekly was still more marked and rapid. Special attention was paid to that most important function of a daily newspaper,—the gathering of news. The town has not yet forgotten nor ceased to admire the enterprise of The Union, which, on that memorable Sunday morning, in November, 1872, when a brief dispatch announced that Boston was burning up, and everybody was crazy for details, chartered a special train, sent its reporters to the burning city, and published their special reports in an extra the same afternoon, which were read even more eagerly than the extras during the war containing the news of a great battle. The next day the special reports were continued, supplemented by those of the Associated Press, and more than 15,000 copies of the paper were sold,—a number small in comparison with the editions of a few papers in the larger cities, but much greater than had ever been printed and sold of any newspaper in Springfield up to that time. The special promptness and enterprise of the paper were again displayed by the issue of Sunday extras in addition to its regular issues at the time of the Mill River disaster, in May, 1874, and on many other occasions of lesser moment, which it is impossible to specify. The character of a prompt and reliable newspaper, which The Union at once began to deserve under its new management, is still maintained; indeed, it has forced so great an advance as to be almost a revolution in the whole business of news-gathering, especially in its local field.

Politically, the Union has always been strongly and consistently Republican. But while holding firmly the principles of the Republican party, it has ever claimed and exercised the right to criticise the men and measures of this party, when, in its view, they were wrong or headed in the wrong direction. As an instance of the political sagacity of the Union, it may be mentioned that it is one of the two or three political papers of the country that did not lose its head at the time of the Presidential election of 1876, and claimed from the very first that Mr. Hayes was rightfully elected President, and would have the office if the will of the Southern States could be correctly voiced, and its confidence in this position was abundantly justified by the action of the Electoral Commission.

In the furtherance of its purpose to make a journal that shall be a favorite in the family, the Union has always devoted great attention and as much space as possible to general literature, agriculture, science, and the arts. Among those who have graduated from its editorial-rooms in the last few years are Edward Bellamy, whose short stories are eagerly sought for by all the magazines, and whose first book has been warmly praised by the critics not only of the United States, but of England; and Edward H. Phelps, one of the most capable men in the country in all departments of newspaper work, and now editor and chief proprietor of the New England Homestead. Among the present editors are Joseph L. Shipley, who has been Mr. Pomeroy's principal assistant since the fall of 1872; Elijah A. Newell, who has had a prominent place on the local department since 1867; Ed. Warren and E. Porter Dyer, Jr., whose connection with the paper is more recent, but who have been with the paper long enough to make their value appreciated. Clark W. Bryan, the business manager from 1872 to 1878, is now editor and publisher of the Great Barrington Courier, one of the most flourishing papers in Berkshire County. Andrew J. Jones, who now has charge of the newspaper business in the counting-room, has been with the paper since 1867. George V. N. Russell has been foreman of the newspaper-room since 1867, and Charles A. Martin has been pressman of the paper almost from the start.

The large printing and binding business of the Clark W. Bryan Company, carried on in connection with the publication of the Union, had a small beginning, as do most great enterprises. It was founded in 1853, by the purchase, by the firm of Samuel Bowles & Co., of which Clark W. Bryan had just been admitted partner, of the job-printing office of Geo. W. Wilson, then located in the third story of the building corner of Main and State Streets, over the “old corner bookstore,” and the absorption of the bindery of J. F. Tapley, started some time previous as a separate concern, though for a while the bindery was conducted under the firm-name of Tapley, Bowles & Co. The printing-office was soon removed to larger quarters on Market Street, in the rear of the Republican office, and the bindery occupied the room vacated by the printing-office. The business of both bindery and printing-office grew so rapidly that new presses and machinery had to be continually added, and soon both were cramped for room again. In 1858 a new building was erected on Main Street expressly for the concern, and for the first time the three departments—the newspaper, the printing-office, and the bindery—were brought under one roof. This was the building now occupied by D. H. Brigham & Co., the clothiers. For some time previous the whole business had been done under the simple firm-name of Samuel Bowles & Co. Ten years later the new quarters were found too strait for the enormously-increased business, and the Second National Bank erected, on the opposite corner of Townsley Avenue, still another new building for the concern. This building had a front of 50 feet on Main Street, was 120 feet deep, and four stories high, and the whole building was occupied by the firm, with the exception of one corner, where rooms were reserved by the bank for its own use. In 1872 the firm of Samuel Bowles & Co. was dissolved, Messrs. Bryan & Tapley taking the printing-offices and bindery as their share of the assets, and the Clark W. Bryan Company was organized, as stated above. In June, 1873, the whole business of the company was moved into the spacious building on the corner of Main and Worthington Streets, which it still (1879) occupies. This is one of the most prominent business blocks in the city, being 50 feet front, 130 feet deep, and five stories high. The whole of it, with the exception of one small store on the first floor, is occupied by the company for their business office and for their publishing, printing, electrotyping, and book-binding rooms.

During the whole twenty-six years of its history the business of this concern has increased steadily, and the establishment is now second to none of its kind in New England. It does a very large amount of general job-printing and custom-binding every year; turns out large editions of books for publishers monthly; makes and sells thousands of dollars' worth of blank books annually; manufactures patent calendars by the million every autumn, and hundreds of Tapley's patent letter-file—very popular with business-men—every week. For ten years succeeding 1861, an important part of the business was the manufacture of photograph albums, this concern being the largest producers of that once popular article in the country. The company now makes a specialty of printing and binding fine illustrated catalogues for manufacturers, florists, etc., and so high is its reputation for this class of work that it has orders from far and near. Indeed, Springfield and the near vicinity could not begin to support so large and complete an establishment. The business relations of the house extend over the country and to the British provinces, from Halifax and St. John at the northeast to New Orleans at the southwest, from Portland and Boston on the Atlantic Ocean to San Francisco on the Pacific. A few of the larger cities in the country may have equally extensive establishments, but no other city of the size of Springfield can boast of one which is its equal in the variety and completeness of its resources, all concentrated under one roof.

The present officers (1879) of the company are as follows: Directors, John Olmstead (president), George W. Tapley, W. M. Pomeroy, Charles A. Nichols, Lewis J. Powers; Clerk, Henry S. Hyde; Treasurer, J. F. Tapley. The superintendent of the printing-office is Nelson F. Twing; of the bindery, Henry E. Ducker.

THE NEW ENGLAND HOMESTEAD

was founded in 1867, by Henry M. Burt, who commenced its publication in Northampton. For the first year it was published monthly, but in 1868 the office was moved to Springfield, and May 16th of that year appeared the first number of its issue as a weekly. Mr. Burt continued as editor and publisher until Oct. 18, 1878, when it was purchased by Messrs. Edward H. Phelps and Herbert H. Sanderson, who had previously been connected with the daily press of Springfield, Mr. Phelps having been, since 1872, local editor of the Union, after filling the same office for several years on the Republican. They introduced new features into the paper, and two months after making their purchase began the issue of a city edition, which they made the medium of musical and dramatic criticism, personal and society gossip, and local intelligence generally. This edition is mostly circulated in Springfield, Holyoke, and Chicopee, while the regular edition finds its readers among the farmers throughout New England, and especially in the Connecticut Valley and west of it.

THE EVENING TELEGRAM,

issued in November, 1878, by Henry M. Burt, as editor and proprietor, is an outgrowth of the Saturday Evening Telegram, established by Mr. Burt in March, 1871, and the Sunday Telegram, in May, 1873. The Evening Telegram is a penny Saturday-afternoon paper, devoted mainly to the discussion of local events. Mr. Burt publishes, during the summer months, Among the Clouds, a daily newspaper, on the summit of Mount Washington, in New Hampshire, at an elevation of 6283 feet above the sea level, which he established in 1877, and it is the only paper ever published on the summit of any mountain in the world. Mr. Burt is a practical printer, having served his apprenticeship with the late William A.

Hawley, in the office of the Hampshire Gazette, in Northampton, in the years 1847-51, inclusive, and subsequently to 1856 was employed in the job-printing office of J. & L. Metcalf, in the same town. His first editorial experience was in Nebraska, in connection with the Bellevue Gazette, a weekly paper, of which he was joint publisher and editor with the late Gen. Silas A. Strickland, in the years 1857-58. Mr. Burt returned to New England in the autumn of 1858, and in the following year the press and printing material with which Mr. Burt issued the Bellevue Gazette were sold to Byres & Daily, who took them to Denver, Col., and upon them printed the Rocky Mountain News, the first paper ever printed in Colorado.

After returning to Massachusetts, Mr. Burt was assistant editor of the Springfield Republican for nearly a year, commencing with April, 1859, having charge of the telegraphic, New England, and city news, which position he relinquished in 1860 to establish the Northampton Free Press, a semi-weekly newspaper. He is the oldest founder of a newspaper now residing in Springfield, and has established more papers than any one else in the Connecticut Valley, as will be seen by the following list, with the dates of his connection with them appended: Northampton Free Press, semi-weekly, 1860-64; Holyoke Transcript, 1863; Brattleboro' (Vt.) Record, semi-weekly (in connection with D. L. Milliken), 1866; New England Homestead Monthly (at Northampton), 1867; New England Homestead, weekly (in Springfield), 1868-78; Saturday Evening Telegram, 1871-73; Sunday Telegram, 1873-76; Among the Clouds, daily during the season, 1877; and The Evening Telegram, 1878. The two latter Mr. Burt still continues to publish.

THE HERALD OF LIFE,

The publication of the Herald of Life was begun Oct. 21, 1863, in New York City, by the Life and Advent Union, which was organized the preceding August for the purpose of promulgating the doctrines of the speedy personal coming of Christ, the unconsciousness of the dead, and a future life by a bodily resurrection for the righteous only. George Storrs was elected its first editor, and continued in that office until Aug. 17, 1871, when he declined to serve longer, and Leonard C. Thorne was elected in his place. He continued editor until Aug. 8, 1877, when he retired, and was succeeded by William N. Pile, the present editor. The paper was published in New York until September, 1872, when it was removed to Springfield, Mass.

THE SUNDAY AFTERNOON,

a monthly magazine for the household, was established in January, 1878, by Edward F. Merriam, son of George Merriam, the senior member of the firm of G. & C. Merriam, publishers of Webster's Dictionary. During the first year of its publication Rev. Washington Gladden was its editor, but since January, 1879, it has been under the editorial management of Mr. Merriam, its proprietor. Mr. Gladden conducts "The Still Hour," the "Editor's Table," and "Literature." The magazine has been indorsed by Mr. Whittier, Mrs. Stowe, and Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, and no periodical publication ever received a more welcome reception from the press. Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, in a letter to the editor, says: "Your magazine belongs to the new era which is coming; everybody thinks and speaks well of it." Though in its infancy, the Sunday Afternoon is already on a solid basis, and justly merits its present popularity.

Familiar Science and Fancier's Journal is a monthly publication, and occupies an important rank in journals of its kind.

The Hampden Whig was established Feb. 24, 1830, by John B. Eldridge. It subsequently passed into the possession of E. D. Beach. Later, D. F. Ashley became a partner, and the paper was issued by them, under the title of the Hampden Post, until July 1, 1843, when it was sold to Alanson Harley.

The Independent Democrat was started May 26, 1841, by Apollos Munn. In 1843 it was sold to Dr. Elijah Ashley, who continued it until 1844, when he, having purchased the Hampden Post, merged the two papers in each other.

The Hampden Statesman was commenced by Apollos Munn Aug. 2, 1845, and lived until 1847, when it was merged in the Hampden Post.

The Springfield Gazette was established in 1841 by Geo. W. Callendar, Henry Kirkham, and Lewis Briggs, and was, after various vicissitudes, merged with the Republican.

The Hampden Intelligencer, an anti-Masonic organ, was established Aug. 25, 1831, by J. B. Clapp, and lived about one year.

The Hampden Washingtonian, a temperance sheet, was commenced by A. G. Tannatt, in 1842, and discontinued in 1848.

The Bay State Weekly Courier, a literary publication, was established Jan. 1, 1847, by Dr. J. G. Holland, now the editor of Scribner's Magazine. "Holland's History of Western Massachusetts," Vol. I., page 442, in speaking of this paper, says: "The Bay State Weekly Courier, a literary newspaper, was commenced by J. G. Holland, a physician, as a refuge from uncongenial pills, and a still more uncongenial lack of opportunity for dispensing them." It soon after passed into the possession of H. S. Taylor, and at the close of six months was discontinued.

The Constellation, the Spirit Messenger, the Mechanics' Reporter, and the Connecticut Valley Farmer also for a time helped make up the press of Springfield. The latter was commenced as the Connecticut Valley Farmer and Mechanic in 1853, and was edited by Hon. Wm. B. Calhoun. It was moved to Amherst in 1855, and Professor J. A. Nash became publisher and editor.

THE HOME FOR THE FRIENDLESS.*

The Springfield Home for Friendless Women and Children was established in 1865. It was the first institution of its kind in Western Massachusetts, and grew out of the real necessities of the community. These necessities were many and various, and sometimes conflicting, and therefore it is not surprising that the character of the Home in regard to its object and the classes of persons who should become its inmates was at first rather indefinite and subject to change.

Benevolent individuals had often felt the need of some place of refuge other than the almshouse for the temporarily poor,—not really paupers, but who, from sickness or other causes, were for a time unable to provide for themselves, and who, after a few weeks of rest in a comfortable home, would be again independent and self-supporting.

This need has been felt also in the case of children,—orphans, or those whose parents were unable or unfit to give them the care necessary to prepare them for a useful life; especially the children of soldiers who had fallen in the late war. These, it was thought, should be cared for until they were able to earn their own living, or could be placed in charge of other suitable guardians.

Then there was the class of young girls who come to the city to seek employment, often without money and without friends, who, after seeking in vain for work, become discouraged and fell an easy prey to the tempters who are too often watching to mislead them. To take in such as these, and to provide them with respectable employment,—this duty appealed to every virtuous heart.

Sometimes, too, the attention of charitable ladies had been called by our city officers to the case of other young girls found in suspicious places, whose feet had perchance slipped from the straight path of virtue, but who had been more sinned against than sinning; individual effort had done much to save them, but something more was needed.

But, perhaps more than all, the pitiable condition of the female convicts released from our jail and house of correction had impressed both the officers of justice and philanthropic persons to whose attention their cases had been brought. Many of these offenders were very young, and had been led astray by others older and deeper in sin than themselves; but when they emerged from confinement,—often with no home or friends to go to, with the stamp of crime and punishment upon their foreheads, with the door of an honest living shut in their faces, and vicious companions lying in wait to throw their toils over them,—who can wonder that they so often fell again, and became at last hardened offenders, or the victims of disease and early death?

A few ladies in the city, whose charity would not let them rest where there was suffering to relieve or a chance to reclaim the fallen, had for several years been laboring especially for this class. All that patient personal effort and tender thoughtfulness could do they had done, but the evil could not be controlled by the means and agencies at their command; and they at length conceived the plan of an institution like the Home, where these women and others needing similar shelter should be received, guarded, and taught, until they should be morally strong enough to be sent into the world to battle with temptation and earn an honest living.

No sooner was this plan started in their minds than they proceeded to consult with philanthropic persons, clergymen and others, respecting it. They found a ready response, and a call was issued for a meeting of citizens interested in providing such a home.

This meeting was held on Monday, Feb. 13, 1865, at the chapel of the South Church. About fifty ladies and gentlemen were present, representing nearly all the religious societies in the city. After a general expression that an institution of the kind proposed was not only desirable, but necessary, and that the citizens were ready to sustain it, a committee of ladies was appointed to prepare and report a plan of organization. This organization was completed at a subsequent meeting, and a board of directors was appointed, two from each religious society in the city, from whom the officers of the association—a president, two vice-presidents, a recording secretary, corresponding secretary, and treasurer—were chosen.

An appeal, setting forth the importance and necessity of the charity, was then made to the public, and so hearty was the response that, in less than a month after the organization of the association, a well-built and commodious house, capable of accommodating twenty persons, had been bought and paid for at a cost of $4500, and more than $2000 had been raised for the purpose of carrying it on. And the general interest in the new charity was not shown by gifts of money alone. Mechanics contributed liberally of labor and materials for making necessary alterations in the house; merchants and citizens of all classes sent furniture to fit it up, and provision and clothing for its inmates.

While the house was being prepared for occupation, it was thought necessary to define more distinctly the objects of the Home, and to determine what class or classes should be received as inmates. At one of the preliminary meetings it had been voted "that the directors be instructed to make this a home for the friendless who are virtuous, and also to provide in other ways, as far as practicable, for the vicious who show any disposition to reform." At an early meeting of the directors it had been voted "that our Home is for friendless females, of all ages and classes, and that the directors shall decide upon each case as it presents itself." But now some of those who had been warmest in their sympathy and most active in their zeal were of the opinion that too broad a field of operations was proposed, and that it would not be wise to bring the fallen and vicious into contact with virtuous girls and innocent children; that the Home should be therefore for children and the virtuous poor alone, while we should care for the fallen who should come to us by sending them to institutions of reform in other parts of the State. This plan was adopted and followed for a short time, but for a short time only.

The first idea in the establishment of a Home had been to raise the fallen, to restore the erring, as well as to save those whose feet had wellnigh slipped, and it was hard for some to give up any part of this cherished object. But the problem was soon to be practically solved. Before the end of the first summer there was brought to the Home for admission a young girl, fallen, indeed, but whose case called so deeply for sympathy and help that this refuge could not be denied her. She was admitted, a meeting of the directors was called, the question again discussed, and it was unanimously resolved that none could be more friendless than those of this class, and that henceforth the doors of the Home should be open to them, if to no others.

It was determined to engage a second Matron, whose special business should be to take care of the children, and to keep them entirely separate from all association with those who could in any way contaminate them. At the same time a stricter supervision was required over the adult inmates. From that time there was a definite though broad field of operation. The managers have never designed to receive the aged or permanently disabled, but rather the young, who have a future before them, and who can be helped and encouraged to lead useful lives. At first it was thought that no one should be received who did not properly belong to Springfield, or at least reside here at the time of application, but very soon applicants were received from the neighboring towns, and some of these towns contributed liberally of money and clothing for the institution.

It has been said that the Home was first organized as a voluntary association, but, after money had been raised and a house purchased, it was thought expedient to obtain an act of incorporation from the Legislature, and such an act was passed in April, 1865, but it was not until March of the following year that an organization was effected under the charter, and the present constitution and by-laws substantially adopted.

Soon after this permanent organization an appeal was made to the Legislature for a grant in aid of the corporation, the ground of the appeal being the actual saving of expense to the State by the prevention of crime and pauperism in various ways, especially by receiving at the Home all female offenders discharged from the jail, who were willing to avail themselves of this refuge. This petition was favorably received, and the sum of $2000 granted on condition that an equal amount should be contributed by private individuals. This amount was easily raised, and the appropriation accordingly received from the State treasurer. For the four succeeding years the same grant was made on the same conditions, the appropriations amounting in all to $10,000. After the fifth year, owing to the increasing number of similar institutions, all claiming State aid, no further appropriation was made, and the corporation was thrown upon its own resources. But the Home had been steadily growing in public estimation, and the citizens of Springfield came nobly to the rescue, and neighboring towns sent in their contributions, so that the institution, though constantly increasing in expenditure, was never crippled in its usefulness by any serious lack of funds.

When the house on Union Street was purchased, it was placed by the subscribers to the purchase-money in the hands of trustees, to be conveyed to the corporation at the end of three years, if in their judgment the enterprise had then proved successful, and the Home had vindicated its claim to become a permanent institution. There was no question as to this success, and the house therefore became the property of the corporation. In the second year of its occupation the house had been enlarged in its capacity by putting another story upon the rear part, thus making it two stories in its whole extent, but it was still too small to accommodate the increasing number of inmates, and applicants were often turned away for lack of room and beds to receive them. Already the managers were looking to a separate and more spacious building for the children alone. It was, however, more than a year after this house had been conveyed to the corporation before actual efforts were made toward the erection of the Children's Home.

At a meeting of the corporation, Oct. 9, 1869, it was unanimously voted to build a new house, to be called the "Children's Home," and subscriptions were solicited for that purpose. Mr. Horace Kibbe made a donation of a lot of land, and Mr. Gordon Bill headed the subscription list with $2000. Afterward a more eligible lot of an acre of ground was given by Messrs. John and William McKnight, G. W. and J. F. Tapley, and Theodore Haynes; and Mr. Kibbe bought back his original gift of land for $2000. These generous gifts, in the very beginning of the project, gave encouragement and hope to those who had undertaken the work. It was considered desirable to raise about $30,000, considerably more than the proposed cost of the building, in order to have a reserve fund for repairs and other emergencies. The sum of $23,000 was raised by subscription, mostly in Springfield, and a fair was held in the city-hall in May, which continued one week, and netted $7500. At this fair the towns of Westfield, Chicopee, Holyoke, Northampton, and Greenfield were liberally represented, and each furnished one or more rooms in the new building.

Work on the Children's Home was commenced in May, 1870, and the building was first occupied in May, 1871. It is capable of accommodating 50 or 60 children. The location on Buckingham Street is dry and airy, and at a convenient distance from the centre of the city. It is a substantial brick building with stone foundation and facings, 50 by 40 feet in the main part, with an L 29 by 38 feet. It is two stories high throughout, with a Mansard roof and finished attic over all, and a broad piazza extending around three sides. It contains twenty-one rooms, exclusive of halls, closets, bath-room, and basement. It has a laundry in the basement, and is supplied with hot and cold water, and all modern conveniences. There is a spacious yard in front, a play-ground on the east side, and a vegetable garden in the rear. The entire cost of the structure, exclusive of land, was $16,000. It would have been impossible to build so economically but for the excellent building committee appointed by the association, one of whom, Mr. Kibbe, gave a large portion of his time to the personal superintendence of the work, besides planning most judiciously the arrangements of the house.

The whole number of inmates received the first year at the Home on Union Street was 80, but the average number was not much over 12. During the next three years the average number was 18, though the whole number received was by no means proportionally greater. The last year before their removal to Buckingham Street, the number of children was much larger than ever before, and after their removal it continued to increase. The average number of children for the first year after the opening of the new Home was 30, the second year it was 40, the greatest number at any one time being 51. From that time to the present the average number has been between 30 and 40. The whole number of children received and cared for during the ten years after its organization was 466.

Since the opening of the Children's Home the house on Union Street has been appropriated to women alone, or to mothers with infants too young to be separated from them. In rare instances other children have been received there when some epidemic has been prevailing at the Children's Home. The average number there is from 12 to 14.

One of the principal aims of this institution has been to find suitable places for the women and children under its care, and much has been accomplished in this direction. Very little difficulty has ever been experienced in finding a place for any woman who was able to work, even with the disadvantage of taking a child with her; and there are always more or less applications for girls old enough to render some service. Great care is exercised in selecting suitable places for these children, but the managers do not give them up when they thus go out into the world. They are statedly visited by the children's committee, and reported upon at the managers' meeting, and if these places do not prove suitable, and the conditions of their service are not fulfilled, the children are taken back to the Home and sent out again under more favorable circumstances. A large number of the children at the Home have been adopted into good families as their own children. Some are in the families of the managers of the institution. But even when thus adopted the institution never loses sight of them.

Among the generous donations from all classes of citizens, the gratuitous attendance of physicians should not be unmentioned. From the very first no fee has been charged for their services, and yet the best skill and the most careful attention have been bestowed. In 1872 a board of four physicians was elected, to whom was committed the medical and sanitary condition of the two houses. Each of these physicians serves for three months, assisted by two younger ones, who act under his direction.

The health of the children has been remarkable from the beginning. There have been in all but six deaths, and three of these were of children who were sick when received. The peculiar diseases incident to children prevail to a considerable extent, but health is soon re-established, and the routine of the family scarcely disturbed. At the Woman's Home it is not so. The inmates, received from all conditions, under such various circumstances and habits of life, are seldom in sound health; and, though the managers have not designed to make the house a hospital, there have been many cases of severe and protracted illness. Very few deaths have occurred, however.

It is not to be supposed that no mistakes are made in the management of the Home. Doubtless there are many; and yet it is true that few institutions have been conducted with so much real ability and careful forethought. The wisdom of the management appears in the financial as well as in the philanthropic aspect of the institution. In its earliest years it was dependent wholly upon the yearly subscriptions, and there was no reserve-fund to fall back upon in case of emergencies. The corporators saw that such a fund was not only desirable, but almost a necessity, and from the very first endeavored to raise yearly an amount more than sufficient to cover the expenditure, and thus become the nucleus of such a fund. When the subscriptions for the Children's Home were solicited, it was intended to secure a surplus over the actual expenses of the building; and this was successfully accomplished, so that after the completion of the building there remained in the treasury the sum of $16,904.17.

But the yearly subscriptions were still solicited and still cheerfully given, except that in the Centennial year a fair was held instead, which netted about the usual amount. Thus, through the changes and depression of the times this fund has been kept nearly the same, sometimes drawn upon, sometimes added to, and the interest upon it has been a very considerable help toward the yearly outlay.

"The Home" is emphatically an institution of the city. It is appreciated and cherished by the people, and they will never let it suffer for lack of funds. Still, it is very desirable that its support should be secured in some less laborious and contingent manner than by yearly solicitations and subscriptions; and it is to be hoped that some of our wealthy philanthropists, living or dying, will remember this institution in the wise bestowment of their charities, and so increase its endowment that it will be less dependent upon the yearly donations.

INDIAN ORCHARD, AND INDIAN ORCHARD MILL COMPANY.

The territory now occupied by the village of Indian Orchard was originally laid out as follows: 415th lot, in the first tier, below the river, to Richard Bliss; 416th lot, same tier, to Benjamin Day; 421st lot, second tier, to Samuel Ely, Jr.; 422d lot, same tier, to Daniel Morgan; 431st lot, third tier, to Francis Ball; part of two lots, same tier, to Ebenezer Bagg; 430th lot, same tier, to Ebenezer Leonard.

Reuben Bliss sold John Paulk, Nov. 19, 1802, lot 415, and recites in the deed conveying it, "Originally laid out to me in the Inward Commons." The other property recited above was purchased at different times by Mr. Paulk, and Dec. 14, 1804, he sold 120 acres to Benjamin Corey, of Brooklyn, Middlesex Co., Mass. Mr. Corey mortgaged a part of the property, in 1808, to James S. and Henry Dwight, which mortgage was assigned several times, and finally foreclosed, and Samuel Osgood passed into peaceable possession. May 2, 1825, Charles Stearns, of Springfield, commenced purchasing land in this section on the river, with a view to developing the water-power, and purchased at different times for several years, associating with him Geo. Bliss, James Brewer, Willis Phelps, and others; and September, 1839, Charles Stearns, James Brewer, and George Bliss deeded their property to the Indian Orchard Canal Company. Surveys were made, but no active operations were commenced until 1846.

In September, 1845, the Springfield Manufacturing Company sold to this company the land owned by them on the south side of the river. The Springfield Manufacturing Company was organized in 1821, with Benjamin Jenks as its leading spirit. Mills were built in Ludlow, with boarding-houses opposite, in the town of Springfield, near "Old Put's Bridge."

In 1845 a survey of the plat and plan of a dam were made by William H. Butler, surveyor, and in the summer of 1846 the massive stone dam, costing $28,000, and 28 feet high, was constructed, and completed in the autumn of that year. Capt. Charles McClallan and a Mr. Willard, of Cabotville, now Chicopee Falls, were the builders. In that year also were built a house for the agent and several boarding-houses. During the next year the hills were leveled, ravines filled, and streets laid out and graded. The Rev. F. A. Barton was the first agent; he was succeeded by William Bemis. Dec. 1, 1853, the Indian Orchard Canal Company conveyed all the rights, titles, buildings, and water-privileges belonging to them to the Ward Manufacturing Company. At this time the canal company had erected the walls of the present mill No. 1, and the old part of No. 2, which used to be known as the machine-shop. Samuel Weber, Jr., was appointed as agent.

During the company's possession looms and spindles were added from time to time, until, at the transfer of the property to the Indian Orchard Mills Company, there were 18,000 spindles and 352 looms. The Ward Manufacturing Company deeded, Nov. 3, 1857, the property to Wm. Dehon, Henry V. Ward, and Samuel Frothingham, trustees; and it was mortgaged to Geo. Bliss, Geo. Walker, and Caleb Barstow, trustees, Jan. 5, 1858. This mortgage was released for a consideration paid by the Indian Orchard Mills Company, and the property passed into their possession. At that time there were twenty-five houses in the village, including the "Big Block" and the "Myrtle Street Block," both brick.

At the present time there are about one hundred buildings, including four hotels ("Indian Leap," "Indian Orchard," "Sulphur Springs," and "National"), eight stores, three churches, and a post-office.

In 1859 the Lower Mill, No. 2, was built, with 18,000 spindles and 385 looms. Spindles and looms were added from time to time, until they now contain 52,000 spindles and 1168 looms. No. 1 Mill is 64 by 270 feet, five stories high, and is run by two turbine-wheels, of 476 horse-power in the aggregate. No. 2 Mill is 74 by 469 feet, four stories high, and has one turbine-wheel, of 558 horse-power. A storehouse, three stories high, 40 by 100 feet, stands near the river; an office, also, 35 by 45 feet, is situated midway between Mills No. 1 and 2. These buildings are all of brick.

About 1859 the company erected a library building and reading-room, and supplied the latter with the weekly papers and magazines, and kept it open evenings for several years for the use of the employés. The library now contains about 1700 volumes.

The agents who have represented the company since its commencement here are Geo. W. Holt, Jenks Brown, James H. Armington, and C. J. Goodwin.

CHAPMAN VALVE-MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

This company was organized with a capital of $100,000 by Boston capitalists, who leased of the Indian Orchard Mills Company the land and buildings they now occupy, and commenced in January, 1875, the manufacture of valves of iron and composition (for steam, water, and gas) and fire-hydrants. The buildings are of brick. The main building is 35 by 100 feet, three stories high, with an L 35 by 35 feet, and a foundry 40 by 70 feet. The main office of the company is at No. 77 Kilby Street, Boston.

The village is included in the 8th Ward of the city of Springfield. An engine-house was built some years since, but is now unused, as the aqueducts from Ludlow supply the village with water.

About 1852 a post-office was established at this place, and E. A. Fuller was appointed postmaster. About 1862, C. J. Eaton succeeded him, and still holds the position.

The Boston and Albany Railroad passes within a mile of the village, and a depot is located on the line for its accommodation. The Springfield, Athol and Northeastern Railroad, which was opened in December, 1873, passes through the village, and furnishes excellent shipping facilities. The population of the village is about 2500, of whom about three-fifths are French.

LEGENDARY.

Where the aqueduct crosses the river was formerly a whirlpool or eddy, near what is known as the Little Cove. A neck is formed by the stream, and tradition says that a band of Indians were pursued by their enemies and driven into this cul-de-sac. The banks of the river at this place are precipitous, and rather than be captured they leaped into the river and were all drowned except one, and from this circumstance the place is known as "Indian Leap." The trees had been cleared away in several places previous to settlement by the whites, and apparently the open spaces had been cultivated, as camping-grounds are well known to have been in this vicinity. How the name Indian Orchard came into use is not definitely known.

EVANGELICAL CHURCH.

As early as the winter of 1847-48 the question of the organization of a church was agitated, and in January, 1848, it culminated in a letter signed by 10 persons, addressed to the Hampden County Association, which was to meet in session in February, requesting permission to call a council for that purpose.

The council convened at Indian Orchard, March 23, 1848, in accordance with the call, and the church was constituted with 15 members in due form, to be known as "The First Congregational Society of Indian Orchard." Soon after the organization the Rev. L. H. Cone supplied the pulpit, and remained until 1855.

During this year efforts were made to erect a church edifice, and to the Rev. Mr. Cone is due largely the credit for the success of the undertaking. He resigned late in 1855, on account of his health. The Ward Manufacturing Company deeded two lots on the north side of Main Street, corner of Oak Street, to the First Congregational Society, March 1, 1856. The Rev. M. E. Bassett was stated supply for six months.

The Rev. E. D. Murphy was their pastor from June 15, 1856, until March, 1858. The Rev. Mr. Barton supplied the pulpit until 1861. A call was made to the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society, and the Rev. Otis Lombard was sent to them as a resident missionary, Oct. 1, 1861. The church building was completed in 1863. Soon afterward the church became disorganized, and the building passed into the hands of Harvey Butler, and from him to the Indian Orchard Mill Company, who own it at the present time.

Feb. 10, 1865, eleven persons called a meeting for the purpose of effecting an organization, and Feb. 18, 1865, they united with members of the old First Church, under the name of the "Evangelical Religious Society of Indian Orchard." The Rev. Mr. Rice became their pastor, and was succeeded by the Rev. Rufus Emerson, Rev. Stephen Harris, Rev. James H. Hamilton, Rev. T. D. P. Stone, and the Rev. James F. Merriam, who is now acting as their pastor.*

The church has a membership of 52. The parish committee are H. K. Wight, C. J. Goodwin, and Jason Giles. Dr. S. F. Smith is superintendent of the Sunday-school, which numbers about 75 pupils.

ST. ALOYSIUS' CHURCH (CATHOLIC).

This church was organized March 3, 1873, with 180 French families, comprising 500 communicants and 800 souls. The first service was held, in the French language, in the hall of the Indian Orchard Mill Company. Through the kindly efforts of C. J. Goodwin, agent of Indian Orchard Mill Company, the property now occupied by the society was presented to them by that company, and Aug. 5, 1873, the corner-stone of a church was laid with appropriate ceremonies, Bishop Fabre, of Montreal, officiating. Services were held in the new edifice Dec. 25, 1873. The church was placed under the charge of Father Gagnier, of Springfield, who remained until Jan. 5, 1876, when the pastoral charge was committed to the Rev. H. Landrey, who is the present incumbent. At that time the society numbered 224 families, 964 communicants, and 1417 souls. This includes the French families residing at Jenksville.

The church is built of brick, and is 55 by 95 feet. A commodious parsonage was erected adjoining the church in 1877.

ST. MATTHEW'S CHURCH (CATHOLIC).

This church was organized in 1863, under Father William Blenkinsop. In 1864 the corner-stone was laid with appropriate ceremonies by Bishop O'Reilly. Father Patrick Healy was placed in charge, and under his care the church was completed. Since then the care of the church has devolved upon the Revs. P. D. Stone, D. F. McGrath, and James Fitzgerald, who is the present pastor. The church numbers 500 souls. They have a Sunday-school of 150 pupils; William Godfrey is superintendent.

SCHOOLS.

About 1849, schools were opened and kept in different parts of the settlement. In 1867 a large brick three-story edifice was erected on the hill, at a cost of $28,842.26, including seats and fixtures. The lot was presented by the Indian Orchard Mill Company. The smaller schools were gathered and united in this building. It contains five school-rooms, two classrooms, one assembly hall, and 257 seats. The number of pupils registered for the school year ending June, 1878, was 559; number of first enrollment, 425; average number belonging, 258.8; average daily attendance, 243.7; percentage of attendance, 97.1. There are 6 teachers, of whom Miss

* Since resigned.

Rebecca A. Sheldon is principal, and Miss E. A. Browne assistant.

The old school building is used for evening schools only. There are 114 pupils in attendance. Wilmon B. Stone, principal. Draughting-school, Sullivan D. Hill, principal.

Charles J. Goodwin is a member of the school committee for 1879.

MILITARY RECORD, 1861-65.

The lightning had scarcely flashed the intelligence to the expectant North that Major Anderson and his gallant band had surrendered as prisoners of war to the Southern Confederacy ere the patriotic sons of Springfield were rallying to the support of their imperiled country. Men and money were promptly raised, and the record of the town during the whole struggle is one of which her citizens may justly be proud.

The city paid the following items: for soldiers' bounties, $116,924; reimbursed individuals for bounties paid, $37,332.63; paid the State on account of bounties, $49,772.69; received from the State on said account, $44,680; amount paid in excess of receipts, $5092.69; paid for recruiting expenses, $14,070.23; paid for State aid to Jan. 1, 1866, $98,652.77; number of men furnished, 2625.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

HON. HENRY MORRIS, LL.D.,

son of Oliver B. Morris and Caroline Bliss, daughter of Hon. George Bliss, was born in Springfield, Mass., June 16, 1814. He attended the schools of his native city, which have ever ranked among the best in the State, and, having decided upon a collegiate course, in 1828 he entered Amherst College, from which he was graduated with honor in the class of '32, which has furnished four judges, two members of Congress, and two trustees of alma mater.

He chose the legal profession for his life-work, and began the study of the law in the office of his father, Hon. Oliver B. Morris, a leading practitioner in Springfield. He also attended the Cambridge law-school, and in 1835 was admitted to the Bar, and commenced the practice of the law in his native city.

Judge Morris, as he is familiarly known, has ever commanded the respect and esteem of his fellow-citizens, and has been honored with various official positions within their gift, always discharging the duties in a truly conscientious manner, and to the satisfaction of all.

In the years 1846 and 1847 he represented Springfield in the Legislature, and aided in procuring the first grant from the State to Amherst College. In 1852, when Springfield was made a city, he was the president of the council, which office he held for two years.

The marked ability displayed by him in the various positions to which he had been chosen attracted the attention of the people, and in 1854 he was elected a member of Congress. Before the time arrived, however, for taking his seat, he was tendered by the Governor of the State the position of judge of the Court of Common Pleas, and, this being more in accordance with his tastes and habits, he resigned his seat in Congress and accepted the judicial office. In 1859 the Legislature abolished the Court of Common Pleas, and, his judicial services having thus terminated, he returned to the practice of his profession, in which he still continues.

Judge Morris has manifested a deep interest in religious matters, and became a member of the College Church in his junior year. After graduation, he transferred his relation to the First Church, in his native city, of which he is still a member, and during several years has been a deacon.

In 1854 he was elected a member of the corporation of Amherst College, and in 1869 he received the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws from his alma mater at the same time with his classmate and co-trustee, Judge Perkins.

In the multifarious duties incident to the legal profession, Judge Morris has found time to study the history of the Connecticut Valley and of Springfield, and has added many valuable contributions to the historic literature of this locality. In addition to various historical addresses which he has delivered from time to time, he is also the author of a thorough history of the old or First Church of Springfield; also, History of Springfield, etc. At present he is president of the Connecticut Valley Historical Society.

May 16, 1837, he united in marriage with Mary, daughter of Col. Solomon Warriner. They have four children living, viz., Mary W., wife of Charles K. Calhoun; Edward, who was admitted to the Bar in 1864 and is now practicing law in Springfield; Frederick W., a bookseller in Springfield; and Helen.

Politically, Judge Morris is a Republican, and although always manifesting an interest in public men and measures he has never been a partisan, caring more for the success of right principles, and the election of good men, than for party or personal gain.

HON. CHESTER W. CHAPIN

was born in Ludlow, Dec. 16, 1798. He is a direct lineal descendant, in the sixth generation, from Deacon Samuel Chapin, the founder of the family in this country. His grandfather, Ephraim Chapin, was one of the largest land-owners of his day in this section, his estate covering lands in Chicopee, Ludlow, and Springfield. His father (also Ephraim by name) occupied a portion of the old Chapin estates, which at the time of his death had not been divided. Though rich in lands, these early settlers were otherwise possessed of small means, and cultivated habits of the strictest economy. Yet these were days of families inversely proportionate to the ready means of the householder, Chester being the youngest of a family of seven children. In such circumstances are often found the beginnings of the amplest fortunes, and that strength of character which gives the widest influence.

Already, then, had there been instilled into the mind of the boy those lessons which have served him so well, when at a tender age his father died and left the family, then at Chicopee Street, to manage for themselves. His older brother, Ephraim, having been sent to college, the duty of remaining at home to care for the interests of his mother and her farm devolved upon Chester. While doing so he attended the district school at Chicopee, which ranked high as a school of its kind in those days, and was afterward sent to the academy at Westfield, from which he entered upon the active pursuits of life.

At twenty-one he went to Springfield, and first found employment at the hotel known as the Old Williams House, kept then by his brother Erastus. Not relishing the business, he was next found keeping a store of his own at Chicopee Street.

Just across the way was another store, kept by the late Stephen C. Bemis, and the two soon formed a copartnership, which continued several months. At this time Mr. Chapin was married to a daughter of Col. Abel Chapin, of Chicopee. He was next found at work upon the construction at Chicopee of the first mill ever built in this country where paper was made by machinery. He took the contract for the foundation and masonry of this factory for the Amesess, and did the work in so satisfactory manner that, when a few years later the mill was burned, they urged him to undertake a renewal of the job; but other engagements then intervened to prevent him from complying. A change in business then occurred, which turned the attention of the young man in the direction of his real life-work. At the solicitation of Jacob W. Brewster, of Hartford, he was induced to take an interest in the extensive stage-lines in the Connecticut Valley. Here he first made the acquaintance of his life-long friend, the late Maj. Morgan, of Palmer, who was engaged in the stage-line running east and west from Springfield. Occasionally holding the reins on the Hartford and Brattleboro' line, Mr. Chapin was soon found to be more needed in developing the general interests of the route, which so prospered under his management as to yield him large returns on his investment.

Soon after the demonstration had been satisfactorily made by Thomas Blanchard that steamboats could run from Hartford to Springfield, Mr. Chapin grasped the idea and utilized it. He bought out Blanchard soon after 1830, and for a dozen years controlled the passenger traffic between the two places. Ever since he has maintained his business relations with boating lines, until he now controls largely the New York and New Haven lines of steamers. Two of his vessels were in government employ during the war of the Rebellion.

Meanwhile, having, largely by his personal efforts, secured a connection between Springfield and Hartford by rail, he became a director in the corporation, and took active interest in its management. Extensive postal contracts having been taken by him on the route from Terre Haute to St. Louis, he sent the stages there, and used the rail as the means of transporting mails under his charge from Hartford to Stanstead, Canada.

In 1850, Mr. Chapin became a director of the Western Railroad, but resigned the position to accept the presidency of the Connecticut River Railroad in the same year. In 1854, having attracted attention by successful management of that road, he was elected president of the Western road, and accepted. In two years fifty miles of rails had been renewed; the bridge over the Connecticut River rebuilt; twelve first-class locomotives, one hundred and forty-five freight-cars, and six passenger-coaches had been added to the rolling stock of the road. The interests of the company called him to England in 1855, where he was successful in negotiating a loan of half a million dollars for further improvements. Very soon the road began to pay handsome dividends. The Albany bridges, the new iron bridge at Springfield, the continuous double track, and more particularly the grand consolidation of the Western and Boston and Worcester roads into the Boston and Albany, with magnificent tide-water facilities, the huge elevator at Boston, and the grand depot at Worcester, have been enterprises owing a large share of their success to the shrewd management of Chester W. Chapin. At various times during his presidency of the Western road he has been solicited to take the management of other large railroad interests, but has always refused. In business relations elsewhere, we find Mr. Chapin mentioned as a stockholder and director in the Hudson River and New York Central Railroads; director of the Western Union Telegraph Company; a prominent manager and owner of the Collins Paper Company property and business at Wilbraham; the Agawam Canal Company at West Springfield; and president of the Chapin Banking and Trust Company, of Springfield (having been formerly founder and president of the Agawam Bank of the same place). He has been honored with a seat in the national House of Representatives. The honor thus conferred precludes the necessity of extended remarks concerning Mr. Chapin's personal excellencies. He is kind and obliging, of unblemished reputation, cool and decided, but considerate, and one whose "promise is as good as his bond."

While Mr. Chapin is a prudent and somewhat conservative man, a careful observer of his career will find that he has always been among the foremost to accept every improvement in the onward march of civilization. At first a stage-owner, he was quick to see and utilize the application of steam,—first upon the waters of the Connecticut, and then upon its banks. Instead of resisting the march of events as bringing into the field an element of rivalry—and perhaps destruction—to his interests in old methods, he was the foremost to contribute his capital and practical experience to the development of each new and improved project in the direction of cheap and rapid transportation. Now, at the age of eighty, Mr. Chapin has retired from active life and is enjoying the fruits of a green old age.

HON. JAMES M. THOMPSON.

Among the men of force and character, well-directed and indefatigable energy, fidelity, and genius, who make their mark in the world, and set an example worthy the imitation of their juniors, is Col. James M. Thompson, of Springfield. He has reached his present enviable position through his own keen foresight, industry, and adherence to principle. He was born in Pembroke, N. H., July, 1811; was one of a family of nine children, of whom Hon. Newell A. Thompson (deceased), of Boston, is another. In their early life their father, who was engaged in cotton and woolen manufacturing, lost his property by the disasters of the war of 1812, which ruined, financially, most of those engaged in that business. It thereafter became necessary for "the boys" to do all in their power for the support of the family, and they did it. Col. Thompson received his early education in the common schools of New England, and commenced his business education in a country store in 1825. At the age of twenty he began business for himself, in which he was prosperous for four years, when, through the failure of another, his business was broken up, but his characteristic resolution and energy soon won him once more a place in business circles.

In 1835 he married the youngest daughter of the late Gurdon Steele, Esq., a lady of culture, pleasing manners, and general excellence. She died in 1866.

Mr. Thompson resided in New York City from 1838 to 1840, and then returned to Boston. A year or two previous W. F. Harnden had established the first express in the country, and in 1840 employed Mr. Thompson in his Boston office. In 1842 he appointed him agent at Springfield, where he has since resided. In the year 1843, Mr. Thompson purchased the line between Boston and Albany of Harnden & Co., with all its stock, and continued the business alone until 1852, when he admitted as partners two of his clerks, Mr. Melcher, of Boston, and Mr. Johnson, of Albany. Thompson & Co. subsequently sold out their interest to the American Express Company, Mr. Thompson holding a position in that company until its consolidation with the Merchants' Union. About the year 1852 the Adams Express Company bought out the Harnden and other lines. Mr. Thompson, in pursuance of his previous interests, became, upon its new organization, one of the first directors, and its secretary, which places he still occupies.

In 1849 a charter for the John Hancock Bank of Springfield was obtained through his influence, and of that bank he was the president for thirteen years following, and has been a director since. For many years he has been connected with the Springfield Institution for Savings; one of the soundest and best-conducted savings-banks in the State, and since the decease of Mr. Hooker, its presiding officer, he has been its president, during which time its assets have increased from about seven hundred thousand to about seven million dollars. He is one of the original directors of the Chapin Banking and Trust Company, and was elected its president in July, 1878, Mr. Chapin declining a re-election. He was also one of the incorporators of the City Library, and contributed, and liberally, toward the erection of the Unitarian Church of Springfield, acting for some two years during its construction as chairman of the building committee. His connection with the Springfield Gas-Light Company has been as a director since 1861, and president since 1870. During the Harrison campaign and after, while the Whig party existed, Col. Thompson was a very active member of the party, but always declined political office. Upon the breaking out of the war of the Rebellion he was anxious to take the field and share his fortunes with our brave soldiers, but the nature of his business and the counsel of his friends, touching the important service he could render at home in the furtherance of the Union cause, kept him from the field, and subsequently, as chairman of the committee of finance and information, he freely responded in time and money in contributing to the benefit of volunteer soldiers and their families, to as great an extent as any other man in the State. In the fall of 1861 he received the unanimous nomination of both the Democratic and Republican conventions for Senator for the Eastern Hampden District, and at the election received every vote cast, except five or six. His doctrine in that hour of the country's peril was, "No man, however humble, has a right to stand back when there is so much to be done to put down this unholy rebellion,—every man can and must do something."

In the Senate he was appointed chairman of the joint standing committee of the Legislature on the militia, and was also a member of several other committees. In these positions he served with marked ability, and brought to bear that consideration, knowledge, experience, and sound judgment which the emergency required. Having in former years had much experience in military matters as aid to Gov. Clifford, who was president of the Senate at the time Col. Thompson was a member, he was the better able to render important service in the position he was called to fill.

For his second wife Col. Thompson married Anna, daughter of Hon. Tracy Beadle, of Elmira, N. Y. His life has been one of active business, and among other monuments to his energy in Springfield is an elegant residence on an eminence commanding "a view unsurpassed for beauty of inland scenery," which, with its spacious grounds, adds much to the beauty of that part of the city, an engraving of which may be seen on another page of this work.

HON. WILLIS PHELPS

was born in Granby, Conn., Feb. 25, 1806, and is a lineal descendant, through his father, Horace, and grandfather, Ebenezer, of William Phelps, who, with his four sons, William, Samuel, Nathaniel, and Joseph, and his brother George, with their families, one hundred and forty persons in all,—including Rev. John Warham, of Exeter, and Rev. John Maverick, from near Exeter, England,—embarked at Plymouth, England, on the ship "Mary and John," and landed on an island in Boston Harbor, New England, May 30, 1630. Thus the members of this large family were among the early pioneers of the Eastern States on the Atlantic coast. The emigrant, William, Sr., lived nearly five years at Dorchester, Mass., when he removed to Windsor, Conn., in the fall of 1635. He was a member of the first General Court held in Connecticut in 1636 and 1637,—which last declared war against the Pequots,—and a magistrate from 1638 to 1642. In 1643 he was the foreman of the first grand jury; was deputy from 1645 to 1657, with the exception of six years, and, with Mr. Welles, of Hartford, was appointed a committee on lying. He represented Dorchester in the first Legislature of Massachusetts, and Windsor in the first Legislature of Connecticut. His brother George removed with him to Windsor, and they bought their land from the Indians. He died July 14, 1672. The grandson of William Phelps was elected twenty-eight times to represent Simsbury in the Legislature of Connecticut. His father, Horace Phelps, removed to West Springfield about the year 1811, to Westfield in 1812, and to Springfield in 1816, which latter has been the home of Willis Phelps since, except from 1831 to 1842, when he resided at Longmeadow. His father died in 1848, at the age of seventy-nine. Mr. Phelps spent his boyhood days in various occupations,—on the farm, in the meat business, driving ox-team, and making brick; the brick-yard being located on Carew Street, where the bricks were made in 1822 for the old "Thompson House." At the age of nineteen he bought the grocery business of N. B. & J. O. Mosely, on the corner of State and Walnut Streets, and then first began business as a merchant. Thus early in life he became schooled in the business operations which, later, developed judicious management and sagacity. From meagre earnings amid the struggles of early life he has risen to the control of large business operations in building railroads and establishing stock companies. In 1838, Mr. Phelps contracted to grade a section of the Western (now Boston and Albany) Railroad, in Dalton, Mass., and soon after contracted for five other sections, between Albany and Springfield, of the same road. He built the Council Bluffs and St. Joseph Railroad, raising the funds for its construction; built the Rome and Watertown and the Potsdam and Watertown Railroads; and for some forty years was engaged in the construction of railroads in various parts of the United States, with several of which he has been officially connected as president and stockholder. It is said that Mr. Phelps has been more extensively connected with the construction of railroads than any other man in the United States.

Notwithstanding his extensive business relations, Mr. Phelps has been somewhat actively interested in the great political questions of the day. In 1844 he was elected commissioner for Hampden County, and was chairman of the board for three years. In 1848 he was in the Massachusetts Senate. Upon the organization of Springfield as a city he became a member of the council; the following year he was elected alderman, and again a few years afterward. He has been a candidate of the minority party four times for mayor of the city.

In 1856 he represented Springfield in the General Court.

Mr. Phelps has been associated with some of the important interests of the city; assisted in obtaining the charter for the Five-Cent Savings Bank, and was its first president. He was influential in obtaining the charter for the Pynchon Bank, and owned one-tenth of the stock of the Fire and Marine Insurance Company at the time of its organization, being also a director for many years.

On the 1st of March, 1828, he married Miss Maria Bartlett, of Springfield. To them were born four children,—three sons and one daughter. The daughter and one son died in infancy. Henry W. resides in Springfield, and is the superintendent of the Athol Railroad. John W. also resides in Springfield.

JAMES D. BREWER

was born in Springfield, Mass., April 24, 1819. He traces his descent from Daniel Brewer, the emigrant ancestor of the name, who came from London or Birmingham, England, and settled in Roxbury, Mass., in 1634.

His father, James Brewer, made mercantile operations his life business, was one of the originators of the Chicopee Bank of Springfield, and as a stockholder retained his interest until his death. He was largely interested in the manufacture of cotton goods in various mills; was an active business-man, possessing that sagacity and business ability not uncommon among self-made men, and a man well read in the current literature of the day. He married Harriet, daughter of Dr. Jabez Adams, of Mansfield, Conn., and to them were born four sons and four daughters, of whom James D. Brewer was the second child. In the year 1840 he engaged as a merchant with his father in Springfield, which business was subsequently conducted as a hardware business, and continued for some thirty-two years. During this time he was interested in many of the enterprises of the city, as treasurer of the Indian Orchard Canal Company, originator of the Springfield Gas-Light Company, and director and treasurer of the same works, one of the directors of the Springfield Car- and Engine-Works, and committee in closing up its affairs; one of the directors of the Agawam Canal Company's mill, director of the Chicopee Bank; and director of the Hampden Watch Company, of Springfield. He was the first chief-engineer of the fire department of the city, after its organization.

Mr. Brewer has led a strictly business life, preferring its independence and activity to the bickerings and strife connected with public affairs, never seeking publicity or political preferment. He has been closely identified with church and kindred interests, has been warden of the Episcopal Church of Springfield for several years, and vestryman for some thirty years. In 1842 he married Sarah, second daughter of Col. Solomon Porter, of Hartford, Conn. Their children living are Edward L., a resident of Hartford, Conn., and Mrs. Dr. Luke Corcoran, of Springfield, Mass.

LEWIS J. POWERS.

It is always a pleasure to the historian to place upon his page "passing incidents" in the life of one who has been solely the architect of his own fortune. Such a one is the subject of this sketch, Hon. Lewis J. Powers. He was born in Springfield, Mass., Jan. 15, 1837, and received his education at the common schools of his native city, and in a private school which he attended several terms. Early in life he entered on a business career for himself, his first work being to deliver to patrons in the city the Sentinel, then published by Alanson Hawley. Soon after he went into the employ of a Mr. Brocket, one of the pioneer newsdealers of Springfield, and subsequently engaged with Mr. Bessey, whose news-room was under the Massasoit House, and who also supplied the trains with papers. Young Powers had exhibited such unusual energy and activity in the prosecution of his business that Mr. Bessey placed him on the train as "newsboy," where he worked incessantly from "early morn till dewy eve," at the rate of two dollars and fifty cents per week. After two or three years he left the train and took a position in the store, and in 1857 purchased a one-third interest in the establishment, and in 1861 became sole proprietor. In 1857, while in company with Mr. Bessey, they started the stationery trade in a small way. This business was commenced by young Powers, who packed a little bag with samples, and, boarding a freight-engine, went to Huntington, Mass., and made his first sale to L. B. Williams, who then resided in Huntington, and is now one of the leading business-men of Northampton. He also traveled as agent for their business in 1861 and 1863. About this time the rapidly increasing trade demanded more commodious quarters, and the business was removed to the Goodrich Block, and still further increased by the addition of the notion trade. It was also about this time (1863) that they took of Samuel Bowles & Co. the Western agency for the sale of albums, which then were being extensively manufactured. They also took the Western agency for the Glasgow Paper Company.

In 1865, Mr. Powers purchased an interest in the old Berkshire Paper-Mills, at Dalton, Mass., and the whole business was consolidated under the firm-name of the Powers & Brown Paper Company. In 1867 he disposed of his interest in the Dalton Mills, and purchased a part of the Riverside Paper Company, at Holyoke, and for several years was its president. In 1870 he built the northern part of the granite building known as the Agawam Bank building. These commodious quarters were, however, soon found to be too small for the increasing business, and in 1875 he erected the substantial and commodious structure now occupied by him on Lyman Street. It is a fine brick building fifty by one hundred feet, seven stories high, with factory in the rear. Upon his removal to Lyman Street, in 1875, Mr. Powers still further increased his business by commencing the manufacture of blank-books, paper, envelopes, papeteries, etc. Here the same energy, indomitable will, and keen business foresight that characterized his early life again displayed itself, and he has increased his business, until now he has a resident agent for the sale of his goods in New York, New Orleans, and San Francisco, besides sending traveling agents into every State in the Union and the Canadas, and the annual sales of the establishment amount to nearly a million dollars.

Although his business has always been of an onerous nature, requiring a large portion of his time, he has manifested a lively interest in all matters pertaining to the welfare of his native city, and was a member of the council when only twenty-three years of age. He was elected to the council again in 1867 and 1869. He was chosen alderman in 1874 and '75, and in 1878, the people, recognizing his public services in the past, and knowing well his remarkable energy and executive ability, nominated him for mayor, and he was elected by a handsome majority over his opponent, a member of the same party, who received the "regular" Republican nomination.

Mr. Powers is largely interested in the general business interests of the city; he is a director in the Agawam National Bank; trustee of the Hampden Savings-Bank; director in the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Company; also in the Clark W. Bryan Manufacturing Company, the Springfield Telephone Company, the Wason Manufacturing Company, etc. He is also president of the Hampden Park Association, and treasurer of the National Trotting Association.

Mr. Powers is essentially a self-made man. Early in life he learned that the way to success was no royal road, but was open to stout hands and willing hearts. While yet a mere boy, he bravely stepped into the arena of active business life, and his great success has been the natural result of ability to speedily comprehend any subject presented to him, power to decide promptly, and courage to act with vigor and persistency.

The Huntington trip, with a little sack of paper, has grown into a business amounting to over three-quarters of a million dollars annually, and the little newsboy of 1848 is one of the substantial business-men of the Connecticut Valley, and mayor of his native city.

"Honor and fame from no conditions rise:
Act well your part; there all the honor lies."

REV. WILLIAM RICE, D.D.,

was born in Springfield, Mass., March 10, 1821. He is a lineal descendant in the seventh generation of Edmund Rice, who was born about 1594, emigrated from England, and settled at Sudbury, Mass., in 1639; removed to Marlboro', and died there May 3, 1663. His grandfather, Nathan Rice, was, when a young man, a soldier in the war of the Revolution. He was an honest and industrious farmer, lived to the age of seventy-seven, and died in 1838. His wife, Hepzibah (Allen), a relative of the famous Ethan Allen, was a native of Concord, Mass., and resided there at the time of the "Concord fight." She died at the age of ninety-one, in the year 1854.

Dr. Rice's father, William Rice, was born in Belchertown, Mass., in 1788. He went to Wilbraham when a boy, and lived there till he was nearly thirty years of age, when he removed to Springfield and engaged in business as a merchant. His intelligence, integrity, and public spirit soon gave him prominence in public affairs, and he was chosen year by year to various town offices. In 1830 he was elected register of deeds for the county, and held the position twenty-nine years. In 1838 he was chosen county treasurer, and that office he held for eighteen years. Through all the mutations of party his fitness for public service and his faithful and popular discharge of official duties carried his election successfully. He rarely had a rival candidate for either of these offices, and when he did the response was usually faint and the opposition was a failure. He was a conspicuous Methodist, but generous in thought and action toward all Christian denominations and all Christian effort; liberal in charities and earnest for every good and noble work. Early and late he was the friend of popular and Christian education. He was one of the founders of the Wesleyan Academy, the first Wesleyan school in New England. When it was established he gave it one-third of all he owned at the time, and on occasions afterward contributed liberally to its enlargement. His life afforded a rare example of simplicity, truth, fidelity, and usefulness. He died at the age of seventy-five.

The mother of Dr. Rice, Jerusha (Warriner), was a lineal descendant of William Warriner, who settled in Springfield in 1640. She died in 1869, at the age of eighty-four.

Of their children (two sons and two daughters) Dr. Rice is the only survivor. He was educated in the schools of Springfield, and at the Wesleyan Academy at Wilbraham, graduating from the latter institution with honor at the age of nineteen. After one year of rest on account of overwork and ill health, he entered the ministry, in 1841, and joined the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Under the system of itinerancy adopted by that denomination, he was successively appointed to the following churches, viz.: North Malden, Saugus, Marblehead, North Russell Street Church, Boston; South Street Church, Lynn; Park Street Church, Chelsea; Chicopee; Bromfield Street Church, Boston; and again to Park Street Church, Chelsea. Here his health became impaired, and, assuming a supernumerary relation to the Conference, he removed to Springfield. He subsequently resumed his active relation to the Conference, but received an appointment to a chaplaincy, and continued to reside in Springfield. He was a popular preacher, and a successful pastor during the years of his active ministerial life, and has always maintained an influential position in his Conference and in the Church. He is also favorably known among the other Christian denominations, having frequently occupied their pulpits since his residence in Springfield.

He was elected to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1856, and was one of the leaders on the anti-slavery side in the great controversy then going on in relation to slavery in the church. He was also a delegate to the General Conference of 1876, taking an active part in its proceedings, and serving on various important committees. At this session, provision was made for the appointment of a committee to revise the Methodist hymn-book. Dr. Rice was selected as a member of this committee, and devoted much time and attention to the work. When the revision was completed, he was appointed chairman of the editorial committee, under whose supervision the hymnal was published. This revised hymnal has received the commendation of the bishops, and the high appreciation in which it is held by the Methodist Church is indicated by its immense circulation.

Dr. Rice has given attention, also, to other literary work. He published, some years ago, a "Pastor's Manual," for the use of clergymen, and an octavo volume of "Moral and Religious Quotations from the Poets," containing more than four thousand selections, topically arranged. These works have been highly commended by the press, and widely circulated. He also prepared and published the excellent catalogue of the Springfield City Library, still in use.

In 1853 the Wesleyan University conferred upon him the honorary degree of A.M., and in 1876 the degree of D.D.

For eighteen years Dr. Rice has been secretary of the trustees of the Wesleyan Academy, and for many years a trustee of the college at Middletown. He has been a member of the school committee of the city of Springfield for the past fifteen years, and a member of the State board of education for sixteen years. During that period he has devoted much time and labor to the work of popular education.

Dr. Rice has been very closely connected with the history of the City Library in Springfield. In its early days he was untiring in his labors in its behalf, soliciting subscriptions to its funds, donations of books, and seeking, by persistent and self-sacrificing efforts, to secure its growth and permanent establishment. Later in its history he co-operated heartily with the few noble men whose zeal and labor to secure a suitable building for the ingathered literature resulted in the erection of the beautiful library edifice on State Street. Having been the librarian since the year 1861, almost from the beginning of the present library, the selection and purchase of books, and their arrangement and classification, have devolved entirely upon him. His wide range of reading, liberal views, cultivated literary taste, and sound judgment eminently fitted him for this work, and have given to the library in a great degree its present high position and established reputation.

In the year 1843, Dr. Rice was married to Caroline L., daughter of Wm. North, of Lowell, Mass. She was a lady of superior culture, and has been a helpmeet to her husband in all his varied work. Their children are Rev. Wm. North Rice, Ph.D., professor in the Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn.; Edward H. Rice, Ph.D., classical teacher in the Worcester High School; Rev. Charles F. Rice, A.M., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church; and Caroline L. Rice, a member of the senior class in the Wesleyan University.

ORRICK HERMAN GREENLEAF was born in Nunda, N. Y., July 18, 1823. He was one of the nine children of William Greenleaf, of Nunda, N. Y., and Almira Sanford, of Vermont, and is one of the ninth generation after Edmund Greenleaf, who came from England and settled in Newbury, Mass., in 1634, from whom all of the Greenleafs in America are believed to have descended. The family is of Huguenot stock originally. Mr. Greenleaf's line of descent in America is as follows: Edmund, who settled in Newbury in 1634; Stephen, who came to America with his father; Stephen, Jr., Rev. Daniel, Dr. Daniel, Jr., Israel (who had two wives and was the father of twenty-two children), Tilly, William, and Mr. Orrick H. Early in life he learned the business of tanning leather in Nunda, and afterward that of currier in Seneca Falls, N. Y., where he was for some time employed. Moving to Springfield, Mass., in September, 1845, he engaged as foreman in Mr. Bliss' tannery, but began dealing in "paper stock" in 1847, and opened the first paper warehouse in the Connecticut Valley, in 1848, at Springfield, under the firm-name of "Greenleaf & Taylor" (Mr. Taylor being his brother-in-law). They soon did the largest business in Western Massachusetts in their line, and in 1853 they built a mill at Huntington, Mass., for the manufacture of printers' paper. In 1854, Mr. Greenleaf organized the "Greenleaf & Taylor Manufacturing Company." In 1859, Mr. Taylor retired from the company. They purchased in Springfield the mill formerly owned by D. and J. Ames, and changed the Huntington mill to one for fine writing-paper. While the business was under the management of Mr. Greenleaf it proved very successful, but in 1868 he disposed of his interest, having become previously largely interested in the manufacture of paper elsewhere. In 1865 he purchased of Stephen Holman and others a controlling interest for himself and friends in the "Holyoke Paper Company," since which time its business has been under his management.

Soon after this purchase he began the enlargement of the mill to a capacity of seven tons per day, being a larger amount of fine writing-paper than is manufactured by any other single mill in the country. This corporation has been eminently successful, owing largely to Mr. Greenleaf's careful oversight and business ability, its goods standing at the head of the market.

During the present year it received a gold medal at Paris for these specialties (linen and parchment papers). Mr. Greenleaf has been a director in the First National Bank of Springfield since its organization, and is interested in other enterprises. He began the erection of his present fine residence in 1872, and finished it the following year. It is situated on Crescent Hill, Springfield, overlooking the city and adjacent country toward the Berkshire Hills, and commanding a charming view both up and down the Connecticut Valley, the one to the south extending many miles into Connecticut. This residence is one of the finest in Western Massachusetts. Mr. Greenleaf has been a member of the Baptist Church for many years, and of the First Baptist Church of Springfield thirty-four years. Unlike many of our wealthy men, he has believed that while living he could dispose of his income in part, and during the last dozen years has given more than seventy thousand dollars for various public and private purposes. In 1847 he was married to Miss Mary Ann, daughter of Robert Baldwin, Esq., of East Windsor, Conn.

DANIEL B. WESSON

was born in Worcester, Worcester Co., Mass., May, 1825. The family of Wesson settled in the town of Worcester over a century ago. Abel, great-grandfather of Mr. D. B. Wesson, was the first settler, and for four generations they were among the prominent families of that place. His father, Rufus Wesson, followed the occupation of making wooden plows during his early days, and only abandoned the trade when iron plows came into use. He spent the remainder of his days as a farmer. He lived to be eighty-seven years of age, and died in his native town in the year 1874. His mother, Betsy Baird, who was descended from one of the oldest and most prominent families of Worcester, survived her husband about two years, and died at the age of eighty-eight, in the year 1876.

The children of this family were five sons and five daughters, of whom four sons and three daughters are living. The eldest son, Edwin, died in Hartford thirty years ago. His name was associated with the celebrated Wesson rifle, of his manufacture. Mr. D. B. Wesson spent his minority, until he was eighteen years of age, in the routine of school- and farm-work, at which time he was regularly apprenticed to learn the gunsmith trade with his eldest brother, Edwin, with whom he served until he reached his majority, and two years thereafter.

In the year 1849, Mr. Wesson commenced business for himself, and began the manufacture of pistols in Grafton, Mass., on a small scale. He there spent two years, and afterward two years as superintendent of the Leonard pistol-manufacture, at Charleston, Mass. When in partnership with Horace Smith, he established a pistol-manufacture at Norwich, Conn., which they carried on for two years, and then sold out, Mr. Wesson continuing to superintend the works there for two years.

In the year 1856, Messrs. Smith & Wesson came to Springfield, and began again the manufacture of pistols on Market Street, where they remained only three years, and removed their business to their new buildings on Stockbridge Street, where the business was largely increased, so that it furnished employment to about 600 persons. Mr. Smith retiring from the business in July, 1874, Mr. Wesson conducted it alone. From a business confined to small dimensions and a local trade, the Smith & Wesson firearms are known in every State of the Union, and have reached large sales in every country of Europe, in parts of Asia, on the Pacific coast, the islands of the sea, Canada, and South America. The superiority of these firearms is owing to the fact that the manufacturers were the patentees of the metallic cartridge,—the first in the world to be used in breech-loading. This feature gave that class of arms a great preference over others in market, and led to a large demand for them during the war of the Rebellion of 1861–65.

In the year 1847, Mr. Wesson married Cynthia, daughter of Luther Hawes, of Northborough, Mass.

Early in life he was trained in the business which he has followed for a lifetime, and taught that shrewdness and sagacity since characteristic of his business operations. He has risen from an apprentice-boy to be one of the largest manufacturers in his branch of trade in the world.

Mr. Wesson has never been active in the political field, but has given his life to business. He has encouraged every enterprise of a local nature tending to elevate and educate the rising generation.

DANIEL D. WARREN.

was born in Hoosick, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., Jan. 21, 1825. He was fourth son in a family of ten children, of Moses and Mary (Russell) Warren. The former, a native of Peterboro', N. H., was a merchant the most part of his life, extensively interested in slate quarries, and opened the first quarries at Hoosick. Spent some time as a farmer, was the first sheriff of Rensselaer Co., N. Y., and a member of the Senate two terms. He died in 1844, aged sixty-five. His wife died in 1875, at the age of eighty-three, at the residence of her son, Mr. D. D. Warren, in Springfield.

Mr. Warren left school at the age of fifteen, and spent the remainder of his minority as a clerk for various wholesale grocery merchants. In March, 1846, he came to Springfield, Mass., and was engaged for the first sixteen years as a wholesale grocery merchant, was interested in paper-making, and for a short time was engaged in the stove and hardware business. In 1864 he became a contractor, and with Hon. Willis Phelps constructed most of the Council Bluffs and St. Joseph Railroad, and the Missouri Valley road. Mr. Warren alone built the Watertown and Carthage road, and, in connection with Mr. Phelps, constructed the Lake Ontario Shore Railroad and the Connecticut Central road, the latter of which he has been president of since 1876. In partnership with William Birnie he built the Springfield and New London road, and a portion of the Troy and Greenfield road in its reconstruction. Since 1864, Mr. Warren has been largely interested in the manufacture of paper, was stockholder and president of the Union Paper and Manufacturing Company, of Holyoke, stockholder and director of the Worthy Paper Company, of Mitteneague, and is the sole owner and carries on the paper-mills at Bondsville and Pepperell, Mass. Mr. Warren has not been an idle spectator of the great political questions of the day; as a life-long Democrat he has taken an active part in local and State politics, and his counsel has been fixed and valuable in his party. Never seeking any honor or emolument that office can confer, nor accepting any position at the hands of his friends, he chose rather the unostentatious ways of business to that of public favor.

In the year 1847 he married Mary Louise, daughter of Joseph Weatherhead, of Springfield. His children living are Joseph W., a graduate of Harvard University, and now a student in the Medical University of Bonn, Germany; Thomas B., a graduate of Harvard University, and now an attorney and counselor-at-law in Springfield; and Louise M. His wife died in 1864. For his second wife he married, in 1873, Mary L., daughter of O. E. Watson, of Oswego, N. Y. Their children are Grace Evans and Daniel D. Warren.

GEORGE RICHARD DICKINSON

was born in Readsboro', Vt., Dec. 15, 1832, and is a son of Caleb Dickinson, a native of Amherst, Mass., who was a farmer by occupation. His minority was spent at home in the routine of attending school and farm-labor, and he received, besides the advantages of the common school, a term at the Warnerville Seminary. This completed his early education, and his subsequent business career has fully demonstrated that the basis then laid, together with his indefatigable energy and sagacity in matters of business, has won him an enviable financial position among the younger business-men of Springfield.

At the age of twenty-one, Mr. Dickinson began business on his own account, his first occupation being that of a tin-peddler, with headquarters at North Adams, Mass. He was subsequently engaged in the same business for four years, from Templeton, Mass. In the year 1857 he moved to Springfield, when he entered into a partnership with Henry Smith,—one of his former employers,—for the manufacture of tin-ware and trade in paper-stock, with a limited capital of only $3000, of which Mr. D. was able to furnish but $857.

The business so increased that in 1864 he established a branch manufactory in New Haven, Conn., with his brother, Royal C., under the firm-name of R. C. Dickinson & Co.

In 1867 he bought the interest of his partner in Springfield, paying therefor nearly ten times the amount of the original capital of both, and took into business relation with himself Mr. Alfred N. Mayo, who had been his clerk for some three years. During the same year he also established a branch house at Norwich, Conn., with his brother, D. M. Dickinson, and one at Waterbury, Conn., with his brother-in-law, David B. Clark. Mr. Clark died in 1877, and the firm is now "Dickinson & Grilley."

In 1874 the firm of Dickinson & Mayo, in connection with R. C. Dickinson, purchased the Excelsior Paper-Mill, of Holyoke, which they are now successfully operating.

The business of which Mr. Dickinson is the head has, from its small beginning in 1857, reached an amount of nearly a million dollars in 1878, doing business with nearly all of the neighboring paper-towns of the East and dealing in all parts of the United States.

Mr. Dickinson has been quite largely interested in the sale and purchase of real estate in Springfield for years past. His life has been one of activity. He is interested in the various enterprises of the city designed for its improvement and for the benefit of its citizens. In 1877 he was elected a member of the city council and placed upon the finance committee and committee on city property. He served as alderman in 1878, and was again chosen for 1879. In politics he is identified with the Republican party.

Jan. 11, 1859, he married Mary Jane, daughter of Edward Clark, of Petersham, Mass. By this union he has one child living,—Henry Smith Dickinson. His wife died in 1863. For his second wife he married, in 1864, Hattie A., daughter of Edward Clark, then of Worcester, though formerly of Petersham.

ALEXANDER BIRNIE

was born in Porto Bello, Scotland, May, 1803. He received his preliminary education in the schools of Edinburgh. His father, George Birnie, was a native of Aberdeenshire, and emigrated to America with his family in 1827, settling in Morris Co., N. J. His eldest son, George, Jr., had previously come to this country, which fact probably induced the father to emigrate. George Birnie, Sr., was a master-builder, and upon reaching this country at once took a contract to construct the mason-work on the Morris Canal. About one year after arriving here he died, leaving the contract to be completed by his son, Alexander, who was associated with him in business. His wife was Ann Inery, also a native of Aberdeenshire, Scotland. Their children were twelve, only seven of whom reached maturity, viz.: George (deceased), Alexander (deceased), Euphemia (Mrs. William Ross, Batavia, N. Y.), Joseph (deceased), Catherine (Mrs. Alexander Ross formerly, but now Mrs. George Robb, of Genesee, Wis.), Ann (Mrs. Wm. Lemon, of Oxford, Province of Ontario), and William, of Springfield.

Mr. Alexander Birnie, after completing the contract taken with his father, contracted for his first railroad work in the construction of the Patterson and Hudson River Railroad, followed by the construction of the bridge over the Passaic River. About 1832 he removed with the family to Massachusetts, settling in Berkshire County, where his mother died a few years after. In this State he took contracts on the Boston and Providence line, one of the earliest in the Eastern States; extensive contracts on the Stonington, and also on the Western or Boston and Albany Railroads. He was continuously engaged as a contractor for some thirteen years, until about 1842, when he bought a place at Hastings, on the Hudson River, and erected a stone dwelling, where he resided about twenty years. Very soon after he purchased another place, adjoining his former one, and erected a fine brick residence; but while engaged in beautifying his grounds, in the preparation of an artificial fish-pond, he was accidentally killed while blasting rock, Aug. 13, 1858.

Mr. Birnie was a plain, unostentatious man, gave little attention to politics, and led a strictly business life. He was a man of great activity, courage, and force of character, and carried forward to successful completion whatever he undertook. In the year 1836 he married Mary S., daughter of Joel and Azubah (Whitney) Adams, of Providence, R. I. She was born in 1807. Her father and mother were natives of Worcester Co., Mass.

Their children are Mrs. James Haviland, of Ludlow, George A., of Brooklyn, N. Y., Mrs. Andrew Bryant, William A., and Mrs. Charles A. Dresser, of Springfield.

WARREN H. WILKINSON was born in Marlborough, N. H., July 9, 1825. He is the lineal descendant, in the sixth generation, of John Wilkinson, who settled in Attleboro', Mass., about 1700. His grandfather, David Wilkinson, was a soldier under Benedict Arnold in the war of Independence, and was quietly stowed away in a sleigh, under some bean straw, when the British were expected to take possession of West Point, betrayed by the traitor Arnold. He was also present at the execution of the spy, Maj. André. At the close of the war he finished learning his trade of harness- and saddlery-making, at Walpole, and moved to Marlborough, Cheshire Co., N. H., where he died at about the age of eighty-one years.

It was at this place that David Wilkinson, Jr. (father of Mr. Warren H.), was born. He has spent a long life in the same business carried on by his father, and at the age of seventy-nine is still in the business and in robust health. In 1823 he married Patty Hubbard, of Putney, Vt., who bore him four sons and five daughters, of whom only two of the sons were living in 1878, viz., Warren H. and Solon Stone Wilkinson, the latter of Keene, N. H. During his boyhood, besides the routine of attending school and farm-labor at home, Mr. Wilkinson began as early as the age of ten to work in the harness-shop of his father, and during his minority acquired a thorough knowledge of the business by which mainly he attained the competence he enjoyed in later years.

Before reaching his majority he attended two terms at an academy, which completed his school-days. At the age of twenty-three he became a partner with his father, and continued in the harness business in Marlborough until 1853, supplying not only the home demand, but also stores in Keene, Peterboro', and Greenfield, Mass. He was in business in Greenfield for six years, and removed to Springfield, which has since been his home.

Upon the breaking out of the late civil war, Mr. Wilkinson received an order for military work from the quartermaster of the State of Connecticut, which, being satisfactorily filled, led to orders from other States and from the United States government for the manufacture of military leather goods of various kinds during the continuance of the war. For many of these he furnished improved patterns, which were adopted, and are still used in the service. For the past three years he has received orders for military work in large quantities from foreign countries.

Since 1869 he has been engaged in the manufacture of horse-blankets, first at Marlborough, then at Winchester, Mass., and, as his business increased, removed the work to Holyoke, Mass., where he has one of the largest mills of the kind in the country, and has, since the war, kept in his employ from fifty to four hundred persons.

Mr. Wilkinson's life has been devoted to business, yet he has not failed to remember early benefits by liberally giving to institutions needing pecuniary support, and especially to the Church of his choice,—the Congregational.

He has never been active in politics. He first voted with the Whig and later with the Republican party. He has served as alderman of the city for some three years. He married first Almira, a daughter of Asa Frost, of Marlborough. She died in 1874. He has since married Emily J., daughter of James Brown, of Brimfield, Mass.

The line of descent of the Wilkinson family is as follows: Warren H., son of David, son of David, Jr., son of David, Sr., son of Joseph, who was the son of John, mentioned in the beginning of this sketch.

DR. HENRY A. COLLINS was born at South Hadley, Mass., Aug. 27, 1826. He was the youngest of the family (three sons and one daughter) of Henry Collins, who was also a native of South Hadley. His father dying while Henry was an infant, the mother and children were cared for by his grandfather, Deacon Josiah White, of the same place, where Henry's boyhood was spent at school. His preparation for college was made at the Williston Seminary, and in 1847 he entered Yale, under the tutorship of Dr. Nathan B. Ives. He was graduated an M.D. from that institution in the year 1850, and began in the same year as a regular practitioner in Conway, Mass., where he remained nearly three years and removed to Springfield. While a student of Yale College and during the days of the cholera in New Haven, Dr. Collins was impressed with the idea that other treatment of cases than that of the regular practice would yield better results, and while at Conway, by study, actual practice, and experiment, he became convinced of the feasibility of the theory of Hahnemann, or the homeopathy practice, and upon reaching his new field of labor at once began the practice of it. At that time only Drs. Swazey and Graves were practitioners of that school in Springfield. The former subsequently removed from Springfield, and the latter continued there in practice until his death.

Dr. Collins met at the outset the difficulties of a new-comer and a comparatively new theory, but a will to do and the merits of the practice he represented soon won for him a place in the profession, and now, as the oldest living of his school in the city, he enjoys the confidence of a large circle of friends in both city and country, among the most intelligent and wealthy families.

He is a member of the American Institute of Homeopathy, and also of the Homeopathic Medical Society of Western Massachusetts. He was first married to Juliette, daughter of Jesse P. Bliss, of North Wilbraham, Mass. His wife dying January, 1855, he was married, in November, 1856, to Mary J., daughter of Martin Graves, of Springfield.

DANIEL HITCHCOCK

was born in Springfield, Jan. 30, 1796. The family of Hitchcock is one of the oldest in the valley, and settled here about the same time as the Pyncheon and Chapin families. Stephen Hitchcock, his maternal grandfather, was a farmer by occupation, and the homestead occupied by him is now owned and occupied by the only daughter of Daniel Hitchcock,—Miss Harriet B. Hitchcock.

Of Stephen's two brothers, one, Daniel, was a prominent lawyer of Providence, R. I., and the other, Gad, settled in Connecticut.

On the paternal side little is known of the family, definitely, farther back than his grandfather, Josiah Hitchcock, who resided near Springfield, and was a large land-owner during his time. His children were Josiah, Luther, and Heber. Of these, the first was father of the subject of this narrative, and had other children,—Festus, Erastus, Pamela (Mrs. Wm. Ball), Gad, John and Catharine (twins), and William. Mrs. Ball and William only are living.

Mr. Hitchcock, following the occupation of his father, was a farmer, and to some extent dealt in real estate. He was a man of strict fidelity to principle, of correct habits, and good judgment. He never sought the excitement coincident with politics, but affiliated first with the Whig and subsequently with the Republican party. He only asserted the right of every citizen,—that of free suffrage. At one time he was chosen a member of the city council. March 18, 1824, he married Lydia, daughter of Asa Day, of Granby, Mass. She was born Feb. 7, 1796, and died June 28, 1870. Mr. Hitchcock died July 1, 1877, leaving an only daughter, before mentioned. A view of his late residence will be found on another page of this work.

MILTON A. CLYDE

was born in Windham, N. H., in 1816, and early learned the stone-mason's trade. Coming to Massachusetts when the Western Railroad was being constructed, in 1838, he worked for Capt. Horace Stone, laying stone along the line of the road. Developing a rare business tact, he soon formed a partnership with Capt. Stone, which was continued many years. The firm of Stone & Clyde took numerous small contracts on the road west of Springfield, and on its completion to Albany, Mr. Clyde came to Springfield, and contracted to fill the meadow, east of Main Street, where the old Boston and Albany freight-yard and side-tracks are located. On the completion of this work Stone & Clyde took a contract for grading on the Hartford and Springfield Railroad, and in 1843 contracted with Boody, Ross & Co. for the stone-work along the line of the road. Mr. Clyde was afterward connected with Mr. Boody in various enterprises, among which was the building of the Niagara Falls and Buffalo Railroad. In 1853-54, Mr. Clyde built the old Hampshire and Hampden Railroad (now a part of the New Haven and Northampton), from Westfield to Northampton. Soon after he became associated with Sidney Dillon, who afterward became president of the Union Pacific Railroad, under the name of Dillon, Clyde & Co., of which Mr. Clyde was the working manager, and for many years afterward the firm was noted as one of the greatest contracting concerns in the country. One of their earlier operations, and a most profitable one, by the way, was the "great fill" on the Lake Shore Railway, between Cleveland, O., and Erie, Pa. Afterward they were engaged in a similar operation on the New Jersey Central Railroad. The firm of Dillon, Clyde & Co. were also heavy contractors on the still unfinished portion of the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad, between Waterbury, Conn., and Fishkill, N. Y., in which they were engaged for several years. About 1868, Mr. Clyde built the first Hartford reservoir, and subsequently the firm of Dillon, Clyde & Co. built the Connecticut Valley Road, from Hartford to Saybrook. They also built the Rockville branch of the Providence and Fishkill Road, and the Springfield and Providence Railroad, from Providence to Pascoag, R. I., in which Mr. Clyde was a director. But the great work of Mr. Clyde's life was the building of the famous underground railway at New York, from Harlem Bridge to the Grand Central Depot, on which Dillon, Clyde & Co. were engaged for more than two years. The contract price for this great work was five million three hundred thousand dollars. The success of this enterprise was largely due to Mr. Clyde's wonderful executive ability, which was ever the marked feature of his character. It was a common remark among contractors that Mr. Clyde could do a job of work cheaper than any other man in the United States. Of an iron constitution, he spared neither himself nor his men in carrying out his enterprises, and it was his untiring devotion to business that caused his death, which occurred Jan. 24, 1875.

The rugged, honest, determined spirit which Mr. Clyde possessed in a remarkable degree, joined to an exceptionally strong and healthy body, highly fitted him for success in the vocation which he pursued. Being almost entirely without educational advantages in youth, his success in life was due to the native integrity and force of character which characterized him during a life of almost unceasing activity.

In 1848 he married Miss Caroline V., daughter of Joseph E. and Sybil (Valentine) Read, of Fall River. Their children are an only son (died at birth), Evelyn L. (Mrs. James D. Gill), Carrie Minnie (died at the age of sixteen), and Hattie F.

JOHN B. ADAMS

was born in Marlboro', Middlesex Co., Mass., Dec. 10, 1814. He was the third son (in a family of four sons and one daughter) of Joel Adams, a native of Northbridge, Worcester Co., Mass., and a resident at various periods of Marlboro', Mass., of Greenbush, N. Y., and of Providence, R. I. At the latter place he died, Aug. 31, 1841, aged sixty-two. His mother, Azubah (Whitney) Adams, was a native of Westboro', Mass., and died in Providence, June 29, 1835, aged forty-nine. Of the children, besides Mr. Adams, only the sister, Mrs. Alexander Birnie, is living. Until Mr. Adams was eighteen years old, his time was mostly spent at school in Providence. For the three following years he was a clerk in his father's store, where he acquired a practical business education. Upon reaching his majority, he was for two years engaged on the construction of the Stonington Railroad, and for four years afterward on the Western and the Norwich and Worcester Railroads, with contractors Birnie, McManus & Co., until the completion of the roads in 1841. In this capacity Mr. Adams displayed such integrity of character and business ability as to retain the confidence of his employers, and command their influence for the future. In the year 1841, and before the full completion of the road, Mr. Adams was appointed a conductor on the Western (now Boston and Albany) Railroad, and ran the first train of passenger-cars over the road, from Albany to Springfield. In this position he remained, conducting the morning train from Springfield to Albany and return, for thirty-two years, probably the longest time served by any one man in a public position of this kind in the State. During these years the distance traveled was equivalent to traveling around the world about seventy-four times. It is said that during eighteen months of these years he was on the road continuously, without losing a trip.

In 1852, Mr. Adams received, as a token for his courtesy, fidelity, and kindness to all classes of society, for his sleepless vigilance and assiduous attention to the duties he had in charge, a service of silver plate, with the following inscription engraved thereon:

"To John B. Adams, Conductor of W. R. Road, for his unflinching kindness, his unremitting attention, and his constant care, this testimonial is presented by a few of his friends, Jan. 1, 1852."

Nov. 26, 1873, Mr. Adams resigned his position as conductor, to take effect on and after December 1st of that year; since which time he has resided in Springfield. An engraving of his residence may be seen on another page of this work.

During his service as conductor on the Boston and Albany Railroad, he was also interested in the construction of the Pittsfield and North Adams Railroad.

It is a fact worthy of note that Mr. Adams received many expressions of confidence and esteem from prominent personages who traveled upon his train, and one in particular from Henry Clay, during his last trip to the New England States, written unsolicited, and showing the uniform attention he gave to all who came in his way.

He was originally connected with the Whig party, and was quite active in the ranks, but since the disappearance of that party he has looked rather to principles than to party, and is therefore independent in politics.

In the year 1838 he married Alice A. H., daughter of John Cook, of Tiverton, R. I. By this union there have been born two sons and two daughters,—Mrs. Charles E. Winton, of Springfield, John C., Alice W., and William H.,—all living.

THE SOUTHWORTH FAMILY.

The history of the Southworth family can be traced with entire certainty through many generations of the English squirarchy and gentry from Sir Gilbert Southworth, of Southworth Hall, Lancaster, England, in the fourteenth century, down through ten generations, the unbroken line in England being as follows: Sir Gilbert, Sir John, Sir Thomas, Richard Southworth, of Salisbury, Sir Christopher, Sir John, Sir Thomas, of Warrington, Richard, of London, Sir Thomas, recorder of wills, Somersetshire, to Edward, who, in 1598, married the beautiful and gifted Alice Carpenter, daughter of Alexander Carpenter. Mr. Southworth, with his two sons, Constant and Thomas, fled to Holland with that company of Pilgrim Fathers which left England on account of the great persecution of the Dissenters by the Church of England. He died after a few years' residence in the city of Leyden, where most of the pilgrims had settled. His widow Alice followed the fortunes of the "Mayflower" exiles on the ship, and arrived in Plymouth in August, 1623, where she soon married William Bradford, second Governor of the Plymouth colony. The two sons followed their mother to America, in 1628, and both became distinguished men in the colony. Thomas had two children, both daughters. Constant married Elizabeth Collier, of Duxbury, on Nov. 2, 1639, by whom he had a large family. He was one of the original proprietors of the town of Bridgewater, Plymouth Co., Mass. His son Edward married Mary Peabodie, of Bridgewater, in November, 1671, while his son Edward, second, married Elizabeth Bosworth, June 11, 1711, and his son Edward, third, born in December, 1718, married Lydia Packard, of Bridgewater, Dec. 16, 1750. They had four sons and five daughters. The names of the sons were Uriah, Perez, Edward, Abiah; all the family except Perez removed from Bridgewater to Pelham.

HON. WELLS SOUTHWORTH was the son of Dr. Abiah Southworth, who was born March 6, 1760, and studied medicine with the celebrated Dr. Wells, of Montague, Mass., and was a practicing physician in Pelham for more than forty years. He married, in 1794, Kezia Boltwood, of Amherst, Mass., daughter of Solomon and Mary Boltwood. Mr. Boltwood was high-sheriff under King George (III.) for the county of Hampshire, Mass. Dr. Southworth's children were Rufus, Mary, Wells, Edward, and Martha. Rufus was born Feb. 3, 1796, and died in Charleston, S. C., Oct. 11, 1828; Wells, Aug. 17, 1799; Edward, July 3, 1804, died Dec. 11, 1869; and Martha, born May 10, 1807, who is the wife of Robert Curtis, Esq., of Bridgewater, residing now in Elmwood, Mass. Dr. Southworth died in South Hadley Falls, Mass., Dec. 27, 1835, and his wife April 28th previously.

Mr. Wells Southworth has been married three times. His first wife was Miss Rebecca C. Woodburn, of Salem, Mass., whom he married September, 1828, and who died at Chicopee Falls, Mass., in 1839. For his second wife he married Widow Frances Rebekah Lyon, daughter of Mr. E. T. Smith, of South Hadley, Mass., in November, 1840, and she died in March, 1844. On March 17, 1845, Mr. Southworth was married to his present wife, Miss Harriet Maria Jillett, of Rome, N. Y., whose father, the Rev. Moses Jillett, was pastor of the Presbyterian Church in that city for thirty-four years. Mr. Southworth has had six children, only three of whom are living,—Horatio Woodburn, born Jan. 15, 1839; united in marriage in New York City, Oct. 22, 1862, with Florence C. Allen; Harriet Mills, born Dec. 13, 1846, and married, Jan. 27, 1876, to Col. George Hastings, of New York; and Edward Wells, born Jan. 14, 1854, an attorney in New York City. Horatio W. is now associated with his father in business.

Mr. Southworth first engaged in business in 1823 as a merchant, in Pelham, Mass., but in 1828 he removed to Chicopee Falls, Mass. (a precinct of Springfield), where he followed the same business up to 1839, when he removed to Mittenague, West Springfield, where he built a fine writing-paper mill, now owned by the Southworth Paper Company, and for more than fifty years has been the president of this corporation. He is still an active business-man, and is to-day the only active paper-manufacturer in the United States who was born in the eighteenth century. In the year 1854, Mr. Southworth removed his residence to New Haven, Conn., for the purpose of educating his children, and has been interested in many of the business enterprises of that city and State. In the spring of 1855 he organized the City of New Haven Fire Insurance Company, and was for ten years its president. The institution, under his management, was very successful. He was also a stockholder and director in the Tradesmen's Bank of New Haven, and has been one of the largest stockholders and a director in the Second National Bank of New Haven since its organization. He is also a large stockholder in the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, besides being engaged in other enterprises. Politically, in early life, Mr. Southworth was a Whig, and took an active part in the questions of the day. On the organization of the Republican party he became a member of it, and has twice represented Springfield, and once West Springfield, in the Massachusetts Legislature. He has long been a member of the Congregational Church, which he has assisted largely with his means, as he has many other worthy objects.

HON. EDWARD SOUTHWORTH,

a younger brother of Wells Southworth, was born in Pelham, Mass., July 3, 1804. His boyhood was passed at his home, where he enjoyed whatever advantages the common schools could offer. At the age of sixteen he was sent to the academy at Amherst, Mass., where he prepared for college. He entered Harvard College in 1822, and graduated in 1826, in a class which numbered among its members Andrew P. Peabody, LL.D., of Cambridge; Dr. Willard Parker, of New York; Hon. Samuel H. Walley and Hon. Stephen M. Weld, of Boston, and other distinguished men. After graduating, he went at once to Charleston, S. C., where he took the position of instructor in ancient languages, in an academy established by his brother Rufus, and of which the latter was principal. His brother dying in 1828, Mr. Southworth succeeded him, and carried on the school until 1833, when ill health compelled him to return to the North. For the next six years he was engaged in business at South Hadley Falls, Mass., and in 1839 removed to West Springfield, and with Mr. Wells Southworth, of New Haven, established the Southworth Manufacturing Company, for making paper. He also held the office of postmaster in West Springfield for several years. In 1853, Mr. Southworth was elected representative to the Massachusetts Legislature, where he served two years. In 1854 he was elected to the State Senate, and was given his seat by a vote of that body over his opponent; but his sense of honor would not allow him to accept it, because of some irregularity in the election, and he immediately resigned. In connection with Mr. John H. Southworth, of Springfield, Mr. Wells Southworth, of New Haven, and others, he organized the Hampshire Paper Company, at South Hadley Falls, Mass. He resided in West Springfield until his death. At that time he held the positions of president of the Hampshire Paper Company, of South Hadley Falls, and of the Hampden Paint and Chemical Company, of Springfield, Mass.; treasurer of the Southworth Company, of West Springfield; director of the Springfield Fire and Marine Insurance Company, and the Agawam National Bank, of Springfield, Mass., and of the Massasoit Paper Company, of Holyoke, Mass., and trustee of the Hampden Savings-Bank, of Springfield, Mass.

Mr. Southworth was one of the first to aid Miss Lyon in the founding of the Mount Holyoke Female Seminary, and filled the office of trustee of that institution from its opening until the time of his death. He was also trustee of the fund for indigent students at Amherst College.

Mr. Southworth was for many years a member of the Congregational Church, and for thirty years was a deacon in the First Congregational Church at West Springfield. Their desire that the principles of that form of church government might be understood and appreciated, which form they considered to be thoroughly republican, prompted Mr. Southworth and his brother, Mr. Wells Southworth, to found a lectureship on Congregational Polity, at the Andover Theological Seminary.

Mr. Southworth was three times married: first, to Ann

Elizabeth Shepard, daughter of Rev. Mase Shepard, of Little Compton, R. I.; second, to Mary Woodbury Shepard, daughter of Rev. Thomas Shepard, LL.D., of Bristol, R. I.; third, to Mrs. Harriet Ann Deane, née Thurston, daughter of Rev. David Thurston, LL.D., of Winthrop, Me., and widow of Melvin G. Deane, Esq., of Portland, Me. This lady survived him. He left six children, two (George Champlin Shepard, of West Springfield, and Mase Shepard, of Williamstown, Mass.) being the children of his first wife; three (Edward Shepard, of New Haven, Thomas Shepard, and Mary Woodbury Shepard) being children of his second wife; and one (Alice Harriet S.) the daughter of his third wife. He died Dec. 11, 1869, aged sixty-five.

of Springfield, Mass., a son of Deacon John Southworth and Betsey Willis Heywood, daughter of Luther Heywood, and a grandson of Perez Southworth, of Bridgewater (who was a brother of Mr. Wells Southworth's father), was born on the 9th of October, 1818. He was educated at North Bridgewater, Mass., and commenced business as a clerk in the dry-goods house of Charles Atherton and Enoch Herton, in 1836, at New Bedford, Mass., but, his health failing, he removed to Chicopee Falls, Mass., and acted as merchant for the firm of F. A. L. Adams & Co.; but, not regaining his health, he went to Dartmouth, his native place, and remained during the years 1840 and 1841. In 1842 he entered into a copartnership with Capt. Michael Baker, for the purpose of engaging in the business of general merchandising, in South Dartmouth. In the year 1844, Mr. Southworth removed to Westfield, Mass., and there engaged in the business of staple and fancy dry-goods. In 1847 he became interested at Mittenague, with Mr. Wells Southworth, in building the Agawam Canal Company Cotton-Mills, acting as resident engineer, paymaster, and book-keeper for the corporation. In 1849 he accepted an offer from Mr. William H. Inlay to become the business agent of two paper-mills, situated, one in Poquannock and the other in Rainbow, Conn., where he remained until the winter of 1851, the business proving successful under his management.

In the winter of 1851, Mr. Southworth took up his residence in Philadelphia, Pa., taking charge of the paper warehouse of the Southworth Manufacturing Company in that city. He soon increased its business more than sixfold, besides largely increasing its business in paper-stock, and in 1854 he was made a director in the company. In 1860 he was elected alderman of the Tenth Ward, Philadelphia, over the Democratic and Independent candidate, by a large majority. He was also a member of the Union League. In answer to a newspaper threat growing out of the Southern difficulty, he was one of those who marched down Chestnut Street and up Walnut, passing the office of the publication on their way.

In this year he, in connection with his kinsmen, Messrs. Wells and Edward Southworth, bought a controlling interest in the Glasgow Paper Company, of South Hadley Falls, Mass. (it now being the Hampshire mill), and acted as its agent and as a director, and in 1868 also became its treasurer, and in 1870 its president. He had also become interested in the Greenleaf & Taylor Manufacturing Company, and was president of the same. In the year 1872 he removed his residence from Philadelphia to Round Hill, Springfield, Mass. In the previous year (1871) he had become largely interested in the manufacture of gas-fixtures, in company with Benjamin Thackary and W. S. Buck, of Philadelphia, under the name of Thackary, Buck & Co., of 718 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia. In the year 1872 he became largely interested in the Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing-Machine Company, and in 1874 was elected the president of and a director in the company. In 1873 he was elected a director in the Agawam National Bank, of Springfield, Mass.; in 1874 a director in the Glasgow Gingham-Mills, of South Hadley Falls, and has been their president since 1876.

Although actively engaged in business, Mr. Southworth has found time to visit many of the countries of the Old World, having made three trips to Europe. In 1871 he visited the most of Europe, with the exception of the Russian empire. In 1874 he visited Great Britain and France, and in 1875 most of the Continent. During the last summer Mr. Southworth was on a train on the Union Pacific Railroad when attacked by robbers, and was quite severely wounded in the arm. In the year 1843, Mr. Southworth married Miss Sarah Law, of Nantucket, Mass., and there were born to them three children, Sarah Elizabeth, in 1841, who died the same year; in 1845, John Wells, who died at the age of twenty-eight in 1873; and in 1847, Sarah Law, who lived to be only nine months old. Mrs. Southworth died in 1847, at the age of twenty-nine years. In 1854, Mr. Southworth married Miss Elizabeth Henderson, of Philadelphia, Pa., and under this marriage there have been born four children,—Charles H., Nov. 1, 1856 (now associated with his father in business); Ida M., March 13, 1858; Edward Courtlandt, Aug. 25, 1860,—he graduates at Andover this year (1879), and enters immediately into the paper-business with his father; and Nina E., Nov. 7, 1862, who lived only until the following July.

WEST SPRINGFIELD.

GEOGRAPHICAL.

THIS township is situated on the west side of Connecticut River, very near the geographical centre of the county, and is bounded on the north by Holyoke, on the south by Agawam, on the east by the city of Springfield and the town of Chicopee, from which it is separated by the Connecticut River, and on the west by the town of Westfield.

It lies in the triangle formed by the two rivers, and its dimensions approximate three and a half by five miles, with an area of about 11,000 acres.

NATURAL FEATURES.

Its distinguishing features are a broad level plain, extending parallel to the Connecticut River along its eastern side, falling away to a lower, narrow "terrace" along the two rivers, with hilly uplands in the west, culminating in the lofty trap ridge which forms its western boundary.

The soil of the plain is a sandy loam, while the bottomlands along the Connecticut and Agawam Rivers consist mostly of a fine alluvium. The scenery in places along the Agawam, particularly at Mitteneague and where the river passes through the trap range, is rugged and interesting. There is considerable drift, and in some localities extensive moraines of boulders are found.

The geological formations consist of the red sand-rock of the valley, the greenstone or dolerites of the trap formation, drift, and lacustrine and alluvial deposits. A small deposit of rotten and impure limestone is said to exist in the northwestern part of the town, which has been utilized to a considerable extent in the manufacture of hydraulic cement, or water-lime.* A few fossils, principally from the vegetable kingdom, have been found. Various minerals, such as hornblende, mica, tourmaline, graphite, quartz, feldspar, etc., are found in the drift deposits; and many relics of the prehistoric period have been unearthed in the soil of the terrace formations along the Agawam and Connecticut Rivers. The various soils of the town are generally well adapted to grazing and grain-growing, and the business of the people has been, until recently, mostly agricultural. Besides the two rivers which bound the town on the east and south, there are a number of small streams, the most important of which is Pautuck Brook, which takes its rise in the town of Holyoke, and, passing through the Ashley ponds, discharges into the Agawam River, near the southwest corner, after a course, bearing a little west of south, of about eight miles.

Lying parallel to this stream, along its eastern bank, is an outlying and inferior range of the trap formation, which is finely exposed at the railway cutting near the mouth of the brook. Here the trap may be seen overlying the sandstone in a position perpendicular to the dip of the latter.

Block Brook rises in a peat marsh in the northwestern portion of the town, and, running south, discharges into the Agawam, about one mile above the village of Mitteneague. On the eastern side of the town are the Darby, Barker, and Ashley Brooks, which rise in the hilly uplands of the central portions and discharge into the Connecticut River. The Pautuck Brook furnishes considerable power near the outlet of the Ashley ponds. There are also several small ponds in the township.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

In 1633 the government of Great Britain, becoming alarmed at the increasing emigration to the New England colonies, which were spreading with remarkable rapidity, as was evident from the fact that already a half-score of parishes had been established and churches erected, took measures to check the movement. An order was issued by the king forbidding further emigration, and many who had made preparation to settle in America were prevented from leaving the kingdom. But means were found whereby the order was evaded, and a colony of about 200 persons, including Cotton, Hooker, and Stone, quietly left England, and arrived safely in America in that year.

The Connecticut River first became known to the English in 1631, and early in the fall of 1633 John Oldham, Samuel Hall, and two others, from Dorchester, traveled through the wilderness and stood upon its banks. Pleased with the kindness of the natives, the meadows on either side, the abundance of game and fish, and the apparent fertility of the soil, they returned to their friends and made a favorable report.

A number of men, led by William Holmes, left the Plymouth colony by water, in October of that year, and sailed up the Connecticut River as far as the present town of Windsor, Conn. Here they built the first dwelling-house erected by a white man in the Connecticut Valley.

In July, 1634, six men from Newtown (Cambridge) visited the river with a view to settlement, but permission was not granted them by the General Court to remove. The next year, however, a petition was presented by the inhabitants of Cambridge, Dorchester, Watertown, and Roxbury, to the General Court, then in session at Newtown, for leave to emigrate to the Connecticut River. This petition was granted, May 6, 1635, with the condition that they should locate within the jurisdiction of Massachusetts, and persons were appointed to govern them one year.

Early records lead to the opinion that William Pynchon, Henry Smith, and John Burr visited the spot where now stands Springfield, and selected the location in 1634.

PRESENT RESIDENCE OF WELLS SOUTHWORTH, (A NATIVE OF THE CONNECTICUT VALLEY IN MASS.)
13 YORK SQUARE, NEW HAVEN, CONN.

In the spring following, John Cable and John Woodcock were sent forward to build a boat for crossing the river and a house for the plantation, the boat and house together costing £6. They came to the place called by the Indians Agawam, or Agam, and built a cabin on the west side of the Connecticut River, and on the south side of Agawam River, in the meadow, called from that circumstance and still known as the "Housemeadow" lot. They were informed by the Indians, who were friendly, that the ground on which they had built was subject to inundation.*

William Pynchon, Esq., with seven others, came from Roxbury in the spring of 1636, to what is now Springfield, and on the 14th of May of that year they drew up and signed an agreement concerning their government. Allotments of land were soon made on both sides of the river, the lots on the west side being located as near as possible opposite the "home-lots" on the east side.

As yet no title had been derived from the Indians, and it was deemed advisable, as an act of justice to the natives and a measure of safety to themselves, to make a formal purchase of the land. This was accomplished, and the land on both sides of the river was conveyed to William Pynchon, Esq., Henry Smith, Jehu Burr, and their heirs and associates. It is the first deed ever executed in Western Massachusetts, and is now on record in Hampden County, bearing date July 15, 1636.

This deed included "all that ground or meadow Acomsick, viz.: on the other side of Quana,† and all the ground and meadow on the side of Agawam except cottinackesh, or ground that is now planted" (by the Indians). The total consideration paid for the land deeded on both sides of the river was 18 fathoms of wampum, 18 coats, 18 hoes, 18 hatchets, and 18 knives, of which 10 fathoms of wampum, 10 coats, 10 hoes, 10 hatchets, and 10 knives was the price paid for land on the west side of the river.

A third deed was made June 20, 1666, "of the right of those who gave it to the land at Agawam and Quana, and also the higher meadow and uplands, from the mouth of Agawam River up to the ponds west of it, and all the land into the woods where Ensign Cooper and Samuel Marshfield had a meadow."

The Hon. George Bliss, in his address delivered at the opening of the town-hall in Springfield in 1828, says:

"It is very difficult to fix the time when the inhabitants began to build on the west side of the river. The land then was improved as a common field, as well before as after settlements were commenced. There were, as I believe, three distinct parts of West Springfield, occupied about the same time. One was south of Agawam River, begun by the ancestors of the Leonards and Coopers. Another was in the first parish under the hill, and a third on Chicopee plain above. These commenced, as far as I can ascertain, in 1633, and soon rapidly increased and extended."

As early as 1654-56 a number of house-lots were granted on Chicopee Plain, on the west side of the river, to Francis Pepper, Anthony Dorchester, Samuel Terry, Hugh Dudley, John Dumbleton, Miles Morgan, John Stewart, Obadiah Miller, and Simon Sackett.

March 5, 1659, John Dumbleton had granted to him land on Paucatuck Brook.

Thomas Cooper and Abel Leonard settled on the southwest side of the Agawam, near where their descendants now reside, about the year 1660, and in a short time Thomas Merrick was there also.

There is in possession of J. N. Bagg, Esq., a slip of paper containing the following:

"March 13, 1660-61.—There is Grant^d to Robt. Ashley Six Acres of Meddow

* Probably those who came lodged there until the fall, for the original record of the trial of Woodcock vs. Cable speaks of occupying and cultivating the grounds near them all that summer.

† The land designated in the deed as Quana is the mill-le meadow, adjoining Agawam Meadow.

on the back side of Chicopee Plain, within 2 or 3 mile of the great River where he can find so much undisposed of.

"A copy from Springfield Records, Ex'd by Wm. Pynchon, Clerk."

Within a few years after this there were several grants of house-lots in various places, some as far west as Paucatuck Brook.

The following are the earliest settlers whose names are to be found on record, who were ancestors of the inhabitants in West Springfield: Thomas Horton, Thomas Merrick, John Leonard and Robert Ashley. These all had allotments of land originally on the east side of the river, and are first mentioned there in January, 1639. Rowland Stebbins, Thomas Stebbins, and William Warriner are mentioned in January, 1641. Thomas Cooper removed from Windsor to Springfield in 1641, but mention is first made of him in what is now Agawam in 1660. Samuel Chapin, first mentioned in 1644; Miles Morgan and Francis Pepper, the next year. Benjamin Cooley, Francis Ball, Nathaniel Bliss, Joseph Parsons, Geo. Colton, and Griffith Jones, in 1646. Soon after 1660, persons by the names of Riley, Foster, Jones, Scott, Barber, Rogers, Miller, Parsons, Morgan, Fowler, Leonard, Bodurtha, Ely, Bagg, and Day settled on the west side of the river. Many of these early families have descendants living in West Springfield and Agawam.

In 1673 the number of inhabitants had so increased on the west side of the river that a petition was presented to the town in their behalf, setting forth and asking "that by reason of their great trouble in getting over the river to attend publick worship and other meetings, a boat might be provided at the charge of the town for their accommodation."

This would appear to be the first movement toward a public ferry, as a ferry was established in 1683.‡

In May, 1695, the population on the west side of the river had increased to 32 families, numbering about 200 people, who, being desirous of more convenient religious advantages, presented a petition to the General Court "that they might be permitted to invite and settle a minister," and stated as their reasons "their distance from the place of meeting for the public worship of God, and the difficulties and dangers attending their passing the river, beside many other inconveniences."

The town appointed a committee to protest to the General Court against the petition being granted. The court appointed a committee of several judicious and indifferent persons to investigate the matter, and report at a subsequent session. This report was made favorably to the petitioners on the west side of the river. The following is a literal copy of the record by which West Springfield first became a parish:

"The Great and General Court or Assembly for his Majesties Province of the Massachusetts Bay in New England, begun and held at Boston upon Wednesday ye 27th of May, 1696, in the Eighth year of his Majesties Reign, and Continued by several Adjournments unto Wednesday the 18th of November following.

"Upon reading the petition of the Inhabitants of the Town of Springfield on the West Side of the great River running through the sd town, Commonly called Connecticut River, therein setting forth their distance from the place of meeting for the publick worship of God in sd Town, and the difficulties and danger attending their passing of the sd River, besides many other inconveniences they lye under by reason thereof, being about Thirty-two Families, and in number upwards of Two Hundred Souls, Praying that they may be Permitted to invite and settle a minister on that side of the River, that themselves and families may enjoy the Ordinances of Christ, and their Children not be in danger of becoming heathens for want of Instruction. And a Committee appointed by this Court of indifferent and Judicious persons belonging to the several neighboring Towns to inquire into that matter, having given a Meeting to the Inhabitants of the sd Town, and heard what was offered on both sides, Reporting that they judge the desire of the Petitioners to be reasonable, and that the granting of their Petition will not only promote Religion, but be much also for the worldly advantage of the Town.

"Ordered, That the sd Petitioners be, and hereby are, permitted and allowed to invite, procure and settle, a learned and orthodox Minister on the West side of the sd River, to dispense the word of God unto those that dwell there, and that they be a distinct and separate Precinct for that purpose, the River to be the dividing Line; And that the present inhabitants on the west side of the ^{sd} River, together with such as shall from time to time settle among them, have liberty to convene together, to advise, agree upon, and take such methods, as may be suitable and convenient for the procuring, encouraging, settling, and support of a minister qualified as aforesaid, and for the building of a Meeting-House, according as shall be determined by a Major Vote, and also to nominate and appoint a Committee of three or more persons among themselves to transact and manage that affair. And all the inhabitants and Estates under their improvement lying on the west side of the said River shall stand charged towards the settlement and support of the ministry in said place in manner as the law relating to the maintenance and support of ministers does direct and provide, and be assessed thereto proportionably by two or more assessors, as shall from time to time be elected and appointed by the major part of the said inhabitants for that purpose, who may also nominate and appoint a Collector to gather and pay in the same as by warrant or order under the hands of such assessors he shall be directed, and when and so soon as the Inhabitants of said Precinct shall have procured a learned and orthodox minister to preach the word of God among them they shall be freed and exempt from paying towards the support of the ministry on the other side of the River, and for so long a time as they shall continue to have and enjoy such a minister.

"By order of the Lieutenant Governor Council and Assembly.

"I consent,

"WM. STOUGHTON.

"JAS. ADDINGTON, Sec^{ry}."

A subsequent petition from the inhabitants on the west side was presented to the court, and was considered by that body, and granted; and it was ordered "that the inhabitants of the east side should pay them £50 toward building a meeting-house, and that there should be a division of the land that had been set apart for the use of the ministry."

This order seems not to have been promptly complied with, for in the parish register, of date Nov. 11, 1703, at a meeting of the inhabitants, it was Voted "that the Present Committee demand of the other side the fifty pound granted by the General Court."

And December 14th of the same year,

"At this meeting Deacon Barber, Benj. Leonard, and John Miller were chosen a Committee to treat with the inhabitants, or whom they shall appoint, with respect to the settling of the ministry lands and the obtaining the fifty pound granted to us by the Court, and to make report of what they due to the people."

On the 14th day of February, 1703, at a meeting of the inhabitants, it was voted "to raise £7 cash, in order to the defraying the charge in sending a man to Boston about the concern of the ministry-land."

"Mar. 12, 1706.—At this meeting the inhabitants of the West side of the River put in their petition, which was read, wherein they desire that the east side inhabitants would pay the fifty pounds in provision pay that the Honored Gen. Corte ordered them to pay to the West side.

"2ndly. That the said east side inhabitants would allow them the hundred acres of land the ^{sd} Honored Gen. Corte and whome to have for ye ministry on the West side of ye ^{sd} River.

"& 3dly. That the ^{sd} West side inhabitants might have immediately one-half of the ministry land on the West side the ^{sd} River.

"Which answer as follows:

"1st. For the provision pay The said East side Inhabitants have Two yeeres from ye time of said order to pay said £50.

"2d. For the 2nd the West side inhabitants signify no place where they would have ther hundred acres allowed said West side inhabitants.

"3d. For the 3d branch of said Petition The vote was Negative, yet the discourse was that it might be put to the Ministers to agree about said Division."

The last notice concerning the £50 bears date Dec. 11, 1711, when it was Voted "that the present comitey shall have power to demand, and, if need be, to sue for the money that is yet behind of the fifty pounds, and that the precinct will defend them in the management of that concern."

The trouble arising from the ministry-land is explained in the following, taken from an old record: The terms and conditions on which the west side of the river was set off as a separate parish were not satisfactory to the new parish.

* From the Town Records of Springfield.

† The following is a survey of the Ministerial or First Parish Lot of what is now West Springfield, in Agawam meadow: "Beginning at the South West Corner, at a Poplar Stump, and running N. 21° 45' E. 55½ rods; thence S. 58° 45' E. 37½ rods across the Agawam River, through a large Oak-tree, to a Stone; thence, by land of Thomas Kirkland, S. 0° 45' W. 192½ rods, S. 79° W. 71½ rods; thence S. 77° W. 46 rods by land of the heirs of Marvin Kirkland, Dec'd, to the place of beginning,—containing 9 acres, 2 qrs., 22 rods, including the Agawam River." Surveyed by Wm. H. Butler, Surveyor, March 16, 1863.

Reservations of land for the use of the ministry and of schools had been made in different parts of the town of Springfield. Several lots of improved land lay in the meadow, on the west side, near the Connecticut River, and other lots lay on the southwest and north part of West Springfield. In setting off the new parish no provision was made for an equitable division of the ministry-lands. The old parish claimed the whole, not only those which were located on the east side of the river, where there were liberal reservations for that purpose in various parts of the town, but also all those on the west side.

From the passage of the act of division the west side remonstrated against the terms of separation, claimed the whole of the ministry-lands on their side of the river for the use of their ministry, and sent their agents to Boston to procure redress. In 1702 an additional act was passed, granting to the west side a small portion of the improved lands and all the unimproved lands.

But in respect to the latter the act of the General Court proved wholly unavailing for the purposes for which the land was originally appropriated.

Both the unimproved tracts were, after West Springfield was incorporated as a town, sold by the town of Springfield, and the avails paid into their town treasury. In the adjustment of difficulties growing out of the division of the town, a portion of the amount received from the sale of ministry-lands was paid to the town of West Springfield, and was appropriated then for objects of town expenditure. Thus a reservation, made by our ancestors for the support of religion, was perverted from its original design, and their pious intentions defeated.

SUBDIVISION OF LANDS.

At a meeting of the inhabitants of the Second Parish of Springfield, April ye 7th, 1707, an attempt was made to divide the lands granted by the town to the inhabitants on the west side of the great river. It was "Voted that every male person that is in the 20th year of his age shall be accounted inhabitants according to the names expressed herein, and they to possess the said land as by the law is granted to them. Hear followeth an account how the lots lying on the hill were drawn, and also of both the other divisions as they were numbered. It was agreed to have three divisions,—one below Agawam river, one from the south of the hill next to Agawam River to run to Dorbey Brook, and the next division to begin at Dorbey's Brook, and so to extend to the end of the land given by the town."

This account is followed by changes made in lots by different parties and by descriptions of the boundaries of all the lots, an accurate copy of which may be found in the "Historical and Genealogical Register," for October, 1874, as made by Lyman Baggs.

The following memorandum is found in the parish register, and follows the account of the division of lands in 1707, and was written by Samuel Ely, who was clerk of the parish from 1702 to 1721, excepting the years 1714–15:

"MEMORANDUM.—In order to prevent all Mistakes that may att any time hereafter arise, It is to be remembered that all that was done About the dividng of the land given by the town to the Inhabitants of this Parish, The Proprietors saw cause to Reverse Because of the difficulties with the first Comitey that should have modeled the said land. So that what Records are of the date of 1707 must be understood accordingly. And nothing was done to effect till after the town had chosen a new Comitey for modeling the said land. So the dividng the said land was delayed till the year 1720, as may be seen in the other end of this book, And then it was Completed.

"SAML ELY, Clerk."

THE ABORIGINES.*

"These were the natives found upon the continent of America, and they were once a numerous race; but their numbers have been and still are diminishing, and in some of the States they are nearly extinct. This has not been brought about altogether by pestilence, famine, or war, but by canker, a poison dealt out to them by civilized men in the intoxicating bowl, and thousands of their number have found drunkards' graves at an early period of life.

"These children of the forest were, without doubt, very numerous along the valley of the Connecticut, from its mouth to as far north as Hartford, in Vermont, as they lived mostly on fish in summer, which they would take with very little exertion and without any kind of net excepting the scoop-net, so called.†

"Long after the first grist-mill was built upon the Agawam River, in West Springfield, shad were so plenty that a man would take, in a single day, with a dip or scoop-net, at the south side of the river, at a gap left open for shad and other fish to ascend the stream for the purpose of casting their spawn, a thousand of shad in a very short time, and every other kind of fish inhabiting the rivers of New England.

"To this circumstance is probably owing the great population of the sons of the forest upon the table-lands of the crooked Agawam, all along its banks, from the falls at the first bridge upon the river at Pliny Leonard's, up to the west part of Westfield. Corn could be raised in all the meadow-lands free of timber, and of easy tillage, which to them was of the utmost importance, as their lands were cultivated without the use of tools made of iron and steel.

"The Fathers of West Springfield (thanks to them for it), by way of paying a tribute of respect to the memory of that race of men called Indians, have in this town suffered the names of several places to remain the same given to them by the aborigines. One of these places is Mitineague, another is Pangatuck, and a third, Agawam.

"In the limits of the town of West Springfield there has been discovered four places of interment for their dead, one, near the Springfield Bridge, on the bank of the Agawam (old bed), at the place known as the 'steep banks.' When a boy, I was accustomed, with those of my sunny years, to go and dig out of the bank the old Indian skulls and look for their tools, such as arrow-heads, stone hoes, etc.

"We found some few of their stone hoes, about six to eight inches in length, flat upon one side and round upon the other, two of which were sent to President Stiles, of New Haven College, he being an antiquarian. The bodies of the Indians appeared to have been buried as deep as we are accustomed to do at this day, and a black, rich mould, from one to two inches thick, was to be found, being the flesh, which had returned to the earth as it was. Acorns, pumpkin-seeds, and some other kinds were found.

"When I was a lad, from ten to twelve years of age, and 'swam on bladders in a sea of glory,' in my much-loved Connecticut, there was a remnant of the Farmington Indians who, during the summer, inhabited a wigwam upon the river-bank, a little north of a warehouse erected by Justin Ely, Esq. It was allowed by permission of my grandfather, Capt. Abel Cooley, to be placed upon his land.

"No man in New England was a more sincere friend to these children of the forest than Capt. Cooley. They were, one and all, at times, welcome to his house and invited to stay; his orchard was large, and cider (which with an Indian is his Alpha and Omega), together with victuals, was dealt out with an unsparring hand. No Stockbridge Indian ever passed his house without calling, and none ever was sent away; indeed, Capt. Cooley was known by the Indians from Boston to Detroit.

"Drift-wood in the Connecticut was plenty, so were fish, and as the Indian paid no ground-rent, it was a capital stand for them, as they occasionally made a few brooms and baskets which they could sell for cider, apple-brandy, etc.

"My oldest brother, in company with a son of the Rev. Dr. Lathrop, one day visited the wigwam and found the Indians absent. The boys took it into their heads to cut up a shine among their cooking-utensils. Returning home, Old Moll saw what had been done, and made her report to her godfather, Capt. Cooley. He went to work and found out the rogues, who, having made their acknowledgment for the fault to the Indians, and Dr. Lathrop having made them a friendly visit, the affair was amicably settled.

"Below are the names of all the Indians who hailed from the wigwam upon the river-bank, now the very lot owned by Mr. Isaac Hammerton, and on it were 25 or 30 buttonwood-trees of immense size. Joe Roblin and his wife Moll, John Pette and his wife Lucy, Joshua Robbins and his wife Phebe, Joe Roblin, Samuel Robbins. All of them would get tipsy on cider, and most of them gloriously drunk, and lie, half naked, under a blazing sun for several hours together.

* From the journal of Sewall White.

† In another place in his journal he says, "The Indians wanted no net to catch fish. They built a stone wall with a narrow passage into it and the fish got into, they would not find their way out."

"John Pette, or Pete, had several male children, who all died young, and John, at the interment of one of them, after thanking the good people for their kind and friendly attentions to himself and family, remarked that all his boys served him so. His children were interred in the ancient burying-ground.

"These families resided only during the summer in West Springfield, and in winter retreated to some more favorable spot for the purpose of living by hunting wild game.

"Two places on the bank of the Connecticut River have been discovered where the bones of the sons of the forest have fallen out of the bank after the spring freshets, some of which once might have occupied a place in the body of some mighty warrior, some Nimrod in hunting, or adroit fisherman. Another place for burying the dead was upon the bank of the Agawam, below the bridge, and not far from the house of Capt. Enoch Cooper. The skeleton of an Indian was dug up near the house of Peletiah Ashley, who was buried with his gun, bullet-molds, and other things.

"An Indian by the name of Old Greylock is supposed to have been the most cunning of all the savage race inhabiting this section of the country. 'Tis said that he often boasted of having killed one hundred persons, save one, and that he had taken and carried away many more for the purpose of raising money out of their friends by way of redemption.

"In the time of the French war Old Greylock lay the greater part of one day secreted in a ditch near the ancient burying-ground, watching to kill or take captive Henry Rogers, a robust, giant-like man, of West Springfield. Mr. Rogers was in the field, hoeing corn, and never went into the forest or corn-field without carrying his musket. Greylock, seeing it, came to the resolution at length not to fire upon Mr. R., fearing, as he said afterward, that if he should fail to kill him dead, that he should be dispatched himself at once.

"When Capt. Hawley Champion excavated ground for his cellar two skeletons—sons of the forest—were found in a sitting posture. They had been buried with a quantity of acorns, which were still to be seen, with some other seeds too far decayed to determine of what sort, but such as they, without doubt, supposed—from the indistinct view they had of futurity—that they should stand in need of when they arrived at that happy country beyond the mountains, where the sun goes down, far, far beyond the Pacific, and from thence throws his lingering beams upon the eastern hills and the broad Atlantic.

"The Chi-opee River was, too, the spot where, along its banks, once rose the smoke from the savage wigwam; where he wooed and wed and lived happily with his dusky mate, subsisting upon every kind of fish, of which vast schools ascended the river; and no doubt that the bow and arrow, wielded with the vigor of an Indian's arm, brought to the ground many a fine deer upon the extensive plain, and many a huge turkey, wild goose, and smaller game in abundance.

"It will be asked how these red men subsisted without salt. This question may be answered by saying that men never sigh and grieve for an article of which they have never known the use. Had the ladies of West Springfield never heard of tea, or tasted it, certain it is that they would not repine because they did not have it."

FISHERIES.

"The Chicopee, as well as the Agawam, was celebrated for shad, salmon, alewives, lamprey, and silver-eels, and almost every other kind of the finny race.

"I well remember the time when, at the fish-place called Squash Point, opposite the house of Roderick Palmer, I have seen lying upon the shore 100 fine salmon, taken in a single day by the owners of the fishing-ground; one weighed 42 pounds, the largest ever caught here. I remember the names among them of Tilly Merrick, dubbed Dr. Till, Heman Day, Elijah Day, David Mason, and others.

"The same day about 50 salmon were taken at the place above, called 'Stub Hole,' owned by Horace White, Jonathan Morgan, and Israel Williston. Another fishing-place was up the river some 50 or 60 rods,—the starting-point at the old Rogers house, and the hauling-in-ground opposite the middle of Horace White's home-plot. At this place there were never caught many salmon, but had in some suitable seasons good success in taking shad. It was a hard place to manage a long net; the water was deep and the stream heavy. The place was named, by the facetious Calvin Miller, 'Hard-Scrabble.' Bass, pickerel, perch, suckers, and many other kinds of hook-fish were plenty in the Connecticut.

"In the season of taking shad, and once in a single morning, I threw upon the shore eight fine bass, standing in a fish-boat and using the roe of shad for bait. I never caught a bass weighing over twelve pounds, but Justin Ely, the first, took one on a line weighing twenty-two pounds.

"My skill in fishing I learned from my uncle, Mr. Walter Cooley, who obtained his from that prince of hook-fishermen, and great wit, Joshua Roll in, an Indian, who gave me some lessons also. Mr. Cooley, one day, seeing Josh coming along with a very large string of trout and of uncommon size, asked the fellow where he caught them, and where the best fishing-ground lay. The Indian proposed to tell if Mr. Cooley would give him a gallon of cider, which he readily consented to do. Then said the witty Indian, 'Keih!' the best place to catch fish, Mr. Cooley, is where they will bite best, mind that."

"Benjamin Ashley & Co. had a fish-place just below where the new ferry is, and on seeing the shad running down the river went round to haul, and caught 1100, and never before or afterward caught a single shad.

"Some days when the weather was warm shad were offered at six and one-fourth cents apiece, but generally brought ten and twelve and a half cents each. In the month of May, 1770, in Horace White's day-book, a number of persons were charged with shad at two cents apiece.

"Col. Benjamin Day, Capt. Abel Cooley & Co., had a net twelve rods in length, and fished with it in the mouth of Agawam River. They took so great a number of them that they did not draw the net ashore, but tied it at each end, leaving room for the fish to swim. They took what fish they wanted and left it for their friends to go and help themselves to as many shad as they wished for.

"The name of Shad Lane was given to the great thoroughfare street in West Springfield. It was done at the time when shad were so cheap.

"Great secrecy was once observed in Shad Lane by the lovers of shad, and a knock at the door by a stranger was the signal for the worthy granddame to order off, or to be covered up under the table-cloth, the massive pewter platter of shad, lest her family should be scoffed or jeered at for living upon Agawam pork, the name given to shad. This done, the guest was sure to be invited to take a seat at the table and partake of the bounties of the board, consisting of doughnuts, pancake, and, if on Saturday, basty pudding, and he was allowed to drink cider as often as he pleased from the honest two-quart earthen pitcher, which gradually went round from mouth to mouth until it was drained of its contents and filled as often as it was emptied."

REVOLUTIONARY INCIDENTS.*

"In the Revolutionary war Capt. Levi Ely of this town raised a company of men, and, under the command of Col. Brown, of Pittsfield, marched into the then frontiers of the State of New York, at a place upon the Mohawk River called 'Stone Raib'y or 'Raby,† fell into an ambuscade and their whole army were thrown into confusion by a tremendous fire from the British and the Indians who lay concealed behind a brush fence.

"Col. Brown fell at the first fire, and Capt. Ely was so badly wounded that he was overtaken by the Indians before he reached the fort, and was tomahawked and scalped, together with seventeen of his men; one of the number was a young man, Wainwright Breck, of Northampton, an apprentice to Horace White to learn the trade of a blacksmith. He was hired to go on the expedition thirty days, Mr. White consenting that he should go and take for his own benefit one hundred pounds, which he received before he started. The late Jonathan Taylor, of West Springfield, was in the battle and received a musket-ball in his right thigh, but being an athletic man he, by throwing away his gun and haversack, reached the fort in safety with the Indians close upon him.

"Thomas Taylor was also in the action and barely escaped with his life. After he had reached the fort, panting for the loss of breath, the first words he uttered was, 'As soon as I reach home I will kill old Sam Rolin and all the rest of Capt. Abel Cooley's Indians.' Taylor did reach home, but Sam and the rest of the sons of the forest were still permitted to live many years to make brooms, baskets, catch fish, and drink cider.

"Capt. Levi was a man of great respectability, left a wife with a large family of children in West Springfield. He was buried upon the battle-ground with the slain, but a monument was erected to his memory in the burial-ground near the town-hall.

"It is related of Jonathan Parsons that while driving a fine cattle team (two yoke of oxen and a horse) attached to a load of stalks, when near the southern end of Shad Lane two horsemen overtook him and ordered him to turn out for the coach of Gen. Washington. Not knowing that Washington was expected and doubting the courier's word, he refused, declaring he had as good a right to the road as the general.

"Soon after a coach passed, having forded the Agawam River near the house of James Leonard, on its way to the Springfield ferry. Parsons halted his team near Ferry Street and followed the coach. The boat was on the east side of the river, and while waiting for it the couriers spoke of the teamster that refused to turn out. Parsons overheard Washington say, 'That man was right; he had as good a right to the road as I have.'"

"A Revolutionary Reminiscence of the West Springfield Park.—Our old antiquarian friend from West Springfield, Sewall White, furnishes us the following Revolutionary wail, which is quite appropriate to the anniversary now upon us:—

"The West Springfield Park, which has been the seat of so much improvement lately, and whose fence has been twice painted, principally by the wives and daughters of that staid old town, was once the camping-ground of two British armies. Gen. Amherst, with an army of seven thousand men, first halted two days and nights there, when on his way to Canada; and Gen. Burgoyne, with his captive army, stopped there the same length of time on his embarkation route to Boston. It was at that time that the accomplished Hessian commander, Gen. Riedesel, was by invitation the guest of Rev. Dr. Lathrop, between which parties conversation could be conducted only in Latin. Riedesel owned the best and largest horse in Burgoyne's cavalry, and the charger was reshed in West Springfield by the father of the writer. On the morning of Burgoyne's departure from the Park, a number of his men were missing. The beauty and fertility of the place led at least a dozen men of that army to desert comrades, friends, home, and country. They never saw their companions-in-arms again, but remained in this region, and their descendants are now identified with the best blood of the valley. The names and occupations of these men, most of whom were personally known to the writer, follow:

"† Apollis Miller, farmer; John Andrice Isensee, farmer (he was killed by lightning, while baying in Agawam meadows); Godfrey Vanganeer, miller (commonly called Old Waggoner); Daniel Hartink, mason (some of his descendants reside in Northampton); Valentine Worthy, weaver; Thomas Pollock, weaver; Hendrick Salter, tailor; Frederick Stackman, shoemaker; Thomas Ewing, farmer; Doct. William, physician (who was considered very skillful, and lived to a good old age in the enjoyment of an extensive practice in Chester, Blandford, and Granville)."

REMINISCENCES OF THE SHAYS REBELLION.‡

"The people of Massachusetts and New England generally have not forgotten that a serious insurrection took place in this State in 1786.

"Capt. Luke Day was born in what is now West Springfield, July 25, 1743. He was commissioned captain at the commencement of hostilities with Great Britain, and joined the Continental Army in 1775, and served his country with credit through the war, and left the service a major by brevet.

"He was the strongest and most persistent of the leaders of the outbreak. During the fall of 1786 he was busy inciting men to join him in open rebellion. The old Jeremiah Steblins tavern was the place where they most did congregate for council, and where he with Elijah and Benjamin Day and others made many flaming and traitorous speeches, which finally resulted in drawing quite a large number around him. They were drilled on the common, and were at first armed with hickory clubs, while in their hats was a sprig of hemlock. He soon found it a difficult task to find shelter for his force of about 400 malcontents, for not all the community were in sympathy with his views. While exercising his men a few days before the contemplated attack on the Springfield Armory, he made a speech to them, an extract from which here follows: 'My boys, you are going to fight for liberty. If you want to know what liberty is, I'll tell you. It is for every man to do just what he pleases, and to make other folks to do as you please to have them, and to keep folks from serving the Devil.' Up to this time demonstrations had been made mostly on the Inferior Courts, rendering them liable only for high misdemeanor; but by the Legislature the Supreme Court had been adjourned to meet at Springfield, Dec. 26, 1786. The rioters were determined to prevent this meeting, and gathered in force. Capt. Luke Day sent an order to the presiding judge not to organize the court or proceed to business. The insurgents were stationed at three places, viz., a few miles east of the armory at Springfield was a division of them, another at West Springfield, and a third at Chicopee, about a mile north of the bridge over Chicopee River. At a council of officers it was determined to attack the United States armory at Springfield and plunder it.

"Capt. Luke Day was one of Dr. Lathrop's parishioners; he valued his minister's judgment, and two or three days previous to the attack upon the public stores at Springfield he had an interview with Dr. Lathrop, and commenced conversation by asking him if he could keep a secret; to this question he gave for answer that it was not certain that he could, especially if it was anything of importance, and if it was such, he had better not reveal it. Capt. Day, nevertheless, insisted upon divulging it, and informed the doctor that upon such a day and such an hour the three divisions of the insurgents were to make a simultaneous attack upon the armory at Springfield, insisting at the same time upon having the doctor give his opinion at the prospect of their success. He did not hesitate or deliberate to reply, and said, 'Capt. Day, your army is deficient of good, true, and trusty officers; you are engaged in a bad cause, and your men know it. I advise you to disband them, and let them return peacefully to their homes, for as sure as you advance upon the public stores 'tis as certain that you will meet with sore defeat.' Whether it was the good doctor's advice that influenced him to give up the attack upon the armory or not is not known; but neither Day nor Parsons moved from their quarters on the day agreed upon, and left poor Shays to attack the public stores alone; and he, after having three men killed out of the head of the column, ordered a retreat. A few days after Shays was defeated, Gen. Lincoln arrived with a strong force from Roxbury, and dispatched Gen. Shepherd, with three divisions of his army, over to West Springfield to look for Luke and Elisha Day; but as soon as these noble heroes heard that the government men were on the way to attack them they retreated so precipitately as to leave their bread baking in the oven and the pork and beans boiling in the pot. The two Days, with their deluded followers, fled to New York, and there remained in exile several months, but were arrested at a later date, as would appear by a mittimus issued by the clerk of the Suffolk County Court, on the 3d of April, 1788. This mittimus is preserved in the archives of Hampshire County, to which county he was transferred by his own request for trial. Two months after he was released by a general pardon, after which they were permitted to return to West Springfield, much out of pocket, and both of them poor men, after being exiled from West Springfield some ten or twelve months..

ANCIENT TAVERNS AND LANDMARKS.

"About 1780, Jere Steblins kept tavern, store, and manufactured saltpetre, on the corner south of the post-office on Ranapogue Street, and with Moses Day was extensively engaged in boating on the river.

"From Landlord Steblins' bar-room fireplace came the live coals that replenished the foot-stoves of the good mothers in Israel during the intermission between service on the Sabbath.

"The old house that stood on the bank of the river, directly opposite the 'don't ditch' shad-fishery, was taken down a few years ago. Its age was not known, but was supposed to have been at least one hundred and twenty-five years. It is believed to have been built for a boatman's tavern by Solomon Steblins. It contained a chimney with five separate flues, and three brick ovens, and occupied fifteen feet square in the centre of the house. The mantles were of oak, and fourteen inches square, and ran the whole length of the chimney. Some of the floor-boards were eighteen inches wide and twenty feet long. The property is now in the possession of Mr. J. N. Bagg."

† "Stone Arabia." This was one of the five districts (the third) into which the new county of Tryon, organized in 1772, was divided. It was the centre one on the north side of the Mohawk River. This affair occurred on the 19th of October, 1780.

SHIP-BUILDING.

"The east end of the common was used as a ship-yard, and it is related that while a vessel was building on the common the raising of the frame of the church on 'Orthodox Hill' took place, and the men there employed assisted in raising the steeple.

"The schooner 'Trial,' of 60 tons built then, the sloop 'West Springfield,' of about the same capacity, and the sloop 'Hampshire,' of 90 tons, owned by Daniel Ely and Benj. Ashley, were built and sailed down the river about the year 1800-2.

"Jonathan Morgan and Israel Williston followed boating on Connecticut River many years. The boats were open, and carried from 10 to 14 tons. They went one year, every month, to Hartford. It required six men to haul a boat up Enfield Falls without a wind. The men who poled the boat had one dollar a trip. They resided at Warehouse Point, and expected the owner to furnish a gallon of good St. Croix rum for each trip."

REMINISCENCES OF SHAD LANE.

"Beginning south at the old Ferry Lane and go north to the head of the street fronting the Common, 'The Great Ferry,' connecting the town of West Springfield with Springfield, was for a long time leased to Capt. Gideon Leonard, a man ardent in habitual and incurable inebriety. He did not tend the Ferry himself, but underlet it to Hezekiah Warriner and Seth Leonard. Warriner and Leonard in succession occupied the old 'Log Cabin,' which stood on the bank of the river. This was the last building to stand of those built by the Hortons, Merricks, and Ashleys, who were ancestors of the inhabitants of West Springfield. This house was taken down some forty years since, and nothing is left to mark the spot it occupied.

"About 100 rods north of Ferry Lane stood the dwelling-house of Deacon Joseph Merrick. This building was unique in its construction throughout, the second story being several feet larger than the first. The yellow pine timbers were massive, the rooms very large and few in number, the white-oak needle posts hung down several feet outside the house and terminated in the form of a heart. The fireplace was so constituted as to consume the greatest quantity of fuel, and at the same time be used a sitting-room by the children of the family. The roof was peaked like the old houses in New York built by the Vanderspyles, Ten Eycks, Hardenburgs, etc. Up the street about the same distance stood the house of Hezekiah Day, about the same size as the Merrick house, and in a similar style of architecture. Mr. Day was the owner of a large landed estate embracing some of the best lands of the town. Directly opposite, across the street, was the dwelling-house of his brother, Col. Benjamin Day. This building was more modern in its style. The old Boylston House in Springfield is an exact copy of it. Half a mile up the street stood the ancient mansion-house of the Ely family, which was built more than a century ago. At the head of Shad Lane, fronting the Common, stood the old red dwelling-house of Capt. Abel Cooley, so renowned in story and song for killing British Regulars on the Common."

SKETCH OF THE EARLY FAMILIES.

Among the early families whose descendants now reside in West Springfield, were the Baggs, Merricks, Ashleys, Smiths, Cooleys, Parsons, Days, Elys, Rogerses, Whites, Champions, and Blissos. John Baggs is supposed to have emigrated from Plymouth, England; died at Springfield, Sept. 5, 1683. In 1660 he conveyed lands in the "second division," probably on the west bank of the river, to Hugh Dudley, of Chicopee Plains; in 1668 his name was signed fourth to a petition against imposts; in 1678, Jan. 1, he was one of the citizens to whom Maj. John Pynchon administered the oath of allegiance. Among his children was Mercy Thomas, born May 15, 1671, and he had eleven children, from three of whom all the Baggs now living in West Springfield are descended. They are the sixth, seventh, and eighth generations from John Baggs. Among these are Col. Aaron Baggs, who has been one of the leading citizens of the town for many years, representing it in the State Legislature, as well as State Senator from the Western Hampden district, and the wealthiest man in town; Harvey Day Baggs, for several years one of the selectmen; James Newton Baggs, an agricultural writer and member of the State board of agriculture; Richard Baggs, a well-known and extensive market-gardener.

Probably the first record of the Ashleys is in a grant of land to one Robert Ashley on Chicopee Plain, in 1660. In 1818, John Ashley made a will, appropriating a fund for educational and religious purposes. The will reads as follows:

"The pious education of youth and the diffusion of Christian knowledge among the ignorant and uninformed, and among those whose local circumstances forbid their enjoyment of the stated instructions of the gospel ministry, are objects which now engage the attention of the Christian world, and to the promotion of which I wish to contribute my mite, with my humble and fervent prayers that the great truths of Christianity may spread and pervade the whole earth, and all may be brought to the knowledge and belief of the truth as it is in Jesus."

An act of incorporation, known as the "Ashley Fund Act," was passed and trustees were appointed, who were ordered to divide the sum intrusted to them "into two distinct parts; two-thirds to be appropriated exclusively toward the education of youth within the town of West Springfield, and the remaining one-third to be appropriated toward the propagation and diffusion of Christian knowledge." He directs that the money be placed upon interest, and that the portion bequeathed for the spread of the gospel be equally appropriated for the use of home missions and foreign missions. In regard to the distribution of the income of the school fund he says: "It is my will that no district shall at any time be entitled to or shall receive any part of the annual dividend, unless their instructor passes the qualifications and produces the evidence of good moral character by the laws of the commonwealth, and unless he shall daily make use of the holy Scriptures as a school-book, and shall daily address the Throne of Grace in prayer with his scholars."

The provisions of the will are fully carried out by a board of trustees elected from time to time. John Ashley also endowed the First Parish of West Springfield with a generous fund for the maintenance of the gospel, the income of which is now annually applied to that purpose.

The Day family in Springfield and their descendants have been numerous. The widow of Robert Day, who came to this country in 1648, married for her third husband Elizur Holloke, of Springfield, and removed to that town from Connecticut in 1648, her eldest son, Thomas, coming also. He married a daughter of Thomas Cooper. Three of their sons, Samuel, John, and Eleazer, removed to this place, and from them all of that name in this town descended.

Col. Benjamin Day was most prominent. He was the first moderator of town-meetings, the first selectman, and the first representative to the General Court. He held the commission of major under George II., and was made colonel in the war of the Revolution. Heman Day, son of Col. Benjamin, was noted in his time. A trait in his character is illustrated by the following dialogue between his neighbors, which has been handed down:

"What time o' dee?" says Walter Cooley;
 "Eleven o'clock," says Judah Baggs;
 "Time to repent," says Parson Lathrop;
 "Time enough yet," says Heman Day."

Capt. Luke Day, who became noted in his later days for his connection with the Shays rebellion, was also of this family.

The Cooleys, of West Springfield, descended from Benjamin Cooley, who came to Springfield in 1640. His grandson, Obadiah, Jr., made a purchase of land in 1730 "on the west side of the Great River," and located on the bank of the river, at the present corner of Park and Main Streets, where Samuel Reynolds now lives. His son, Capt. Abel Cooley, purchased 6 acres of land on the opposite corner, and the homestead is still in the hands of his descendants. About this time the Indians were troublesome, and it is related of Capt. Cooley that he had port-holes made through his house, and kept a loaded gun ready to fire at the intruders. One night, hearing the Indians, as he supposed, he looked out and saw their heads dodging up and down behind the well-curb. He thereupon opened fire, continued it as often as he saw a head rise up through the darkness, breathing out threatenings to them, and saying, "If you will come into the house, I will treat you like gentlemen." An examination of the spot in the morning revealed the fact that he had filled the bucket attached to the well-sweep, which the wind had made to dance up and down at intervals, full of shot.

Roger Cooley, a great-grandson of Benjamin, settled in the western part of the town—"Pacawtuck"—in 1759. He served as a lieutenant in the war of the Revolution. Roger, Jr., the sixth of his ten children, also served his country in the Revolutionary war, and was on duty at the execution of Maj.

André. After the war he became a noted military-man, serving several years as colonel in the Massachusetts militia.

Henry Rogers was born in 1733, and resided in this town and lived on the bank of the Connecticut River, south of the house now owned by William Fox. He was a strong, athletic man, and did valuable service in the wars. He was killed in 1795, and is buried in the Town-House Cemetery. He had several children united by marriage to the Ashley and Bliss families.

Talcott Rogers is the only representative of the family in town. The old family homestead has been in the Rogers family for more than one hundred and twenty-five years.

There is a tradition that a few rods north of this house there used to be a favorite camping-ground of the Indians, and many arrow-heads and other relics are found in that vicinity.

Of the Parsons family, Ebenezer was a prominent man about 1700. He was for fifty-two years a deacon in the First Church. His grandson, Jonathan, owned the property on the south side of the park, and lived in the "Old Parsons House," which was taken down in 1872. He was born in the old Parsons homestead, which formerly stood one hundred rods east of his later residence, and was the oldest of an old-fashioned family of ten children. His early fondness for military life led to his election as captain of the Hampden Grays, and his subsequent choice as colonel gave him a title with which his name was ever after associated. A man of rare good judgment, and with a genuine adaptability to public life, he was several times chosen to both the Senate and House of Representatives, and held for many years the town offices of selectman, assessor, overseer of the poor, clerk, treasurer, and school committee. He was also one of the trustees of the Ashley fund. He was one of the most prominent advocates of the separation which led to the formation of the new Park Street Church and the improvements in the park fronting the church.

The Smiths have formerly had a large representation in West Springfield. Jonathan, who was born in 1697, seems at one time to have been the leading business-man of the town, especially in that part called "Pauquetuck." He is said to have been a very conscientious man. No unnecessary work was allowed to be performed on his premises after the going down of the sun on Saturday until the close of the Sabbath; and on one occasion, his son David, when a grown-up man, returned home from a hunting excursion—for which he was said to be famous—after sundown on Saturday; his father obliged him, with unshaven face, to go four miles to the old church on the common, the next day, so scrupulous was he in his observance of the Lord's day.

Simon Smith was "a man of science," and also lived at "Pauquetuck." During the Revolutionary war he manufactured saltpetre, and also distilled New England rum for the army, from Indian corn. Some of the machinery remains to this day. Another family of Smiths have resided at Ashleyville. Horace Smith was for many years deacon in the First Church. It is said of him that he always came to meeting, rain or shine, and his prayers were so simple and fervent that they touched every heart. His son, Franklin, is now a deacon in Park Street Church, and his grandson, Joseph, deacon in the First Church.

Reuben Champion came to West Springfield as a place of refuge for his family, and located in that part called "Amos-town" (supposed to be named after Amos Taylor). He purchased the spot, now owned and occupied by John Carleton, of Zinec Hopkins, a son of Rev. Hopkins. He went to the Revolutionary war as a surgeon, taking his son, Mede, with him, and died in the service. His son, Reuben, Jr., built the present Champion homestead in 1794. His daughters, Flavia and Maria, with their nephew, James, still reside on the old Amos-town homestead. It is related of Reuben Champion that when Shays' men were marching through the town, under the lead of Capt. Luke Day, coming over Meeting-house

Hill, Mr. Champion was passing around the hill alone. Coming out from the "dingle" on the place now owned by L. F. Mellen, the Shays men were suddenly upon him. He raised his staff and shouted back, "Come on, boys, we've got them!" which led them to suppose there was a company of men in ambush, and they all ran back over the hill. The ruse had prevented his capture, and perhaps saved his life.

ORGANIZATION OF THE TOWN.

The following is a copy of the first petition of the parish to be set off as a town in 1756:

"At a meeting of the Inhabitants of the Second Parish of Springfield, July 15, 1756, Capt. Benj. Day, Moderator, It was voted, 1st. To chuse a Committee to prefer a Petition to the Great & General Court of the Massachusetts Bay, That they would set off all the Inhabitants and the lands on the west side the Great River in Springfield, To be a Distinct Town with all Privileges belonging thereto. 2ndly. That Capt. Benj. Day, Doct. John Van Horne, Capt. Joseph Miller, & Mr. Josiah Day be a Committee for that purpose."

The subject was agitated for several years, sectional differences were constantly arising, until it became an impossibility to ignore it longer, and the town of Springfield, at their annual town-meeting, March 23, 1773, were called upon to consider the condition of the town, and settle, if possible, their differences. Committees were appointed, reports were made, copies of which are given; action was taken at different times until Jan. 20, 1774, all of which culminated in the incorporation of West Springfield, Feb. 23, 1774.

March 23, 1773.—In the warrant for the annual town-meeting of Springfield the following item occurs:

"16thly. To consider the state of the Town Respecting any Division of the same into Separate and Distinct towns or Districts and pass any acts or vote relative thereto. Particularly to take the minds and sentiments of the town relative to a Division thereof into two separate and Distinct towns, having Connecticut River for the Boundary line, saving & excepting that any and all Land, lying in the Great & General field, so called, on the west side said River, held and possessed by persons Inhabiting the first parish in Springfield, shall not be annexed to the town to be made on the west side said River, but shall be and remain part and parcel of, and appertain to the Town on the east side of the River to all intents and purposes, and pass all proper votes, thereon or respecting a Division of said town into three or more separate towns or Districts with such boundaries as may be determined upon."

"At this meeting voted to adjourn to the 25th day of March, Instant, to ten o'clock in the forenoon, to the Meeting-House in the second Parish of Springfield."

Leonard, Mr. Asaph Leonard, Abraham Burlbank, Esq., Mr. Joseph Ely, Dea. Edw'd Chapin, Ensign Phineas Chapin were chosen the committee for the purposes aforesaid. Voted that this meeting be adjourned to tuesday, the 30th March, instant, at the Court-House in Springfield."

March 30, 1773.—"Met pursuant to adjournment from 2d inst. Voted that this meeting be adjourned to Wednesday, the 31st day of March, Instant, to ten of the clock in the forenoon, at the Meeting-House in the Second Parish of Springfield."

March 30, 1773.—"The Inhabitants assembled according to notice and voted and accepted the Report of the Committee, which report was as followeth: The Committee appointed by the Town at the meeting before the Last Adjournment thereof to consider the present state of the Town, the Disputes & Animositities that subsist Between the several parts, the matters that lie before the meeting to be acted upon, and the unhappy Embarrassments that attend the same, and to project some method to remove them, and to Report at this time, have attended that service, maturely considered the matter referred to them, and report their opinion as follows, viz.:

"That the said town is in a most unhappy and melancholy State; that, considering the situation and circumstances of the town and the Inclinations and tempers of the Inhabitants, there is no prospect they can Longer manage their public affairs to mutual & General Advantage in one entire corporate Body, but that it is quite necessary there should be some Division thereof.

"That no mode or Form of Division can be devised which the Generality of the Inhabitants in the Several parts of the town would accede to acquiesce in.

"That it is consequently Absolutely Necessary for the Peace and Happiness of the whole that the Mode and Terms of their Division should be Referred and submitted to the Determination of Judicious & Disinterested persons from abroad.

"They therefore further Report their opinion and Advise to the town that (as the only expedient to restore Peace or to prevent the various increasing Mischiefs of Discord and Contention among them and to Remove Embarrassments aforesaid) they should now unitedly agree to choose an Indifferent and Judicious Committee of Disinterested Persons in the neighboring towns to Repair to this town to view the Situation of its Parts, to consider its circumstances, and to Judge at Large thereon what Division and on what terms and Conditions shall be made thereof, and to Report the same, to the End that the town may be divided in such manner as may in all respects be best; that whereas the said town heretofore Voted the sum of 200 pounds toward building a Bridge over Agawam River, and appointed a Committee to build a Bridge in case, &c., as by their votes appears; and whereas the said Committee have proceeded in said business, and procured great part of the timber for the same, touching which the said Committee are Apprehensive Great and Sharp Disputes and Contentions will arise unless prevented by some prudent and amicable Composition & Agreement: They beg leave to report the following proposal of an Agreement thereon which they approve themselves, and recommend to the town for their acceptance, viz.: That of the stock of Money or Securities for Money in the Treasury of said Town bro't in or due for Land sold, or otherwise not bro't in by Taxes nor specially appropriated by the Donors to the support of the poor, nor otherwise specially appropriated, amounting to about £459 16s. 7, the Inhabitants on the West Side Connecticut River in said Town should have such proportion of the same as they are assessed in the Last Assessment in said Town, and the Inhabitants on the East Side of said River in said town shall have the residue thereof when Division shall take place Between them; that at present the said Committee for building said Bridge should receive of the same to the Amount of two hundred pounds as part of the proportion aforesaid of the Inhabitants on the West Side of said River, to be Improved in defraying the Charge and Expense of building and finishing said Bridge, the said Committee Indemnifying the Town from any further expence for the same Bridge in future; and that on such proposed Division of the said town, the Inhabitants on the west side said River to receive the Residue of the proportion aforesaid of such stock in the treasury, the Remainder thereof to be for the Inhabitants on the East side, to be disposed of as they shall agree, or as shall be ordered for them; the Division of said Stock both at present and hereafter to be made Reasonably, having proper Regard to the Quality of said Debts, and the probability of speedy payment thereof by a Committee to be appointed for that purpose.

"Voted that inasmuch as the two hundred pounds before mentioned for building a Bridge may be wanted sooner than it can be collected out of part of the debts aforesaid due to the town without Distressing the Debtors, that the vote aforesaid, respecting the same, be so far Reconsidered as Respects present Equal Division of them, and instead thereof the treasurer be directed to raise out of the whole two hundred pounds, and to pay it as soon as he may to the Committee for building said Bridge, under the General Agreement, however, in said vote mentioned.

"The above Report of the Committee Voted & Accepted."

April 2, 1773.—"Voted to choose a Committee of three persons to consider the State of the Town Relative to a Division thereof, Agreeable to a Report of a Committee accepted and agreed upon in this meeting. Voted that the Committee who prepared the Report for a Division of the Town be and are Desired to Consider on some proper persons in the neighboring towns for that purpose, and Report their names to this meeting at Adjournment. Voted that Williams Williams, Erastus Wolcott, & Joseph Root, Esqs., be a Committee to Repair to this town to view the situation of its parts, to Consider its Circumstances, to Judge at Large thereon what Division & what terms and Condition shall be made thereof, and to report the same. Col. John Worthington, Col. Benj. Day, Maj. Jonathan Bliss, chosen a Committee to send to the Gentlemen Chosen by the Town to Repair to this Town as soon as may be to take into Consideration all matters that there may be Laid before them, contained in a Report excepted by the town for that purpose. Meeting Adjourned to May 6th, 1773, to receive the Report of the Committee chosen by the Inhabitants of the town, and to pass all proper votes thereon.

"The Committee reported at this meeting as follows:

"To the Inhabitants of the town of Springfield:

"GENTLEMEN,—Agreeable to yore Desires we have taken into our most deliberate consideration the several matters you have thought fit to lay before us relating to the Unhappy Contentions subsisting among you, which has brought to a Determination that some Division of your town is necessary, concerning the mode of which Division you have been pleased to Refer yourselves to us for Aid and advice. Our opinion upon the matters submitted to us you have in the following Report:

"The Committee consider it as Great Unhappiness that the most ancient and respectable town in the County of Hampshire, the wise and peaceable conduct of whose public affairs has ever to this day done much Honour to the Inhabitants, and established a just veneration for their leading men, should by means only of the supposed or Real Jurisdiction and mistakes of a few persons be Reduced to the necessity of a Division in order to the Amicable management of your public affairs for the future, and tho' the manner only in which this Division shall take place seems to have been referred to us, yet we conceive it proper to declare our Concurrence in sentiment with you that some Division is become necessary touching the manner in which a General Division (which appears to be the principal object) shall be made, it is the United opinion of the Committee that the town be divided into Two Towns in all respects, and to every purpose Distinct, with equal Powers, privileges, & Immunities, by Connecticut River; that the Land lying on the West side of the said River, notwithstanding, shall be holden to pay taxes of every kind to that part or place in which the owner or person in Actual possession and Improvement of the same shall happen to dwell forever; that each town shall hold & enjoy the Estate given for the use of the ministry in the town of Springfield, in manner as the same has by order of the General Court been heretofore assigned and confirmed to the parish or precinct Respectively; that the Public Monies now in Stock in the Town Treasury and there secured to your Treasurer for the use of the Town (in which it is intended to include all Donations to the town) shall be received by the said proposed towns Respectively, According to the Report of the town Committee received and accepted at your adjourned Meeting on the Thirty-first Day of March last; and as to any Public Buildings, that each of the said Proposed towns shall have and enjoy those which happen to stand within their Respective Limits without rendering to the other any consideration for the same; and that each of the said proposed towns shall contribute toward the support of the poor now in the town of Springfield so Long as they shall need support, in the same proportion as they respectfully share the Public Monies above mentioned. The local circumstances of the people living in that part of the town called Stony Hill appear to us such as to make it Reasonable they with their Land should be a District in the manner the town has voted them off, with this addition, that the farms in possession of Zachariah Warner, Zachariah Warner, Junr., & Ezekiel Squire should be annexed to the District in Case the West line of the District, as settled by the Town, shall not include them. The Committee are of opinion that these people have their proportion of the said Public Monies (except any that may have been given for the use of the poor), and that they ought not to be charged with any part of said support of the present poor of the town.

"The General Benefits & Advantages accruing to the Community from that Constant and Unavoidable Intercourse occasioned by the Public Business of every town, particularly as it is a means of producing greater sociability and more generous Sentiments among the Inhabitants, have appeared on this Occasion, More especially, in so striking a Light to the Committee as to give them the fullest Conviction that nothing but Absolute Necessity can ever justify the lessening or Dividing the town. The Committee are also persuaded that nothing but oppression or Injustice—or the evident want of harmony and peace—in the joint management of the common Concerns of a Town, consisting of Divers parts or Parishes, can create that Necessity. Convinced, also, from the known integrity of the Leading Members of Each of the proposed towns, that the former is not likely to take place in either, and that the Uneasiness now subsisting in this town must therefore soon be Removed, and a good understanding among the several parts soon be recovered, and that the small inconveniences of attending the Public meetings in the first and second Parishes by the Inhabitants of the Others are by no means equal to the advantages which must arise thereupon, or to those Inconveniences and evils which may be justly apprehended from a further Division of the town of Springfield, they find themselves obliged, however Reluctant, on account of that uneasiness which may thereby be occasioned to some of the people, to give it as their Opinion that no farther Division of the town is eligible at present. If, however, upon farther trial it shall be found that the Harmony which has heretofore subsisted, but is now in some measure lost, cannot be recovered, it is the advice of the Committee that the third and fifth parishes in the town be divided from the other parts of the proposed towns by their present parochial bounds, and incorporated into Districts,—the Inhabitants of the Respective towns and Districts to enjoy their lands under their actual improvements in the same manner and to the same purposes, it is above proposed the Inhabitants on the east side of the Connecticut River should hold and enjoy their lands in the Great and General field above mentioned.

"We sincerely wish that peace and harmony may again take place among the people of the several parts of this Great Town, and that we may have the pleasure to know that our endeavors have in some measure contributed towards effecting an Event so valuable, so important to you.

"We are, Gentlemen, your Obedient, humble Servants,

"To Col. Benj. Day, Lt. Benj. Leonard, & Dea. Nathaniel Ely:

"GENTLEMEN,—Your being chosen by the Town as Agents to make answer to the General Court to several petitions now depending there, praying for a Division of said Town, We do desire you to use your Influence with the Representative of said town to prevent by all proper ways & means in their power any General Division thereof, and that you make use of counsel to assist you therein as you shall think necessary, and that you can offer such reasons against any General Division thereof as you shall think proper & reasonable, also that you prefer the following to the Great & General Court as an answer to the petition now depending therein praying for a Division of said town of Springfield, Jan. 20, 1774.

"PROVINCE OF MASSACHUSETTS BAY:

"To his Excellency Thomas Hutchinson, Esqr., Captain-General & Governor-in-Chief in and over his Majesties Province of Massachusetts Bay: the Honorable his Majestys Council and House of Representatives in General Court assembled at Boston, on the 20th day of Jan., 1774.

"May it please your Excellency & Honours, the town of Springfield have been notified and cited to shew cause, if any they have, why the Petitions of the first Parish, and also the petition of part of the 3d and 4th parishes, and also the Petition of a place called Stoney Hill, in said Springfield, now Depending in the General Court praying for a Division of said town should not be granted. The town suppose no General Division thereof at Present either necessary or Eligible, but that if any particular part thereof are Dissatisfied with their connections with the main body, it is but reasonable they should petition to be made a Distinct Corporation, but as the Petitioners have alledged a number of Facts in their Petition which we think have a tendency to give your Excellency & Honours a misunderstanding of the state of this town, we must beg leave to make some few Remarks thereon.

"The Difficulties that have arisen in the town have been too notorious to be wholly concealed, and we hartly wish we could say that any Particular Parish had not been the Occasion thereof. A Particular Detail of facts might be made, but we choose a veil of oblivion should be forever drawn over them excepting so far as may be necessary to set the conduct of the rest of the town in a faire light.

"A number of circumstances concurred last March to bring the town generally to gather at their Annual Town Meeting for the choice of Town Officers, &c., in which the Town chose to make some alteration in their officers, which was so disagreeable to several Persons in the first Parish that they endeavored, in an unprecedented manner, to obstruct and hinder the business of the meeting by a sufficient number appearing to object to almost every vote, when it was indispensable to every Body present, and this not only in matters important, but also in the choice of the most inconsiderable offices, whereby the List of the Voters was obliged to be called, which necessarily took up some Hours; and this was followed about three days and a half with the express and avowed design to get the town to send to the general Court for a Committee to Divide the same,—a measure then and ever seems very disagreeable to much the greatest part of said Town,—and this was continued until within a few hours of the extent of Time allowed by Law to make choice of Town Officers, whereby many considered themselves under a necessity of complying to have a Committee. The Petitioners are very much mistaken in their representation of a Report made by a committee of the town, that an Application to the General Court for a committee to divide the same was the only expedient to restore Peace and prevent Discord and Confusion; for we are informed by a member of said committee that no such Report was made or agreed to by the major part of them, and we are certain there is no such Article in their Report as entered on the Town Records, but their Report was to choose a committee in the neighboring towns, &c. The town had always avoided applying to the General Court, because they would be Left at Liberty about accepting a report of any committee about a Division of the town, as they should think eligible or not; and the charge of Insincerity is utterly groundless and without foundation, and only mentioned, as we conceive, with the Design of Representing the town in an unfavorable light to your Excellency & Honours. The Petitioners alledge a vote of the town that a Division thereof was necessary, and that it should be remembered that there had been an application before that time by Stoney Hill (so called) and Long Meadow to be made separate towns or Districts, and they had obtained the towns consent thereto. These people might vote in that manner from their own particular circumstances; others from the necessity they was then under, as before referred to, &c.; but when the Report was made, the town could not consent to it, and the following, with others not mentioned, might be their reasons for rejecting it, viz.:

"No allowance was thereby made to the western town which was to be erected for any moneys they had expended for Public Buildings in the first Parish, no care was thereby taken of money, particularly as to the 200 pound voted for a bridge across Cheequepee River, if not expended for that purpose. By said Report Connecticut was to be the Dividing Line, and yet no Dividing Line was to be fixed. Stoney Hill were to receive their share of the Town Stock and have no part of the poor; the Jurisdiction of the meadow Land was to be left vague, precarious, and fluctuating, which might be the occasion of Great Disputes and Contentions, and perhaps prove the utter ruin of the western town; these with others probably were the Reasons of the Towns rejecting the Report.

"As to the Petitioners of the third and fourth Parishes, we would observe that the Petitioners are but a very inconsiderable part of two Large Parishes, and much the greatest part of each of those parishes are very far from being in sentiment with them as to the matter of their Petition.

"The Inhabitants of Stoney Hill have heretofore applied, and secured the consent of the town for being made a separate town or District, and we think their Local circumstances are such that they can receive very little, if any, benefit from their present connection with us, either as to town or Parishial privileges; but as the greatest part of them have within a few years moved into this from the neighboring towns, we cannot think it reasonable they should have their proportion of the town Stock of Money without being chargeable with part of the support of the poor of the town.

"We therefore pray your Excellency & Honours that the prayer of the Petitioners may be dismissed."

The petition of 1756 was finally granted in 1774, and the act of incorporation is as follows:

"Act of Incorporation, Feb. 23, 1774.—Anno Regni. Regis, Georgia, Tertia, Decimo, Quarto."

"An act for dividing the Township of Springfield, and erecting the Western part thereof into a Separate Town by the name of West Springfield, passed Feb., Anno Domini 1774.

"Whereas, by reason of the great extent of the Township of Springfield, the Remote Settlements, Disputes, Controversies, and different Interests of the Inhabitants thereof, the difficulty and often Impracticability of the Assembly in Town-Meetings for Elections, and other necessary purposes, by Reason of the Great River Connecticut almost equally dissecting the Township, it is necessary that there be a Division thereof.

"Be it enacted by the Gov., Council, and House of Representatives, That that part of the Township of Springfield lying on the west side of Connecticut River, and the Inhabitants thereof, be constituted and erected into a different town by the name of West Springfield, and be invested with all the Powers, Privileges, and Immunities which, by the laws of this Province, Towns have and enjoy.

"Provided, and be it further enacted, that it shall not be lawful for the Said Town of West Springfield, or any Parish or Precinct, then or at any Time hereafter, to assess or Tax the Lands or Estates of any Inhabitant of the Town of West Springfield, situate or lying in that part of the Great and General Field, so called, on the West side of the River, lying Southward of a Line running from y^e Ferry, over said River, at the upper Wharf, so called, to the Pond, called Turtle Pond, in said Field, and thence to the Ferry over the Agawam River, near Moses Leonard's Dwelling-House. For any Rates, Duties, or Charges Whatever, all Lots, Lands, and Estates Whatever, lying within the Said Great and General Field, the owner and Proprietor thereof, shall, for the Time being, and at any Time hereafter, be an Inhabitant of the Town of Springfield, shall stand Chargeable and Taxable, and shall be Charged, Taxed, and Assessed for all Province, County, Town, and Parish Taxes, Rates, Charges, and Duties, only in and by the Said Town of Springfield, and the Parish or Parishes, respectively there, at all Times hereafter."

At the terms of this act the inhabitants felt aggrieved, and at a meeting held March 24, 1774,

"Col. Benj. Day, Mr. Justin Ely, Doct. Chauncey Brewer, Dr. John Vanhorne, and Benjamin Stellbins were chosen a committee to draw up the Reasons of this Parish for their making applications to the Great and General Court for an alteration in Respect of Lands that now are or may be liable to pay Rates or Taxes out of this Parish, and to make a report the 20th day of May next."

The committee made their report to the meeting on that day, as follows:

"To his excellency Thomas Gage, Esqr., Captain-Genl. and Commander-in-chief in and over his Majesty's Province of the Massachusetts Bay, &c. And to the Honorable His Majesty's Council and House of Representatives, in general Court assembled at Boston, the last Wednesday of May, 1774. The Petition of the inhabitants of the first Parish of West Springfield humbly sheweth; That by an act of the Great and General Court, passed in the year 1696, all that part of the town of Springfield lying on the west side of Connecticut River was erected into a separate Precinct or Parish, and by said Act all the then present inhabitants of said precinct, and such as should from time to time Joyn them, and all Estates under their Improvement lying in said Precinct, were to stand chargeable for the support of the Ministry, and for building Meeting-Houses. That within these few years past one Entire Parish, and the greater part of another, have been set off from us. So that we are now reduced within very narrow limits. The whole extent of our Lands but little exceeds 9000 Acres. Of these Lands several valuable farms belong to Baptists, who have a minister of their own Denomination, with their estates exempt from Parish Taxes. Part of our land is Mountainous, Sandy and Pine Plain, incapable of any very profitable cultivation; and within the aforesaid limits, the Inhabitants of the first Parish in East Springfield own a valuable part of our Meadow Lands, which not being under the immediate improvement of our Inhabitants, are not subject to the aforesaid Act for Taxation. From these several causes we are reduced to be much the smallest Parish either in East or West Springfield, and perhaps in the whole County. We beg leave further to shew that by an Act passed in the last Session of the late General Court, entitled an 'Act for dividing the town of Springfield, &c.' It is provided and enacted 'that it shall not be lawful for the town of West Springfield, or any Parish or Precinct then, or at any time hereafter, to assess or Tax the Lands or Estates of any Inhabitants or Inhabitants of the Town of Springfield Situate or lying in that part of the Great and General Field, so called, on the west side of Connecticut River, lying south of a Line beginning at the upper Wharf, so called, and running to the Pond called Turtle Pond, in said Field; and thence to the West end of the Hill called New Field Hill; and thence to the Ferry over Agawam River, near Moses Leonard's Dwelling house, for any Rates, Duties, or Charges whatsoever, the same being within the nominal limits of the said Town of West Springfield, notwithstanding, &c.,¹ by which clause we are debarred from our ancient right and privilege of Taxing Lands within said Field under the Improvements of our Inhabitants in case they happen to belong to any of the Inhabitants of East Springfield.

"There is indeed a Subsequent Clause in the Act providing that nothing in said Act shall change, alter, or affect the present Rights or Limits of the several Parishes in said undivided Town, or either of them or their respective interests, &c., by which we apprehend our ancient Right of Taxing all Land improved by us within the Limits of our Parish is secured.

"But as there is a manifest contradiction and Inconsistency between the said act passed in the year 1696, and the re-straining clause in the Act of Division which may be the occasion of future Controversy, and as unjust use may possibly in some future time be made of the said restraining clause,

"We humbly pray that the Legislature would take the matter under their wise consideration, and make such amendments as may be necessary to secure to us our own rights and Privileges, and to prevent future Litigation.

"There is now a large Farm within a mile of our meeting-house, which has for many years been owned by an inhabitant of East Springfield, and leased out to a Tenant who lives thereon, and who, with his Family, enjoy the privilege of Publick worship with us, and can enjoy it nowhere else. This Farm has been constantly Taxed for the defraying of Parish Expenses with us, as it ought manifestly to be.

"It is not improbable there may be some other Farms in a short time under the same circumstances, and if we are to loose the Jurisdiction of our Meadow Lands as soon as the Fee of them becomes vested in the inhabitants of another town, we may soon be reduced to an utter incapacity to maintain the Gospel.

"What makes this Clause in the Act more exceptionable is this, That the first Parish in East Springfield is one of the most wealthy parishes in either of the two Towns, and perhaps in the County, as it is of large extent and is under many and singular advantages.

"The second Parish, called Longmeadow, has much valuable meadow Land, and is opulent, so that neither of these Parishes need the Jurisdiction of Lands in our Meadow for defraying their Parish Charges, but we being reduced, as aforesaid, stand in absolute need of them.

"We therefore submit to the Wisdom of the Legislature whether it be not just and reasonable, not only that we should enjoy, as heretofore, the uncontroverted and unmolested Rights of Taxing all Lands in said General Field under the Improvements of any of our Inhabitants, but that we also should be enabled to Tax all Lands within the nominal limits of said first Parish in West Springfield, except such Lands as shall be under the Improvements of any of the Inhabitants of the Parish in East Springfield."

Signed by John Vanhorn, Benjamin Stebbins, Benjamin Day, and Justin Ely, Committee for the first Parish in West Springfield to draw up a Petition to the General Court.

May 20, 1774.—"The above Petition was voted and accepted by the Inhabitants of the first Parish in West Springfield, and Col. Benjamin Day was chosen Agent for the said Parish, and desired to present the same to the General Court and to use his influence to get the Prayer thereof granted.

"Test: Nath. Atchinson, "Clerk of the first Parish in West Springfield."

Another appeal to the General Court makes this complaint:

"That a Minor Part of a Town should force a Division contrary to a Sense of the Town, and yet be left in full Possession of the Ancient name of the Town and all the Public Buildings without making any Compensation therefor, but, as if that had not been sufficient, that they should, in an unheard-of manner, extend their Jurisdiction over Lands and Buildings out of their Bounds, and that the Majority of the Town should be so dishonestly crowded off by the Minority, and at the Same Time have a considerable Part of the valuable Lands with a number of Buildings within their Limits liable to pay all Taxes to the Town from whence they are thus crowded off, is such an Instance of Partiality and of Injury and Oppression towards us, as we presume is not to be met with in any other spot on the face of the Globe." They further say, "The Town of West Springfield was always extremely displeased with being forced to abandon their Ancient connections with Springfield, in a manner so hurtful to their Interest and Reputation," and pray "that the late act for dividing the Town may be repealed, or that we may be restored to our proportional part of the Estate and enjoy the Same Privileges as all other Towns in the United American Colonies do enjoy (viz.), That of taxing all Houses and Lands within the Limits of our Township."

The petition and appeals availed nothing with the General Court. The law was enforced for many years, until modified by a proviso that when the land changed hands it should then pay taxes to West Springfield, and the last of the property did not change hands until 1865.

The first warrant for a town-meeting was served jointly by Constables Joseph Day, of Springfield, and David Miller, of West Springfield, and is as follows:

"HAMPSHIRE, ss.:

"To the Constable or Constables of the Town of Springfield, or either of them,

Greeting,—You are hereby required in his Majesty's name forthwith to warn and give notice to the Free holders and other Inhabitants on the West side of Connecticut River, in West Springfield, First Parish, North District, from Northampton Bounds to Riley's Brook, on the County Road; on the west to Westfield and Southampton, to meet and assemble together at the old Meeting-House in said Town, on Wednesday, the 23d day of this Instant, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, then and there to act on the following articles:

"The 3d Article. To see if the Inhabitants will apply to the General Court for any alteration in the incorporating act, as was made at the last setting of said Court, that incorporated the inhabitants on the west side the River in sd town a separate town.

At a town-meeting held April 11, 1775, delegates were chosen to represent the town at a Provincial Congress, and it was voted "that the delegates be instructed to dissent from any proposal that may be made for setting up any form of civil government different from that contained in the charter we hold under William and Mary, excepting when the laws of self-preservation (which supersede all others) necessarily require it, the determination of which requires the greatest caution and circumspection." It was also voted to enlist and pay a company of "Minute-Men," with Mr. David Leonard as captain."

Cotton Ely

The Elys have been numbered among the representative families of West Springfield since the settlement of the first ancestor, Nathaniel, who located his residence on the banks of the Connecticut, and where generation after generation has remained for more than a century. The first known of the name in that town was Nathaniel, who lived to the age of ninety-five, and died in the year 1787. His son Nathaniel occupied the farm now owned by the fifth generation in descent, which was in turn owned by the grandson, Cotton, and also by the great-grandson, Cotton Ely, Jr., the subject of this narrative, who was born June 8, 1803. Besides carrying on farming on the old homestead during his life, Mr. Ely was a tanner and currier by trade, and as his father had before him, so he engaged quite largely in that business, and also as a jobber in hides and leather. He was the youngest of the three sons, Homer, Frederick, and himself, and one daughter, Fanny, all of whom are now dead.

Mr. Ely's life was one of active business, and so characterized by integrity in all his business relations as to secure the esteem of all who knew him. He sought no place in the arena of politics, but quietly did his part as a citizen, identifying himself formerly with the Whig, and subsequently with the Republican party. He was a man of sound judgment, conservative in his opinions, and possessed a will to carry forward whatever he deemed to be right and worthy his attention. Early in life he became a member of the Congregational Church, and there his influence for the forwarding of that and kindred interests was always acknowledged. He was active in church work, and for very many years was a teacher of the young in the Sunday-school, and a liberal contributor to all enterprises looking toward the elevation and education of the rising generation. In the year 1830 he married Mariette, daughter of Ruggles Kent, of West Springfield. Mr. Ely died April 11, 1874.

Aaron Ashley

The first record of the Ashleys in the Connecticut Valley in Massachusetts is in the following memorandum :

"There is granted to Robert Ashley six acres of meadow on the backside of Chicopee Plain, within two or three miles of the Great River, where he can find so much undisposed of.

"MARCH 13, 1660-61.

"A copy from Springfield records, examined by William Pynchon, clerk."

In the town of West Springfield the family of Ashley can be traced back about one hundred and sixty years to the grandfather, Benjamin Ashley, who was born in 1697, and died May 11, 1772; his wife dying Dec. 25, 1788, aged eighty-seven.

Their children were Moses, Aaron, Mary, David, John, and Benjamin. Of these the third son, David, was father of Aaron Ashley, and married Meribah Gaylord in 1769. He was born in 1735, and died in 1813. His other children were David, Jr., Solomon, Noah, Justin, Enoch, Lueretia, wife of Gennabath Bliss; and Eunice, wife of Eli Ashley.

David Ashley owned large tracts of land in West Springfield during his time, and was one of the largest real-estate owners in the valley. This fact, together with the settlement of so many of the name in one locality, gave the name Ashleyville,—a part of West Springfield.

Aaron Ashley was born April 19, 1786. His life, like that of his ancestors, was almost wholly spent as a farmer; and, alike with them, industry, local enterprise, devotion to family and friends, and strict integrity were his characteristics. He married, Nov. 7, 1811, Almira, daughter of Simeon Smith, of West Springfield, a lady who proved herself a devoted wife and a loving mother. She was born Dec. 28, 1786, and died in 1834. Their children were Edmund (died in 1862, aged forty-eight); Jennett (Mrs. Albert A. Hudson, of Syracuse); and Charles A. Ashley, who married, Feb. 11, 1862, Miss Sarah M. Ashley, of the same township.

Mr. Ashley was never solicitous of political preferment, but chose the quiet of a farmer's life, and he never accepted any office. He was always interested in the cultivation of good society, in the spread of religious principles, and in the education of the young, and left behind him a record worthy of imitation.

His second wife was Charlotte, daughter of Moses Ashley, of West Springfield. She was born July, 1799, and died in 1869, surviving her husband two years, who died in 1867.

It is a fact worthy of note in writing this sketch, that the Ashleys as a family, during the entire long period they have lived in West Springfield, have been among the first in thrift, respectability, and all interests tending to advance the well-being of society.

James P. Ely

JAMES P. ELY was born in the town of West Springfield, Mass., December, 1802. His grandfather, Nathan, and father, Nathan, Jr., were natives of the same town. His father was an only son, and had seven sisters, all of whom lived to advanced age. He was a farmer, as his ancestry had been before him. Was married to Anna Price, of Wethersfield, Conn., and became the father of children as follows: James P., subject of this narrative; Mrs. Francis Ashley, of West Springfield; Pelatiah, of Longmeadow; Nathan, of Wrentham; and Julia Ann, of West Springfield, all of whom are living.

Mr. Ely spent his minority in the routine of school and farm labor at home, and at the age of twenty-five, in the year 1827, married Mercy L., daughter of Noadiah and Tirzah (Taylor) Smith, of West Springfield. She was born in March, 1802. Her great-grandfather, Jonathan, and grandfather, Jonathan, Jr., also lived and died in the same town, and were farmers by occupation. Her father was a fife-major in the war for independence, and served nearly through the entire war. He is said to have been the owner of the first two-horse wagon in the town, and was engaged in teaming between Springfield and Boston before the days of railroads. He died at the age of forty-four, in 1807. Her mother died at the age of seventy-five, in 1841.

Mr. Ely has passed a life of industry and labor as a farmer, and is known as a man of sterling integrity in all his business relations. The pecuniary assistance received from his father was small, but by economy he has secured a fair competence. He has been a liberal supporter of church and like interests, and a member of the Congregational Church since about 1842, his wife being connected with the same church for the same period.

Mr. Ely has not taken an active part in politics, but has been honored by the citizens of his town for two terms as one of the selectmen.

HOMER ELY was born in West Springfield, May 23, 1793. He married, Dec. 19, 1816, Anna Kent, of the same town, who was born Nov. 20, 1797. Their children were the following: Frances Ann, born Oct. 22, 1817; Chauncey Kent, born Dec. 15, 1819; Eliza Rosamond, born March 5, 1822; Henry Gilbert, born March 7, 1824; Leicester Kent, born Aug. 16, 1826; Celia Sophia, born May 30, 1829; Homer, Jr., born July 25, 1831; Homer, Jr., born Feb. 1, 1833; Esther Maria, born June 17, 1835; George Albert, born April 8, 1842.

Mr. Ely was a tanner, and the son of a tanner. By his industrious habits, and his diligent, personal attention to all the details of his work, he honored his calling, and had a high reputation among his fellow-craftsmen. He was an amiable, courteous, and dignified gentleman of the old school. A sagacious business man and a prudent counselor, his advice was repeatedly sought by others, and was ever deemed safe and reliable. A kind neighbor and a sympathizing friend, his ready assistance and prompt charity were proverbial.

A Christian gentleman, his life was pure and consistent, and his conduct proved that religion with him was no mere form, but a genuine vital principle.

He was a member of the First Church for nearly fifty years, and an officer for nearly twenty. Having decided opinions, he was a firm adherent to the creed and government of the church with which he was connected.

Mr. Ely was always deeply interested in public affairs, and he was active in promoting all the interests of his native town. His advice and influence extended over the wide field of the county and the State. He was a member of the convention that met to revise the constitution in 1853, and brought to the discharge of his duties in that body that quiet attention and solid practical judgment which had appeared in his discharge of official trusts at home. Mr. Ely descended from a long line of honorable ancestors. He was one of three brothers who married three sisters, all neighbors, natives, and life-long residents of the same town. The names and traditions of these two old families date back to the earliest settlement of Western Massachusetts, and form an interesting part of its history.

Mr. Ely lived to a good old age, and died Jan. 28, 1873, universally esteemed for his many virtues. His wife died the year previous.

Of their ten children, five only survive their parents: Henry G. and Homer, Jr., of New York; Mrs. N. P. Pierce, of Brooklyn, N. Y.; Mrs. G. Morgan Smith, of South Hadley and Mrs. J. S. McElwain, of Holyoke.

CHURCHES.

THE FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

In June, 1698, two years after the west side of the river was set off as a separate and distinct parish, the first church was formed, and the Rev. John Woodbridge was constituted its pastor. No records of the parish were kept from the time of its organization, in 1696, until March 20, 1702, and the original contract between the parish and the Rev. Mr. Woodbridge cannot be definitely ascertained. At a meeting of the inhabitants, Dec. 12, 1704, it was voted "that the Present Comitey shall give to the Rev. Mr. Woodbridge a deed of the house and land which he now possesseth in the name of the 'side.'"^{*} It was also voted that the committee, viz., Deacon Barber, Deacon Parsons, John Miller, John Day, and Benj. Leonard, form an agreement with the Rev. Mr. Woodbridge in reference to his settlement.

At a meeting, Nov. 5, 1705,

It was voted "that seven men more be added to the comitey: Eben^t Jones, James Ely, John Bagg, Nath^l Morgan, James Merrick, Sam^l Day, and Sam^l Ely. And that they should agree with him and bring things to a conclusion, and what they did conclude of they would stand by and perform and accomplish accordingly."

An agreement was made in which they promise to "give the Rev. Mr. John Woodbridge annually for his salary Eighty pounds in provisions, particularly wheat at four shillings ye bushel, Peas att three shillings ye bushel, Rie att four shillings ye bushell, Indian Corn att two shillings ye bushell and six pence, Pork att 3 cts. per lb.; and what any person shall doe with respect to bringeing of wood for the fier. It is all every man's libertye to doe what he shall secause, gratis; only the Comitey shall appoint a day yearly for what an Person shall secause to doe of that nature for Mr. Woodbridge his greater convenience."

He "also was to possess and enjoy the use of the ministry-land, and to have the use of two acres of land for mowing meadow, and six acres that was to be 'stubed' within twelve months and fitted for mowing meadow; and, in order to further accomodate our said Rev. Minister, we doe promise to procuer a certain tract of land lying on Block Brook, of about 40 acres, belonging to Deacon Barber, and also another tract of 20 acres, convenient thereto, and that we will doe something toward setting up a barn as soon as he shall secause to build the same."

Mr. Woodbridge remained with this people, serving them acceptably, until his death, which occurred in June, 1718, at the age of forty years. "He was a man of great learning, of a very tender spirit, very apt to communicate, one that had an excellent gift in giving advice and counsel."[†] After his death the pulpit was supplied for a short time by the Rev. Mr. Hobart and Rev. Mr. Pierpont, the latter receiving an invitation from the society to become their pastor, which offer he declined.

In October, 1719, it was voted to invite the Rev. Samuel Hopkins to preach to them on probation, and in January, 1720, he received an invitation to settle in that place as their pastor, at a salary of £100. He accepted, and was ordained and installed June 1, 1720. He remained as pastor over this society thirty-six years, and died in October, 1755, in the sixty-second year of his age.[‡]

Rev. Joseph Lathrop was ordained to the pastorate of the church Aug. 25, 1756, having graduated at Yale College two years previously. His ministry was a long one, extending to upward of sixty years, and he was one of the most remarkable divines of the Connecticut Valley. He wrote 5000 sermons, many of which have been published.

He was elected in 1792 a Fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and in 1793 was chosen Professor of Divinity in Yale College. His death occurred Dec. 31, 1820. He was succeeded by Revs. Wm. B. Sprague, Thomas E. Vermilye, John H. Hunter, A. A. Wood, H. M. Field, T. H. Hawks, E. B. Foster, Henry M. Grout, John M. Chapin, and Edward N. Pomeroy.

The church is now without a settled pastor. The present membership is 120. The deacons are J. N. Bagg, W. H. Bull, and Joseph M. Smith. The superintendent of the Sabbath-school is Dr. H. M. Miller.

The First Meeting-House.—The first action in reference to the erection of a meeting-house, of which any record is found, is in the parish register of date Dec. 8, 1702. At a meeting it was voted "to raise a rate for the carieing on the work of the meeting-house and other charges of the sum of two hundred pounds."

It was voted, April 1, 1703, "that the present comity, viz., John Barber, Eben Parsons, Joseph Leonard, Benjamin Leonard, and John Miller, have the disposing of the two hundred pounds Raised for and toward the carieing on and erecteing the work of the meeting-house."

At a meeting, Nov. 11, 1703, "In order to the modeling of the Meeting-House with respect to the seating of it, It was voted that the Meeting-House be seated In form according to the moddle of the east side Meeteing-House, proportionate according to the room."

Dec. 14, 1703, voted "that the present comitey seate the meeting-house, and that they have respect to Age, Estate, and Qualification, and having respect to these Rules they are to act according to their best discretion and Sound Judgment."

On Dec. 9, 1707, it was voted "to raise twenty pounds for a meeting-house bell," which was not done at that time, however. At a meeting Dec. 14, 1708, it was voted "to allow John Ely twenty shillings for Drumeing on the Sabbath," a custom which was kept up for about forty years, when, in 1743, a bell was procured.

The year 1711 seems to have been the time when the church was completed, for Dec. 12, 1710, it was voted "that the present Comitey should finish the meeting-House."

The meeting-house was first occupied in 1702, and was located on the common almost in front of the present town-house. It was 42 feet square and 92 feet in height to the top of the spire. An engraving of this building is given on page 908.

The glass in the windows was diamond-shaped and set in lead sash. Around the walls were fifteen square pews. The body of the house was filled with slips fronting the pulpit, with a partition running through the middle, forming two divisions, one occupied by the men, the other by the women. The treble singers sat in the gallery on the right of the pulpit, the bass singers on the left. The wood-work of the pews, pulpit, and railing was of oak and yellow pine.

An amusing description of the church was related by Dr. Lathrop of a child who attended meeting there for the first time, and on returning home undertook to describe it, as follows: "The men were all shut up in hog-pens, and there was a man a-hollerin' up in the chimbley, and on the roost there was a lot of gals squallin'."[§]

Here in this quaint house of worship the people gathered together for a century. The last Sabbath assemblage was on June 20, 1802, when the pastor, Rev. Joseph Lathrop, preached a valedictory sermon from the ninth verse of the forty-eighth psalm. In closing, he said: "The antiquity of this house

[†] Extract from the diary of Rev. Dr. Williams, of Longmeadow.

[‡] During his early ministry here he was suspected of entertaining heterodox views. A Mr. Jonathan Worthington, of Springfield, was presented by the grand jury for making such an assertion, and was fined by court, in 1722.

[§] In about 1739-40, when the church was undergoing repairs, several additional pews were built, and some of them seemed to cause trouble, as would appear from a vote Oct. 24, 1745,—“Voted that if there be not a Reformation Respecting the Disorders in the Pews built on the great Beam in the time of Publick Worship, that the Committee shall have power, if they see cause, to pull them down.”

carries our minds back to the time of its erection, one hundred years ago. This community was then small, consisting of but 30 families; savages dwelt among them, and a wilderness surrounded them. There are no houses here except this ancient house of God, which was built a hundred years ago. The founders of this ancient temple are gone, and their places on earth are known no more. The same in a century will be said of us. We are now about to leave this house; this is the last time that we are here to meet for God's worship; there will soon be a last time of our meeting in any place on earth. May we all meet in heaven!"

The building was used eighteen years after it was given up for worship for town and parochial meetings, and, in 1820, by a vote of the town, it was torn down, and part of the old beams and timbers were used in the construction of the town-house.

The subject of building a new meeting-house began to be discussed as early as 1769, and a committee was appointed, in January of that year, to agree upon a location. The subject was agitated at intervals until near the close of the century. Committee after committee was appointed, and places were designated, but met with opposition repeatedly.

In the year 1799, Mr. John Ashley contributed to the parish, as a fund for the support of the ministry, £1300, on condition that the parish would erect a spacious meeting-house on a spot designated by him. On the 6th of June, 1800, the inhabitants of the parish voted their acceptance of his generous donation, and the long-continued troubles of the society came to an end.

The new meeting-house was built on what is known as "Orthodox Hill," and was completed in 1802, and four days after the farewell sermon in the old house Dr. Lathrop and his congregation assembled in the new, and it was dedicated one hundred years from the erection of the First Church, and is still in use by the descendants of the early fathers.

The contract was let to Capt. Timothy Billings for $1400 and ten gallons of St. Croix rum, valued at about $60. The rum was not used, and the amount of money was distributed to the workmen. The parish committee who had charge of building the meeting-house were Dr. Seth Lathrop, Justin Ely, Jr., Ruggles Kent, and Moses Ashley.

THE PARK STREET CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH was organized in 1871, with 75 members, who received letters from the First Church. The handsome brick church was built in 1872, at a cost of about $40,000, including organ and land. Rev. Lyman D. Calkins, the present pastor, was installed in 1873. Present membership, about 140. Its officers are: Deacons, Samuel Smith, Franklin F. Smith, and Lucius F. Mellen; Superintendent of Sabbath-school, Rev. L. D. Calkins.

THE SECOND CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

was organized in 1850, and is located at the village of Mitteneague. Its present pastor is Rev. John E. Hurlbut; membership, about 90. Officers: Deacons, Luke Bliss, H. A. Crowe, and George C. Buel; Superintendent of Sunday-school, Henry A. Goodman.

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH, on Main Street, was built in 1872, at a cost of $4500. It was a mission of the State Street Baptist Church of Springfield until 1874, when it was organized into an independent church, and called Rev. Oscar D. Thomas to the pastorate. He resigned in November, 1878, and the church is now without a pastor. It has a membership of 105, and Sabbath-school of about 100. The officers are: Deacons, Alexander Grant, Plumer J. Prescott, Emerson A. Todd, and Edwin Richardson; Superintendent of Sunday-school, J. D. Parsons.

The Methodists commenced holding meetings in the town-hall in West Springfield in 1841, and continued to use it until a church was built, in 1843, on Elm Street. In 1852 the church was removed to Mitteneague village, and is now, after being remodeled, the Second Congregational Church. Its pastors have been the Rev. Henry Powers, Rev. Perkins K. Clark, Rev. H. M. Holden, and the Rev. John E. Hurlbut.*

In 1872 a mission of Trinity Methodist Church of Springfield was established in the southern part of the town, meeting at first in the school-house on School Street, and afterward in Centennial Hall. In 1876 a church was organized, and Rev. W. E. Knox placed in charge, who is the present pastor. In 1878 a church edifice was erected on Main Street, and through the efficient efforts of Rev. Mr. Knox the money was raised by subscriptions to free the church from debt previous to dedication. The building is 55 by 38 feet; the audience-room is the full size of the building, with a seating capacity for 275 persons. In the lower rooms are a vestry, two classrooms, and pastor's study. There is a large Sunday-school connected with this church, of which Solomon E. Reed is superintendent.

THE CHURCH OF THE GOOD SHEPHERD (EPISCOPAL),

on Main Street, was built in 1870, at a cost of about $10,000, mostly a gift from Chas. Ely. It is a very handsome, unique edifice. It has had several pastors, but is supplied mostly from Christ Church, Springfield. An efficient Sunday-school is conducted by E. P. Kendrick.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH (CATHOLIC), located at Mitteneague, was built in 1870, cost $15,000, and has a seating capacity of 650. It was a mission church of St. Michael's Cathedral, Springfield, under the direction of Very Rev. P. Healy until 1877, when it was placed in charge of Rev. P. B. Phelon. It has a total membership of 950, including many who attend from Agawam, and a Sabbath-school of 180.

* The church building was destroyed by fire Feb. 22, 1879, and is now being rebuilt on the old site at a cost of $4000.

THE CHURCH OF THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, on Main Street, was built in 1878, at a cost of $4500, including the organ. It has a seating capacity of 320, and its interior is very tastefully embellished with designs peculiar to that church. Father Phelon is also in charge of this church, and of the parishes of West Springfield and Agawam as a distinct district.

SOCIETIES.

The organized societies of this town, aside from the churches, are but few. They are the "Father Mathew Temperance Society," "St. Thomas Temperance Society," "Oaken Bucket Division of the Sons of Temperance," and the "Women's Christian Temperance Union."

BURIAL-PLACES.

"Since the time when the stones and relics of the original Springfield burying-ground were removed to the new cemetery, on the hill, the old graveyard in West Springfield has been the most venerable landmark of the sort in this vicinity. Westfield, or perhaps even Longmeadow, may possess monuments more ancient, although I am under the impression that Northampton is the nearest town that boasts of such a one.

"As the present towns of Holyoke and Agawam were formerly included in West Springfield's limits, and as their numerous cemeteries now existing are of comparatively recent date, nearly all the dwellers on the west bank of the river—from the mountain range below Northampton to the boundary line of Connecticut—were brought to this place for burial. Tradition, indeed, says that the yard became so over-crowded as to be 'planted two or three deep with bodies.' Accepting as true this story that the ancient dwellers in the country, where land was so cheap, should sanction a practice observed by the moderns only in cities (like Paris), where land is very dear, I take the explanation of it to be this:

"The yard was the common property of 'the Parish,' which, in those early days of universal church-going, was only technically distinguishable from 'the town,' without private ownership or 'family lots' of any sort. Spaces for burial were indicated to applicants by the parish officers, and when several members of a given family chanced to be buried in proximity, and stones were erected to indicate their resting-places, the representatives of that family acquired a sort of presumptive right to the vacant spaces in the immediate vicinity. But many people in those days were too poor or too careless to erect enduring monuments of any sort, and so the mounds unmarked by stones were soon leveled, and in course of years the localities of the graves were forgotten, and the parish officers pointed them out as vacant spaces for new applicants.

"Probably no existing record or living man remains to tell when the first interment was made there. The earliest date that has been deciphered is Nov. 7, 1711, on the stone belonging to 'Nathaniel Dwite;' but it is more than likely that the ground had been used before the close of the seventeenth century. Few if any interments have been made since the present century opened, for the earliest monument in the town-house yard is dated 1787, and several other burial-places in remoter sections of the town were dedicated not many years later.

"Up to about 1850 the old yard was kept in tolerable condition, partly by individual attentions to particular portions of it, partly by general oversight of some one member of the parish, who was allowed to pasture his sheep there, or carry off the hay in return for his trouble.

The mounds of all the comparatively recent graves were well defined; the pathways were kept cleared, and the spot was a not unpleasant one to wander through. Then came the project, in which Mr. Sewall White was the chief mover, for erecting a monument to the first clergyman settled in the town, building a fence, and planting some evergreen trees, which project was carried out by the voluntary contributions of money and services from individual parishioners and citizens. As no stone of any sort remained to indicate the locality of the grave of even so important a man as the first minister, it was decided to place the monument in the centre of the yard. It is a plain sandstone shaft, perhaps 12 feet high, bearing on its south and north sides, respectively, the following inscriptions:

"Rev. John Woodbridge, first minister of West Springfield, after serving his generation faithfully, fell asleep June 10, 1718."

"The righteous shall be held in everlasting remembrance."

"Erected by the descendants of his parishioners, 1852."

"Among the first settlers and the earliest families of the town we found the names of Ashley, Bagg, Barber, Bedurtha, Cooper, Day, Dumbleton, Ely, Fowler, Jones, Leonard, Merrick, Miller, Petty, Rogers, Parsons, Smith, Vanhorn, and Foster, who gave this ancient burial-ground to the first parish of West Springfield."

"The Rev. Samuel Hopkins is also buried in this burying-ground, and his monument bears the following inscription: 'Here rests y^e Body of y^e Rev^d Mr. Sam^l Hopkins, In whose sound Judgment, solid Learning, Candour, Piety, Sincerity, Constancy, and universal Benevolence combined to form an excellent Minister, a kind Husband, Parent, and Friend, who deceased October the 6th, A.D. 1755, in the 62d year of his age, and 36th year of his Ministry.'

* The above paragraphs are taken from an article contributed to the Springfield Republican of Dec. 12, 1872, by Lyman H. Bagg, and as they contain much of interest connected with the old cemetery we quote them.

"In about 1770 the Paucatuck Cemetery was opened. The first burial of which any record is obtained is on the monument of Jonathan Smith, as follows:

"In memory of Mr. Jon^s Smith, The virtuous Father of a numerous offspring, to whom he gave an example of Piety and Prudence; Who died Feb. 9th, A.D. 1772, In the 75th year of his age.

"How best are they
Who in Christ's bosom sleep!
Cease, then, dear friends,
To mourn, lament, or weep."

TOWN-HOUSE CEMETERY.

The first burial in these grounds was that of Solomon Lathrop, son of the Rev. Joseph Lathrop, whose epitaph is as follows:

"In memory of Mr. Solomon Lathrop, who, in hope of a blessed immortality, calmly fell asleep April 27, 1787, in the 28th year of his age.

"A coffin, sheet, and grave is all my earthly store,
'Tis all I want, and kings will have no more."

The Rev. Joseph Lathrop lies buried in this yard, and the lines that perpetuate his memory are as follows:

"To the memory of the Rev. Joseph Lathrop, D.D., third Pastor of the first church in West Springfield, who died Dec. 31, 1820, aged LXXXIX years and 2 months, and in the LXV year of his ministry."

MEETING-HOUSE HILL CEMETERY.

"These grounds are owned by the First Parish in West Springfield, and were purchased previous to the erection of the church in 1800, of Landlord Benjamin Stebbins. A place was set apart where persons of color were interred, but no monument has as yet been erected to mark the spot. Ira Fletcher, a celebrated violin player, and his wife are laid here. The first person buried in this yard was Mrs. Eleanor, consort of Mr. Joseph Ashley, who died Apl. 14, 1803, in the 86th year of her age. Entering the yard, she lies at the left side of the gateway."†

The remains of three ministers are buried within this inclosure,—the Rev. D. T. Bagg, died Jan. 15, 1848; Rev. Moody Harrington, died July 22, 1865; Rev. Pliny Butts, died July 6, 1860.

In this cemetery also is erected the soldiers' monument, a brownstone shaft about 20 feet high, bearing the following inscription:

This monument is erected to the memory of those members of Co. I, 10th Mass. Regiment, who fell in the service of their country during the Great Rebellion at Williamsburg, Fair Oaks, Glendale, Malvern, 1st Fredericksburg, Mary's Heights, Salem, 2d Fredericksburg, Gettysburg, Rappahannock Station, Mine Run, Wilderness, Spotsylvania, Cold Harbor, and Petersburg.

SCHOOLS.

When this territory was yet in the first parish of Springfield, "a tract of land at the lower end of Chicopee Plain, on the west side of the 'Great River,' is said to have been appropriated by the town in 1654, either for the helping to maintain a schoolmaster or ruling elder, or to bear any other town charges."

This land was rented for many years, and the rents applied to the support of schools. The following extracts are from the town records of Springfield, and are the first official action in reference to schools in the second parish:

March 13, 1704.—"At the town-meeting the Committee for the precinct on the west side of the Grt River, in behalf of ye said Precinct, did Petition that the Towne would either direct and establish a school on that side of said River, or else acquit them of paying any rate for the Town's school on the East side of ye gret River."

March 26, 1705.—"At a Towne Meeting it was voted to pay out of the Town Treasury an addition of fifteen pounds, to encourage the inhabitants on the west side of the great River & of Long meadow to promote the Learning of their children for the present year, & the Selectmen are to see to the disposing of said sum according to their best discretion."

March 12, 1706.—"The Inhabitants of the west side the River presented a Petition to the Town, that they would allow them support for encouragement of their schoole. And it was voted that, if they keepe a schoole, to continue the support of the Towne."

March 26, 1705 (on the backward page).—"Nathaniel Sikes and Eben Warner dissent from this vote."

May 30, 1706.—"It was voted and agreed at a Towne meeting that the said west side inhabitants have Liberty to get a schoolmaster to teach their children to read and write, and that the charge be carried on by the Towne in the same manner as the school affaire is carried on on the east side of the grt river, as the law directs."

"At a Parish meeting held Dec. 10, 1706, it was voted to build a school-house and that Deacon Parsons, Samuel Day, and Samuel Ely to see the same accomplished as soon as may bee. And to raise a rate to defray the charge of sd worcke."

June 2, 1708.—"At a town-meeting of Springfield it was voted & concluded to ratify the vote of the town at the meeting May 30, 1708, respecting the school affair on the west side of the grt river, & further that the Selectmen of this Town of Springfield be empowered to provide them, the said west side inhabitants, a meet person to teach children to read and write, and that the inhabitants of said west side the grt River have Liberty to aide from among themselves some one man to join with the said selectmen to carry the said affaire, that the children of said West side inhabitants may be taught to read & to write, & that what the scholars' part to pay falls short of satisfying the charge, that it be paid as other town charges are paid."

Dec. 7, 1711.—"It was declared that the selectmen agree with Mr. Benjamin Colton to keepe schoole on the west side of the grt river, & to pay him after the rate of twenty pounds for halfe a year, but he kept the school for four months only, viz., from the thirteenth day of April to the 13th day of Aug.; amount, £13 6s. 8d."

"At a Parish meeting Dec. 9, 1712, it was voted That the Present Comity tack the care of Building a School-House and procuer a schoolmaster."

"At a town-meeting of Springfield, April 1, 1713, Dea. Parsons, John Day, and Pelatiah Glover, Selectmen, agreed with Mr. Nathaniel Downing for the keeping of School on the west side of ye Great River for the terms of halfe a yeare, and to pay to the said Mr. Dowoing 15s in Graine or Money, and to allow him a fortnight time in the said halfe yeare for his Harvest and Getting in his Hay."

He taught also in 1714, 1715, and 1716.

Jan. 16, 1716.—"There was granted to Mr. Nath'l Downing twenty-five pounds for teaching the school on the west side of the River."

March 28, 1716.—"Those parts of the Town of Springfield which was by the Town voted to be precincts are as follows: 1, The west side of the grt River; 2, The Long meadow; 3, The west side of Agawam River; 4, The Upper Chickapee; 5, The Lower Chickapee; 6, And Skipmuck. It was further voted that each of the places above mentioned should be allowed precincts respecting of schools. It was further voted that they should be contioned precincts for three years. Voted that every precinct shall pay to them one school. Voted that that precinct which doth neglect keeping a school, that money which is raised upon them for the supporting of the schools shall return into the Town Treasury. Voted further to raise eighty-two pounds in pay in order to the supporting the schools in Springfield."

May 6, 1721.—"Then agreed with Mr. John Hooker to keep school for the west side precinct, in Springfield, for the year ensuing to teach to read & write, and said Mr. John Hooker to have 30 pounds for his Labour, to be paid in money or in grain at the market price, as it passeth generally between man & man."

Dec. 9, 1726.—"Then agreed with Mr. John Woodbridge To keep the grammar school in Springfield for the space of three months; he is to have for his solerry after the reat of forty-five pounds yearly."

Mr. Woodbridge left the school the 27th of January, 1727.

"March ye 13th, 17[?] — It was voted at this meeting that there be application made to the General Court, In order to the settling of a school in this Precinct, and that Deacon Parsons, Samuel Day, John Day, Jams Mirick, and Sam'l Ely be a Comittie to manage that concern In behalf of this Precinct. It was further voted and concluded that that money which is the proportion of this Precinct of the eighty-two pounds granted by the town to be raised for the school, shall be disposed of for that use by the Comitey for the School."

"March 12th, 17[?] — Voted that the present cmmitty tacke care of the school."

"May ye 10, 1731.—The Committee on ye west side of ye Great River have hired Mr. Samuel Ely to keepe ye schoole in said precincts and ye Selectmen have consented to ye same, he to begin ye Schoole by ye Day said above. Ordered Mr. Henry Burt, Treasurer, to pay to Mr. John Ashley, Jun., the sum of Fourteen Pounds Seven Shillings and six pence, May ye 10, 1731, for his Services in ye Schools on ye West side of ye Great River."

"In 1732, Jonathan Bliss was paid nine pounds for keeping ye school on ye west side of ye Grt River."

Apr'l 5, 1734.—"Mr. John Ely, Senr., began to keep the school on the west side of y g River."

May 23, 1734.—"An order was given to pay Josiah Miller four pounds six shillings in full for keeping the school on the west side of ye Grt River to the 3d day of Jan'y last past."

March 31, 1735.—"John Ely was paid £16 05s. 06d. for keeping ye school. Nov., 1735, Nathaniel Atchinson begun keeping school on ye west side, and He taught several years."

"There is no evidence on the records of West Springfield that a school-house was really built before 1752, but from an entry in the Springfield Records, Vols. IV. and V., page 15, and bearing date Nov. 21, 1737, it appears that there was 'Granted to Joseph Miller for building a stack of Chimneys on the west side of the Great River at the School-House, two pounds & three shillings for nails & shingles about said house.'"

This is followed by nine other grants concerning the work done at said school-house, one of which leads to the opinion the house had been built some time.

"Granted to Thomas Miller for Repairs at the School-House on the west side of ye Grt River last year, 3 shillings & six pence."

March 10, 1752.—"Voted and Granted unto the Inhabitants of the Second Parish in said Town on the west side of the Great River the sum of seventy pounds to be applied for and toward building a School-House there, and that the same be paid to the Committee that may be chosen by said Parish for Building said School-House, and that the said sum be raised in the next vote."

"At the Town-meeting May 15, 1752, voted that William Stebbins, Capt. Jos. Colton, & Nathaniel Burt be a Committee to view & consider, fix and determine the place where the School-House shall be built on the west side of the Grt River Toward the building of which there was Seventy pounds granted at the Town-Meeting in March last, & that Ensign Stebbins appoint the time and Place for attending said service."

"At a meeting of the Inhabitants of the Second Parish in Springfield, May 18, 1752, It was voted That Ensign John Ely, Benj. Day, & Capt. Joseph Miller be a Committee to lay out the money and provide materials in order to build a School-House in this Parish, according to the vote of the Town of Springfield in March Last past. Voted, 2d, To leave it with the Committee to Determine what Dimensions to build the School-House."

The school-house was built on the common, and served for many years the purposes of education. The lower story was divided into two rooms, and was used for the smaller schools, which were taught by Ann Cooley for more than twenty years, while the upper part in the gambrel roof had but one room, and was warmed by fires in the huge fireplace in each end of the building. In this room was kept the high school.

A record in the parish register of Jan. 29, 1770, records a vote

"To accept of the Report of the Committee chosen to confer with the Committee chosen by Agawam and the people of the fourth Parish on the West side of the Great River, which is as followeth, viz.:

"SPRINGFIELD, 25th January, 1770.—We, the subscribers, being appointed Committees from the second and the fifth Parishes in sd Springfield, on the West side of the Great River, conferred together about getting off as a town, do unanimously agree on the following particulars, viz.:

"First, that after the west side shall get off as a Town, or District, the Gramer School Shall be kept for the first Ten Years, one-half of the Time in the second Parish, and the other half in the fifth Parish, viz.: alternately in each Parish. Thirdly, That, whereas, the Inhabitants of part of the fourth Parish having agreed to relinquish their right to the Gramer school for the first Ten years, We do agree That after the first Ten Years the Gramer school shall be removed into each Parish in Proportion to what each Parish shall pay if the Inhabitants of the fourth shall desire the Gramer school any part of the time; otherwise, to be kept in the second and fifth Parishes for the future, in proportion to what the second and fifth Parishes shall pay towards the support of said school. Moses Leonard, Francis Stebbins, John Morgan, Samuel Palmer, Justin Ely, George Breck.

"Test: NATH. ATCHINSON, Clerk."

This ancient school-house is still well preserved, and is used for a barn by William White, in the rear of his house in Park Street. It was with great difficulty that the money was raised to erect a new and more commodious school-house, and still more difficult to locate it, until 1818, when the centre district appropriated $800, the balance being raised by individual subscriptions. The new school-house was located where the new town-hall now stands. It was a brick structure, containing three school-rooms on the first floor, and a hall in the second story for the use of the town, and where town-meetings were held from 1820 to 1873, when it was taken down to give place to the new hall. The new town-hall was built in 1873, at a cost of $38,125. A part of the lower story is arranged for school purposes, and is occupied by the high school. The town has nine other substantial and commodious school-buildings,—the Centre District, built in 1874, at a cost of $23,957.67; Main Street, built in 1872, cost, $20,745.56; Miteneague, built in 1871, cost, $16,449; besides school-houses on School Street, and at Riverdale, Ashleyville, Prospect Hill, Paucatuck, and Amostown. There were about 750 pupils enrolled in the different schools in 1878, and about $8000 were expended in that year. Of this amount $864 was received from the "Ashley fund," and $330 from the dog fund.

OLD TREES.

One of the largest trees in the State is the "Big Elm," situated on the west side of Main Street (formerly Shad Lane), standing on land now owned by Mrs. Heman Smith and Mrs. A. W. Allen. The land was originally a part of the Heman Day farm, and the tree was brought by him on his shoulder from Agawam Meadow, and planted where it now stands on his twenty-first birthday, Jan. 27, 1776, it having then attained six or eight years' growth. The engraving here presented gives some idea of its immense size.

The circumference of the trunk, at its smallest diameter, is 27 feet. Its branches extend about 130 feet. A few years ago a large branch was blown off, otherwise it is a splendid specimen of vigorous old age, symmetry, and strength. It is coeval with the Republic, "and a beautiful emblem of that tree of liberty that has stood firm and majestic amidst all the storms it has endured, and whose spreading branches cast a healthful shade over the entire continent.

"The hills are covered with the shadow of it, and the boughs thereof are like the goody cedars. She sends out her boughs unto the seas and her branches unto the rivers."^s

The elms that stand in Ramapogue Street were set over one hundred years ago by Luke and Ebenezer Day and John Ely, and were brought from Barber's Swamp, in Tatham, in the west part of the town. The large buttonwood-tree that stands in the yard of Joseph Morgan was planted in 1782.

INITIAL EVENTS.

The first wagon in town was owned in Amostown, and was without springs. Brooms were carried from West Springfield to Boston by Solomon Todd, who, with his own team, transported produce and brought back goods for Jesse Stebbins and others. In 1752, Rev. Samuel Hopkins published a pamphlet giving an account of the Indian way of manufacturing maple-sugar.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES.

Through the instrumentality of the Rev. Dr. Lathrop, a library was founded in 1775 with 40 subscribers. It was peripatetic, going from house to house in a two-bushel basket. It attained at last to 56 volumes, and in October, 1807, was divided among the shareholders.

About the year 1810 another library was started, with headquarters in the town-house. This collection was sold about 1840.

There is a town library containing 2288 volumes. It was inaugurated in 1855 by individual contributions, but subsequently transferred to the town on condition that $50 be appropriated annually for new books. A committee of three is appointed annually to purchase books, and by the payment of 50 cents per annum books can be drawn from the library, on the first and third Mondays of each month. J. M. Harmon is librarian, and the books are kept at the library-rooms in the town-hall.

NEWSPAPERS AND PUBLICATIONS.

A newspaper called the American Intelligencer was established in West Springfield, Aug. 15, 1795, by Richard Davidson, an Englishman. It was soon after purchased by Edward Gray, who continued it weekly for three years, when he removed to Suffield, Conn., and later to Hartford. The office was a few rods west of the old meeting-house.

In 1796, Mr. Gray published a small pamphlet (which passed through eleven editions) entitled "The Advantages and Disadvantages of the Married State, under the Similitude of a Dream."

A copy of the American Intelligencer, dated Dec. 5, 1797, No. 121, contains an account of the sickness and death of a little child, daughter of Joseph Ashley, Jr., who was bitten by a mad dog on the 14th of October previous.

* Centennial address of Rev. Wm. B. Sprague, 1874.

POST-OFFICES.

There are three in the town, West Springfield, Mitteneague, and Ashleyville. The postmasters at West Springfield are given below, as accurately as can be ascertained: Jere. Stebbins, appointed Dec. 18, 1802; Benjamin Stebbins, Feb. 19, 1817; Miner Stebbins, Oct. 26, 1819; Elias Winchell, Aug. 27, 1824; Henry Cooley, Nov. 16, 1836; Edward Southworth, Sept. 30, 1841; M. M. Tallmadge, May 9, 1845; Michael Marsh, April 29, 1846; Lester Williams, Aug. 31, 1847; P. Le B. Stickney, June 5, 1849; Lewis Leonard, June 2, 1851; W. E. Cooley, July 24, 1866; Henry A. Phelon, Feb. 13, 1867; George D. Gilbert. The postmaster at Mitteneague is Luke Bliss, and at Ashleyville, Franklin F. Smith.

HIGH-WATER—DYKES.

The lower portions of West Springfield, now occupied by the shops of the Boston and Albany Railway, and the new town which has sprung up around them, were subject, in former times, to considerable overflows by the Agawam and Connecticut Rivers.

The highest uprisings of the latter stream, commencing with 1801, have been as follows: 1801, called the "Jefferson Flood," 19 feet; 1804, 19 feet; in 1818 there was a great rise, which carried off the old bridge, built about 1805, but the height is not given; 1843, 18 feet 6 inches; 1854, 22 feet 2 inches; 1862, 22 feet 1 inch; 1864, 22 feet; 1869, 18 feet; Dec. 11, 1878, 18 feet 6 inches.

About 1864 the people began to construct dykes, and the old bridge company built from their bridge to the railroad bridge, and in 1868 the town finished it northward nearly to the park, and the same year constructed the one on the south toward the Agawam River. These dykes or levees have proven so far substantial barriers, and prevented the spreading of the waters through the settled portions of this part of the town. They are similar to the Mississippi levees, and have been constructed at considerable expense. The Agawam River, in December, 1878, rose three and a half feet higher than ever before known.

MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES.

On the 21st day of February, 1649, "there was granted Deacon Samuel Chapin a parcel of land by Agawam Falls, where he hath one acre and a half already adjoining to Mr. Moxon's meadow ground, which acre and a half is to be made up to six acres." This land is supposed to be what is known as the old "Original Mill Grant," and tradition says that it was granted on condition that a grist-mill be erected to grind grists for families on the west side of the river; and it is said that a few years later a mill and a dam were erected, and from that time to the present the site has been occupied for that purpose. The property is now, and has been since 1859, in possession of Mr. J. L. Worthy, after having passed through many changes. The dam was rebuilt about 1850, and the mill is now conducted as a flouring- and grist-mill, and contains two runs of stone.

The site of the present grist- and saw-mill, owned by Andrew Bartholomew, on Darby Brook, has been improved for more than one hundred years. A saw-mill was first erected, and the property has belonged to the Baggs, Ashleys, Whites, and others among the old families. The power was never extensive, and consequently not very valuable. The present mills use steam in connection with water-power. The tanneries at Ashleyville were once quite important, but are doing very little at present.

At the beginning of the present century, and for several years thereafter, more business was done on the west side of the river than on the east. There was located on Park Street a hat manufactory, the business being carried on so late as 1840 by Lester Williams, who now resides, at an advanced age, on the corner of Park and Elm Streets, and has been a prominent man in town for many years. Farther up on Park Street, at "New Boston," were located a large tannery and a factory for dressing cloth, and still farther up on the Agawam road was an extensive gin and brandy distillery.

The manufacturing interests of West Springfield are not large. It has a valuable water-power in the Agawam River, which is turned to good account. A dam was built across this river at Mitteneague Falls in 1840, furnishing power for several manufactories. The Agawam Canal Company built a cotton-factory in 1848. The capital stock is $377,250, and the company manufacture cotton-sheets at the rate of 100,000 yards per week, employing 300 hands. The officers of the company are Chester W. Chapin, President; W. K. Baker, Treasurer; I. B. Lowell, Agent. The Southworth Paper Company manufacture fine writing-paper, and produce annually $125,000 worth, employing about 80 hands. The paper-mill is owned by Wells Southworth, of New Haven, and the heirs of Edward Southworth, of West Springfield. H. W. Southworth is agent and manager. The Agawam Paper Company's mill was built in 1859; its capital stock is $50,000; makes fine writing-paper at the rate of one and a half tons per day, and employs about 60 hands. These three obtain their water-power from the Agawam Canal. Goodhue & Birnie have a manufactory in the southern part of the town for making iron water-pipes lined with cement. They supply water-works in all parts of the country. The carriage-works of Edson Clark, in the northern part of the town, manufacture wagons, sleighs, and carriages to a considerable extent. There is also in this part of the town a tannery, which formerly did a large business. Riverdale steam saw-mill and grist-mill, at the centre, are owned and run by C. A. Bartholomew.

MILITARY RECORD.

The town has a noble military history, and the patriotism of its citizens has been conspicuous from the days of the Revolution to the close of the great Rebellion. When the General Court, in June, 1776, ordered 5000 men to be raised in the colony, 754 were to come from the Connecticut Valley, and the quota of West Springfield was 48, a larger number than from any one town in the valley,—1 more than Northampton, 4 more than Springfield, and 17 more than Westfield.

Previous to this, upon hearing the news of the battle of Lexington, a company of Minute-Men numbering 53 was raised and sent forward to the scene of action. The officers of this latter company were Capt. Enoch Chapin and Lieuts. Samuel Flowers and Luke Day.

In the war of 1812-15, the town, having strong Federal sentiments, sent Peletiah Bliss and Timothy Burbank as delegates to a convention held at Northampton, which sent a memorial to the President praying that commissioners might be appointed to negotiate peace with Great Britain upon honorable terms. It was largely represented in a company of artillery which marched out of Springfield in 1814, under the call of Gov. Strong.

A history of the part it took in the civil war of 1861-5 will be a matter of interest to the reader. The following facts relative to those who went from West Springfield and were killed or died are copied from a "Decoration Day" address, delivered by L. F. Mellen, in 1872:

"Corp. Wm. Richards, 34th Mass. Regt., killed in action at New Market, Va., May 15, 1864. He was retreating, after a skirmish, and was shot through the heart while getting over a fence. He was buried on the battle-field.

"Lieut. Wm. Arthur Ashley, 10th Mass. Regt., was killed in the battle of the Wilderness, May 5, 1864. His comrades wrapped his body in a blanket, marked his name on a piece of paper, and left him in the hands of the enemy. The place of his burial was never known.

"Corp. Nelson R. Hoisington, 34th Mass. Regt., wounded at Winchester, Va., Sept. 19, 1864. Died in the hospital at that place, Sept. 24th, and was buried in the hospital yard. His remains were afterward brought home and deposited in Park Street Cemetery.

"Corp. Aaron Clapp, 34th Mass. Regt., wounded in battle at Piedmont, Va., May 24, 1864. Died of his wounds, June 5, 1864; buried on the battle-field.

"Private Parvin Clapp, 34th Mass. Regt., killed instantly, July 5, 1864, at Piedmont, Va., and was buried South.

Henry A. Phelon

HENRY A. PHELON was born in Nantucket, Mass., Oct. 12, 1831. His paternal grandfather, Henry Phelon, was among those who early settled at Feeding Hills, Hampden Co., Mass., and was a very successful farmer. His father, Henry Phelon, Jr., was born at Feeding Hills, in 1799. When but a boy he left the paternal roof and went to Nantucket, and with a seeming natural desire for a seafaring life, and an ambition to know something of the world, he engaged in the whaling fishery. For twenty-one years he was in the employ of Starbuck Brothers, working his way up from the humble position of sailor to be commander of some of the finest ships that ever left that port. In 1841 he retired from the sea, and bought a small farm in West Springfield, Mass., where he lived for seven years, and became one of the prominent men of the town, taking an active interest in all that pertained to the welfare of his fellow-men, and being elected to represent them in the State Legislature. In 1848 he was prevailed upon by Swifts & Nye, of New Bedford, to become part owner and take command of the ship "Ploughboy" for a whaling voyage, and with his son (the subject of this narrative), then seventeen years of age, sailed for the Pacific Ocean on a four years' voyage; but in the fall of 1849 the vessel was wrecked off the coast of Peru, South America, and the crew picked up by a Spanish catamaran and taken to Guayaquil. This ended the father's seagoing life. He returned to West Springfield, and died in the year 1851. The mother, Mary Ann (Folger) Phelon, was a lineal descendant on her mother's side of Thomas Macy, who was the first white settler on Nantucket Island, in 1659. He was dwelling in Salisbury, Mass., when a fine of five dollars an hour was imposed on him for entertaining two Quakers a day and a night. He preferred the society of the Indians (some three thousand of whom dwelt then upon Nantucket) to such foolish laws. He died in 1682. His wife, Sarah Hopecott, of Chelmarth, England, died in 1706, aged ninety-four. On her father's side the Folgers were a numerous race.

Peter Folger, the grandfather of Benjamin Franklin, was invited to Nantucket Island, in 1663, to act as miller, weaver, and interpreter with the Indians, and there the mother of Franklin was born.

His mother died Feb. 4, 1875. Captain Phelon first went to sea with his father, the late Captain Henry Phelon, in 1848, but the father's last expedition was only the beginning of ocean life with the son. Upon his return from Peru, he was still attracted to lead a seafaring life. The calm of his rural home was more galling than the stormy sea, and accordingly, in 1850, he embarked as a sailor on a voyage for Europe, and for nearly ten years Captain Phelon was on whaling voyages, in the merchant service, and coasting, visiting almost every portion of the world, and sailing twice around the globe. He rose from a subordinate station to the highest in command.

When the war of the Rebellion broke out, Captain Phelon made haste to offer his services to his country, and in February, 1862, he was commissioned as acting master in the United States navy, and served as executive officer of the U. S. S. "Victoria" and "Commodore Perry," and was subsequently placed in command of the gunboat "Shawsheen," which was destroyed in the advance up the James River. She received a shot in her boiler, which exploded, and Captain Phelon and many of his officers were supposed to be killed. The press thus eulogized him: "He was regarded as one of the best officers of the navy; a braver man never trod the quarter-deck, and his unusual social qualities made him the favorite of all who knew him." Subsequently, he was executive officer of the iron-clad "Atlanta," and in July, 1864, took command of the U. S. S. "Monticello," under S. P. Lee, acting rear-admiral, commanding N. A. B. Squadron. It was during his command of this war vessel that Captain Phelon, while cruising off "New Inlet," N. C., in the night, discovered the rebel gunboat "Tallahassee" standing for the shore under a full head of steam. After a challenge and no reply, Captain Phelon opened upon the mysterious vessel with shell and grape, and after a short but sharp contest the rebel gunboat disappeared, but was seen the next morning lying serenely under the guns of Fort Fisher, having escaped notwithstanding the vigorous lookout of the blockading fleet. Upon this occasion, Captain Phelon was noticed as follows: "To Captain Phelon all honor is due; to him belongs the credit of first engaging the rival of the destroyed 'Alabama.'" Soon after he took command of the U. S. S. "Daylight," which he continued to command until the close of the war.

He was complimented a number of times by the commanding officers of the squadron. Commodore Davenport, in writing to Admiral Lee, says: "I desire to call your attention to the zealous and very efficient manner in which he has performed his duties while here. He has made a number of very important captures of rebels, and his good conduct generally recommends him to your most favorable consideration."

At the close of the war Captain Phelon returned to West Springfield, and was married, June 13, 1865, to Miss Josephine, daughter of C. C. Brand, of Norwich, Conn. (who was the inventor of the whaling "bomb-lance"). He was a merchant and postmaster at West Springfield from 1867 to 1876, and in the year 1877 he was appointed to a position in the custom-house at Boston, which he now holds.

He has only one brother living, Charles I. Phelon, who has also seen much of the world, his business for the past fifteen years having called him to every city and town of importance on this continent. The two brothers still own and have their home under the old paternal roof.

Besides the volunteers, the town was very prompt in filling the several drafts for men who went to the front when the nation was in peril. The whole number of men furnished for the war was 228,—a surplus of 24 over and above all demands. Six of these were commissioned officers. The amount of money expended, exclusive of State aid, was $35,486.76. The aggregate amount of money furnished by the town, and voluntary contributions by citizens, was more than $50,000.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

NORMAN DAY

is the son of Daniel Day, Jr., and the great-grandson of Col. Benjamin Day, of West Springfield, who was a lineal descendant of Robert Day, the first of the name who came to this country, in the year 1634. The family is one of the oldest in the Connecticut Valley, the descendants of which are still among the prominent citizens of West Springfield.

Norman Day

His father, Daniel Day, Jr., married Elizabeth Cooley, Dec. 30, 1802. Their children were Norman, Erastus, Elizabeth (Mrs. Frederick Palmer), Annie Van Horne, Harriet, and Daniel.

Many of the members of this family have occupied high and responsible places within the gift of the people, and have been chosen as legislators in the State and nation, although the majority have been tillers of the soil. Mr. Norman Day has been a farmer since arrival at manhood, having been born Oct. 11, 1803. In early life he was connected with the old State militia, was in the artillery for eight years, and served in the infantry ranks until cleared by age. In the year 1828 he married Aurelia Ely, a native of the same town. To them were born three children, all of whom died young. Mr. Day has led a business life, caring little for the fluctuating standard of politics. He cast his first vote for President of the United States for John Quincy Adams, and was originally a member of the Whig, but now is of the Republican party. His grandfather, Daniel Day, was a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. Day has been connected as a member with the Park Street Church for upward of forty years. His wife became a member at the same time. She died November, 1874.

HEMAN DAY.

The family of Day in the Connecticut Valley originally came from Wales. On a monument in the rear of the Centre Congregational Church in Hartford, erected in memory of the early settlers of that town, is recorded, among others, the name of Robert Day, the ancestor of the Days who have lived in the New England States. Of his history previous to leaving England nothing is known. Mention is first made of him in the colony records as admitted to the freedom of Newtown, now Cambridge, Mass., May 6, 1635. It is probable that he emigrated from England to this country some time in the year 1634. In June, 1636, he crossed the wilderness with Rev. Mr. Hooker and a hundred others to Hartford, and remained there till his death, in 1648. His children were Thomas, John, Sarah (Mrs. Nathaniel Gunn, of Hartford), and Mary (Mrs. Samuel Ely, of Springfield). The subject of this narrative is a descendant of Col. Benjamin Day, of West Springfield, who was a member of the fifth generation from the emigrant, whose son Thomas, above mentioned, settled in Springfield, married Sarah Cooper, daughter of Lieut. Cooper (killed when the town was burned by the Indians), Oct. 27, 1659, and died Dec. 27, 1711.

Heman Day was born Jan. 27, 1755, in West Springfield, and married Lois, daughter of Col. Benjamin Ely, of the same place. Their children were Henry, Laura, Rodney, Robert, Sarah, Benjamin, Heman and Lydia (twins), Harriet, and Frances, the youngest now living, and to whom we are indebted for the material for this sketch.

Mr. Day was a farmer by occupation, although very much of his life was spent as a public servant for his townsmen, occupying for many years the office of justice of the peace, selectman, and was many times selected as guardian, administrator, etc. He possessed sterling qualities, strict integrity, sound judgment, and sociable and agreeable manners. He was a leading man among the citizens of West Springfield, and took an active part in the great political questions of his day, being a member of the old Whig party. He died in 1837, at the age of eighty-two. His wife died July 29, 1819.

COL. EDWARD PARSONS

was born in West Springfield, Hampden Co., Mass., Sept. 17, 1804, and died Aug. 12, 1878, having spent his life of seventy-four years on the same homestead which has been in the family nearly one hundred and fifty years. He married, Nov. 17, 1825, Sophronia, daughter of John Bagg, Esq., of West Springfield; she died July 8, 1875. They were not blessed with children.

Benjamin Parsons came from England and settled in

Edward Parsons

Aaron Bagg

Springfield about 1636. He was prominent in the town and church affairs, and one of the leading men of his times.

Ebenezer Parsons, son of Benjamin, was a very prominent man in West Springfield, and deacon of the church for fifty-two years, as appears on his tombstone, still well preserved in the old burying-ground. The genealogy runs as follows:

1. Deacon Benjamin Parsons, died in 1689.
2. Deacon Ebenezer, son of Deacon Benjamin, died in 1752, aged eighty-four.
3. Deacon Benjamin, son of Deacon Ebenezer.
4. Jonathan, son of Deacon Benjamin, died in 1810, aged seventy-five.
5. Jonathan, son of Jonathan, died in 1827, aged fifty-seven.
6. Edward, son of Jonathan, died in 1878, aged seventy-four.

The Parsons estate, opposite the town-hall, was owned and occupied by the first Ebenezer, and has been in the family from that time.

Edward Parsons was known for many years as "Colonel," having received that title in the militia service. He was prominent in the affairs of the town and parish, having filled at various times nearly all the offices in each. As a member of the Massachusetts Senate and House of Representatives, he honored his town and county. He was appointed by the Governor a justice of the peace, which office, by successive appointments, he held for thirty years, until the time of his death. He was a consistent and faithful Christian man, manifesting great interest in and devoting much time to the welfare of the Congregational Church.

As a farmer, he was interested in all the improvements connected with his calling, and was among the first to adopt them, always contributing of whatever he possessed that would add interest to exhibitions and fairs of the town and county. The town is indebted to Col. Parsons for laying out and beautifying the park, which up to 1866 was an open highway. He was one of the leading spirits in building the Park Street Church and the new and beautiful town-hall. As a good citizen, a considerate neighbor, a faithful representative, and an honest man, he had few, if any, superiors.

COL. AARON BAGG

was born in West Springfield, Mass., Feb. 6, 1810. The Bagg family is of English origin. The first to settle in this country is believed to have been John Bagg, who came from Plymouth, Eng., and died in Springfield, Sept. 5, 1683. The great-grandfather of Col. Bagg, also named John, his grandfather, Aaron, and his father, John, all passed their lives upon the same farm, which he still owns and occupies.

His grandfather held important town offices, and was a soldier in the war of the Revolution. He was disabled by sickness at White Plains, N. Y., and soon after returned home. He was a farmer by occupation, and died at the age of eighty-two years.

His father, John, was employed during the war of 1812-15 in transporting guns from the United States Arsenal, in Springfield, to Burlington, Vt. He married Sophronia Woodruff, of Connecticut, by whom he had nine children, seven of whom lived to mature years.

Col. Bagg was the fourth child, and is the only surviving member of the family.

At the time of his father's death he was but ten years of age, and the mother and children were cared for by the grandfather until his death.

Col. Bagg received a common-school education, supplemented by a brief course at the Monson Academy. At the age of sixteen he engaged in teaching, but, after serving three terms, changed his occupation to the pursuit of agriculture, and took charge of his grandfather's farm, where he has lived most of the time since, devoting himself mainly to agricultural matters. He was a member of the State militia, in whose ranks he rose to the rank of colonel, by which title he is still familiarly known.

He has filled the highest civil offices in the gift of his townsmen, and in 1843 represented West Springfield in the General Court. In 1858-59 he was a member of the State Senate, and in 1873 was again elected a member of the General Court.

Col. Bagg has been largely interested in many of the most important enterprises of Springfield, Holyoke, and other places. He was one of the originators of the Parsons Paper Company, of Holyoke, and has been director and president of the same since its organization. He is a director of the Valley Paper Company; of the Agawam Paper Company, of Mitteneague; and also of the Agawam Canal Company, cotton manufacturers. He is president and director of the Springfield Collar Company; director of the Springfield Weaving Company; president and director of the Hampden Watch Company; director of the Third National Bank; and vice-president of the Five-Cent Savings-Bank, both in Springfield.

Col. Bagg was a member of the Democratic party until the breaking out of the Rebellion, since which time he has been an ardent supporter of the principles of the Republican party. He has been twice married. His first wife was Hannah Mather, of Marlboro', Vt., by whom he had one daughter,—Mrs. Ethan Brooks, of West Springfield. His second wife was Lucy Mather, of Marlboro', Vt., by whom he has had children,—Aaron, Jr., one of the present town officers of West Springfield; Rufus Mather; Lucy Maria; John Sullivan, past assistant surgeon United States Navy; and Edward Parsons, paymaster of the Parsons Paper Company, Holyoke.

H O L Y O K E.

Looking back thirty years we find no traces of a city where now exists the flourishing city of Holyoke, with its various manufactories, the products of which find a sale in almost every important mart of the civilized world. Then this place was occupied by less than a score of families, quietly engaged in agricultural pursuits, and was known as Ireland, or Third Parish of West Springfield. It derived its name from an Irish family named Riley, who came prior to 1745, and located in the south part of the present town, near "Riley Brook."

One of the earliest settlers was Benjamin Ball, great-grandfather of Col. E. H. Ball, who located in 1745 on the farm now occupied by Col. Ball. The locality was sparsely populated at that time, as shown by the following extract from a letter written by Benjamin Ball: "There were but six families in this parish, and they 'forted' together nights for fear of the Indians."

Ireland Parish was not rapidly settled, and, says Col. Ball, "in 1825 the following were the leading citizens of this thinly settled district,—Elisha Ashley, Adam Ives, Noah Wolcott, Austin Goodyear, Caleb Hummerston, Miles Dickerman, Herman and Michael Fuller." The two latter were colored men, and carried on quite an extensive trade in purchasing produce and bringing merchandise from Springfield. Among other leading citizens of this period were Ichabod Howe, Jno. Ludington, the Danks, the Elys, the Days, and the Morgans.

The first merchant who offered his wares for sale in this parish was Chester Day, and his stock in trade usually consisted of a hoghead of rum, a tierce of salt, and a lot of tobacco. This pioneer store was located near the present Hampden Mills. The first grist- and saw-mill was located near the finishing-mill of the Parsons Paper Company. There was one other mill here in 1825, a "fulling-" or "clothing-mill," operated by Warren Chapin. At this time the site of the present city was called "the fields," and was occupied by twelve one-story dwelling-houses.

Ireland Parish was an uninviting region, and "the fields" were certainly not an attractive place. In about the year 1815 a gang of counterfeiters from Chicopee had their rendezvous in the locality now known as "Money-Hole Hill." They were subsequently captured, and one received the somewhat novel punishment of ear-cropping.

The first move that was made to utilize the waters of the Connecticut, which sweep in a graceful curve over the rapids at this point, was in 1831, when the Hadley Falls Company was formed, and erected what is now known as the "Hampden Mill, Jr." It was supplied with power by means of a wing-dam which extended from the bank obliquely up the river, guiding the water into a canal above the mill. This was a cotton-mill of 4000 spindles. Alfred Smith, of Hartford, was president; David and Alvin Smith and Warren Chapin comprised the board of directors. This establishment and a small grist-mill were the only manufacturing interests here as late as 1847.

CIVIL ORGANIZATION.

The town of Holyoke was set off by the General Court in 1850, and on the 14th of March of that year was organized as a town, with its present boundaries. The following is a list of the selectmen from the organization of the town until 1874, the date of incorporation of the city:

A somewhat remarkable feature in this young city is the elegance of many of the buildings, both public and private. Incorporated as a city only five years ago, it has one of the finest city-halls in the State in point of architecture and in both interior and exterior decoration. It is a granite building, delightfully located on the brow of the hill at the corner of Dwight and High Streets, and is a commodious and sub-

Company, and the present mayor of the city; and the other the Holyoke House, owned by Joseph C. Parsons, of the Parsons Paper Company. The opera-house, erected by Mr. Whiting, and connected with the Windsor Hotel, is one of the handsomest opera-houses in the country, and is very complete in all of its appointments.

THE WATER-POWER.

The rapids in the river at this point were known as the Great Rapids, or South Hadley Falls, and in a distance of one and a half miles there is a fall of 60 feet. This immense water-privilege had for some time attracted the attention of capitalists; and when, in 1847, the channel was gauged at low-water mark, and the volume of water passing found to be 6000 cubic feet per second,—equal to 30,000 horse-power,—it required no prophetic vision to discern that this would in the near future become one of the great manufacturing centres of America. It only required energy, enterprise, and capital for its development, and these were forthcoming.

In the autumn of 1846, George C. Ewing, of the firm of Fairbanks & Co., of New York, began negotiations for the property at this point, which at the close of three months were finally and satisfactorily concluded, and the transfer of about 37 acres was made in March, 1847. Soon after, the property of the Hadley Falls Company, and the mills mentioned above, were also purchased by Mr. Ewing, and thus he succeeded in accomplishing what others had failed in. Mr. Ewing is still a resident of Holyoke, and may justly point with pride to the success of his mission, which added another flourishing city to the constellation that has rendered the commonwealth of Massachusetts famous both at home and abroad.

The first company incorporated for the development of the enterprise was composed of Fairbanks & Co., of which firm Mr. Ewing was a member, together with a number of Boston and Hartford capitalists. Its capital was fixed at $4,000,000, and J. K. Mills, of Boston, was chosen treasurer; John Chase, of Chicopee, and P. Anderson, a West Point graduate, engineers; and George C. Ewing, land-agent.

The Messrs. Fairbanks withdrew from the enterprise in January, 1848, when Mr. Ewing resigned, and C. B. Rising succeeded him as land-agent. In the same year the property passed into the hands of Thomas H. Perkins, George W. Lyman, and Edmund Dwight, who were incorporated as the Hadley Falls Company, "for the purpose of constructing and maintaining a dam across the Connecticut River, and one or more locks and canals, and of creating a water-power, to be used," etc. This company was organized with a capital of $4,000,000. The purchase of 1100 acres of land was the first move made, thus enabling them to prosecute the gigantic task icut Valley. There are many excellent business-blocks, and two of the finest hotels in the State,—one the Windsor Hotel, recently erected by William Whiting, of the Whiting Paper of damming the waters of the Connecticut without let or hindrance.

The work was at once commenced, and on the morning of Nov. 19, 1848, the great dam was completed and the gates closed. The filling of the dam required several hours, and it soon became evident that the engineers had greatly underrated the pressure of the volume, as a portion of it near the centre soon gave way, and finally, at about two o'clock P.M., when the waters had nearly risen to the top, the costly structure gave way, and with a mighty roar the pent-up waters rushed down the accustomed channel.

This was a severe blow to an enterprise that was by some deemed Quixotic in its inception and prosecution, but its far-sighted progenitors saw nothing to discourage them as to the successful accomplishment of the grand project.

"Wise men ne'er sit and wail their loss,
But cheerily seek how to redress their harms."

The building of the dam was at once renewed, and Oct. 22, 1849, was successfully completed one of the greatest engineering feats of modern times. The following description of the dam, and the water-power of Holyoke, is from the pen of J. P. Buckland, a resident of the city, and may be relied upon as accurate:

"This great structure, about one-fifth of a mile in length, is flanked by abutments of massive masonry, and may be described in detail as the dam and the apron which now appears in front of it. The former has a base of ninety feet, and rises thirty feet above the original level of the river. It contains four million feet of sawed timber of large dimensions, all of which is submerged, and so insured against decay. A mass of concrete and gravel protects the foot of the dam, and the upper portion is covered to the thickness of eighteen inches with solid timber, while the crest is protected its entire length with sheets of heavy boiler-iron. The dam was completed Oct. 22, 1849, and as the river ceased its flow over the rapids and rose against the ponderous barrier, thousands watched the gathering flood with eager interest; and when the slowly rising waters reached the crest, and fell in one broad sheet to the rocky bed below, it was a time of genuine triumph for the engineers who planned the successful structure and the capitalists who built it.

"In 1868 the gradual wearing away of the rocky bed below the dam by the constant action of the falling sheet of water decided the Holyoke Water-Power Company, which had meanwhile succeeded to all the rights and property of the Hadley Falls Company, to commence the construction of the apron which now forms the front of the original work,—an undertaking second only to the building of the great dam itself in magnitude and cost. The new portion was even more massive in character than the old, and was built into the latter so as to form with it one solid structure of timber and stone. The work was completed, in 1870, at a cost of $263,000, and by rendering the further wearing of the foundations impossible establishes the durability and permanence of the dam beyond all future question. All the masonry of the abutments, bulkhead, and the waste-weir immediately below is of heavy ashlar work, built on the solid ledge, and massive enough to withstand the great pressure to which it is subjected. The bulkhead, one hundred and forty feet long and forty-six feet wide, is surmounted by the extensive gate-house.

"The system of canals is laid out on a grand scale, commensurate with the volume of water to be distributed. Twelve large gates, each fifteen feet long by nine feet wide, and weighing more than four tons, and two others of half that width, and eleven feet in length, all operated by a water-wheel in the abutment which actuates the powerful gate-machinery, admit the water to the upper level canal. This main artery of the system, starting with a width of one hundred and forty feet, and a water-depth of twenty-two feet, extends eastward past the great water-weir about one thousand feet, and then sweeps southward in a right line for a distance of more than one mile to supply the upper tier of mills, the width gradually lessening at the rate of one foot in every hundred.

"To trace the still longer course of the level canal, we begin at its southerly end opposite the terminus of the grand reach of the upper level, and follow it northerly for a mile and more, parallel with the first-described canal, and four hundred feet easterly from it, this portion serving as a raceway for the upper level, and also as a canal for the supply of mills below; and thence we follow it easterly and southerly for a mile and a quarter more, at a distance of about four hundred feet from the river, this marginal portion of the second level affording mill-sites along its whole length, from which the water used passes directly into the river. For two thousand feet this canal has a width of one hundred and forty feet, and thence the sides gradually converge to a width of one hundred feet, which is continued to either end, the average depth of water being fifteen feet. These two canals, extending in broad parallel water-courses through the central portion of the city, and spanned by iron bridges, from any one of which the eye takes in the whole long stretch of water, make a unique and pleasant feature of the place.

"The third level canal, one hundred feet wide and ten feet deep, is also a marginal canal, with mill-sites along its entire length, and beginning at the southerly end of the second level extends thirty-five hundred and fifty feet to the other terminus of the same canal, thus making with the latter a line of marginal canals around and near the whole water front of the city. The mills on the upper level have a head and fall of twenty feet, and the difference between the second and third levels is twelve feet, while that between the marginal canals and the river varies from twenty-three to twenty-eight feet. The upper level canal, throughout its entire length, and large portions of the others, are walled with substantial stone-work to the height of three feet above water-level.

"Three overfalls of cut granite, with suitable waste-gates, allow the water to pass directly from each canal to the next lower, independently of the supply derived from the mills above. To maintain a uniform head in each of these canals watchmen are constantly on duty, whose sole business it is to regulate the inflow from the river, and the outflow at the several waste-weirs and overfalls; and so effective are the means employed, and so thoroughly is the system carried out, that the height of water in either canal is not allowed during the day or night to vary one inch from the established water-level at any moment in the year. Whether the mills are running or idle, the long lines of canal are always full to the prescribed gauge mark; a constant quantity in time of winter floods and summer droughts alike, making a pleasing and profitable contrast in the experience of the manufacturers who have removed hitherto from the water-powers which fluctuate between abundance and scarcity."

THE HOLYOKE WATER-POWER COMPANY.

In the year 1857 the Hadley Falls Company failed, and the property, consisting of about 1100 acres of land, the reservoir, gas-works, and the Hadley Falls machine-shops, now known as the Hadley Thread Company, was purchased by the late Alfred Smith, of Hartford, Conn., for the sum of $325,000, and the Holyoke Water-Power Company was incorporated in June, 1859, with a capital of $350,000. George M. Bartholomew, of Hartford, Conn., is president, and William A. Chase is agent and treasurer. This water-power has its own unit of measurement, called a "mill-power," and is described as follows in the deeds of the water-power company:

"Each mill-power at the respective falls is declared to be the right, during sixteen hours in a day, to draw from the nearest canal or water-course of the grantors, and through the land to be granted, thirty-eight cubic feet of water per second at the upper fall, when the head and fall there is twenty feet, or a quantity inversely proportionate to the height at the other falls."

In the language of Judge Buckland, "one of these mill-powers is equivalent in round numbers to sixty-five horse-powers, and when a site for a mill or shop is taken, the requisite number of mill-powers is conveyed to the occupant by an indenture of perpetual lease, the form of which is never varied. The last purchaser takes the same rights in kind as those who have preceded him or those who will come after, until the sales shall have reached that safe limit of available power which has been resolved upon. Having entered into such an indenture, the mill-owner, relieved of all anxiety or expense of maintaining the dam and canals, confident of the permanence and safety of the great hydraulic system, and secure in the guarantees of the corporation which controls it, pays his semi-annual rental, finds the canal always full at his head-gate, and makes his plans and contracts with the assurance that his due allowance of motive-power will be always forthcoming,—a motive-power which is furnished at a rate so cheap as to be almost nominal when compared with the prevailing rates of rental in other parts of the country, or with steam-power, or with the cost of water-power derived from streams of the average size.

"If the cost of the dam and canals at Holyoke was large, the number of mill-powers obtained was still larger proportionally, thus reducing the cost of a single one far below the average outlay required to obtain the same amount of power by a dam and canal on a smaller stream; and the same principle applies to the expense of maintenance. The annual rental per mill-power is 260 ounces of silver of the standard fineness of the coinage of 1859, which is in practice paid in current funds, and amounts to about $300 a year or $4.62 per horse-power, an expense so small as to be hardly an appreciable item in the cost of any manufacture. The prices charged for water-power vary so widely in different sections of the country, and the comparative value of such power depends so much on locality, accessibility, and other natural conditions, that no stated comparison is here attempted between the annual rental above given and the ruling rates elsewhere; but if the reader takes the trouble to institute such a comparison, it will not only be found that the cost of water-power here is far less than the average rental throughout the country, whether paid as water-rent, or in the form of interest and maintenance, but also that to-day, all things considered, Holyoke affords the cheapest and most desirable manufacturing power in the world."

MANUFACTURING INTERESTS.

Of the manufacturing interests of this enterprising city, that of paper occupies the foremost rank, and to this industry is chiefly due its present world-wide reputation as a manufacturing centre.

THE PARSONS PAPER COMPANY.

The first company formed for the manufacture of paper in Holyoke was what is known as the "Parsons Paper Company," named from its treasurer and agent, Mr. J. C. Parsons, who is a veteran in the manufacture, having been in the business nearly 40 years, beginning as manager of the Ames Paper Company at Northampton. The buildings of this company are situated on the river-bank near the dam, and were built in 1853. They are two in number,—the main mill, where the paper is made, and what is known as the finishing-mill, where it is finished. The former is a brick structure three stories and a basement high. The upper floor and attic are devoted to drying purposes, while the second story contains the storehouse and rag-rooms. About 175 persons are employed on the two floors. On the ground-floor is the engine-room, which contains sixteen 450-pound and fourteen 250-pound engines. The mill has three Fourdrinier machines, two of them 62-inch and the other 72-inch. It has two bleach-boilers, of $3\frac{1}{2}$ and $2\frac{1}{2}$ tons respectively, and 4 sheet calenders and a web calender and 2 hydraulic presses.

The finishing-mill is also situated on the bank of the river, a short distance from the other mill, and, like that, is a brick structure three stories high. The attic and third floor are used for packing, and on the second floor the paper is reeled and jogged. On the first floor are eight 6-roll calenders and three powerful hydraulic presses, and in the basement is a box-factory and plating-machine. This company makes a specialty of fine writing and envelope papers, white and tinted; also cardboard. Capacity of mill, $8\frac{1}{2}$ tons per day.

The officers of the company are as follows: Aaron Bagg, President; J. C. Parsons, Treasurer and Agent; and J. S. McElwain, Secretary.

THE VALLEY PAPER COMPANY.

These mills are located on the elbow of the second-level canal, near the bridge. The main building, built in 1864, is of brick, three stories high, with attic and basement, and has a central wing extending toward the river, which was erected in 1877. The attic and upper stories are used for drying the freshly-made sheets, and the second floor is occupied as a rag-packing department and office. The mill is supplied with seven 450-pound engines and six sets of calenders, a 62-inch Fourdrinier, a $2\frac{1}{2}$ -ton bleach-boiler, and the only Piper's new patent double-ruling machine made.

The enterprise was founded originally by Mr. David M. Butterfield, formerly a finisher at Parsons' mills. It manufactures fine writing and envelope paper, and has a capacity of $2\frac{1}{2}$ tons per day.

The officers of the company are Broughton Alvord, President; J. C. Parsons, Agent; and J. S. McElwain, Treasurer.

THE WHITING PAPER COMPANY.

The largest paper-manufactory in the world is located in Aberdeen, Scotland, and has a capacity of producing twelve tons per day. The next largest is the Whiting Paper Company, of this city, with a capacity of nearly eleven tons per day. The promoter of this vast establishment, William Whiting, made his first appearance in connection with the paper business in 1858, as clerk in the Holyoke Paper Company. His first attempt at paper-manufacturing was in connection with the Hampden company, which he organized while still with the Holyoke. When the old Holyoke company disposed of its establishment Mr. Whiting ceased his connection with it, and, having sold his interest in the Hampden, in 1865 he organized the Whiting Paper Company, with L. J. Brown and E. F. Jenks, with a capital of $100,000. The present capital is about $1,200,000.

The "No. 1," or old mill, with which this company begun, is 280 feet long, 45 feet wide, and has three wings, all being three stories high, with an attic. The attic and third stories are used entirely for drying paper. Two hundred feet are set aside on the second floor for a rag-room, where are employed about 110 persons. The business office as well as Mr. Whiting's private office is also on this floor. A portion of the first floor is devoted to the engines, of which there are two 1500-pound washers and four 1200-pound engines. In one of the wings are two 62-inch Fourdrinier machines, each driven by an upright steam-engine. In another wing are two rotary bleach-boilers of 5000 pounds' capacity each. On the lower or ground-floor are situated the finishing- and plating-rooms. Here are two plating- and other machines, and work on this floor requires the services of about 80 persons.

The business of the Whiting company soon assumed such gigantic proportions that the No. 1 mill was found insufficient, and so another immense structure, known as Whiting No. 2, was begun on Dwight Street, near Race. The new mill, which was built in 1871, is 200 feet long, 60 feet wide, and five stories high. The roof is of the mansard pattern, and at the side is a square tower, 85 feet high. There are in addition two capacious wings and a boiler-house, containing the four 60 horse-power boilers, which supply the establishment with steam. The vast area of the two upper stories affords ample room for drying purposes. The third floor, furnished with the latest modern machinery, is devoted half to a rag-room, with 150 hands, and half to finishing.

WHITING MILL NO. 2, HOLYOKE.

There is also a finishing-room occupying half the second floor, the other half containing the engines, of which there are ten, of 1000 pounds' capacity each. In the wings are the machine-rooms, with one 72-inch and one 62-inch Fourdrinier machines, and the bleach-room, with two rotary bleach-boilers of 7000 and 6000 pounds' capacity respectively.

This company manufactures all kind of fine writing- and envelope-papers; employs 500 persons.

The company consists of L. L. Brown, C. C. Jeneks, and William Whiting, the latter of whom is agent.

THE HOLYOKE PAPER COMPANY.

This company was organized in 1857, having a mill with a daily capacity of one ton, and Mr. D. M. Butterfield as agent; the original building erected by it was the second paper-mill built in Holyoke.

In 1860, Stephen Holman, now treasurer of the Holyoke Machine Company, became agent, which post he held until 1865. About this time the management passed into the hands of O. H. Greenleaf, Esq., of Springfield, who has since conducted the mills and enlarged them to their present capacity of seven tons a day.

The buildings of the company are situated on Main Street, near the foot of the second-level canal. The buildings cover a little over one acre of ground, and are divided as follows: the rag-room occupies parts of two floors in the main building, and contains four dusters, which have a daily capacity of ten tons. In the story under the dusters are three rotary boilers, of a daily capacity of nine tons. The engine-room, 208 by 54 feet, contains 8 washing- and 12 beating-engines, of a capacity of 500 pounds each. The machine-room, 72 by 90 feet, situated in a wing off the main building, contains one 72-inch and two 62-inch Fourdrinier machines, for making plain and flat bond-papers. These papers received the gold medal at the Paris Exposition of 1878.

The finishing-room, 232 by 50 feet, contains 13 five-roll sheet calenders and 2 platers, 4 trimming and 4 hydraulic presses, 8 ruling-machines, and all other necessary machinery for the finishing of fine papers, both ruled and flat. The balance of the building is occupied by size-room, boiler-house, and lofts for drying purposes. The stock-house, 48 by 110 feet, two stories, is located about 100 feet from the mill. The power comes from 8 turbine wheels of about 500 horse-power. The steam for heating and drying purposes is made by 5 large boilers. The drainers for storing the pulp while bleaching are in the basement under the engines.

The Holyoke company has a special railway track, which extends the length of its buildings. Its machinery is of the latest improved models, and altogether it is one of the most complete manufactories in existence. It has a daily capacity of 7 tons of tub-sized and loft-dried writing-papers. Among its specialties are the celebrated American linen papers, both flat and folded, and banker's parchment ruled.

THE CROCKER MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

The building known as the Crocker Mill, No. 1, was erected in 1870, by D. H. and J. C. Newton, and was intended for the manufacture of collar-paper only. In 1871 it was purchased by the Crocker Manufacturing Company, which was organized with a capital of $60,000, with S. S. Crocker as president, and D. P. Crocker as agent and treasurer. The new company added new calenders, super-calenders, and a new machine, and continued the manufacture of collar-paper and engine-sized flat card, bristol, etc. The No. 1 mill, which is a T-shaped building, is arranged as follows: on the upper floor is located the office and repair- and rag-room, also store-room and the engine-room, with 10 450-pound engines, and in another room is the machinery for dusting and threshing. The lower floor contains a fine 76-inch Fourdrinier and a cylinder-machine. This company in 1878 also purchased the old Albion Mill, which is a spacious structure two and a half stories high, and is devoted to the manufacture of book, news, and colored medium papers. The Albion is known as the Crocker Manufacturing Company's No. 2 Mill. In the attic are located 2 threshers, and the next or second story is used as a rag-room, and contains 2 of Daniels' cutters and another duster. Seven engines, one of them a Jourdan, are on the lower floor, and prepare the pulp used in this mill, which is afterward run over a 62-inch Fourdrinier machine. The same floor also contains 1 rotary bleach, and a set of super-calenders, 2 cutters, a trimmer, and other machinery.

This company engages largely in the manufacture of a peculiarly-colored and ornamental paper, under a patented process which it owns. This paper is used for safety tickets and other purposes. Capacity of No. 1 Mill, 4 tons per day, and of No. 2, 2 tons per day. Daniel P. Crocker is treasurer and agent. Capital increased to $90,000 in 1879.

THE HADLEY FALLS PAPER COMPANY is an offshoot of the Carew Manufacturing Company, located at Hadley Falls, just across the river. The establishment consists of a four-story brick building, with a two-story wing on the side next the river, and is entered by bridges from the bank of the first-level canal. The mill has four 300-pound and one 500-pound engines, and a 62-inch cylinder machine; makes manilla paper; capacity, 4000 pounds per day.

HOLYOKE MANILLA MILL.

This establishment, after various vicissitudes as a manilla- and tissue-mill, was organized by the present proprietors, Messrs. Robertson & Black, on a new basis in 1875. The mill consists of a building two stories high, with an attic and two wings. The upper story of the main building is occupied by the rope-cutter, and the ground floor by the three 500-pound engines. The wing on the west side contains a good 62-inch cylinder machine, while the 3-ton rotary bleach, and two 4½-foot steam-boilers occupy the other. Capacity, 2500 pounds per day.

THE EXCELSIOR MILL.

This establishment is situated on the third-level canal. The mill was built in 1872, by D. H. & J. C. Newton, and was purchased of them by J. B. Warren and R. C. Dickinson, April 1, 1873. Jan. 1, 1874, J. B. Warren sold his interest to George R. Dickinson and A. N. Mayo, of Springfield, who, with R. C. Dickinson, are the present proprietors, R. C. Dickinson being the treasurer and sole manager of the business.

The building, which has a fine location on the bend of the river, is somewhat T-shaped, and has three additions on the side next the river. The main building, which runs parallel with the river, is three stories and a basement high. The two upper floors, which contain two Daniels rag-cutters and two dusters, are used as rag-rooms. The ground floor is the engine-room, and is furnished with four 800-pound engines. The two steam-boilers and the 3-ton rotary bleach-boiler are in the additions on the side opposite the main wing. The mill has also one 64-inch Fourdrinier; manufactures book and press paper; capacity, two tons per day.

THE RIVERSIDE PAPER COMPANY

was first organized in August, 1866, with Charles O. Chapin as president. The mill was built in 1867, and the company began work. It did not long remain in the organizers' possession, but changed hands several times, and at one period William Whiting was agent. About 1871 the present company purchased the mill, and began to run it with $150,000 as capital. L. J. Powers, the well-known Springfield envelope-manufacturer, acted as president, and J. H. Appleton as treasurer and agent. The former subsequently retired from his position, and J. H. Appleton is now both president and treasurer.

The mill in its present state consists of a long main building and two wings or L's, both of the latter being on the northeast side. The attic and next story are devoted to drying purposes. Part of the next floor contains the engines, of which there are seven, and the other part, in which there are seven sheet-calenders, is used as a finishing-room. The basement contains the water-wheels, which were supplied by the Holyoke Machine Company, and are four in number,—one 66-inch American, one 40-inch Risdon, and one 25-inch American turbine, and one 15-inch Hercules. One of the L's contains a rag-room and one 72-inch Fourdrinier machine. In the other L is also a rag-room, with two dusters and a 4-ton rotary bleach-boiler. The two 4-foot steam-boilers are in a small addition on the end of the main building. The mill has also an 80-inch Fourdrinier, with all the modern improvements. Manufactures fine writing-paper. Capacity, three tons per day. In addition to the other machinery, there are five ruling-machines in the mill. The specialty of the Riverside Company is fine writing-paper. Capacity, two and a half tons per day.

THE CONNECTICUT RIVER PULP-MILL, NEWTON BROTHERS, PROPRIETORS.

This, which is the only one of the kind in Holyoke, is devoted entirely to the manufacture of wood-pulp, and has a present capacity of four and a half tons per diem. The mill was started in August, 1876, with two washing-engines, a rotary bleach-boiler, and two turbines. In September of the same year, additions were made in the shape of furnaces for reclaiming the soda; these were followed by other additions, such as bleach-tubs, tanks, and another wet-machine. In the spring of 1877 the rotary broke, and was replaced by a Dixon digester. On Dec. 1, 1877, a fire broke out in the mill, which threatened to be serious, and which was only extinguished after a loss of $3500. The principal machinery now in the buildings consists of two steam-boilers, two Dixon's digesters, 7 by 18 feet, several soda-furnaces, two washing-engines, 60 by 60, 30 feet long; and a cutting-machine or chipper, which cuts up a cord of wood in fifteen minutes. The premises are on the edge of the canal, and are built of brick, two stories high. This establishment manufactures chemical spruce- and poplar-wood pulp. Capacity, two tons per day.

THE NEWTON PAPER COMPANY.

A copartnership, of Moses Newton and James Ramage, in the fall of 1873, built Mill No. 1, for the manufacture of building paper. In May, 1875, a stock company was organized, with James Ramage, President; Moses Newton, Treasurer;

NEWTON PAPER COMPANY MILLS, HOLYOKE.

George A. Clark, Secretary, and built Mill No. 2, for the manufacture of duplex papers, carpet, felt, and manilla papers. In the winter of 1879 two wings to No. 2 were built, containing four 800 horse-power engines and one four-cylinder 62-inch machine.

No. 1 contains two engines of 800 horse-power each, and one 40-inch four-cylinder machine, with nine 3-foot dryers. No. 2 contains eight 800 horse-power engines, one four-cylinder machine, 52 inches wide; eight dryers, 3 feet in diameter; and one machine of four cylinders, twelve 3-foot dryers, two large rotary bleachers, etc. Capacity, 20,000 pounds each twenty-four hours.

This establishment manufactures patent corrugated carpet lining, building paper, straw-boards; bogus, and manilla wrapping-papers. Employs 50 men. Capital, $125,000. Jas. Ramage, President; Moses Newton, Treasurer; George A. Clark, Secretary.

THE FRANKLIN PAPER COMPANY.

The mill belonging to this company was built in 1866 by the present owners, who were then as now respectively president and treasurer of the company, the nominal capital being fixed at $60,000. The building is three stories in height. In the upper story is a rag-room, with a thrasher, duster, and Sturdevant blower. The north end of the next floor is occupied by the engine-room, which contains eight 450-pound and one Jourdan engines. The south end is used as a finishing-room, and has two of the Holyoke Machine Company's web supercalenders, the trimming presses, and two Hammond cutters. The 62-inch Fourdrinier is in a wing on the north side of the mill. Another addition in the rear contains a 3-ton bleach-boiler and one 4-foot steam boiler. The company formerly manufactured great quantities of collar paper, and at one time used for its cloth-lined paper 1,000,000 yards of muslin annually. Since 1876 the mill has manufactured fine book, writing, and envelope paper, white, tinted, and colors; employs sixty presses; capacity, three tons per day. Calvin Taft, President; Jas. H. Newton, Treasurer and Agent.

THE UNION PAPER-MANUFACTURING COMPANY

was organized in 1870, with a capital of $200,000, by Henry and Edwin Dickinson and J. E. Taylor, formerly of the firm Greenleaf & Taylor, Springfield. The company purchased the property of the Bemis Paper Company at Holyoke, and began with D. D. Warren as president and J. E. Taylor as treasurer, and the Messrs. Dickinson as agents. The buildings were found to be too small for the business of the new company, and large additions both in machinery and buildings were made.

The main building of the mill is 200 feet long and three stories high, not including the basement and attic. The two upper rooms are used as rag-rooms, and contain one 6-foot and two 4½-foot Holyoke dusters. The engine-room is on the south end of the room, beneath the rag-rooms, and contains ten engines of 600 pounds' capacity each. The north end is used as a finishing-room, and is furnished with several sheet calenders and two trimming presses, and the lofts of that portion of the building are used for the drying of papers. There is one L built at right angles to the main building. The north half L, which is three stories and an attic high, contains three drying lofts, occupying the upper stories; the lower floor, being devoted to finishing, packing, and the offices, is occupied by the machines,—two Fourdriniers, 62 and 72 inch respectively. In addition on the river side are the two 3-ton bleach boilers and the three 4½-foot steam boilers. There are on the premises two smaller buildings entirely separate from the main mill; one of these is used as a repair-shop, while the other, on a siding of the Connecticut River Railroad, receives the stock.

This company manufactures fine writing and collar paper. Capacity, three tons per day. D. D. Warren is President of the company; H. Dickinson, Agent and Treasurer; E. Dickinson, Selling Agent.

THE ALBION PAPER COMPANY.

The establishment owned by this company is wholly a Holyoke enterprise, everything about it being either prepared or supplied by Holyoke firms, except a few Southern pine beams and the Fourdrinier machine. It was built by D. H. & J. C. Newton, Mr. D. H. Tower being the engineer. The mill was completed in February, 1878, and consists of two substantial brick buildings two and a half stories high, joined in the centre by a wing. In the basement of the building is the repair-shop, and on the next floor are two 9-roll web supercalenders of 36-inch face and two 72-inch Hammond cutters, and on the upper floor is a Cranston cutter and some minor machinery. The basement of the rear mill is occupied by the driving machinery and drainers. The engines are located on the first floor, and consist of two 1000-pound washing-engines, with rolls 44 by 48 inches, and three heating-engines of 1000 pounds' capacity each. These are furnished with Bradbury & Russell's patent rolls, and in addition a Jourdan engine. The bleach boiler, also located on this floor, has a capacity of between four and five tons. On the upper floor are two Daniels cutters and a Holyoke and a railroad duster. The thrasher is in the attic. The central wing contains the Fourdrinier, a fine 84-inch machine with all the latest improvements. The building has two elevators, and the steam required is supplied by two tubular boilers $4\frac{1}{2}$ by 15 feet. The company manufacture book paper and engine-sized flat paper. Capacity of mill, two tons per day.

The present year an addition is being made, which will double the capacity of the mill. The new mill will contain eight engines, one Jourdan, and two bleach boilers of capacity of five tons each. The new buildings are the same size as the old mill. They are brick, 184 feet—main building—including bleach-room. The centre is 104 feet; front, 89 feet. Between the two mills is a tower 16 by 20 feet, 50 feet high, with French roof. In the rear is a tower for stairs and elevator; all the elevators are furnished with safety hatchways. The mill has Daniels cutters. The machine is a Rice, Barton & Fales, 86-inch, two 9-rods, each super-calenders, and three Hammond cutters. Manufactures machine and super-calender book-paper. Capacity per day, five tons. Both mills employ 150 persons.

THE OLD ALBION MILL.

The history of this enterprise would not be complete without a mention of what is known as the "Old Albion." The Albion Company was formed in 1869, and purchased the mill formerly belonging to the Hampden Company, and began the manufacture of collar paper. Continued on this grade until 1874, when they began making super-calender paper. In 1877 it was sold to D. H. & J. C. Newton, who erected the present mills of the Albion Company. The present officers of the company are Calvin Taft, President; Edward C. Taft, Treasurer; and A. H. Page, Clerk.

THE WAUREGAN PAPER COMPANY.

This new and complete mill, called the "Wauregan," is owned by Mr. James H. Newton, and was built in 1879. It is a large brick building located on Dwight Street. The finishing-rooms are 45 by 82 feet, machine-room 30 by 120 feet, engine-room 46 by 114 feet, size-room 25 by 36 feet, rag boiler building 20 by 33 feet, stock-house 25 by 80 feet.

WAUREGAN PAPER MILLS, HOLYOKE.

The first floor is occupied by the finishing-rooms and offices. Here are three web calenders, three stock-cutters, one trimmer, and salting tables. On the second floor are salting tables, store-rooms and offices for rental. The machine-room has an 84-inch Fourdrinier, warranted to run smooth and true at the rate of 200 feet per minute. Here also are ten 3-foot dryers and one stock calender. The engine-room contains wire drawers, shafting, etc. There are six rag-engines of 1000 tons' capacity each, and two Jourdans. On the next floor are the rag-rooms, where are dusters, two rag-cutters, salting tables, etc. The attic is devoted to storage and rag whipping, and contains a Sturdevant blower. Capacity, five tons per day of fine book, envelope, and writing paper, white and tinted. Employ 100 persons. Five mill-powers, equal to 325 horse-power.

THE BEEBE & HOLBROOK PAPER COMPANY.

The fine writing-paper mill belonging to this company was built in 1871-72, by the Hampden Paper Company, organized for the purpose by Mr. Jared Beebe, who was the principal stockholder. After running about a year the balance of the capital stock was purchased by Beebe & Holbrook, who continued the business till the death of Mr. Beebe, in July, 1876; the present corporation having been formed Jan. 1, 1878, with G. B. Holbrook president and treasurer. The main building is 50 by 130 feet, three stories and basement. The first floor is used for offices, repair-shop, and plating-room, the latter containing two heavy plating-machines. On the second floor are the finishing- and engine-rooms; in the latter are two 750-pound washers, one 600-pound, and three 500-pound beaters. The upper floors are used for drying lofts and storage. There are two wings attached to the main building, one of which, 30 by 90 feet, two stories high, has on the upper floor a 76-inch Fourdrinier machine, the lower floor being used for the preparation of animal sizing. Another wing contains the bleach-room, with a three and one-half ton rotary boiler, and above it is a rag-duster. Connected with this wing is the rag department, with the dusters in the attic. The third floor is the rag-room proper, the rest of the wing being used for storage.

The product of this establishment consists largely of specialties in the finest grades of white and tinted wedding folios and linen papers, also choice lines of flat and ruled writing-papers. Capacity, two and one-half tons per day.

MASSASOIT PAPER-MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

The Massasoit mill is owned by the Massasoit Paper-Manufacturing Company, having a capital of $300,000. The mill is four stories and attic, and is built of brick. The basement floor is used for storage in the eastern part, and for drainers in the western. The first floor is used for the office, store-room, size-room, etc., etc. There is also on this floor a large Holyoke Machine Company's plater, which does splendid work. The eastern portion of the second floor is used as the finishing-room, and contains six calenders, one Cranston trimming-knife, two hydraulic presses, five ruling-machines, and the stamper. The western part of the second floor is used for the engine-room, and contains eight engines,—three washing and five beating. Adjoining the engine-room is found the machine-room, in an L, in which is a fine 79-inch Fourdrinier machine. From this machine can be run three tons of finished paper per day. The production of the mill on thin and thick finished papers is two and one-half tons. The third floor (eastern part) is used for storage, and the western part for a rag-room; the fourth floor and attic for the drying-rooms.

This is one of the most complete mills in Holyoke, and as fine paper can be made here as any manufactured in the country or imported. The agent and treasurer of this company, E. C. Rogers, has introduced into the market several brands of very choice linen papers, among these the "crown Leghorn," "imperial parchment," and "Lyons parchment, silk finish."

J. W. ARNOLD & Co.—Organized in 1878. Manufacturers of manilla paper. Capacity, one and a half tons per day.

ROBERTSON, BLACK & Co.—Organized Jan. 1, 1875. Capital $35,000. Manufacturers of manilla papers. Product, one and a quarter tons per day.

THE MERRICK THREAD COMPANY

dates its origin from July, 1865. It was the outgrowth of a partnership with Timothy Merrick, Austin Merrick, and Origen Hall as partners, under the firm-name of Merrick, Bro. & Co., located at Mansfield, Conn., and engaged in the business of spooling three-cord cotton thread. The business of the firm grew so rapidly that in 1864 it became necessary for them to seek for some other location affording the requisite facilities, especially in the matter of water-power, to enable them to enlarge their business and make provision for manufacturing the better quality of six-cord thread that the use of the sewing-machine demanded. A careful examination of various localities resulted in the selection of Holyoke as the future home of their business, and on the 27th day of July, A.D. 1865, the first meeting was held for organization as a corporation under the laws of Massachusetts. The organization was effected with Elisha Johnson, of Wethersfield, Conn., as president, and Timothy Merriek, of Holyoke, as treasurer and clerk, and the following as board of directors, viz., Elisha Johnson, Timothy Merriek, Herbert F. Palmer, Austin Merriek, Origen Hall, George Chapman, Lyman R. Hopkins, Palmer Southworth, William Boardman, adopting as their corporate name The Holyoke Thread Company, which was at a subsequent meeting changed to The Merriek Thread Company, with a capital of $200,000.

The business of the corporation, as set forth in the articles of association, is the manufacture of spool cotton.

The company, having leased the necessary mill-site and tenement grounds from the Holyoke Water-Power Company, along with three mill-powers of water from the second-level canal, began at once the foundations for the necessary buildings, and the following year completed the structures substantially as they appear to-day. The dimensions of the principal buildings are as follows: main building, 206 by 66 feet, four stories high, besides attic; picker-house and repair-shop, 114 by 40 feet, two stories, flat roof; spool-shop and bleach-house, 166 by 40 feet, two stories; all forming three sides of a square, which is completed by the office building and gangway, affording communication between the various parts through the interior court. One-half of the capacity of the buildings having been taken by the necessary carding, spinning, and twisting machinery, the company near the close of 1867 commenced the manufacture of three-cord spool cotton, giving employment to about 200 hands. Jan. 1, 1868, the capital stock was increased to $350,000, and the filling of the balance of the unoccupied room with the necessary carding, combing, and spinning machines requisite to the most approved methods of working fine Sea Island cotton soon followed, enabling the company to produce a first-class article of six- and three-cord spool cotton, especially adapted to meet the requirements of manufacturers of clothing, straw-goods, and soft leather, as a substitute for silk or linen, besides being suited to general domestic requirements. The furnishing of a thread and a bobbin fitted for use in the shuttle of the sewing-machine, thus avoiding the necessity of filling the iron bobbin in the usual way, has grown to be quite an important branch of the business, which the company control under a license from the patentee. Some two years since a further addition to the plant became necessary, and the company acquired by purchase from the assignees of the Hampden Mills the property known as the "Little Hampden," putting the mill in complete repair and filling it with the most improved machinery for making the coarser numbers of their three-cord thread, which do not require Sea Island cotton.

The present capacity of the works is as follows: fine mill, 11,544 spindles spinning, 6300 spindles twisting; coarse mill, 4048 spindles spinning, 1656 spindles twisting. Add to the foregoing the entire machinery for the manufacture of the spools and the dyeing, bleaching, dressing, and spooling of the entire product of the spindles of the plant, and there is a yearly product amounting in value to $450,000. The manufacturing department is under the efficient supervision of J. M. Dunham, Esq., who has ably filled the position of superintendent for the past ten years.

The present officers of the company are as follows: President, Lyman R. Hopkins; Treasurer, Timothy Merriek; Clerk and Paymaster, C. W. Reder; Board of Directors, Timothy Merriek, Lyman R. Hopkins, Herbert F. Palmer, C. W. Reder, George C. Basson, John Amidon, S. W. Robbins. Principal selling offices, 370 Broadway, New York; 276 Devonshire Street, Boston; 248 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; 27 German Street, Baltimore.

HADLEY COMPANY SPOOL-COTTON MANUFACTORY.

This company was organized in 1863. It has a capital stock of $600,000, with but few stockholders, all of whom reside in the eastern part of the State. The company owns about 14 acres of land, on which are the mills and tenements.

The central part of the mill is 80 by 48 feet, four stories high, and a wing on either side, each 200 by 60 feet, three stories high, with an additional east wing 200 by 60 feet, two stories high, to which a tower is attached, 30 by 30 feet. The picker-room is 200 by 48 feet, and the combing-room 96 by 48 feet, each one story high. The dye-house is 160 by 60 feet, and the repair-shop 140 by 40 feet, each two stories high, with a stock house 200 by 30 feet, one story high, besides the finishing mill 100 by 40 feet, and the office building. It will thus be seen that there are about four acres of flooring in these buildings, or as much as is contained in a tract of land one and a half times as large as Hampden Park. The company owns six large blocks, containing 53 tenements, where many of its employes find a home.

Work was begun on the stone foundations of what are known as the cottages, Feb. 4, 1848. April 4, 1848, the first stone was laid in the foundations of the office building, and April 15th of the same year the foundation of the blocks was begun. The first brick was laid in the office building April 18th, and in the blocks May 16, 1848. May 11th of the same year the "Cataract House" was opened as a hotel. Work was begun on the picker- and combing-room Oct. 26, 1848, and November 7th, following, a ball was given in the office building. It was not till Sept. 13, 1849, that the first brick was laid in the mill proper. The brick-work of the mill and tenements was all done under the direction of Charles McClellan, of Chicopee.

The mills were built by the Hadley Falls Company, and used for a machine-shop until the company began to use it.

In 1859, the Holyoke Water-Power Company having succeeded to the rights of the Hadley Falls Company in 1857, sold the property to John C. Whitin, who was sole director of the work as long as it was used as a shop. Much of the machinery now used in the mill, and that formerly used in the Hampden Mills, including the turbine-wheels and conduit-pipes of iron, was made in this old shop, some of it after the shop became the property of the Hadley company. The pipes, fixtures, and apparatus of the gas-works, with the gasometer and castings, were also made here.

Its power is furnished by water from the Connecticut River, which turns two large water-wheels of the Boyden patent, equal to 500 horse-power and using eight mills power.

Mr. J. S. Davis, the long-time agent of the Lyman Mills, had been instrumental in the formation of the company, and on its organization, or in April, 1863, he was appointed agent for the company, with Wm. Grover, then master-mechanic of the Lyman Mills, as superintendent. Work was begun at once toward putting in machinery for the manufacture of

HOLYOKE MACHINE COMPANY, HOLYOKE, MASS

is a representative institution of this enterprising city. It was organized in 1863, chiefly through the instrumentality of Stewart Chase, who was treasurer, with a capital of $40,000. This was increased in 1871 to $80,000, and in 1872 to $150,000, its present capital. The value of the first annual product of its business was $60,000, and fifty men were employed. The present annual product is $500,000, and, running at full capacity, three hundred men are employed. The machine-room proper is three hundred and eighty by fifty, and the foundry one hundred and forty by sixty, feet. In addition are blacksmith-shops, store-houses, etc.

This establishment makes a specialty of water-wheels and machinery for paper-mills, and in this manufacture has won a world-wide reputation. Finishing-machines have been shipped to Scotland, France, and Germany. The establishment was furnished in 1878 and 1879 with an entirely new outfit of the latest improved machinery, and it is now one of the most complete machine-shops in the State.

The present officers of the company are as follows: C. H. Heywood, President; S. Holman, Treasurer; S. F. Stebbins, Agent.

spool cotton, and Mr. Grover went to Europe in the interests of the new company. Mr. Davis having resigned the agency, Mr. Grover was appointed in his stead in May, 1867.

The officers of the company now are George W. Lyman, President; Arthur T. Lyman, Treasurer; J. N. Morrill, Clerk; Wm. Grover, Agent and Superintendent; C. L. Farrington, Paymaster. The position of paymaster has been held by C. H. Heywood, George A. Heywood, F. S. Davis, L. D. Thayer, and C. L. Farrington. Mr. Farrington, the present paymaster, has held the position since 1869. William Widdowson, assistant paymaster, was appointed in 1872.

Though this is known as a thread-mill, only about one-third of its product is made into thread. The remaining two-thirds are sold either for yarn, twine, or warp. The company has quite an extensive trade in seine twines, and often in the twisting-room are found 40 or 50 kinds and numbers of twine and yarn at one time. The entire annual product is 727,315 pounds of yarn. Some of the finest is sold to the woolen-manufacturers, and is worked into the woolen so as to make the silk-mixed goods which have been so popular in market.

Very much of the cotton used is the Egyptian cotton, which is shipped directly to the company from England. American cotton is used to some extent, and this comes from Texas and Mississippi, the "Peeler" cotton forming a large portion of the American cotton used.

The total number of spindles in the mill is 29,664. This is one of the largest manufacturing establishments in Holyoke, and adds much to the material prosperity of the city. (We are indebted to the Holyoke Transcript for the above history of the Hadley Company.)

THE LYMAN MILLS.

The Lyman Mills corporation was organized in 1854, but two of the mills were erected and in operation previous to that date, having been erected and operated by the Hadley Falls Company.

The first stone in the foundation of the walls of Mill No. 1 was laid Sept. 5, 1848, and Oct. 12, 1848, the first brick was laid. The 24th day of May, 1849, the first stone was laid of the foundation of the "picker-house," and June 7, 1849, the first shovel of earth was removed in the excavation for Mill No. 2. The first stone was laid in Mill No. 2, Aug. 17, 1849, and the first brick July 9, 1849. July 25, 1849, the first piece of machinery (a speeder) was placed in Mill No. 1, and March 30, 1850, the first water-wheel was set in motion in No. 1, and the first manufacturing was done April 23, 1850. April 15, 1872, the excavating for No. 3 was begun, and in 1873 the mill was in full operation.

The three mills are of the same size "on the ground." The dimensions are 268 by 68 feet, inside the walls. Mills Nos. 1 and 2 are five stories high, with roof-rooms, and No. 3 is four stories high, with flat roof.

The picker building is four stories, 62 by 180 feet; the buildings on Front Street, containing the office of the company, the cloth-room, belt- and roll-shop, storehouses, etc., have a total length of 426 feet and a width of 36 feet.

The repair-shop was built in the spring of 1860, and is 250 by 34 feet, one story high. There are three brick buildings in the rear of the mills,—the boiler-house, waste-house, pipe-shop, blacksmith-shop, paint-shop, dry-house, etc.,—two of them being about 48 by 28 feet each, and one 90 by 28.

A slight idea of the area of these mills can be obtained by the statement of the fact that there are more than 8½ acres of flooring in the factories and appurtenant buildings.

The corporation also own seven large brick "blocks," containing 205 tenements. These tenements are kept in good repair and excellently managed.

The brick-work of Mills Nos. 1 and 2 was laid by Capt. Charles McClellan, of Chicopee, and twenty-seven years have proved the reliability of the work.

The product of No. 1 Mill is principally of standard sheetings, flannels, and drills. The standard sheetings are made of four grades, marked respectively A, B, C, and E, 30 to 45 inches in width. Flannels are made of three grades, 30 to 33 inches in width; drillings of one grade, a 44-inch "twill;" "R-cloth," 50 inches wide, and used in making oil-suits and rubber-clothing; and "T-shirting," 36 inches wide. Mills Nos. 2 and 3 are as one mill in manufacturing, the carding and spinning being done in No. 2, and the spooling, dressing, and weaving in No. 3. These mills manufacture varieties of lawns, cambrics, silesias, and organdies. The lawns and organdies are 32½ inches wide; the cambrics are of three grades, from 34½ to 39 inches wide; satteens of three grades, 36 inches wide; "Y" and "Q," very fine sheeting, 39 inches wide; "hucks," or toweling; "K-cloth" of two grades, 30 and 26 inches wide. The cotton used in the mills is of the qualities known as "low middling," "middling," and "good middling." For the cloth woven in No. 1 the "low middleings" and "middleings" are bought, while for the finer work of the other mills the best of cotton that can be found, except the costly "Sea Island," is purchased, the delicate threads of the fine fabrics requiring a staple of length, strength, and body. The cotton from No. 1 comes from Vicksburg and Memphis, and for Nos. 2 and 3 the "Peeler" cotton, grown mostly in Texas, is purchased in Galveston.

The power is furnished by the water of the Connecticut River, turning eight water-wheels of the Boyden patent, having together 1433 horse-power, and using 21½ mill-powers.

There are 1556 looms in the mills,—viz., 628 in No. 1, and 928 in No. 3. The looms are principally the Chicopee, Holyoke, and the Whitin loom. The Holyoke loom was invented in Portsmouth, N. H. The drawings and patterns were brought to Holyoke by Jones S. Davis, and the looms were constructed under his direction and supervision, and have been called the Holyoke loom.

The total number of spindles in these mills is 74,888,—No. 1 Mill containing 23,552, and Nos. 2 and 3, 51,336. The machinery of No. 1 picker-room consists of 3 willows or "openers," 3 Kitson compound-pickers, 3 Kitson second-pickers, 4 Lowell and 2 Whitin second-pickers. No. 2 picker-room has 2 English pickers and 3 Whitin pickers, and 1 of Van Winkle's openers. The carding department of No. 1 has 144 "breakers," 192 "finishers," and 30 waste-cards. No. 2 has 108 breakers and 108 finishers, making a total number of cards of 582. The spinning in No. 1 Mill is entirely what is known as "ring-spinning, and the spindles are of the Lowell, Sawyer, and Rabbeth pattern. The spinning in No. 2 is done by 10,560 ring-spindles," and the balance by 30 Mason "mules" and 12 English mules made by Taylor, Lang & Co. The dressing is done in No. 1 by 3 "slashers," 1 of the Harrison manufacture and 2 of Howard & Bullough's.

The operatives number upward of 1200. These are employed as follows:

The present officials of the company are: President, Thomas Parsons; Treasurer, S. L. Bush; Agent, Q. W. Lovering; Superintendent, Theop. Parsons; Clerk and Cashier, C. D. Colson.

The first agent of the mill was Mr. Wm. Melcher, who was succeeded in 1853 by Mr. J. S. Davis, who remained until 1871. Mr. Q. W. Lovering, the present agent, has been connected with the corporation for near twenty-four years, and has been agent for nearly seven years.

The annual product of the mills is as follows: No. 1 Mill, 198,000 pieces, 2,686,000 pounds, measuring 7,900,000 yards; No. 2 Mill, 122,000,000 pieces, 886,000 pounds, measuring 6,000,000 yards.

This is the most extensive manufacturing corporation in the city, and has a capital of $1,470,000.

(The above is condensed from an article written by William S. Loomis, editor and proprietor of the Holyoke Transcript.)

THE UNQUOMONK SILK-MILLS.

This is the only institution of its kind in the city. It was established at Haydenville, Mass., in 1849, and was destroyed by the memorable and disastrous flood of 1874. Mr. William Skinner, its proprietor, then decided to rebuild the mill in Holyoke, and in the following July (1874) it was completed. Here are manufactured machine-twist sewings, button-hole twist, organzine and cashmere sewings, etc.

It is perhaps not inappropriate to remark, in this connection, that the fine residence of Mr. Skinner, which now forms one of the ornaments of the city of Holyoke, was removed in pieces from Haydenville. It was the only dwelling left standing by the flood on that ever-memorable May day.

THE FARR ALPACA COMPANY

was incorporated under the general statutes, Nov. 13, 1873, with a capital of $250,000. The first meeting of the promoters of the company was held just previous to the outbreak of the financial crisis in September, 1873, but, notwithstanding the general depression in business which followed, and the long-continued prostration of the trade of Bradford, England, the chief seat of the worsted industry, the company was firmly established, and has proved a decided success. The erection of the buildings, which are built of brick, was commenced in December, 1873; and six months after, a full range of goods was shown in New York, and at once took the front rank. In view of the depressed state of trade, it was deemed advisable to only partially equip the mill at the start, but the first goods shown were so well received that it was found necessary, in order to meet the demand, to at once fill up the mill to its full capacity,—255 looms,* and duplicate combing, drawing, and spinning machinery was put in to enable the company to produce either lustre or soft goods. Special care is taken in the selection of raw materials; and all operations in dyeing and finishing (some of which are original) are conducted with a view of producing the brightest lustre and the clearest and most durable color.

The general agent of the company, who closely superintends every operation of manufacturing, has a thoroughly practical knowledge of the work in the various departments of the mill, from selecting and sorting the stock to dyeing and finishing the cloth, and knows, by long experience, what results are needed in each department to produce goods of the highest standard of excellence.

The very satisfactory award on the company's exhibit at the Centennial Exhibition confirms the verdict of the trade on the productions of this company. It is an explicit and positive expression on all essential points in the production of perfect goods, and is fittingly supplemented by Mr. Mitchell, of Bradford, the English judge of award, in his report to the British government, in which he says, "The alpacas, cashmeres, and serges shown by the Farr Alpaca Company were specially good."

The value of the annual product at the beginning of business was $500,000, and the value of present annual products amounts to $750,000. The number of employes at the beginning was 300; present number, 600. The first president of the company was Jared Beebe. He was succeeded by Gurdon Bill, in 1876. The present officers are as follows: Timothy Merriek, President; Joseph Metcalf, Treasurer; H. M. Farr, General Agent.

THE PRENTISS WIRE-MILLS.

This business was established in 1857, by Geo. W. Prentiss, who remained sole proprietor until 1871, when he associated with himself Mr. W. W. Prentiss, who had been superintendent of the mills for ten years. William A., son of the founder, became a member of the company in 1877. This industry has grown from a comparatively small to one of the leading industries in this flourishing city. The annual product of manufactured goods during the early years was 100 tons, valued at $25,000. The present annual product is 1000 tons, valued at $250,000. In the beginning, 8 persons were employed; now, 50. The present mill was erected in 1871, and the main building is 45 by 162 feet, three stories high. The L is 45 by 75 feet, two stories. The product of this establishment embraces all kinds of iron wire, particularly the highest grades, including those varieties which require especial skill and attention in their manufacture.

THE PRENTISS WIRE-MILLS.

THE MASSACHUSETTS SCREW COMPANY was organized March 14, 1864. The main building is 40 by 152 feet, three stories high, with an L 36 by 65 feet, two stories high. It is situated on the Upper Level Canal, on Cabot Street. The daily product is 2000 gross iron flat-head and wood screws.

BANKS.

THE HADLEY FALLS NATIONAL BANK.

The pioneer banking institution in this city was the Hadley Falls Bank, which was organized May 24, 1851, twenty-three years before the city was organized, and only one year after the town of Holyoke was set off from West Springfield. Its original capital was $100,000, which in 1853 was increased to $200,000. The first officers of the bank were C. B. Rising, President; J. R. Warriner, Cashier. The first board of directors was composed of the following: John Ross, N. D. Perry, Cyrus Frink, J. Miller, R. G. Marsh, Whiting Street, A. D. Chapin, and William Melcher. Chester Crafts was chosen in place of Whiting Street, declined. Mr. Street, however, was soon after chosen a director, and remained in the board until his death, in 1878. The following are the several presidents and cashiers from the organization to the present time: Presidents, C. B. Rising, Rufus D. Woods, A. D. Chapin, and Charles W. Ranlett; cashiers, J. R. Warriner, C. W. Ranlett. H. P. Terry was chosen cashier in 1864, and has officiated in that capacity since.

The bank was reorganized as the Hadley Falls National Bank, April 3, 1865. The present board of directors is as follows: C. W. Ranlett, Broughton Alvord, William Skinner, Jonas Kendall, Spencer A. White, Benjamin Aldrich, Alfred White, Edwin H. Ball, and Charles B. Prescott. Present capital, $200,000; surplus and earnings, $125,000.

THE CITY LIBRARY.

This institution was organized May 16, 1870, mainly through the efforts of W. S. Loomis, Esq., and Henry A. Chase. These gentlemen early saw the need of a public library in the rapidly-growing city of Holyoke, and through their efforts the people of Holyoke to-day have a well-selected library, one that not only reflects much credit upon those by whose co-operation it has been sustained and fostered, but is superior to many in our land of much longer and older growth.

The act establishing the library passed the House April 20, 1870, the Senate the 21st, and was signed by the Governor on the following day. The incorporators were William Whiting, John E. Chase, and Edwin Chase. The first officers were as follows: William Whiting, President; Edwin Chase, John E. Chase, and George C. Ewing, Vice-Presidents; W. B. C. Pearsons, J. S. Webber, William Grover, J. S. McElwain, and W. S. Loomis, Directors. The first report of the library shows that the whole amount of original subscriptions for funding the library was $1989. The town of Holyoke voted $1500, to which was subsequently added by the town $1000. The Parsons Paper Company also donated $500. The report of May 13, 1868, shows that the income from all sources during the year was $1092.85; $500 was voted by the city, and $592.85 paid by subscribers. Number of volumes in the library, 6763.

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

The first meeting for the organization of the old "Fire District" was held "at the school-house on Chestnut Street, on Wednesday, Dec. 25, 1850," and the warrant was signed by Smith, Day, and Chapin, selectmen. Enoch Blood, constable, was ordered to "post" in three public places in the "New City." R. G. Marsh was chosen clerk of the meeting, and it was voted "to establish a fire department for and within the limits of School District No. 1." C. B. Rising, W. H. Carter, and Dr. A. S. Peck were designated to draft the by-laws. The second meeting was held at the office of Miller & Newell, when the first officers were chosen, as follows: Jonas Kendall, Chief; R. G. Marsh, S. K. Hutchinson, A. S. Peck, and E. Allen, Assistants; J. M. Davis, Clerk. Kendall and Allen declined, and Marsh was chosen chief, and Kendall and Galhauddett assistants. The old fire district organization remained until the city was chartered, when it was dissolved, its property turned over to the city, and the ordinance for establishing the present department passed the common council June 22, 1871, and the board of aldermen the 29th of the same month.

The chief engineers of the old "Fire District" were as follows: 1851, R. G. Marsh; 1852-53, Daniel Bowdoin; 1854, Thomas H. Kelt; 1855-58, W. B. C. Pearsons; 1859-60, Jones S. Davis; 1861-62, W. B. C. Pearsons; 1863-64, W. H. Dickinson; 1865-67, L. P. Bosworth; 1868-69, R. P. Crafts; 1870, O. S. Tuttle; 1871, R. P. Crafts; 1872-73, R. Patten.

The first officers of the present department were as follows: Benjamin F. Mullin, Chief Engineer; J. W. Davis, J. D. Hard, M. D. Sullivan, and E. P. Ford, Assistants.

Reliance Engine Company.—S. W. McKown, Foreman; C. H. Knapp, Engineer.

Relief Engine Company.—J. W. Roby, Foreman; George E. Hong, Engineer.

Mount Tom Hose Company, No. 1.—J. W. Doran, Foreman.

Mount Holyok Hose Company, No. 2.—J. Bannister, Foreman.

Emerald Hose Company, No. 3.—M. F. Fitzgerald, Foreman.

Rescue Hook-and-Ladder, No. 1.—L. M. Tuttle, Foreman.

Dexter Hose Company, No. 4.—J. M. Fox, Foreman.

The following have officiated as chief engineers from the organization of the city to 1879: B. F. Mullin, 1874-75; John D. Hardy, 1876-78; B. F. Mullin, 1879.

The department is now in a good condition, and consists of two steam fire-engines, one hook-and-ladder company, four hose companies, and an extinguisher company.

THE WATER-WORKS.

The city is supplied with water by gravitation from two contiguous ponds, called Ashley's and Wright's, located within the city limits, about three and one-half miles from the city-hall. The works were begun in 1872, and in August of the following year were completed. The reservoirs will supply two million gallons per day for one hundred and forty-three days without any inflow, and the water-shed of the ponds embraces 1726 acres. The works are constructed in the best possible manner, and the entire system cost less than $250,000, the limit prescribed by the Legislature. The works are self-supporting, and there is every indication that the entire expense of construction will be paid out of the current income.

BURIAL-PLACES.

FORESTDALE CEMETERY.

"This place, set free from common use, is hallowed ground;
Of Love, of Memory, the chosen shrine."

The need of a cemetery more convenient of access and adequate to the wants of an increasing population had long been felt by the citizens of Holyoke, and, in the autumn of 1860, the necessary legal steps were taken to form a cemetery association and purchase suitable grounds. At a town-meeting holden in October, the sum of $1500 was appropriated to aid in the purchase of such grounds upon certain conditions, which have been fulfilled. An association was duly formed, Nov. 1, 1860, under the name and style of the Forestdale Cemetery Association, and 24½ acres of land purchased of Hon. R. A. Chapman and W. T. Davis (surviving trustees) at $100 per acre. In order to obtain a regular boundary, 4½ acres of this land were exchanged for an equivalent amount belonging to the Holyoke Water-Power Company. The Lyman Mills, Hampden Mills, Holyoke Water-Power Company, and Holyoke Machine-Shop aided the project by liberal purchases of lots.

The work of reclaiming the grounds was attended with much difficulty, and was carried on energetically during the whole of the following year, under the direction of Mr. J. S. Davis, the president of the association. The cemetery was finally laid out by the joint labors of the president and Mr. Wm. Grover, of Holyoke.

The first board of officers were as follows: Jones S. Davis, President; Porter Underwood, Secretary and Treasurer. Board of Trustees: Jones S. Davis, Porter Underwood, J. M. Whiting, Henry Wheeler, Edwin H. Ball, S. Stewart Chase, S. J. Weston, Austin Ely, Asa O. Colby, S. H. Walker. Auditors: R. B. Johnson, Chester Crafts.

The cemetery was dedicated June 22, 1862, and the services were of an impressive and interesting character. The dedicatory address was delivered by Prof. J. G. Voss, of Amherst College, and the address on behalf of the trustees by George C. Ewing, Esq. An interesting part of the services was the reading of a poem by Rev. Roswell Foster.

The people of Holyoke manifested a general interest in the cemetery from its inception, and are entitled to great credit in beautifying this sacred spot. It is delightfully located on a gentle eminence in the suburbs of the city, and is one of the finest rural burial-places in New England.

The present officers of the association are as follows: William Grover, President; R. B. Johnson, Secretary and Treasurer; William Grover, C. H. Heywood, H. A. Chase, Levi was organized April 5, 1850, and worked under a dispensation until December 12th of same year, at which time it received its charter from the Grand Lodge. Its organization began with seven charter members. The first W. M. was Brother S. K. Hutchinson. On the morning of Aug. 18, 1852, fire was discovered in the building occupied by the lodge. The entire block was consumed, and Mount Tom Lodge lost all its property except its charter. Brother N. W. Quint, who was Master of the lodge at this time, for some reason fortunately carried the charter home with him after the previous meeting, and thus it was saved to the lodge. Although Holyoke at this time had hardly arrived at the dignity of a village, and the membership of the lodge was small, yet, notwithstanding their loss, their work went on without interruption.

The lodge has for many years held a foremost position among the lodges in this district in point of excellence in Masonic work, and its officers have always taken pride in sustaining the position. The lodge is now making arrangements to move to more suitable quarters, or have the present enlarged and remodeled to meet their requirements. The present membership is about 350.

Another branch of the Masonic order exists in the city,—the Mount Holyoke Chapter.

MOUNT HOLYOKE ROYAL ARCH CHAPTER

was incorporated in September, 1865. The charter members were B. S. Bucklin, N. W. Quint, Henry Wheeler, R. B. Johnson, C. L. Frink, William Grover, Porter Underwood, T. H. Wellington, E. A. Marsh, Chas. H. Lyman.

The Past High-Priests are William Grover, C. L. Frink, T. T. Waterman, E. G. Best.

The present officers are as follows: Dwight Bradburn, H. P.; James Stafford, E. K.; L. M. Richards, E. S.; G. S. Bassett, Treas.; G. F. Bassett, Sec.; C. W. Brown, C. H.; A. A. Paul, R. A. C.; W. C. Wharfield, P. S.; C. H. Tower, Master 1st Veil; S. Featherstone, Master 2d Veil; T. Slingsby, Master 3d Veil; James Caffrey, S. S.; S. E. Bliss, J. I.; T. T. Waterman, C.; N. W. Quint, Tyler. Whole number of members, 139.

CONNECTICUT VALLEY LODGE, KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS, was instituted in Holyoke, March 17, 1870, by Myrtus Lodge, of Springfield. The charter members were as follows: Justin E. Brown, P. C.; John H. Clifford, C. C.; A. E. Pomeroy, V. C.; L. C. Browning, Mr. of Ex.; G. G. Dicky, Mr. of F.; H. Spencer, K. of R. and S.; W. H. Sissor, Mr. at A.; F. D. Chamberlin, I. G.; E. C. Richardson, O. G.

The above-named charter members constituted the first officers of the lodge, John H. Clifford being the first Chancellor Commander. Among the first members initiated were Dr. L. M. Tuttle, Dr. G. H. Smith, C. H. Printers, P. J. Crofts, T. W. Man, W. H. H. Ward, R. B. Johnson, H. C. Ewing, and C. H. Richards. The order continued to grow quite rapidly, but the first members of the lodge had to work hard and use their money quite freely for the first two years, as there were a good many expenses incurred in furnishing new hall, etc.

The lodge has prospered through all these years, and at the present time is one of the strongest in the State, numbering about 100 members in good standing. The lodge has had but little sickness among its members thus far, but those who have suffered have been well attended and cared for. The lodge-room and property are worth $1000; the lodge is free from debt, and has a surplus of nearly $500. New members are constantly being received. On the 1st of January, 1879, a public installation was held in the city-hall; it was well attended, and was an interesting affair. The present officers are P. C., F. E. White; C. C., D. Bradburn; V. C., C. L. Farington; P., W. C. Wharfield; K. of R. and S., Edwin R. Pierce; Mr. at A., G. W. Philbrick; Mr. of Ex., F. R. Norton; Mr. of F., Edwin E. Bartlett; I. G., G. W. Richards; O. G., James Thompson.

EDUCATIONAL.*

For more than a century the village school has been an institution of the people occupying the present territory of Holyoke. Wherever a few farmers or fishermen had fixed their abode, there they seem to have erected the temples of civilization. These school-houses were located as follows: one near the northeast corner of the town, over the mountain; one on West Street, near the site of the present one; another somewhat south of Craft's tavern, and on the opposite side of Northampton Street; another on the spot now occupied by the Ingleside station platform (Holyoke and Westfield Railroad); another at the south end of Ashley's Pond, and another south of Dwight Street and west of the new Wauregan Mill site. In the latter, Chester W. Chapin taught school about fifty-six years ago, while the venerable Alexander Day and Col. Edwin Ball and some others of our own citizens pursued pedagogies in several of these houses nearly a generation ago. None of these earlier school-houses have successfully withstood the wear and tear of time and use, and their precise location can with difficulty be determined. The records of School District No. 15, West Springfield, are the only records of these ancient schools that have come to our hands, and these do not begin until 1802. This book contains only a very brief account of the annual meetings, though it is continued sixty years, the first entry having been made Nov. 29, 1802, and the last Nov. 24, 1862. This school was located near the site of the present West Street school-house. Many of the items would prove interesting reading to the present denizens of the village. The first runs thus:

Nov. 29, 1802.—"At a school-meeting held at the school-house, Passed the following Votes:

"1st. Chose Mr. Peresh Hitchcock Moderator.

"2d. Caleb Humeston Clerk.

"3d. Voted to give Caleb Humeston 3s. 6d. a week for boarding Miss Sally Clapp three months.

"4th. Voted to give Caleb Humeston 2s. per week for boarding Lovina Humeston three months.

"5th. Voted that we bring $1\frac{1}{2}$ cord of wood for each scholar that we send to school in our turns, or pay eight shillings for each cord of wood that the committee shall provide ready-cut fit for the fire.

"6th. Chose Mr. Elisha Ashley committee for the ensuing."

Caleb Humeston was clerk of the first of the meetings above alluded to, and moderator of the last recorded. All these schools seem to have been managed in nearly the same manner. They were neighborhood affairs, doubtless indifferently taught, some of them having a smaller number of pupils than the smallest of our present suburban schools; the burden of their support rested upon, and seems to have been bravely borne by, a few persons.

The changes which visited the district school-houses between the two dates given above cannot be given in this brief sketch. Suffice it to say that the Ingleside school-house gave place to one located near the dry bridge, above the old site; the West Street house to one farther west; the West Holyoke house to the Rock Valley house; the Northampton Street house to the one farther north; the one in "the fields" south of Dwight Street to one standing west of the Prentiss Wire Company's mill, where the Upper Level Canal now flows. This topic should not be dismissed without special reference to a noteworthy institution known as "The Seminary," built in 1808. The house was a two-story frame structure, 40 feet long by 35 broad, and was located south of Stephen Rand's house. The original proprietors were Rev. Thomas Rand, the father of Stephen, who owned one-third, Deacon Perez Hitchcock, who owned the larger share of the balance, Caleb Humeston, Austin Goodyear, grandfather of the present one, Noah Woolcott, David Bassett. Only a part of the upper story of the building was finished, and in this Elder Rand, as he was called, successfully conducted his seminary some 24 years, impressing his character and learning upon many who still hold their place and importance among us, and others still whose good name and fame any teacher would be proud to claim as the result of his labors. This incipient college, with one professor, during those years had for its pupils Col. E. H. Ball, Frederick and Annie Street, Charles Ely and Norman Smith, of Tatham; Thaddens Kent, of West Springfield; Solomon Ashley, of Ashleyville; Rev. Justin Perkins, missionary to the Nestorians; Rev. Hosea Howard, missionary to Burmah; Dwight Ives, D.D., pastor at Suffield thirty-five years; Rev. Thomas Barrett; David Pease, who lately died in Ashleyville at the age of nearly one hundred years; Rev. Reuben Winchell; Rev. Asabel Chapin, still living in Kansas; Alonzo Lamb; John Cook, of Huntington; Linus Day, lately deceased; Curtis and Quartus Ely, still living; Bishop Humeston, father of Dr. L. F. Humeston, of this city, and others whose names are worthy of addition to this honorable roll. The lower story of the seminary was used for recitation-room and public worship. But a change came over the old seminary on the removal from town of Elder Rand, and some thirty-four years ago the building was taken down and removed to the spot now occupied by Mr. Timothy Merrick's skating-rink. About this time a change was made in the eastern limit of the Baptist village district. This region was cut off from the Ireland parish district, and accommodated with a district school in the lower story of the seminary, finished for the purpose.

The seminary prospered under Mr. William Gamwell, who kept it for some time, when it was familiarly known as "Gamwell's school." The school was afterward taught by Messrs. Gardner, Leavitt, Barton, T. W. Wadsworth (1847), Kimball, Pratt, Joseph Darwin Long, son of Dr. Long, of this city, now a lawyer in Illinois, Oscar Ely, Rev. Dr. Chapin Carpenter, for many years pastor of the church in Paris, also editor of the Illustrated Christian Weekly and a hymn-book, now pastor of the Madison Avenue Church in New York City, Chapin Carpenter, of Burmah, and Mr. Bissell, some seventeen years ago. Like those of most high schools and academies of that day, the teachers were frequently changed, and the above list represents far more years than names. Generally, however, the school bore a good and often a high character. Soon after its removal to Baptist village, the original owners generously relinquished their personal right in the building, and the school was maintained by the district until the growth of the incipient city made a new centre of learning as well as of business. The above brief sketch falls far short of doing justice to the intelligent and persistent energy with which a small and scattered community maintained schools of excellent merit. A total stranger a few days ago to these facts and the people they concern, I stop this agreeable narrative to record my astonishment at the taste for the better culture manifest in the kind and success of their educational institutions, maintained largely at personal cost, but shared and cherished by nearly all. The old seminary, losing its patronage, was finally sold at auction to Rev. Chapin Carpenter, for the non-payment of a printer's bill, Mr. Carpenter doubtless intending to secure its continuance as a permanent institution. By this time, however, influence and population were drawing all things to the new centre, and Mr. Carpenter gave up the struggle, selling the "seminary," by the hands of the auctioneer, Robert Marsh, to George C. Ewing, of this city. The building was torn down, brought SAMUEL BARRETT ALLYN was born in the township of Montgomery, Mass., Aug. 31, 1822. His father, David Allyn, Esq., of Montgomery, and Joanna Barrett, his mother, were descended from the first settlers of Groton, Conn.

Mr. Allyn received his education in the schools of his native town. At the age of twenty-two he started in business, devoting the following three years to farming.

In 1847 he moved to Holyoke, Mass., and entered into partnership with his elder brother, Deacon Anderson Allyn, in the marketing business. Being successful, they also soon engaged in the real-estate business. At the present time they are the owners of large tracts of land in and about the city of Holyoke, and have built several of the finest business blocks and over thirty dwelling-houses in the city. They have been largely interested as stockholders in many of the manufactories of the city, Mr. S. B. Allyn being for two years a director in the Holyoke Paper Company, and another year its treasurer.

In November, 1849, Mr. Allyn married Miss Sarah P. Ball. They had one daughter,—Virginia, born in November, 1850. Mrs. Allyn died in April, 1866. The daughter, after graduating at the high school, was sent to Europe to complete her education, where she remained two years. She died of consumption, in 1874.

In 1867, Mr. Allyn married Miss Catherine Merrill, daughter of Daniel Merrill, Esq., of Connecticut, and sister of Cela Merrill, the celebrated Hebrew scholar, of Andover. By this marriage there were born two children,—Robert Arthur, Nov. 9, 1869, and Mary Catherine, September, 1871. The mother died in January, 1874.

In 1875, Mr. Allyn married Miss H. Emeline Minor, of Stonington, Conn., daughter of Capt. Frank Minor, who, with his ship, was lost at sea on a voyage to the West Indies, nothing being heard from them after sailing from New York.

In early life Mr. Allyn was a Whig, but has been a Republican since the organization of that party. He has been a member of the Second Congregational Church for twenty years. In 1876 his residence was destroyed by fire, and in the same year was replaced by his present fine residence, erected at a cost of $25,000.

RES. OF S. B. ALLYN, HOLYOKE, MASS.

CONNECTICUT RIVER LOOKING SOUTH FROM SOUTH HOLYOKE, MASS.

into the village, where its boards may be found to-day, covering the sides of a building near Ewingville. Thus closes the first period in the history of the schools. If the second period, with its ample means and the inspiration of great material prosperity, exhibits equal zeal and proportionate success, the history of Holyoke will be as conspicuous for its educational institutions as for its business success.

The following exhibit shows the condition of the schools of the town of Holyoke at the time of its organization: number of districts, 9; teachers employed, 20,—6 males and 14 females; number of persons between the ages of 5 and 15, 537; number attending school in summer, 492; in winter, 471; average attendance in summer, 294; in winter, 328; months taught by males, 23½; by females, 72½; amount of wages paid to males, $719.50; to females, $1053.59. The appropriation by the town for schools was $1800. The schools increased in number and usefulness, and in 1873, the last year of the town organization, the appropriation by the town for schools amounted to $25,350; and the average number of scholars for the year was 738.

The following exhibit from the superintendent's report shows the value of school property, etc., in the year 1878: school-houses, 11 (9 brick, 2 wood); value of lands, $31,559; value of buildings, $75,300; number of sittings, 1848; pupils enrolled, 1854; value of furniture, $6384; value of books and apparatus, $2067; total valuation, $117,840.

The school committee's report for 1878 shows the number of children enrolled in the public schools 1948; number in the city between the ages of 5 and 15, 3163; and the average attendance, 1403.

Since the incorporation of the city the schools have been in flourishing condition. In the language of the school committee, "the schools are well furnished, liberally provided with educational requisites, and are conducted under a thorough and rigid system of inspection and supervision."

The present organization of the school committee is as follows: Hon. William Whiting, Mayor, Chairman; E. L. Kirtland, Secretary and Superintendent of Schools; at large, G. C. Ewing, term expires, 1880; John Doyle, 1881; Ward 1, William Ruddy, 1880; Ward 2, F. Morrison, 1882; Ward 3, Patrick Herbert, 1880; Ward 4, William Kelly, 1882; Ward 5, Daniel M. Manning, 1881; Ward 6, E. W. Chapin, 1882; Ward 7, E. P. Clark, 1881.

THE PRESS.

THE HOLYOKE TRANSCRIPT.

The Transcript is published semi-weekly, Wednesdays and Saturdays. It was established in 1863, the first number appearing April 11th of that year. It was published weekly during nine years. In April, 1872, the first number of the Wednesday edition was issued, and it has been a semi-weekly from that date. The Saturday edition of 1863 was a 24-column folio sheet, 22 inches by 31½ inches, the same size as the present Wednesday edition. In April it was enlarged to 28 column, 24 by 35 sheet. In August, 1868, another enlargement was made, this time to a 27 by 40 sheet, of 32 columns. In April, 1870, it was enlarged to 48 columns, and was printed on a sheet 31½ by 44 inches, and in the present quarto form. The founders of the Transcript were Messrs. Henry M. Burt and C. R. Lyman. In August, 1864, Mr. Lyman purchased Mr. Burt's interest, and conducted the paper until Feb. 11, 1871, when Mr. E. L. Kirtland purchased an interest, and the firm of Lyman & Kirtland published the Transcript until May 1, 1873, when Mr. Lyman sold his interest to Mr. W. S. Loomis. In August, 1875, Mr. Kirtland retired, selling his half of the establishment to Mr. Loomis, who has been sole proprietor since that time.

The files of the local papers since 1848, published by this establishment, are carefully preserved in the Transcript office. It has been the aim of the publishers of the Transcript to make a good local paper. It seeks to-day to honestly give a complete and true record of local events, and to comment freely upon local needs. Its files contain such a history of the rise and progress of town and city as can nowhere else be found, and it has been generously supported by the citizens of Holyoke.

The Transcript has published, from time to time, illustrations and descriptions of the noteworthy buildings and enterprises of the city, and histories of its churches, manufactories, and worthy institutions. It is the popular advertising medium of the merchants of the city, and has a large circulation among former residents in other towns and States.

THE HOLYOKE NEWS.

The Holyoke News was founded April 13, 1878, by Hon. W. H. Phillips, who removed to the city from Pittsfield, where for nearly six years he was the publisher of the Pittsfield Sun, having previously founded the Hoosac Valley News, at North Adams, and having also owned and published the Adams Transcript, in the same town. He is the oldest editor in actual service west of the Connecticut River, having wielded the editorial pen over thirty continuous years. He was educated at Williams College, is a practical printer, has filled minor town-offices, and was elected to the State Senate from the North Berkshire district in 1874. The Holyoke News is independent in politics, and carries a free lance in both political and local topics.

The following are obsolete publications: the Hampden Freeman, started in 1849 by William L. Morgan, changed in 1853 to Holyoke Freeman, and subsequently to Holyoke Weekly Mirror. The New City Weekly Times, started in 1849 by J. F. Downing. The Independent was established by E. G. Plaisted & Co. in 1854. These had only a brief existence.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

THE FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

The First Congregational Church of Holyoke was organized by Dr. Lathrop, of the First Congregational Church of West Springfield, Dec. 4, 1799, with the following members: Joseph Rogers, Amos Allen, Titus Morgan, Timothy Clough, Susan Morgan, Nathan Stephens, Jonathan Clough, John Miller, and Glover Street. The first regular preacher of whom any record exists was Rev. Mr. Taylor, in 1816, who was engaged to preach one Sunday in four. After his dismissal an arrangement was made with the Baptists, by which it was agreed that the money raised by the Congregationalists should be paid to Rev. Thomas Rand, pastor of the Baptist Church, and that he should exchange with Congregational ministers "to supply us with preaching our part of the time." Rev. Mr. Hays supplied the church in 1828, and remained until 1833. He was succeeded by Rev. Harvey Smith, who officiated until Jan. 4, 1841. The next pastor was Rev. Gideon Dana, from 1841 to 1844; he was followed by Rev. Simeon Miller, who supplied the pulpit from September, 1844, to 1846, when he was called as pastor, and was ordained May 7, 1846, and continued in the pastoral relation until Jan. 22, 1870. Theodore L. Day was ordained and installed Dec. 18, 1872, and remained until June 24, 1874. The present supply is Rev. S. W. Clarke.

The deacons of the church have been as follows: Joseph Rogers, Amos Allen, John T. Dunham, Nathan Morse, Hiram Jones, Hervey Chapin, David C. Rogers, Lorenzo Nash, Lyman F. Thorp, and Samuel T. Lyman.

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH.

This church was organized Oct. 5, 1803, as the Second Baptist Church of West Springfield, with the following members: Thomas Rand, Caleb Hummiston, Perish Hitchcock, Benj. Bassett, Asahel Chapin, Jedediah Day, Austin Goodyear, Joseph Ely, Sarah Hummiston, Anna Hitchcock, and Bela Gill. There were, however, members of the Baptist Church in this vicinity as early as 1727. In that year five persons in West Springfield—which at that time included Agawam and Holyoke—were immersed on a profession of faith by Rev. E. Calender, of Boston. In 1710 these persons, with others, three of whom were Col. Benj. Ely, Capt. Joseph Ely, and Asahel Chapin, organized as a church at Feeding Hills. This little band of believers, however, occasionally received ministrations from Rev. Asa Todd, who would walk from his parish in Russell, sixteen miles distant, and return on the same day. Of the council that constituted the present church, Elder Gano, of Providence, was chairman, and Elder Jesse Whitman, clerk. The first pastor was Rev. Thomas Rand. The following have served this church as pastors from its organization to the present time: Thos. Rand, Oct. 6, 1803, to Feb. 19, 1828; Richmond Taggart, March 13, 1828, to Dec. 22, 1828; H. Archibald, April 5, 1830, to Aug. 13, 1832; Ira Hull, May 6, 1835, to 1837; H. D. Doolittle, Aug. 16, 1838, to April 1, 1842; William L. Brown, Aug. 23, 1842, to April 1, 1846; Joel Kenney, 1846, to May 9, 1847; Asahel Chapin, Oct., 1847, to June 17, 1849; Mark Carpenter, Jan. 1, 1849, to April 1, 1859; S. W. Gorman, from April 1, 1859, to April 1, 1864; J. H. Kent, from May 1, 1864, to March, 1866; J. L. A. Fish, May 14, 1868, to 1872; Rev. W. H. Evans, 1872, present pastor. The following have served as deacons: Caleb Hummiston, Perish Hitchcock, Stephen Chapin, Cyrus Frink, Abraham Jones, Caleb Hummiston, Samuel J. Street, Newton Day.

The records show that "in 1792 the Baptists erected a meeting-house about half a mile south of the present house, but were able to finish it only on the outside." "After a few years the Congregationalists solicited them to remove it farther north and they would help finish it and own a part of it. It was accordingly removed, pews put in on the floor, and front seats in the gallery." This building was completed in about 1811, and was occupied until 1826, when the society built the present house of worship, which has been several times repaired and improved.

THE SECOND CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETY.

The history of this church dates back to the summer of 1848, when services were held in a school-house located near the present Lyman Mills. They subsequently worshiped in the brick school-house and in Exchange Hall. The church was organized May 24, 1849, and Rev. Mr. Pierce was the first pastor, and remained until 1851. Other pastors were as follows: Rev. Richard Knight, 1853-55; J. B. R. Walker, 1855-64; L. R. Eastman, Jr., 1865-67; J. L. R. Trask, 1867, present incumbent. The deacons are as follows: Robert S. Howard, Anderson Allyn, Alex. H. Child, Samuel Prentiss, M. L. Childs, A. O. Colby, W. J. Johnson, Nathan Clark, John D. Hardy, and Chalmers Chapin.

The present church edifice was commenced in 1852, and completed and dedicated in 1853.

THE SECOND BAPTIST CHURCH.

The Second Baptist Church was organized June 27, 1849, with Rev. Asahel Chapin as pastor, the congregation at that time worshipping in what was known as Gallaudet & Terry's Hall, corner of Lyman and High Streets, Ireland Depot. Hummiston, and Mary Emerson.

The society worshiped in Chapin Hall until 1855, when it removed to the vestry of the new church. The church was dedicated Nov. 17, 1859. In 1863 the house was destroyed by fire, when meetings were again held in the hall until the rededication of the church in 1865. The pastors have been as follows: Asahel Chapin, 1849-52; J. French, 1853-55; J. W. Gorman, 1856-58; C. H. Rowe, 1861-62 (supply); A. M. Chase.

The list of deacons is the following: John Parker, Edwin Chase, Bullard Pettingill, Joseph Ely, James Lamareaux, E. T. Richards, A. C. Slater, John W. Currier, Cyrus Frink, G. E. Lamb, George Thayer, Edwin Chase, George E. Lamb, Geo. Thayer, and Timothy Merriek. Present membership, 420.

THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

This church was organized in 1853 with 20 members, and the first pastor was Rev. Thos. March. Services were held in Lyman, Gallaudet & Terry's, and Chapin's halls, successively, until, July 4, 1869, they removed to the vestry of the church.

The following have officiated as pastors: Rodney Gage, Philander Wallingford, M. Emory Wright, Martin Chapin, Nathaniel Fellows, Wm. J. Hambleton, Wm. D. Birge, John Peterson, Samuel Roy, I. B. ST. PAUL'S EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

This church was organized in 1863, and services were first held in Exchange Hall, High Street; afterward the congregation worshiped in a chapel on Maple Street, the property of one of their members.

The corner-stone of the first church edifice owned by the parish, the same which they now occupy, was laid in 1866, and the church was subsequently completed at a cost of $30,000. Early in the year 1868 the congregation began to hold services in the new church. It has accommodations for seating 300 to 400 persons. The present rector is Rev. A. Skeele, and the church-wardens are George H. Le Doyt and E. P. Ford. The present number of communicants is 180.

THE GERMAN REFORMED CHURCH is located on Park Street. Rev. T. B. Hanle pastor.

ST. JEROME PARISH (CATHOLIC).

The church belonging to this parish was begun in 1856, and completed in 1860. It has ever been a flourishing church, and has taken a deep interest in all matters tending to the welfare of its communicants. In connection with this church is the convent of Notre Dame, the St. Jerome Institute, and the orphan asylum and hospital. The parish is under the pastoral care of Rev. Father P. J. Harkins.

THE CHURCH OF THE SACRED HEART is a large and flourishing Catholic Church. Rev. Father J. T. Sheehan is pastor.

THE FRENCH ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH is one of the finest church edifices in the city; it is brick, with marble trimmings. The old church belonging to this society was burned May 27, 1875, and 71 persons perished in the flames. The remains of 47 of the victims lie buried in one common grave in the French Catholic cemetery, across the river, in South Hadley.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

HON. WILLIAM WHITING

was born in Dudley, Mass., March 24, 1841, and is the son of William B. Whiting and Elizabeth B. Whiting. The Whiting family is of English descent, the earliest ancestor in America having settled in Lynn, Mass., during the year 1636.

Mr. Whiting was educated in the public schools of Holyoke, and, after graduating at the high school, began his business life with the Holyoke Paper Company as book-keeper in 1858. Afterward he traveled as their agent, and later accepted the position of business agent of the Hampden Paper Company, but resigned at the end of three months, and purchased the wire-mill now known as "Whiting No. 1," and changed it into a mill for the manufacture of fine writing-paper, with a capacity of five tons per day. This business proving very successful, he purchased a tract of ground on Dwight Street and the second level of the canal, and erected the mill known as "Whiting No. 2," with a capacity of seven tons per day, making his full production twelve tons per day, a larger amount than is manufactured by any other corporation in America. In these mills he employs over five hundred operatives, with a pay-roll of over one hundred and eighty thousand dollars per annum. In 1877 he erected on his Dwight Street property a beautiful opera-house, the finest in New England outside of Boston, and at the same time a fine hotel, —the Windsor House (both of brick with stone trimmings), —at a cost of one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. In 1872 he organized the Holyoke National Bank, and has been its president since. He is also a director in the Chapin Banking and Trust Company, of Springfield; a member of the finance committee of the Holyoke Savings-Bank; a director in the Holyoke Warp Company; vice-president of the Holyoke and Westfield Railroad, and has been largely identified in other enterprises. In politics he has always been a Republican. In 1873 he was elected State Senator by sixteen hundred majority. In 1877 he was elected mayor of Holyoke, receiving the nomination from both parties, and in 1878 he was re-elected over the regular Democratic nominee by more than nine hundred majority. In 1876 and 1877 he held the office of city treasurer, defeating the Democratic candidate, notwithstanding Holyoke has generally given a majority for the Democratic party. In 1876 he was elected delegate to the Cincinnati Convention which nominated President Hayes.

Mr. Whiting married, in 1862, Miss Annie M., daughter of Luther M. Fairfield, of Holyoke, and has two children,—William F., born July 20, 1864, and Raynor S., born Jan. 20, 1867.

GEORGE HERBERT SMITH, M.D.,

son of Edmund H. and Lucy B. Smith, was born in Chicopee, Mass., July 4, 1840. He received a liberal education and made himself proficient in all the branches taught in the common and high schools, and in the summer of 1861 graduated with full honors at the Wesleyan Academy, at Wilbraham, Mass. In the same year he commenced the study of medicine with Dr. R. T. Chaffee, of Hartford, Conn. In September, 1862, he enlisted as private in the 25th Regiment Connecticut Volunteers, and in January, 1863, when the regiment was stationed at Baton Rouge, he was detailed on special service, and was quartermaster-sergeant in the Ambulance Corps, under command of Surgeon Rogers. In April he returned to his regiment, the surgeon of which having died, and the second assistant being unfit for duty, he was assigned to act under First Assistant Surgeon Woods, who was soon after promoted to full rank. Dr. Smith was with the Army of the Gulf during the campaign of 1863, and was present and rendered valuable service at the battles of Irish Bend, Franklin, Donaldsonville, and the siege of Port Hudson. On the 17th of June, 1863, he was taken prisoner while at Linwood Hospital, but during the day the enemy was driven back, and he was released. He returned with his regiment, and on the 26th of August, 1863, was mustered out of service. He then resumed his studies, attended two courses of lectures at the Bellevue Hospital Medical College in New York, and graduated March 1, 1865.

He commenced the practice of medicine in Tariffville, Conn., but, his health failing, in the fall of 1866 he moved to Sycamore, Ill.; but in 1868 he returned to New England, and established himself at Holyoke, Mass., where he has since resided. Dr. Smith makes a specialty of obstetrics and the diseases of women and children, and his extensive practice is sufficient testimony to his professional skill. Though an ardent advocate of homœopathy, he has, by his liberal views and courteous demeanor, secured the respect and good-will of his professional opponents.

In December, 1874, he was elected a member of the common council of Holyoke, and re-elected in 1875. In January, 1876, he was chosen president of that body. In December, 1876, he was elected a member of the board of aldermen, and re-elected the following year. He has been connected with the city government in an official capacity since its organization.

Dr. Smith has always been a Republican in politics. He is a leading member of the Masonic order, in which he has risen to the thirty-second degree. He is also a member of the Odd-Fellows' society.

He married, June 8, 1869, Miss Ada M., daughter of Dr. C. W. Babcock, of Medina, Ohio, and has had three children, —Abbie M., born May 19, 1872; Edward H., born March 4, 1874 (died on the 11th of the following December); and Lucy C., born March 11, 1876.

THE NEWTON BROTHERS.

JAMES HALE NEWTON

was born in Hubbardston, Mass., on Jan. 13, 1832. The Newton family in America are descended from Moses Newton, who was born in England, and came to America in A.D. 1700. From Moses Newton to James Hale, we find several generations: (1st) Moses, (2d) James, (3d) Joseph, (4th) Ebenezer, and (5th) James (the father of James Hale), who was born in 1801, and who married Elizabeth Hale, another of the English families which early settled in Massachusetts.

Mr. Newton was educated at Dartmouth College, graduating in 1859. While fitting at Easthampton, and during his college term, he taught various schools during the winter vacations, to assist in meeting his educational expenses. Immediately after graduating he was elected to the principalship of the Thomas Grammar School,—the largest in the city of Worcester, Mass.,—in which position he remained five years. At the end of that time he removed to Holyoke, Mass., and in connection with his brothers, Daniel H. and John C. Newton, and others, organized the Hampden Paper Company (there being then but two small mills in Holyoke). Their capacity was two tons of collar-paper per day. Mr. Newton acted as business agent and treasurer until 1866, when he disposed of his interest, and, in connection with his father-in-law, Calvin Taft, Esq., of Worcester, organized the Franklin Paper Company, with a capacity of three tons per day, running exclusively on book- and colored envelope-paper. Mr. Newton is now engaged in building another fine mill for manufacturing paper, on Dwight Street, between the two levels of the canal, which he expects to complete in 1879, and will increase his production of fine paper to over eight tons per day. In 1872, Mr. Newton was elected one of the directors in the Third National Bank of Springfield, Mass., which position he still holds. In April, 1872, he organized the Mechanics' Savings-Bank of Holyoke, Mass., and has since then held its presidency. The institution now has over three hundred thousand dollars on its deposit account, showing an increase each year over the previous one since its organization. In November, 1863, Mr. Newton married Miss Susan Taft, of Worcester, Mass., and has had four children, —Edward Taft, born Dec. 15, 1864; Frederick Hale, born Feb. 23, 1866; Lila Taft, born Jan. 22, 1868; James Bertram, born Aug. 11, 1876.

MOSES NEWTON,

a younger brother of James H., was born in Hubbardston, Mass., Oct. 27, 1833. He lived on his father's farm until fourteen years of age, receiving his education in the schools of that town and at Deerfield Academy. He remained on the farm until past thirty years of age, being engaged, however, with his father and brothers in the lumbering business, when he removed to Holyoke, where he engaged in the paper-business as superintendent of the Hampden Paper Company, until it was destroyed by fire in the year 1870, when he went to Miller's Falls as treasurer of the Buckus Vise Company, in which capacity he remained until the year 1872, when the company was united with the Miller's Falls Manufacturing Company, after which he engaged in the lumbering business for the following two years with his brothers. After this he entered into a copartnership with Mr. James Ramage for the buildings, enlarged Monson Academy (at Monson, Mass.), and built the Holyoke Warp Company's mill and nine dwellings. In 1865 he built Tenement Block for the Hampden Paper Company's mill; also the Franklin Paper Company's mill and two dwellings on Race Street.

Nov. 28, 1865, he married Miss Lela F. Vulte, of New York City. In 1866 he was elected manager of the Hampden purpose of manufacturing building paper. In the year 1877 he, in connection with Mr. Ramage and Mr. George A. Clark, organized the Newton Paper Company, for the purpose of manufacturing building, carpet lining, and wrapping papers. The mill has been greatly enlarged during the past year. When organized the capacity was only one ton per day, while they are now making the enormous quantity of ten tons per day, being more than that of any other mill of the kind in the United States. Mr. Newton was married in 1859 to Miss Maria B. Arms, daughter of Borden Arms, Esq., of Deerfield, and has four children,—Laura M., born in March, 1861; Susie, born in October, 1863; Alice C., born in February, 1868; and Herbert Arthur, born in December, 1875.

JOHN C. NEWTON,

brother of James H. and Moses, was born in Hubbardston, Mass., and, like his brothers, spent his boyhood at the ancestral home.

In 1858 he graduated at the normal school in Westfield, and during the following year taught school in Vermont and Massachusetts. In 1860 he began his career as a builder by erecting the gas-works at Westfield and Greenfield, and an addition to the State normal school in Westfield.

In 1861 he built the bridges on the Tunnel Railroad.

In 1862 he came to Holyoke and built the Lyman Street school-house, the high school, and the wire-mills, now Whiting Paper Company's No. 1 Mill.

In 1863 he built A. T. Stewart & Co.'s woolen-mill and the Holyoke Machine Company's building; also W. H. Wilkinson and Emerson Wright's blocks, Wilkinson's collar factory, Stebbins' brass-foundry, and four private dwellings for employés of the United States Armory in Springfield, Mass.

In 1864 he built the Florence Sewing-Machine Company's Paper Company's mill, of which he was also treasurer and principal owner.

In 1867 he built the Hampden Paper Company's Mill No. 2, now Crocker Manufacturing Company's Mill No. 1. In 1869 he added the second machine and engines to Hampden Paper Company's Mill No. 2. During the summer and fall of 1870 he rebuilt this mill, which was destroyed by fire in March; he also put in water connections and laid the foundation of the Prentiss Wire-Mill and Whiting Paper Company's Mill No. 2.

In 1871 he sold the Hampden Paper Company's mill to the Crocker Manufacturing Company, and, forming a partnership with his oldest brother, D. H. Newton, they purchased the Ryder property, and sold the site for the city-hall. He also built the Massasoit Paper Company's mill, the Springfield Blanket Company's mill, and others, including the Beebe & Holbrook mill. In 1873 he built the paper-mill at Union Village, Conn., and the Jessup and Laflin paper-mill at Salmon Falls. He built the fishway at the Holyoke dam, also the Massachusetts Screw Company's mill, and graded the land above the first canal level, requiring four hundred thousand yards of earth for filling.

In 1874 he built the Furr Alpaca Company's mill, the Skinner silk-mill, and the dam for the Agawam Canal Company, on the Agawam River. During the same year he organized the Massachusetts Screw Company, D. H. Newton, president, J. C. Newton, treasurer and principal owner. The greater part of the following year he spent in California for the benefit of his health. During the latter part of the year he erected buildings for the Chapman Cutlery Company, the Seymour Cutlery Company, J. C. Smith's machine-shops, and Joseph Peal and Connor Brothers' woolen-mills.

Edward C. Taft

A. C. Parsons

In 1876 he built the Newton Paper Company's Mill No. 2, the Connecticut River Pulp-Works (running the latter with his brother, Daniel H.). He also built seven cottages on Newton Street.

In 1877 he built the Albion Paper Company's Mill No. 1, and a saw-mill for himself on Dwight Street. In 1878 he erected twenty Quaker houses and two tenements on Bond Street, nine houses on Newton Street, and a block for the Albion Paper Company.

In 1879 he built the Wauregan paper-mill on Dwight Street, and an addition to the Newton Paper Company's mill for four engines and three paper-machines. He also repaired the dam at Huntington for the Massasoit Paper Company, which was washed away by the flood, Dec. 10, 1878. While the above is not an entire list of buildings erected by J. H. Newton, the principal ones have been enumerated, and comprise probably a larger number than has ever been erected by any single person in Western Massachusetts, and shows what perseverance and energy can accomplish.

Mr. Newton has been largely interested in inducing capitalists and manufacturers to establish themselves in and around Holyoke.

Mr. Newton's family now consists of his wife and four daughters, aged respectively three, five, eight, and ten years.

JOSEPH CLARK PARSONS.

In the year 1636 there was executed by a number of Indian chiefs a deed to the land on which Springfield, Mass., now stands, and as a witness to this instrument we find the name of Joseph Parsons, Esq., and from this gentleman Mr. Joseph Clark Parsons traces his descent, the line being Joseph (known as the "Cornet"), Joseph, Jr., Noah, Noah, Jr. (who was collector of taxes in 1777 for the "State of Massachusetts Bay"), Mr. J. C. Parsons now having in his possession his original warrant signed by Henry Gardner, Esq., treasurer and receiver-general, authorizing him to collect taxes to the amount of £579 7s. 0½d. Next we find, after Noah, Jr., Justice, the father of Mr. Joseph C. Mr. Parsons was born at Northampton, Mass., Feb. 6, 1814. His mother was Lydia Clark. He was educated at the Northampton Academy, and at the age of fourteen began to learn the drug business. In 1834 he entered into business relations with Mr. Henry Stearns, in drugs, medicines, and groceries. They continued in this business until 1839, when Mr. Parsons sold his interest and purchased a farm in the town of Agawam, Mass., where he has made his home more or less since. In the year 1840 he took charge of Ames Brothers' mill at Northampton, the original paper-makers in the Connecticut Valley. In 1843 he took charge of their mill and business at South Hadley Falls, Mass., but, this mill being destroyed by fire in the same year, he purchased a paper-mill at Suffield, Conn., and formed the "Eagle Mills Company," with a capital of $30,000, changing the mill from a hand- to a machine-mill. In 1853 he disposed of his interest, and removed to Holyoke, Mass., where, in connection with Colonel Aaron Bagg, of West Springfield, and others, he organized the Parsons Paper Company. With this corporation he is now connected as treasurer and agent, and has managed its business since its organization. During its existence it has divided more than $1,000,000 in profits, besides increasing the original investment of $60,000 many fold from its earnings.

In 1872, Mr. Parsons became president of the Third National Bank of Springfield, Mass., of which he had previously been one of the incorporators. The surplus of the bank under Mr. Parsons' management has steadily increased, and is now more than three hundred thousand dollars, while it has paid regular dividends of from ten to twelve per cent. per annum. In connection with the bank and Col. Bagg he has built the finest business block in the city of Springfield.

He has been interested as a stockholder and director in the Holyoke Manilla Company, The Holyoke Warp Company, Farr Alpaca Company, of Holyoke; is interested in the Valley Paper Company, of Holyoke, and is president of the Holyoke and Westfield Railroad, besides having been an incorporator in both of the Holyoke savings-banks, and a director in the Hadley Falls National Bank, of Holyoke. He has also been interested in many other enterprises of the Connecticut Valley in Massachusetts. To him, as the business manager of the Parsons Paper Company, the city of Holyoke is indebted for a fine public hall, and (he has rebuilt and refurbished it at great expense the past season) for the Holyoke House, one of the finest hotels in Western Massachusetts. In 1878 his name (without his consent) was presented to the Republican convention as a candidate for Congress from the Tenth Massachusetts District, and later he was unanimously nominated by the Independent convention, which nomination was promptly declined. Mr. Parsons was married Sept. 29, 1836, to Lucretia, daughter of Col. George Colton, of Springfield, Mass. They have had five children, one son (deceased in infancy) and four daughters,—Elizabeth Hoyt, who was the wife of C. P. Prescott, Esq., postmaster of Holyoke, died Sept. 19, 1876; Fanny Colton, an invalid at home; Sarah Leonard, wife of Emery Meekins, Esq., of Springfield, Mass., and Catherine Turner, wife of E. C. Taft, of Holyoke.

As to the marriages of Mr. Parsons' ancestors it may be observed that,—1. Joseph Parsons married Mary Bliss, of Springfield; 2. Joseph Parsons married Elizabeth Strong, of Northampton, a relative of Gov. Strong; 3. Noah Parsons married Mindwell Edwards, sister of Rev. Jonathan Edwards; 4. Noah Parsons married Phebe Bartlett, of Northampton; 5. Justice Parsons married Lydia Clark, of Peru.

EDWARD CALVIN TAFT

was born in Uxbridge, Mass., Jan. 29, 1846. His father, Calvin Taft, who now resides in the city of Worcester, Mass., was formerly a successful cotton-broker in the Southern States. Mr. Taft is a descendant of Robert Taft, who came to America from England about 1646. He was educated at Phillips Academy, Andover, and, upon leaving school, connected himself with the Franklin Paper Company of Holyoke, of which his father was president.

In 1869 his father purchased the Hampden Paper Company's mill, of which Mr. E. C. Taft took charge, and in the same year the latter organized the Albion Paper Company with a capital of $60,000, and filled the position of business agent. In 1877 they built their present mill, covering over 120,000 square feet, three stories in height, with a capacity of 3½ tons of book and engine-sized flat paper per day, which amount will be largely increased upon the completion of their new mill, now in process of erection.

In the year 1870, Mr. Taft married Miss Kate T., daughter of J. C. Parsons, Esq., and has one daughter, Lucretia P., born in 1875.

DR. JAMES I. O'CONNOR

was born on the 19th day of September, 1842, in Pittsfield, Mass., where the new Catholic Church now stands. He is descended from Roderick, the last king of Ireland, through a long line of ancestors. His father, Eugene O'Connor, and his mother, Honora Kinney, were both born in the county of Kings, Ireland. The doctor is the oldest of ten children,—seven sons and three daughters. When James was three years old his father moved to Springfield, and since then the son has resided in that city, where he received a liberal education in the public schools. Afterward he acquired a thorough knowledge of the drug business, while in the employment of Lombard & Crandall, a well-known firm on Main Street. During his five years' stay with this house he rose to the position of first prescription clerk, and held the same up to the evening on which he left Springfield to prepare for the practice of medicine. At the age of nineteen he entered Harvard Medical College, with the advantages of a good education and a thorough knowledge of the apothecary business. Here he pursued the regular course of study, and was graduated on the 11th of February, 1865.

At a special examination held to supply ten surgeons for the United States army, in answer to a call from the surgeon-general (the call being considered a great honor by that institution), he received his diploma and commission in the regular army, but, being attacked with pneumonia, he resigned his position.

Dr. O'Connor, immediately after his recovery, began the practice of medicine in Holyoke, Mass., and soon acquired a large and remunerative practice. He has the reputation of a skillful and successful physician and surgeon.

In the years 1872 and 1873 he erected a fine brick block of six dwelling-houses, at a cost of $45,000, on Dwight Street, opposite the city park. He has taken an active part in everything relating to the interests of Holyoke, as well as the church (the Roman Catholic) with which he is connected, and is esteemed by all as an upright and energetic citizen. On the 3d of January, 1867, he married Miss Mary Ann Elizabeth, daughter of Commodore Beahn, of Springfield, and has had five children,—Mary, Margaret, Edward, Agnes, and James, only two of whom (Agnes and James) are living.

JOHN DELANEY

was born in the village of Cullahill, Queens Co., Ireland, in the year 1815. He was the son of James Delaney and Julia Camphion. His father was a farmer, and died when John was but sixteen months old. Left fatherless, he was early compelled to earn his own living. He learned the trade of a stonemason, which he has since followed. In December, 1835, the great fire occurred in New York, and, rightly judging this to be a good time for him to strike out for America, on the 1st of April, 1836, he left his native town and embarked at Liverpool, April 8th, in the packet-ship "Star," Capt. Glover, and landed in New York May 9th. His first work in New York was on the extension of the Vassar Brewery at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., where he remained about a year, when he went to Hudson, N. Y., and remained a year, and in the fall of 1837 returned to New York City, where he was employed on the Croton Water-works for two years. In April, 1840, he went to Becket, Mass., where he worked on the railroad bridges at that place, and remained a year. In 1841 a portion of the Croton dam was washed away, and he was engaged as superintendent of the work, and remained in charge until the dam was restored, in 1842. He then returned to Massachusetts, and was employed on Fort Warren in Boston Harbor for two years. Subsequently he returned to Brooklyn, and was employed on the Atlantic dock for two years, whence he went to Brunswick, Me., and was employed on the erection of a chapel for Bowdoin College. In the fall of 1846 he again returned to Massachusetts.

He was married to Miss Bridget Lahey, of Thomastown, County Kilkenny, Ireland, in the Franklin Street Cathedral, Boston, on Nov. 20, 1846. Soon after he then went to Lowell, and took charge of very important work for the Lock and Canal Company under Engineer J. B. Francis until the spring of 1849, when he moved to Holyoke, where he has since resided. His family consists of six children,—two sons and four daughters,—four of whom are living. His oldest son, James E., was born in Lowell, Nov. 7, 1847, the other five in Holyoke: John L., Nov. 15, 1849; Julia A., Nov. 23, 1851; Mary Elizabeth, June 4, 1854; Elizabeth A., Nov. 18, 1855; and Mary L., March 23, 1859. Mary E. died Dec. 16, 1854, and Julia A. Dec. 19, 1854. In Holyoke, under Engineers John Chase and his nephews, S. Stewart and William A. Chase, Mr. Delaney has done all the important stonework on the head gates, wheel-pits, raceways, and the many extensive canal walls, as well as on the bridge between Holyoke and South Hadley, on the several bridges that span the canals, and on the foundations of the several mills, city-hall, churches, and business blocks in the city. In Springfield he did all the stonework at the water-shops on the dam, put in the foundations for the gun-level machines, built the stone dam at Smith & Wesson's Works, Mill River, built the masonry for the Connecticut River Railroad Company for the entrances to the Hampden Park, and the extensive river wall along their premises; for the Otis Company at Ware he performed very important work, consisting of their dam, bridges, and mill foundations. He also built the dam of the Nonotuck Silk Company at Florence, and in 1874 was awarded the contract to rebuild the bridges, dams, retaining walls, and foundations washed away by the great Mill River flood at Williamsburg and Maydenville. He has always done his work in a thorough and substantial manner. In 1876, business being a little dull, he took the opportunity to visit the land of his birth, and, in company with his daughter Mary L., sailed from New York on the steamer "Abyssinia," on July 5th, and landed in Queenstown July 14th. After a very pleasant visit with friends in Ireland, they made a tour of England and France, and returned home.

WESTFIELD.

GEOGRAPHICAL.

WESTFIELD, lying on the Westfield or Agawam River, is about eight miles distant from Springfield, and is one of the important manufacturing towns of Hampden. It is bounded on the north by the town of Southampton, in Hampshire County, on the south by Southwick, on the east by Agawam, Holyoke, and West Springfield, and on the west by Russell and Montgomery. It is traversed east and west by the Boston and Albany Railroad, and north and south by the New Haven and Northampton Railroad.

NATURAL FEATURES.

The surface is generally flat or undulating, except on the east and west, where hilly ranges border the town. The central portion of Westfield is an expansive valley, surrounded, save at the northwestern extremity, by abrupt terraces, ranging in height from 20 to 70 feet. According to geological authorities, this valley was once a lake about seven miles in length, three in width, and forty feet in depth in its deepest part.

The Westfield or Agawam River enters the town in the northwest, at the foot of Mount Tekoa, and, flowing eastward, empties into the Connecticut, receiving en route, near the village of Westfield, the waters of Little River.

Among various water-courses are Pond, Moose Meadow, Powder Mill, and Great Brooks.

A spur of the Green Mountains fringes the western border, and in the northwest rises Mount Tekoa, from whose summit, it is said, the eye may describe a circle of vision seventy-five miles in diameter. Among other conspicuous elevations are Pochassie Mountain on the west, and Ball and Grindstone Mountains on the northwest. Limestone is found in the western part of the town.

John Delaney

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

Touching the date of the earliest settlement of the tract now occupied by Westfield, authorities differ, but it seems to be agreed that it took place some time between 1658 and 1662. It is, however, known that grants of land in the section were made in 1658 to Thomas Cooper, in 1660 to Deacon Chapman, and in 1661 to Capt. Pynchon, Robert Ashley, and George Colton. In 1666, George Phelps, Isaac Phelps, Capt. Cook, W. Cornish, Thomas Dewey, J. Noble, David Ashley, John Holyoke, John Ponder, and John Ingersoll received grants, and settled here in that year. It is recorded that the first child born here was Benjamin Saxton, in 1666. He lived to be eighty-eight years old, and left a numerous family, who have handed the name down to the present generation of dwellers in Westfield.

As to an argument in favor of the theory that there were settlements here previous to 1658, it may be noted that in the colonial records under date of 1641 it was declared by the General Court that the people of Connecticut had encroached upon the domain of the Massachusetts Bay by permitting persons of theirs to establish a trading-house at Woronock (the original Indian name of Westfield). Again upon the records of Massachusetts in 1647 it was provided "that Woronoco shall be a part of the town of Springfield, and liable to all charges there as other parts of the same town," etc. It was also ordered "that the trading-houses established at Woronoco and all trading-houses to be erected should be contributory to all public and common charges, 'both in towne and county.'" The Records of Massachusetts, vol. iii. pages 131 and 164, show that about 1648 there arose a controversy between Massachusetts and Connecticut as to the right of jurisdiction over Woronoco. In 1649 it was determined that the dividing line between the two colonies should be run so as to settle the question of title to Woronoco. Connecticut failed, however, to send a representative, as she had agreed, to be present at the running of the line, and thus "Woronoco was ordered to Massachusetts." Massachusetts offered to give Connecticut further opportunity to prove her claim, but she did not choose to avail herself of it, having probably ascertained that her title was defective. At all events, the controversy was never after revived.

At the May court in 1662 certain inhabitants of Windsor and Dorchester presented a petition in which, after setting forth that they were much in want of land, they asked for a tract six miles square at Woronoco to be joined with the farms of "the late much-honored Maj.-Gen. Atherton and Capt. Roger Clapp, of Dorchester," to whom grants had previously been made by the court. Fifteen persons signed the petition, which was granted, and at the same time it was decreed by the deputies that the farms alluded to should belong to the plantation in respect to public charges, and that "the order for Woronoco henceforth to lie to Springfield should be void," provided the petitioners should settle themselves and a minister within three years. The deputies appointed Capt. Pynchon, Capt. Edward Johnson, David Wilton, Samuel Smith, and Nathaniel Dickinson, Sr., to set out the plantation, and order its affairs until twelve inhabitants (six of whom at least should be freemen) should be settled. Of the petitioners above referred to, mention is made in the records that George Phelps received in 1666 a confirmation of his title, and as they were not issued save upon a showing that the grantee had resided upon his grant for the space of five years, it is clear that Mr. Phelps must have settled at Woronoco in 1662.

Woronoco was considered one of the best localities for obtaining beaver, and in the skins of these animals the Indians used to drive a brisk trade with the settlers. For this reason the Indians abounded plentifully near Woronoco, and this view appears to be confirmed by the fact that the early settlers of the place exercised unusual precautions for mutual protection from savage incursions. Mr. Pynchon, of Springfield, was an extensive trader in beaver-skins, and under a license from the General Court he controlled the entire trade in those commodities at Woronoco.

The pioneers did considerable in the way of gathering turpentine, and instances are frequent in the records of grants made to various persons "to set boxes for turpentine and to collect turpentine."

In the land records of the proprietors of Westfield mention is made of a transfer to Samuel Taylor, "blacksmith," of a parcel of land under date of April 9, 1697. From this it would seem that Taylor was the first blacksmith the town had, but where his land or shop was located the records fail to indicate.

The early Indian name of Westfield was known as Woronoco, Warronoco, and Warorake, the latter being the name designated by the General Court in referring to matters touching that portion of the town of Springfield. When the question of incorporation was first mooted it was proposed to give the town the name of Streamfield, from the fact that it was located between two streams, but the name of Westfield was finally selected as a mark of greater distinction, the town being nearly west from Boston, and at that time the extreme westerly settlement of New England. The tract was under the control of Springfield, as has already been noted, according to the understanding of the General Court of Massachusetts.

In the early records of Springfield, under date of Feb. 7, 1664, it appears that Capt. Pynchon, Maj. Holyoke, and Messrs. Ely, Colton, and Cooley were chosen a standing committee with sole power "to order matters concerning Warronoco, both for the admittance of inhabitants and to grant lands, etc." July 6, 1666, this committee made grants of land in Woronoco to the following persons: Capt. Aaron Cook, 50 acres; Thomas Day, 30 acres; James Cornish, 40 acres; John Ingersoll, 20 acres; Josiah Leeds, 30 acres; Moses Cook, 30 acres; John Osbourn, 25 acres; Maj. John Holyoke, 40 acres; David Ashley, 30 acres; Thomas Noble, 30 acres; Sergt. Stebbins, 35 acres; Samuel Marshfield, 30 acres; John Ponder, 35 acres; John Root, 35 acres; Benjamin Cooley, 14 acres; Hugh Dudley, 20 acres; William Brookes, 30 acres; Thomas Orton, 35 acres. A further grant of 30 acres was made to Samuel Marshfield, conditioned upon his releasing an Indian chief then in his custody. Subsequent grants about that time were made as follows: Ambrose Fowler, 10 acres; Walter Lee, 20 acres; George Phelps, 50 acres; Joseph Whiting (or Whitney), 54 acres; George Tyler, 11½ acres; Israel Dewey, 8 acres; Isaac Phelps, 30 acres; John Sackett, 5 acres; Thomas Bancroft, 30 acres; Jedediah Dewey, 15 acres. Other grants were made about that time, but the imperfectly-copied records do not make it clear to whom they were made.

The above grantees were required to dwell in their own persons on these lands by the last of May, 1667, and to continue thereon for the space of five years. They were further to use their endeavors for settling an able minister among them. Shortly thereafter it was ordered that each grantee should have an additional grant of a home-lot not to exceed six acres.

In January, 1668, the Springfield committee announced that, as many of the grantees had forfeited their grants by failing to settle, the committee, to give further opportunity to such as were serious in their intentions to settle, ordered that grants should be confirmed to all who should do their share in the erection of a fence about the general field, said fence to be completed by May 20, 1668, and all persons failing to comply with these conditions were to utterly forfeit their grants. As can best be gathered from the records, only about one-half of the original grantees fulfilled the conditions.

When this general fence was completed, and provided with "a suitable gate," it was ordered that any person leaving the gate open should be fined five shillings.

In accordance with the order above, concerning the settlement of a minister, Capt. Cook was instructed, July 24, 1668, "to go into the Bay to procure a minister for this place, such a one as he shall be advised by the Elders in or about the Bay, if the committee at Springfield do approve of our acts herein."

The copy of an old document, dated 1670, indicates that James Cornish and Joseph Whiting were selectmen of the town in that year, although the records do not note the election of selectmen earlier than 1672.

In March, 1669, Sackett's Creek was granted to Joseph Whitney and David Ashley, to set a mill thereon and grind corn.

The earliest purchases from the Indians of lands now included within the limits of Westfield were made by Capt. John Pyncheon on behalf of the early settlers. An old aboriginal document is the deed signed by Alquat, called "the Indian sachem of Waranoake and Pochasuck," and witnessed by Wallump and Wallamunt (two Indian chiefs), transferring to Capt. John Pyncheon, on behalf of certain inhabitants of "Waranoake, alias Westfield," a large tract of land lying between Great and Little Rivers. The date of the document is June 30, 1669. The price paid for the purchase was £40, and the boundaries of the tract, as defined by the deed, were, in the language of the deed, as follows:

"A certain Parcel or tract of Land, Meddo & wood-Land, lying & being at waranoake aforesaid, on ye side of waranoake river, ye greate River, and on ye north or northerly side of ye Little River, or Foart River, adjoining on ye south-east, East, and Northeast, on Land formerly Purched by Saml Marshfield, of Springfield, for the Inhabitants of Westfield aforesaid, and on ye south and southwest, on ye Little River aforesaid, commonly called the fort River. On ye North or Northerly it is bounded by ye greate River called waranoak River, and so running up waranoak river to ye falls, near about a mile above ye present Honsen to a marked tree there, and from that marked tree it runs off westerly or southwesterly upon a straight line to the Little River or fort River to a stone at ye Nooke or Poynt where all ye good land ends, and where going up ye hill the pine plaine begins, the sd common or Pine Plain being ye westerly or Nor-westerly bounds of this tract of Land, ye line of Division being run by several English going along with ye Indian from ye fawls in the greate River over to that stone aforesaid, which is on the top of the hill by the Little River, where the Pine plaine begins."

March 12, 1667 (the inhabitants living at "the cellars" requesting it), George Phelps and John Williams were appointed to lay out a "highway across the west meadow, under the hill, to the pyne playnes."

The spot chosen for the first permanent settlement was near the Little River, and near its junction with the Great or Agawam River, and about where the iron bridge now crosses the smaller stream, a mile east of Westfield village. This settlement was inclosed by a strong palisade about two miles in circumference, built for protection against the savages, and within this, besides the dwellings of the settlers, was a strong log fort, beneath which was a wide cellar, provided as a place of refuge for women and children in case serious danger from the Indians should threaten the settlement. The settlement began to thrive and expand, until several settlers, unable to get lands within the palisades, were forced to locate without its limits. This was because the land within had all been taken up in the original allotments of village lots, by which each householder received lots "according to the number of his family."

Fearing, therefore, that the security of the settlement might be endangered in being thus extended, it was determined, in 1677, to consolidate the people into a more compact community, and to that end the proprietors of town lots in Westfield, near "their meeting-house," agreed by a general vote to "break their lots" and allow other persons living in the remote sections to settle upon them, the persons so yielding up their portions to new occupants receiving in exchange for every acre thus relinquished two acres of town lots in some distant portion of the town.

In March, 1668, a division of the territory was made into three parts, and lots were cast for it. In the first division the lands fell to Thomas Gun, David Ashley, John Ponder, Sergt. Stebbins, Joseph Whiting, William Brookes (alias Israel Dewey), Thomas Bancroft, Hugh Dudley, Isaac Phelps, Geo. Phelps, Thomas Rootes, Thomas Noble. Grants were also made in 1668 and 1669 to John Sackett, John Ingersoll, Geo. Fyler, Capt. Cooke, Josiah Dewey, John Osborne, Mr. Fiske, and Thomas Handebett. At the time of the incorporation of the town grants had been made to thirty-four persons.

The Rev. Edward Taylor, the first pastor of the church, was also a physician, and for years after his settlement he was the only doctor for miles around. Mention is made of a George Filer, who, removing in 1667 from Northampton to Westfield, practiced medicine in the latter town a few years, after which he passed over to Connecticut.

From records kept by Rev. Edward Taylor concerning King Philip's war, it is learned that "the inhabitants were sorely distressed, yet sovereignly preserved. Our soil," he continued, "was moistened by the blood of three Springfield men,—young Goodman Dumbleton, who came to our mill, and two sons of Goodman Brooks, who came here to look for iron ore, but they fell in the way by the first assault of the enemy. Mr. Moses Cook, an inhabitant, and a soldier not an inhabitant were killed, and the houses of Mr. Cornish, John Sacket, and Ambrose Fowler were burned." Shortly afterward nine Westfield men were at Deerfield, when that place was attacked, and three of them were killed. A place called Indian Plain marks the scene of the encounter of Noah Ashley with an Indian, the latter being routed, but not killed. A daughter of the second wife of Mr. Sackett was captured by the Indians, and carried into captivity in northwest New York, where she married an Indian and remained until her death.

The central government at Boston, fearing disastrous results to the frontier settlements from Philip's war, transmitted to them a letter of advice, which ordered the colonies, in effect, to desert their settlements and unite themselves with the inhabitants of Springfield for more thorough protection. The letter, dated March 20, 1676, concluded thus:

"If you people be averse from our advice, we must be necessitated to draw off our forces from them, for we cannot spare them, nor supply them with ammunition."

Westfield considered this order in town-meeting, and the protest of the inhabitants against it was conveyed to the government through a letter, prepared by Rev. Edward Taylor, and signed on behalf of the town by Isaac Phelps, David Ashley, and Josiah Dewey. In this letter, the inhabitants took the ground that Springfield offered no better protection than Westfield, and by reason, moreover, of much sickness in the town (by which a removal of the settlement was impracticable), they strongly objected to the change.

The reasons set forth in the earlier letter of the two transmitted by Westfield to the government upon the matter, were as follows:

"1st. Its Situation.—Lying on both sides of the great river Connecticut, whose east side is void of habitations, being but very few left, and those a great distance asunder,—those on the west side being scattered about a mile up and down, some of which are hid with brambles; and as for its tillage-ground, most is a great distance from the town, and not clear from brush in some places of it and to it, inasmuch as an indifferent person cannot but judge (as we suppose) that the danger is double, in managing field-employments, to what ours is.

"2d. Its Preparation.—It is a place (with grief of heart be it spoken), most of the east side in ashes, unbuilt and unfortified, unless some few houses.

"3d. Its Providential Dispensation.—It hath been sorely under the blasting hand of God, so that it hath, but in a lower degree than ordinary, answered the labor of the husbandman, and sometime his labor upon it is wholly cast away.

"Now, these thoughts are very discouraging unto all thought of our removal thither,—for to remove from habitations to none, from fortifications to none, from a compact and plain place to a scattered, from a place of less danger in the field to more, from a place under the ordinary blessing upon our labors to one usually blasted, seems to us such a strange thing that we find not a man among us inclined thereto."

Three days afterward a second letter was dispatched, and, after repeating the protest contained in the first letter, thus continued:

"If we must be gone from hence, many of us have estates and friends calling of us elsewhere, and thereupon most of us incline, in case we remove, to come downwards. But yet the hand of God hath shut us up, so that we apprehend that we are under the call of God to abide here at present, by reason of the sore hand of God upon us, disabling Capt. Cook's family and others from a remove, who are low, and captain's wife at the point of death under the bloody flux. Wherefore the ground of these lines is, in part, to intimate unto you that if there should be any convoy allowed at the present by your honored selves to any one for the bringing off their estate, the opportunity being so desirable to us all, if our town were not under the circumstances by the hand of God upon the persons of some amongst us, whereby it would be their death to remove (yet we see that it being such a desirable opportunity), that we fear we should lay our hands upon . . . leaving our sick to look to themselves, and liable to the rage of merciless enemies.

"This we thought good to leave with you that you might not, against their wills, expose us to such a temptation as such an opportunity might be. This, and not any respect of resuming the estate of any one with us, is the ground of this intimation; but the ground also of our lines is to desire this favor, that you would refresh us in this sad state that we are in by letting us understand whether we may have any hopes of such a favor as may be a safety for us, in case the Lord should put us in a personal state to remove by removing his afflicting hand, and whether or no you would advise us to adventure to cast any seed into the land, if God doth detain us at the present where we are. You know (we judge) how our fields lie. We request not anything at your hands to lay you under any temptation, and therefore we have ingeniously intimated what the thoughts of the Bay gentlemen are concerning us. But our danger is such as we cannot settle upon anything, and if we are like to have no relief from yourselves, it being known, may be an occasion to force us into the fields. The Lord shine forth, and show us our duty, and bring us to a willing kissing of the rod. We shall not add, only desiring the Almighty to be our shield."

The town records show that there was much strong feeling in opposition to the order, and, Northampton manifesting similar strong objection, the order was shortly after rescinded, and the towns left to take care of themselves as best they could.

Although Westfield suffered considerably during the war from incursions made by small parties of marauding Indians from time to time, the town escaped the serious trouble at first apprehended. Buildings were burned, a few persons were shot, and others carried away into captivity, but the loss of life and property was comparatively small.

The pursuits of daily life were, as may well be imagined, pushed forward in those days amid dire apprehensions, and only to a limited degree. No man ventured forth to daily labor without being fully prepared to defend himself from savage attacks, which he knew might be made at any moment. At night, sentries and patrols were constantly on guard to protect the sleeping inhabitants.

At the close of the war the town entered at once upon a new era of prosperity, the population began to increase rapidly, and the busy hum of industry cheered and encouraged the patient hearts to look forward to a bright and peaceful future.

In 1731 the town was divided into outer and inner commons, the former being respectively at the north and south sides of the town, and the latter in the centre between them. Grants of lands in the outer common were made to 107 householders, in tracts ranging from 12 to 515 acres. Among the grantees the Ashleys, Shepards, Mandsleys, Bancrofts, Fowlers, Taylors, Ingersolls, Kelloggs, Sackets, Nobles, Roots, Deweys, and Phelps were the largest possessors. In 1733 the inner commons were divided among 106 grantees. As a matter of historical interest, the names of the grantees other than those above noted are here given: Loomas, Ponder, Church, King, Gunn, Bush, Root, Lee, Warner, Saxton, Weller, Williams, Bull, Handebet, Martindale, Pixley, Bagg, Sexton, Ingersoll, Kinsley, Cadwill, Old, Stiels, Rains, Stiles, Granger, Eggleston, Coots, Nash, and Cark.

In 1805 the inhabitants of the town began to concentrate the chief settlement at the centre, or where the village of Westfield is now located. The erection of the first church at the centre in that year was a pronounced step in favor of concentration there. The earliest settlement, as has been observed, was at Little River in 1666, and it was not until many years after that the inhabitants began to make settlements of any consequence in any quarter far removed therefrom.

The first lawyers of Westfield of whom mention is made were John Ashley, who graduated at Yale in 1730; Josiah Dwight, who practiced here in 1750; Samuel Fowler, in 1768; and John Phelps.

DESCENDANTS OF THE PIONEERS.

Among the descendants of Westfield's early settlers now living in the town, may be mentioned the Ashleys, Atwaters, Averys, Bancrofts, Bush, Cadwells, Campbells, Clapps, Clarks, Cooks, Curtis, Deweys, Fowlers, Hanchetts, Hastings, Holcombs, Hulls, Kelloggs, Egglestons, Kings, Kneils, Lees, Loomis, Moseleys, Nobles, Pease, Phelps, Roots, Sacketts, Sextons, Shepards, Smiths, Taylors, Upsons, Wellers, Whitneys, and Wrights.

EARLY ROADS.

We are told by the proprietors' land records that in 1668 John Williams and George Phelps were given permission to lay out a way two rods wide, "from the way that runs thro' the Meadow on the East side of the river, between the lands of Edward Hart and George Sexton, and so running to Pine Hill." A highway was also ordered to be laid out to Fort Meadow by Mr. Dudley's, and so running down the hill to the bridge, and thence to the west corner of Mr. Taylor's plowing land, and then to the meadow. Another road extended from the meeting-house west to Filer's hemlock, four rods wide, and then to Deacon Hanchett's, seven rods wide, and then to the northwest corner of Samuel Root's lot, and then west to Pochassie farm. From this road a road was laid out, running north to the river by the westerly end of Noble's lot, sixteen rods wide, and so over the river, and thence by a bunch of trees at King's ditch, running up by the river to the hill, and so into the common.

There was one from Deacon Hanchett's home-lot, running southerly by a spruce swamp, and thence westerly by Nathaniel Weller's lot to the Pine Hills. Another one ran from the meeting-house south to the plain gate, and from the gate to Deacon Taylor's land, and so to the right across Deacon Taylor's land to the river, and then over the river into the "hundred acres," running up the hill across the "hundred acres" into the commons. In 1670, Springfield received permission to build a highway from the Woronico River westerly to Westfield. An early road was made from the two-mile brook, near the lower field, to Country Hill, and into the commons toward Springfield. There was also one across the Western Meadow under the hill to the pine plains.

REVOLUTIONARY REMINISCENCES.

Preliminary to their subsequent action during the stirring days of the Revolution, the citizens of Westfield, in September, 1774, chose Eldad Taylor, John Moseley, and Elisha Parks to represent the town at Northampton in a county congress, to be held September 22d of that year, for the purpose of consultation and deliberation over "ye present distressing times." In January, 1775, John Moseley and Elisha Parks were chosen as representatives to the Provincial Congress at Cambridge, and when there "not to take up Government without further order from the town." In February, 1775, it was voted to encourage the company of Minute-Men who had offered their services; and upon a search for guns "for ye use of ye Minute-Men on a sudden emergence," the committee reported that they had found "between 30 and 40 guns and a few Bagganets."

The committee of correspondence appointed to carry out the resolves of the Provincial Congress consisted of Dr. Mather, Col. Moseley, Capt. Wm. Shepard, Eldad Taylor, Col. Parks, Daniel Moseley, Daniel Fowler, David Moseley, Joseph Root, William Sacket, Samuel Fowler, John Shepard, Jr., and John Phelps. It was voted that "the Minute-Men shall have one shilling per half-day exercising, they spending four hours in the service once a week." April 10, 1775, it was voted to raise £25 to purchase powder and "warlike stores." In February, 1775, it was voted "the town will not raise any money to encourage the Inlisting of Soldiers into the Continental Service." In March, 1778, a committee was chosen to remonstrate to the General Court, etc., "of the Nakedness of the army, of the Necessity of its being supplied with Clothing and other Necessaries immediately." In April of the same year a committee was appointed to provide 53 shirts and 53 pairs of shoes and stockings for the use of the Continental army at the cost of the town. In May of the same year it was voted that each soldier raised to reinforce the Continental army for nine months be paid the sum of £30.

June 29, 1779, it was resolved to raise the sum of £1200 "for the encouragement of ten soldiers to be raised to join the Continental army forthwith for the space of nine months." It was also voted "to give the soldiers who enlist in the service for the term of nine months twenty shillings per month to each soldier, to be paid in silver or grain." At the same time it was resolved "to raise one hundred and twenty pounds to be paid to four soldiers to be raised and sent to Providence." July 20, 1779, it was resolved to raise nine months' men forthwith, and to pay each man 40s. per month. Oct. 20, 1779, it was agreed "to raise the sum of thirty pounds bounty for each soldier now to be raised for the Continental Service, and Destined to Claverack,* and also their Milage Money, at two shillings per mile."

June 16, 1780, it was Voted "to give the nineteen soldiers to be raised by this town for the Continental army for the term of Six Months three pounds per month in hard money, or Continental money equivalent, as wages, and one Thousand Dollars in Continental Bills as Bounty for each man, and the Bounty money to be paid before the marching of the men. Or Four Pounds per month in hard money or Paper Courancy equivalent, as the soldiers shall chose." Also, that "the Town meet on the Parade to-morrow at four o'clock in the afternoon, in order to enlist the soldiers aforesaid, and that the Captains of the several companies be directed to provide their several companies, when mustered, as much rum as they may think proper."

July 5, 1780, the town raised five additional six months' men, and a number of three months' men, to the latter of whom it was agreed to pay 10s. over and above their State pay, in hard money, and $500 in hand in Continental bills. In July, 1780, in response to a requisition from the General Court, the town agreed to purchase twelve horses for use in the Continental army, and directed the town treasurer to give the notes of the town in payment. In October, 1780, it was voted to increase the offer for six months' men by 20s. per month, hard money. At the same time it was voted to raise $44,000 to purchase beef ordered by the General Court for the army. A committee was also chosen to take into consideration the resolve of the General Court relative to raising more soldiers. Upon their report, it was resolved to raise eighteen men. At this time it was voted to raise £30,000 to defray the expenses of the past year.

July 2, 1781, it was voted to raise £130, hard money, to purchase beef ordered by the General Court for the army. In the same month the General Court ordered the town to raise fifteen three months' men, and, as an inducement, the town offered each soldier £4, hard money, per month.

Sept. 21, 1781, it was resolved

"To give encouragement to the militia called to be in readiness to serve under the command of Governor Trumble in the State of Connecticut;" and further, "to give to each soldier who shall march into Connecticut, belonging to this town, to be under the command of Governor Trumble, three pounds per month in hard money."

May 13, 1778, in response to a requisition for men to join the army, Noah Cobley and Paul Noble enlisted, and David Fowler, Roger Bagg, Enoch Holcomb, Joseph Dewey, Simeon Stiles, Jacob Noble, Benjamin Sexton, John Moxley, Martin Root, Stephen Fowler, Eli Granger, Roger Noble, and Daniel Fowler paid their fines. Upon the first alarm sounded at Lexington, Westfield sent out a company of 70 men, commanded by Capt. Warham Parks, whose lieutenants were John Shepard and Richard Falley. Every man in this company was a citizen of Westfield.

The treaty of peace between Great Britain and the United States, signed Sept. 3, 1783, was publicly celebrated in Westfield by joyful demonstrations. The day was ushered in by the discharge of cannon, and at noon there was a salute of 13 guns to mark the number of the States then banded together. The inhabitants then listened to an eloquent sermon preached by Rev. Noah Atwater, and in the afternoon there was a public banquet, in which visitors from many neighboring towns participated. The drinking of each toast was attended by the discharge of a cannon. A display of fireworks in the evening terminated the celebration in a glowing manner.

The HON. WILLIAM SHEPARD, one of the most distinguished men known in connection with the history of Westfield, was a son of Deacon John Shepard, who settled in the town in 1700. He was born in 1737, and at the age of seventeen enlisted in the military service of the government. At the age of twenty-one he was a lieutenant under Gen. Abercrombie, and at twenty-two served as captain in Gen. Amherst's command. He fought six years in the French war, and took part in the battles of Fort William Henry, Ticonderoga, Crown Point, Isle aux Noix, St. John's, and Montreal. Upon the close of the war he returned to Westfield, where he lived in peaceful retirement until 1775, when he was called to take part in the Revolutionary struggle. In that year, with the commission of lieutenant-colonel, he repaired to Roxbury, and served a long time near Washington's own person. He was a general under La Fayette in 1780, and thus continued until the war terminated. He fought in 22 battles, and retired on gallantly-won laurels as an eminent soldier and a man noted for many sterling qualities of character. Subsequently he was chosen major-general in the militia, a State Senator, a representative at the General Court, a representative to Congress, and was appointed by the Governor of Massachusetts to treat with the Penobscot Indians, as well as later, by the national government, to treat with the Six Nations.

General Shepard was also chosen Presidential elector at two elections, and received in numerous ways evidences of the high regard in which he was held by the people of Westfield. He was again called from retirement in 1786, upon the outbreak of Shays' rebellion, and in the detailed history of that campaign—presented elsewhere—the valuable services he rendered the commonwealth will be found fully set forth. He died in 1817, aged eighty.

Among other officers in the Revolutionary war from Westfield were Maj. Warham Parks (afterward Gen. Parks), Capt. John Gray, and Lieut. David Sackett. Among those of Westfield's citizens who lost their lives in the service were Abijah Dewey, James Ashley, Jared Noble, and a Mr. Rogers.

The town records covering the period of the war of 1812 are silent touching the action of the town as connected with the part it took in the events of that period, if any.

NOTEWORTHY INCIDENTS.

In March, 1676, the town, considering "the hand of God upon them in having let loose the Indians upon them," resolved that the inhabitants should be so ordered that while a portion went out to labor, the others should remain near home to guard the settlement. The following month it was agreed to build a fort near Mr. Whiting's house, of such size that all the inhabitants might come within its compass.

As an early indication of the organization of a military company, it may be observed that, in 1674, Samuel Loomis was appointed "ensine of the foote company of the towne."

In 1676, John Moseley was appointed a lieutenant in the same command.

In 1698 it was voted in town-meeting that any person failing to attend town-meeting should be fined one shilling for each neglect. In 1703 the selectmen were instructed to raise £3 with the county rate to pay the representative for the town. Aug. 11, 1703, the selectmen, with John Noble, were instructed to agree with "ye Ingenes" for the purchase of all lands lying within the town bounds not already purchased.

In 1703 it was ordered "that there shall be a highway turn down Capt. Phelps' corner, and so over ye River where it may be most Convenient, and soe out into ye Commons in ye place which is called Goodman Ponder's Hollow."

June 30, 1704, it was voted "y^e severall houses in ye towne y^e are forted shall stand and be Defended and have theire severall proportions of men posted to y^m by ye Comity appointed, as may be most convenient for their defense."

In March, 1719, it was voted "that Philip Tremain may set up a litle house in ye highway, near the sider-press, and near to John Gun's orchard, and one-quarter of an acre of land where it can best bee spared, and to improve it dureing ye Towne's pleasure." In 1721 it was voted to allow the town of Springfield "five shillings" toward the building of a court-house there. In those days land was not particularly scarce or high-priced, for one may read in the early town records numerous entries such as,— "voted John Smith — acres of land wherever he can find it." In 1724, Capt. John Ashley, of Westfield, for the consideration of £460, "three barrels of sider, and thirty quarts of rum," obtained for himself and Col. John Stoddard, Capt. Henry Dwight, and Capt. Luke Hitchcock, a deed of the tract of land in which are now comprised the towns of Great Barrington, Sheffield, Egremont, Alford, Mount Washington, and Boston Corner. Twenty-one Indian sachems signed the deed. In 1735, Mr. Ashley made from the Indians a further purchase of a tract of land two miles wide and twenty-six in length, extending from Westfield to what is now Sheffield. These purchases opened the settlement of Sheffield, whither many Westfield people removed, the first to go being Obadiah Noble.

In 1747 it was decided to fort the town, and a "Comitty," being chosen to take charge of the matter, reported it best "to make a fort Round Stephen Kellog's house, and Lieut. Consider Moseley's and Doct. Ashley's house, and one over the Little River, and one over the great River, and two watch boxes, and to be done by the town."

In 1756 the town was visited by an earthquake shock, which displaced several chimneys. In 1792 two similar shocks were felt, by which many buildings were shaken.

In 1777, in accordance with an act of the General Court, the selectmen of Westfield established a scale of prices of merchandise and of labor, from which it appears that wheat was to be sold at 6s. per bushel, oats at 2s., pork at 4d. per pound, beef 3d., men's shoes 9s. per pair, tobacco 6d. per pound, and English hay 4s. per hundred. For keeping a horse a night and a day 1s. 6d. were charged. Common labor cost 3s. per day, and farming labor 53s. for six months. Horse hiring was 3d. per mile. Flip was 1s. per mug, and "Cyder" 6d. per mug.

Touching the early opening of trade, tradition says that a trading-house was established by three young men in 1662 at the confluence of the Little and Great Rivers, and further that the young men, after tarrying a year, suddenly disappeared, carried off, probably, by the Indians.

The records say that in December, 1672, Joseph Whiting, Thomas Dewey, Josiah Dewey, and Jedediah Dewey finished the building of a saw-mill and corn-mill on Two-Mile Brook, and that they proposed to manage the concern in partnership. In 1680, Lieut. Moseley, Thomas and Sergeant Dewey were granted permission to set a grist-mill and saw-mill on Two-Mile Brook, at its mouth. After this, saw-mills began to multiply quite rapidly. Feb. 10, 1803, David Morley was authorized to build a toll-bridge across Agawam River, "near the late dwelling-house of Stephen Noble, deceased." June 17, 1800, the town of Westfield was empowered to build a toll-bridge "over Westfield Great River, near Parks' Mills." In 1801, Ezra Marvin, Elihu Stow, and others, of Westfield, obtained a charter as "The Eleventh Massachusetts Turnpike Corporation," for the purpose of building a road to run from Westfield through Russell, Blandford, and Chester.

One of the old landmarks of the town is the old Ingersoll house on the Springfield road, about two miles from Westfield village and one mile from the location of Westfield's earliest settlement. It is said to have been built by John Ingersoll in 1700,* and is owned by Chandler L. Ingersoll, of New York. The fact that it was built to serve the purposes of a fort accounts for its preservation to this day, for it still continues its service as a habitable residence. It was here that Thomas Ingersoll encountered and routed Greylock, a noted Indian warrior, who was at that juncture about to murder Mrs. Ingersoll.

Among those of Westfield's citizens who lost their lives in the French war of 1755-60, Maj. Noah Ashley, Capt. Jonathan Ingersoll, and Richard Campbell were killed in a fight near Lake George.†

During the prevalence of the small-pox in town in 1777, an order was passed that "if any person should go within half a mile of the pest-house and then come into town, he should be fined £20, and, in default of payment thereof, should be publicly whipped twenty stripes upon the naked back."

In 1782 the town directed its representatives to petition the General Court for a "Lottery" to build a bridge over the Great River, near Weller's Mills. The petition was granted, but not until June 18, 1783.

Incidental to the Shays rebellion of 1786, it is perhaps worthy of remark that Capt. Sackett, of Westfield, took an active part in the organization of troops on behalf of the insurgents.

About the year 1800, Westfield lost a considerable number of her inhabitants by their removal to the Black River country, in the State of New York. Lowville, in Lewis County,—the centre of the settlement alluded to,—contains to-day many descendants of the earliest settlers of Westfield.

Westfield celebrated the bi-centennial of its existence Oct. 6, 1869, on which occasion Hon. William G. Bates, now living‡ in Westfield, delivered an interesting historical address, in which he embodied many valuable references to the early history of the town. The celebration was an important and joyous event, and its participants included, besides the inhabitants of Westfield, citizens of Southwick, Russell, and Montgomery (which places were formerly portions of Westfield), and many of the former residents of Westfield, then living in near and far-distant States. The day's exercises included a procession, addresses, and singing at the First Church, and a banquet in the open air near the park, where upward of a thousand persons partook of a rich feast. The day previous to this celebration, Westfield was visited with a disastrous inundation, caused by the breaking of the river levee after a heavy rain. The damages occasioned to the town by this flood reached $60,000.

Westfield has been visited by no less than four destructive floods since the year 1819,—in the years, to wit, of 1819, 1839, 1869, and 1878,—the latter of which proved the most disastrous, although those which preceded it are still memorable events in the town annals. The flood of 1878, like the earlier ones, was caused by the breaking away of the dyke on Westfield River, above Westfield village, brought on by a sudden rise of the river on the night of Tuesday, December 10th, after a heavy fall of snow on the previous Monday, followed on Tuesday by a fall of rain that endured without cessation for more than twelve hours. At ten o'clock on Tuesday night the dyke gave way in several places, and the waters poured in an immense and rapid volume into the village, and, entering by the way of Ellis Street, flooded in a brief space of time to the depth of from three to ten feet the section of Westfield village from School Street to the river and from Elm to Charles Street. The flood marked its destructive course by washing out in some cases to the depth of six feet or more many of the thoroughfares, undermining buildings, deluging the lower floors of hundreds of dwellings, and utterly demolishing not only outhouses and small structures, but many residences and large factories. Provin's brick block was undermined, and the southern half of it from top to bottom demolished. Steer & Turner's large organ-factory, near the Great River bridge, was so badly shattered that a wind-storm, following on the 3d of January ensuing, leveled the structure to the ground. The Catholic Church was badly damaged, numberless frame dwellings and shops lifted bodily from their foundations and thrown down, sidewalks and fences destroyed on every hand, and ruin generally visited upon that part of the village where the waters held their mad revels.

The thoroughfares called upon to suffer most were Ellis, Franklin, Shepard, Charles, Jefferson, Madison, Hampden, Elm, Lincoln, Orange, Maple, Meadow, and Mechanic Streets. Elm Street was a roaring river from School Street to the bridge, through which latter Great River rolled its resistless tide to the depth of three feet over the bridge floor, but despite the onslaught upon it the ancient structure stood its ground. Elm Street was badly washed out, and in repairing the highway damages there and in other streets the town was subsequently engaged for a week or more. At Little River settlement, on the east, Morley's bridge and the county bridge, as well as a saw- and grist-mill, were swept away, while at various points in the town bridges were destroyed and roads rendered impassable by wash-outs. The first estimate of the actual loss caused by the flood placed the figures at $200,000, but subsequent careful computation fixed it at about $100,000. The effects of the overflow were largely felt in the neighboring river-country as well, but Westfield was conspicuously stricken with a calamity which, as "the great flood of 1878," will be keenly remembered for many years to come.

INCORPORATION.

Until the 28th of May, 1669, Woronoco was a part of Springfield, and the history of the latter town necessarily embodies reference to the settlement of Woronoco previous to that year. Upon the date in question, in response to a petition of the inhabitants of Woronoco in 1668, and further in response to the action of the inhabitants of Springfield in the premises, the General Court passed the act incorporating the town of Westfield.

From the Records of Massachusetts, vol. iv. page 405, it is learned that a petition was made to the General Court in 1668 by Aaron Cooke "in the name of the inhabitants of Woronooke," and "they judged it meet to make such an addition of land to the petitioners as may be to the contents of six miles square, so as they intrudeth not upon any former grants to towns or persons." The town of Springfield was authorized "to take the furtherance of the work for a township." Pursuant to this the inhabitants of Springfield, at town-meeting held Feb. 2, 1668, passed the following:

"SPRINGFIELD.—Att a Towne Meeting febr. 2d, 1668. Upon ye Motion of ye Inhabitants at Woronoco This Town being willing to promote & further their desire of being a Township of Themselves (amongst other grants to them did, &c.), Doe leave the Inhabitants there to themselves to manage their own matters, or as the Honnord Genle Corte shall further Order: And we hope the Corte will see cause to Order them to be a Township, & that they through the favor of God may grow up into a comfortable society & bee a happy Neighbourhood to Us, & Our freinds & Theires.

This is a true Coppy of the Town Ord, vizt., soe much of it as is concerning the releasing of Woronoco from Springfield.

"Taken out of ye Town Records

"By mee,

"ELIZUR HOLYOKE,

"Recorder."

The following is a copy of the act of incorporation:

"There being a motion made to this Court in ye behalfe of ye Inhabitants at Woronooke belonging to Springfield, That they may be a Township of yourselves: Springfield being willing thereto, as appears by Coppy of an order of that Towne, under their Recorders hand heretoe annexed. Leaving Woronooke to ymselves, & referring ym to this Court. This Court (therefore) Doth hereby Grant them to be a Township, & allows them all Priveledges according as other Townes have in this Colony, And that ye sd Towne be called Westfield.

"The magists have past this, their bretheren, the Deputys, hereto consenting 28 May, 1669.

"Consented to by the Deputyes,

"EDWARD RAWSON, Secty.

"WILLIAM TORREY, Cleric."

The committee appointed by the town of Springfield for laying out the six miles square granted by the General Court to the domain of Westfield consisted of Elizur Holyoke, Samuel Marshfield, George Colton, and Rowland Thomas. In their report to the General Court they said:

"The said quantity of land is laid out to them five mile broad at ye Northerly end thereof extending from a pine tree marked at ye East Mountayne to a white oake marked at ye West Mountayne, & it running in length Southerly Nine mile, and at the Southerly end of their Nine Mile their limits are four miles broad Westward."

January 12, 1736, Thomas Ingersoll, representative at the General Court from Westfield, presented a petition from the inhabitants of Westfield, praying for the addition to the town tract of a mountainous section on the western frontier, embracing about 6000 acres. The people of Westfield desired the possession of this tract because it contained excellent building-stone.

The petition was granted, and the tract so added was thereafter known as "The New Addition." From this "New Addition" the town of Russell and a portion of the town of Montgomery were taken. In the sale of "New Addition" lands, Westfield reserved the right of quarrying stone forever from certain parts of the territory so sold. Previous to the acquisition of this new tract, the original domain was lessened by the creation, in 1770, of the town of Southwick.

SELECTMEN.

The early town records, dating from the incorporation of the town—1669 to 1696—have disappeared, and the copies thereof which were made early in 1700, and which are still extant, present them in a very incomplete form. These copies contain no record of a town-meeting earlier than 1672. In that year Capt. Cook, Deacon Hanchett, Sergt. Dewey, John Sacket, and Joseph Whiting were chosen selectmen.

TOWN CLERKS.

The first reference, in a copy of the early records, made to the election of a town clerk was under date of 1693, when John Ashley was chosen. In 1694, Joseph Sexton was elected. In 1695, Isaac Phelps was chosen, and served until 1702. The following is a list of the town clerks who served from that date to the present:

Joseph Sexton, 1702-5; Isaac Phelps, 1705-15; John Root, 1715-31; John Gunn, 1731-47; Eldad Taylor, 1747-63 (the records between this date and 1774 are lost); Eldad Taylor, 1774-77; Samuel Mather, 1777-81; Samuel Fowler, 1781; Israel Ashley, 1782-88; Samuel Fowler, 1788; Israel Ashley, 1789; Paul Whitney, 1790-95; Abel Whitney, 1795; John Atwater, 1796; Abel Whitney, 1797-99; John Ingersoll, 1799-1813; Charles Douglas, 1813-15; William Blair, 1815-17; David King, 1817-23; Alfred Stearn, 1823-26; Eli B. REPRESENTATIVES AT THE GENERAL COURT.

The earliest records of the town do not indicate, except at long intervals and in a vague way, who represented the town at the General Court previous to 1700. The earliest observation in the records touching this matter was made May 14, 1677, when Thomas Dewey was chosen "to plead the town's best interests at Court, if need require." The colonial records state, however, that J. F. Hull represented Westfield at the Court in 1671, '72, and '73. As can best be ascertained, the following were the Westfield representatives from 1671 to 1876, when Westfield became a part of the Tenth Representative District:

J. F. Hull, Thomas Dewey, John Ashley, Daniel Bagg, John Moseley, Elisha Parks, Joseph Lyman, Isaac Phelps, James Taylor, John Ingersoll, Asahel Eager, Jedediah Taylor, Benjamin Hastings, Frederick Fowler, Azariah Moseley, William Blair, James Fowler, David King, William Atwater, Alfred Stearns, Elijah Arnold, Charles Douglas, David Wright, Aaron Sibley, Matthew Ives, Jesse Farnam, Henry Douglas, Eli B. Hamilton, Henry Fowler, Joseph S. Avery, Elias Cadwell, Lewis Fowler, Asahel Bush, Henry Champion, Chauncey Pease, Thomas Loomis, Joseph Hedges, Asa B. Whitman, Lucius Wright, Joseph Arnold, David Moseley, Jonah L. Gross, Norman T. Leonard, Dennis Hedges, Samuel R. B. Lewis, George Sackett, Hiram Harrison, Oliver Moseley, Chauncey Colton, Hiram Fox, Royal Fowler, Hiram A. Beebe, Israel Sackett, Josiah S. Knowles, Daniel D. Erving, Hiram Hull, George H. Moseley, James Noble (2d), James Holland, Luke Bush, Henry Fuller, D. N. Goff, George Green, Addison Gage, Jasper R. Rand, David M. Chase, Lewis R. Norton, Henry J. Bush, Thomas Kneil, James K. Gladwin, Charles Dickerman, William G. Bates, Samuel Horton, Alexander McKenzie, Reuben Noble, L. B. Walkley.

VILLAGES.

The most important place in the town is the village of Westfield, a station on the Boston and Albany and the New Haven and Northampton Railroads. It is washed on one side by the Agawam River, and on the other by Little River, and from both streams draws a water-power that is used to a considerable extent in its manufactories. Here is the seat of town government and the centre of the town's manufacturing interests. The village has a population of about 7000, and contains seven church buildings, the post-office, the town-hall, High School, Masonic Hall, Normal School, School of Observation, Davis School, Music-Hall, Westfield Athenaeum, two banks, two railroad depots, numerous manufactories, a number of handsome business blocks, eight hotels, and many stores.

The village is a lively, bustling, and thriving place, and wears an air of solid thrift and substantial comfort, while its broad, handsome, and well-shaded avenues—adorned with hundreds of stately elms—make it, especially in the mild seasons of the year, a delightfully inviting retreat. Many elegant and showy residences grace the outlying streets, such as Court, Broad, Silver, Day, Washington, and others. There is a large mercantile trade at this point, to which the inhabitants of not only Westfield, but of many surrounding towns, journey for their household and other supplies.

The other settlements in the town—none of which, however, have a post-office—are West Parish (originally called Hoop-Pole), which has a church and a whip-factory, and whose people are chiefly devoted to farming, Middle Farms, Little River, Owens, East Farms, and West Farms. At the latter place are two whip-factories and a Union chapel. The inhabitants of these minor settlements are nearly all agriculturists, and they are in the main well-to-do.

CHURCHES.

The first religious meetings in the town of which there is any mention were held in 1667. Mr. John Holyoke, son of Maj. Holyoke, of Springfield, conducted the services. In 1668, Moses Fisk began to preach, and continued until 1671. An old record, dated Aug. 11, 1668, speaks of a meeting held at "Streamfield" on that date, when it was voted "to looke out for a minister." About that time it was voted "to pay the minister, Rev. Mr. Fisk, £40 pounds for the year, and to disburse £40 to build a house for the minister." It was further resolved that "the meeting-house should be set on the Fort side." This, the first house, is supposed to have occupied the site whereon the town pound stood about ten years ago.

In 1678 the Governor of Massachusetts colony granted permission for the organization of a church in "Narromoco Colony," and in 1679 was organized. Rev. Edward Taylor, who graduated at Harvard in 1671, received a call from Westfield that year, when he responded, and continued to preach until 1679, when he was installed pastor of the church then organized.

In his journal, now in the possession of one of his descendants living in Canandaigua, N. Y., is contained this entry: "November 27th, I set out with Mr. Dewey and arrived at Westfield December 1st. On Lord's Day I preached to them from Matthew iii. 2, my first sermon, Dec. 3, 1671. My going to Westfield with Mr. Dewey was a great part of the way by mark'd trees. I arrived, and lodged the first night at Capt. Cook's, in the little village."

Jan. 6, 1672, it was resolved to build a meeting-house 36 feet square. There was some delay in deciding upon a location for it, and, lots being eventually drawn to determine the matter, a place was chosen "near Goodman Phelps' house."

In those early days it was not the custom to heat the church, and its atmosphere in the winter season was sometimes bitter cold. Tradition has it that while the pastor frequently wore mittens in the pulpit, the youthful lads of the congregation used to create a good deal of discordant music by hammering their boots against the benches, in a desperate effort to keep their feet warm,—less fortunate than the female members, who invariably provided themselves with feet-warmers upon setting out for church.

The records say that in 1697 the people grew tired of the custom of calling the inhabitants to Sabbath worship by the beating of a drum, and concluded to buy a bell for two hundred acres of land. That scheme must have miscarried, for in March, 1698, and thereafter as late as 1702, the selectmen agreed with certain persons—notably with the Widow Noble and Edward Noble—"to beate ye Drom and sweepe ye Meeting-house for one year, for which they will recieve two pounds and five shillings."

In 1703 it was agreed "to builde pewes in ye meeting-house where ye plank seats now stand, and ye fore pewe is votted to be in Dignity betweene ye fore seate in ye body and ye Table; and ye second pewe to be in Dignity between ye first and second seate in ye body: and ye fore Gallerey is accounted to be in Dignity between ye second and third seate in ye body and ye side fore seate in ye Gallerey to be in Dignity between ye third and forth in ye body," etc.

It was further voted that persons should be seated in the meeting-house according to their age and estate, and that "so much as any man's estate is increased by his negroes, that shall be left out." If a man lived on a hired farm, or had obtained his property by marriage with a widow, such property was reckoned at only one-third the value it would have possessed had the man obtained it by his own industry.

In January, 1717, it was resolved to build a new meeting-house, but such was the difficulty experienced in fixing upon a satisfactory place for its erection that it was not begun until June, 1720. Various committees, including a committee chosen from Springfield citizens, were selected to report upon a site, but their reports were all rejected, and it began to look as if the meeting-house would never be located. Finally, it was agreed to leave the matter to Samuel Partridge, Esq., and his report, which was not accepted without considerable discussion and delay, read as follows:

"Whereas: the Town of Westfield at a Legual Town-meeting on ye 21 day of this instant December, 1719, past an act in said meeting, they being at a Difficulty of Concluding the place to set their new meeting-house at, and voated to leave the full Desition of that mater unto mee under named, upon which I, together with the asistance of Capⁿ John Ashley and Lieutenant Adijah Dewey, went up to ye place of the cyder-press their standing, which I judged too far towards the West end of ye Town for conuieneyce of the people's meeting at ye present; also I vewed ye norwest corner of Deacon Root, Diseased, his lot; I Judged that place too near ye Dwelling-houses adjacent; and as to Mr. Gun's paster and ye lot where old John Sacket lived, too much to the South end of the town, and ye old meeting-house; much more I also vewed Capt. Mandesley's paster on ye south side of the way, and that I judge will be too near Samuell Root's barn, therefore have I maturely vewed the Knowl on Capn Mandesley's lot on the north side of ye way behind his housing close to ye highway, I hearby Determine to bee the place for erecting and seting up the new meeting-house: this I Deliver as my positive opinion upon the Premises." There the house was accordingly built; moreover, "baru fation, with a bellconey upon the middle of it fifty-two fouts in length and forty-one fouts in bredth."

The original members of the First Church were Edward Taylor, John Mandesley, Sammel Loomis, and Isaac Phelps, from Windsor Church; Josiah Dewey and John Ingersoll, from Northampton; and John Root, from Farmington, Conn.

As characteristic of early church discipline it may be noted that, in 1689, Walter Lee, Samuel Fowler, and the sergeant of the guard were appointed to take care of children and youth on the Sabbath, "to see that they attend and keep their places and behave themselves seemly, both before and in the time of service."

In 1674, Rev. Edward Taylor married Miss Elizabeth Fitch, and, she dying in 1689, he married Mrs. Ruth Wyllys, who died in 1730. One of his daughters was the mother of President Stiles, of Yale College. Mr. Taylor's salary, which was at first £60, never went beyond £80. His successor, Mr. Bull, who made frequent appeals for increase to pay his multifarious debts, received in his last year as high as £240,—a very handsome sum in those days. Toward the close of his ministerial career Mr. Taylor became weakened by age, and, in 1726, Mr. Nebemiah Bull was ordained as his colleague. Mr. Taylor died in 1729, aged eighty-seven, after serving the church fifty-eight successive years.

Mr. Bull graduated at Yale in 1723, and taught grammar school as well as preached some months before his settlement. He married Miss Partridge, of Hatfield, in 1728, and died in 1740, in the fourteenth year of his ministry. Mr. Bull took an active part in the mission to the Housatonic Indians in 1735, and baptized the first Indian convert.

Rev. John Ballentine (Mr. Bull's successor), a graduate of Harvard, was ordained in 1741. He was the pastor for thirty-five successive years, and died in 1776. Rev. Noah Atwater, a Yale graduate, was the next pastor. He did not settle until 1781 (the interregnum of the Revolutionary war having until then deferred the choice of a successor to Mr. Ballentine). He preached twenty years, and died in 1802. Mr. Atwater was regarded as a distinguished scholar and divine, and devoted much of his time to astronomical and meteorological investigations.

Rev. Isaac Knapp was ordained in November, 1803. He was a graduate of Williams College, and was the church's pastor until 1835, when failing health compelled him to relinquish his active labors. He died July 6, 1847, aged seventy-two years. His successor was Rev. Emerson Davis. Mr. Davis graduated at Williams College in 1821, served as a tutor there one year, and was for the fourteen subsequent years preceptor of the Westfield Academy. He was installed as Mr. Knapp's colleague in June, 1836, and after a pastorate of thirty years died suddenly on the Friday following the Sunday whereon he preached a sermon commemorative of the completion of the thirtieth year of his service as pastor of the church.

Rev. Elias Richardson succeeded Dr. Davis in May, 1867, and he, being called to New Haven, was succeeded by Rev. A. J. Fittsworth in 1871. Mr. Fittsworth removed to Chelsea in 1875, and from that year until 1879, when Rev. John Lockwood, the present pastor, was ordained, the church depended upon supplies.

The first church erected by the First Congregational Society was, as already noted, built in 1668, near Mr. Taylor's, in the Little River settlement. The second, built in 1720, near Mr. Moseley's, corner of Main and Meadow Streets, was burned in 1803. The third was erected in 1805, on the site of the present edifice; and the fourth, the one now used, in 1861, on Broad Street, adjoining the town-hall. This church building cost $25,000, and contains a handsome organ, built by Johnson & Co., of Westfield, at a cost of $5000. In the tower, surmounted by a high steeple, is the town clock. The present membership of the church is 350. The church building replaced by the present one stands in the rear of the latter, and is occupied by H. A. Parsons as a sleigh-manufactory. The society owns, besides the church building, a handsome parsonage.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH OF WESTFIELD

was organized Sept. 15, 1784, and after prospering fairly until 1795 was divided and disorganized until 1806, when a revival occurred. There was a quiet time again about 1810, and until 1819 there were no regular services. In that year Rev. David Wright began a restoration of the strength of the society, and since that period it has continued to prosper. The first church was built in 1794 on South Street, near the Southwick line; the second house stood on Main Street, about a mile east of Westfield village; the third on Main Street, near the bridge; the fourth on the west side of Elm Street. The fifth—the present temple of worship, erected in 1868, at a cost of $35,000, including a $6000 organ—stands on the east side of Elm Street. The present society is the direct outgrowth of a reorganization, in 1833, of the church of 1806. A second Baptist Church was organized in 1786 in the western part of the town within what are now the limits of Russell, to which it belonged after 1792. The pastors who have served the Baptist Society of Westfield since about 1800 are thus named: Adam Hamilton, Azariah Hawks, David Wright, Isaac Child, Andrew M. Smith, Charles Van Leon, Feronda Bestor, Alfred Colburn, N. M. Perkins, John T. Alden, Wm. Carpenter, John R. Baumes, John Jennings, E. M. Jerome, and W. H. Eaton, the latter being the present pastor. The church has now about 250 members.

THE FIRST METHODIST EPISCOPAL SOCIETY OF WESTFIELD was organized late in 1794. The first quarterly collection taken up in 1795 realized—so the records say—50 cents. Services were held in 1795, but there was no class until 1800, when Rev. Billy Hibbard provided the preaching. Previous to that Rev. Joshua Taylor and Rev. T. Dewey preached occasionally. This society was located in what is now known as West Parish, but then as Hoop-Pole. Their first church was built in 1829, and dedicated by Rev. David Kilburn. It was torn down in 1868 and replaced by the present building. Rev. W. H. Adams is the present pastor. Membership, 50.

The first Methodist society of the village of Westfield was organized in 1812, when it contained 10 members, one of whom was a colored woman. Services were not held until 1816. The first church building was erected in 1832-33 on Main Street, and was used until 1843, when a more spacious edifice was built on the site of the present post-office. The old church building was subsequently used by Stimson & Co. as a piano-leg factory, and torn down not long thereafter. The church was attached to the Granville Circuit until 1836, when it was set apart. Rev. Thomas Thorpe, who preached in the house of Mr. Joel Farnam, corner Elm and Main Streets, the first sermon preached to the society, married Rebecca Farnam, daughter of Joel, and was the father of Thomas B. Thorpe, a distinguished author, who died recently in New Haven.

The church on Elm Street, built in 1843, was occupied until 1875, when, the society having grown beyond the capacity of the older building, the present elegant structure was dedicated. Its cost was $50,000, and the cost of the organ $7000. Rev. S. L. Gracey is the pastor now in charge, and the number of members 540. The society owns, besides the church building, two fine parsonages. The names of the pastors who have served the society since 1836 are appended: Paul Townsend, William Smith, Benjamin M. Louth, E. Scott, J. Hascall, M. Trafton, M. Raymond, J. B. Husted, G. F. Cox, J. H. Twombly, Wm. Butler, Gilbert Haven (afterward Bishop Haven), J. J. P. Collyer, Daniel Chapin, G. Bowler, C. D. Hill, H. W. Warren, D. Richards, W. G. H. Lewis, J. Mansfield, G. Whitaker, J. S. Barrows, S. L. Gracey.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH OF WESTFIELD

was organized in 1853, when it formed a part of the mission in charge of Father Blenkinsop, of Chicopee. The present church building on Orange Street was erected in 1858, but, according to the present contemplation, will soon be replaced by a handsome brick edifice. The first resident pastor was Rev. M. X. Carroll, whose successor was Rev. Dominick Miglionico. He was succeeded in 1874 by Rev. Thomas Smyth, the present pastor. There are about 1500 Catholics in the town, who belong to the church parish. The church owns, besides the church building, a pastoral residence, and a cemetery, located about a mile away from Westfield village.

THE UNIVERSALIST SOCIETY OF WESTFIELD

was organized in 1853, with a membership of 13. Rev. D. H. Plumb was the first pastor. After his retirement, the society had no regular services until a short time ago, when Rev. J. R. Johnson, the present pastor, was installed. The society numbers about 30 members, and owns a neat chapel on Chapel Street, Westfield village.

In 1856 the society of the First Congregational Church had grown too large for the capacity of the church building, and a was thereupon formed. Worship was at first held in what is now known as Music-Hall, in Westfield village; but in 1861 the erection of the present church building on Main Street was begun, and in the following year it was occupied by the society. The structure cost about $25,000, and contains a fine organ, built by Johnson & Co., of Westfield, at an expense of $6000. The first pastor of the church was Rev. Francis Homes. Rev. Joel H. Bingham was installed in 1857, and in 1863 was succeeded by Rev. George Bowler, who was dismissed in 1865. Rev. Henry Hopkins, the next pastor, was installed in June, 1866, and is still in charge. The church has a membership of 336; owns the church building, a handsome chapel, and a parsonage; is free of debt and in a flourishing condition.

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN WESTFIELD VILLAGE, in charge of Rev. B. F. Cooley, has about 70 members, and occupies temporary quarters in a building on Main Street. The church was organized in 1860, and for four years thereafter worshiped in the Universalist Chapel, first under Rev. John F. Mines, and later under the charge of Rev. Andrew Mackie. From 1864 to 1873 there were no regular services, but in the latter year they were renewed in the first place of worship, when Rev. F. J. Winkley assumed the rectorship. Preaching was continued regularly in the Universalist Chapel until Nov. 17, 1878, when a change was made to the present place of worship. Mr. Winkley was succeeded in 1877 by Rev. Benjamin W. Atwell, and he by the present rector in September, 1878.

THE SECOND ADVENTISTS have a handsome chapel on School Street in Westfield village, built in 1874 at a cost of $6300. Although the society held occasional meetings before that date, there was no organization until 1872. From that time until 1877, Elder James Hemingway was the preacher. Since then there have been no regular services, although the society expects to settle a pastor soon. Until the erection of the present chapel, worship was held in the old Baptist Church and Universalist Chapel. The membership of the church is about 100.

A UNION SOCIETY AT WEST FARMS

has a neat chapel, where preaching is provided each Sabbath by one of the various pastors of Westfield village. A Baptist society flourished here many years ago, and erected a church building, but the latter, long standing unused, was torn down recently, years after the extinction of the society.

SCHOOLS.

The earliest reference in the records to education was made in a town-meeting held Feb. 4, 1678, when it was agreed to give Mr. Dentre £15 "to act as schoolmaster." In September, 1679, James Cornish was hired to be schoolmaster, at £18 for a half-year, payment to be made in grain. At a town-meeting held Feb. 10, 1696, it was ordered that "such as send their children to school shall pay three pence a week for reading scholars and four pence for writing, and that all boys from seven years till fourteen shall pay by the week." At a meeting held Nov. 1, 1700, it was voted "that there shall be a school house built, and Lieut. Root, John Gunn, Samuel Ashley, and David Ashley, Jr., were chosen as a Comity to take care that said house be built and finished, said house to be about eighteen foot square; the said Comity are to call all persons to work, giving a day's warning, each person to be aloud for his work, according to what he does; the said house to be sit between the fort gate and the gully by John Noble's." The selectmen were directed to speedily provide a "school master and a place to keep school in." In January, 1701, it was voted to change the proposed location of the school-house, and that it be "set" near the meeting-house.

In 1699 it was voted that "such persons as are too poor to pay for schooling should provide a load of wood for each scholar as it shall be needed."

In 1702 it was voted that all boys between the ages of six and twenty pay the prescribed charges for schooling "whether they be sent to school or not." To this order it appears that several inhabitants "entered their dissents."

In 1703 it was voted "ye Children y^e goo to schoole should pay (viz.) Ritors 3d. per weeke, and Readers 2d. per weeke." To this a number of inhabitants entered their dissent, but for what reason does not appear. Dec. 16, 1703, a formal agreement, in writing, was made with Joseph Sexton, the town clerk, by which he engaged to keep school until the next April, "and to use his best skill to teach children to reade and wrighte." For his services he received £10 in grain at the market rates. In 1706, Mr. Sexton was succeeded by Isaac Phelps, who was also town clerk that year.

In March, 1707, it was resolved "to build a school-house this summer, to be set up in the place where Daniel Nash his shop stood."

Isaac Phelps was undoubtedly an acceptable schoolmaster, for he taught the school from 1706 to 1718, when he was succeeded by Felix Habalah. The first female school-teacher of the town was Widow Catharine Noble, who was engaged in 1726. She was to have 25s. a month as long as the town saw cause to employ her in that capacity.

From the report of the school committee, made in 1878, it is learned that there are in the town nineteen school buildings, and the following schools, to wit: high 1, grammar 1, intermediate 6, primary 8, ungraded 12. The total number of pupils attending the town schools in 1878 was 1450, and the cost that year for maintaining the schools, $21,788.04. According to the State reports of 1876-77, Westfield ranks 253 in the 342 towns of the State in percentage of valuation appropriated to public schools. According to the same table, the town ranks 16 in Hampden County.

The chief town schools in Westfield village are the High School, the Davis School,—so named in honor of Rev. Emerson Davis,—and the School of Observation. This latter occupies a handsome brick building (erected in 1871), and receives annually from the State $500, conditioned that its modes of teaching shall be in accordance with the methods of the normal system, and that the Normal School pupils shall be privileged to observe practical illustrations of the normal system. The grades of this school are primary, intermediate, and grammar. The grammar departments of this and the Davis School are the grammar schools of the town, whence pupils may graduate with equal privileges to the High School. Value of the 19 school buildings of the town, $151,500.

THE WESTFIELD ACADEMY.

Although this time-honored educational institution is among the things that were, it will, for many years to come, continue to be a proud recollection in the minds of the citizens of Westfield, and it deserves, therefore, a place among the important features in the history of the town.

On the 17th of June, 1793, the Legislature passed the following act:

"Whereas, The encouragement of literature among the rising generation has ever been considered by the wise and good as an object of the most serious attention, and as the prosperity and happiness of a free people greatly depend upon the advantages arising from a learned and pious education, and it appearing that the said town of Westfield have voted the sum of six hundred pounds for the purpose of erecting and supporting an Academy in the town of Westfield, in the county of Hampshire, etc.:

"Be it therefore, etc., that there be established in the town of Westfield an Academy by the name of Westfield Academy, for the purpose of promoting piety, religion, and morality, and for the instruction of the youth in such languages and such of the liberal arts and sciences as the trustees may direct; and the Hon. W. Shepard, Samuel Fowler, and Samuel Mather, Esqrs., Warham Parks, David Moseley, and Abel Whitney, Esqrs., Rev. Joseph Lathrop, Rev. Solomon Williams, Rev. Noah Atwater, Rev. Bezaleel Howard, Rev. Isaac Clinton, Rev. Joseph Badger, Hon. Samuel Lyman, Justin Ely, Esq., and Jonathan Judd, Jr., Esq., are hereby appointed Trustees of said Academy, etc."

The board of trustees was accordingly organized April 20, 1797, when it was voted "that the sum of $1000 and more is secured by the inhabitants of Westfield for the benefit of the Academy in addition to the sums voted for the same purpose by the said town."

In addition to the charter, the Legislature donated to the academy half a township of land in Maine, which was afterward sold by the trustees for about $5000.

The erection of a school building was at once begun on the site now occupied by the High School in Westfield village, and on Jan. 1, 1800, it was dedicated with religious ceremonies.

The old building was occupied until 1857, when it was replaced on the same site by the handsome brick edifice now used as the High School. The corner-stone of the new building was laid July 31, 1857, with elaborate ceremonies, of which an address by Hon. William G. Bates formed an important part. The old building was removed bodily to the rear of the original site, and it is still used as the scientific department of the High School. The old academy fund, at the laying of the new corner-stone, had reached $5000. To this were added $5000, bequeathed by Stephen Harrison for the establishing of an agricultural department in connection with the academy; $10,000 were also subscribed by the citizens to assist in the erection of the new academy, and for this purpose also the town appropriated $5000. A few years later, the usefulness of the academy began to be impaired by the superior educational facilities offered by the Westfield High School and the Westfield Normal School, and, after carrying it forward to 1867, the trustees, deciding to temporarily close the institution, sold the school building to the town for $35,000. The edifice has since then been occupied as a high school.

The proceeds of the sale, together with other moneys belonging to the fund, were invested in railway and bank securities, and the fund now aggregates about $68,000. This must, according to the original design, be devoted to the promotion of education in Westfield, but there is yet no definite understanding touching an early disposition of the fund to that end. Mr. Bates, the president of the board of trustees, cherishes a hope that the academy will be revived at an early day, on a scale of extended liberality, and has indeed already set apart lands which he intends to donate for the buildings whenever the project shall bear fruit. The general opinion seems, however, to be that the academy will never be re-created. The present academy trustees are W. G. Bates, E. B. Gillett, H. J. Bush, Samuel Fowler, Henry Hopkins, Edwin Smith, L. R. Norton, and L. F. Thayer, of Westfield, J. B. Eldredge, of Hartford, Wm. W. Whitman, of Troy, N. Y., and Rev. A. J. Titsworth, of Chelsea, Mass.

THE HIGH SCHOOL.

The Westfield High School was organized in 1855, and until 1867 occupied the building now used as the town-hall. In the latter year, the town having purchased the academy buildings, the school was removed thither, where it has since remained. The present principal, A. E. Gibbs, has served in that capacity since 1867. There are in the school three departments,—the English, the general, and the classical,—conducted by a corps of four teachers, in addition to the principal. One hundred and sixty-one scholars were on the rolls in the winter of '78. Tuition is free to all persons residing in the town, while pupils from abroad are charged a fee.

THE NORMAL SCHOOL.

The second Normal School opened by the State of Massachusetts is the one now located in Westfield village. It was originally stationed at Barre, in September, 1839, under the direction of Prof. Samuel P. Newman, who died in 1842. In 1844 the school was removed to Westfield, and was in that year and in 1845 under the charge of Rev. Emerson Davis. In September, 1846, the present structure was first occupied by the school. The original building cost $6500, of which the State appropriated $2500, the town $500, the central school district $1500, and private subscriptions the residue. Later, in 1861 and 1869, the building was remodeled and materially extended by the State, at an additional expense of upward of $25,000. Previous to the erection of the Normal School building the sessions were held in the basement of the Westfield Academy, and in the Westfield town-hall. Tuition is free to every pupil who gives a pledge to teach school in the State. Others are required to pay a tuition-fee. The pupils numbered, in 1878, 110, and the corps of instructors 7, in addition to the principal. The course of study is a thorough one, is intended to be such as shall fit any scholar for college, and covers a period of two years. A supplemental course of two years is provided for graduates of the regular course. Connected with the school (supported by the State to the extent of $500 annually) is a School of Observation, a valuable library, apparatus for the illustration of the important principles in the natural sciences, a cabinet of mineral, geological, and zoological specimens, a chemical laboratory, and a handsomely appointed art-room. Adjacent to the school building is the Normal School boarding-house, an elegant brick mansion, erected by the State in 1873-74, at a cost of $84,000, with accommodations for 130 scholars. In 1878 it had 70 inmates.

The list of principals from 1844 to 1878 is as follows; Emerson Davis, David S. Rowe, Wm. H. Wells, J. W. Dickinson, and Joseph G. Scott.

From the foundation of the school in 1839 to 1878, 2806 pupils have attended it.

COLLEGE GRADUATES.

Among the citizens of Westfield who have graduated at American colleges, beginning with Jonathan Ashley, who graduated in 1730, were the following: Jonathan Ashley, Israel Ashley, Joseph Ashley, Gideon Noble, John Strong, P. K. Clark, Israel Moseley, David Shepard, Moses Ashley, Israel Ashley (2d), Ebenezer Ballentine, Saul and Samuel Fowler, John Taylor, John Ingersoll, Samuel Mather, Royal Phelps, William Atwater, James Fowler, Warham Crooks, Matthew Ives, Samuel Perry, William G. Bates, Henry B. King, and Joseph M. Ely, at Yale; John Ballentine, Wm. G. Ballentine, Warham Parks, John Phelps, and Moses Clark, at Harvard; James Taylor and Daniel Moseley, at Williams; Hiram Smith, at Amherst; Seth Moseley, at Union; Seth Noble and Gerard Root, at —; Charles Hooker, at Williams; Philip Fowler, at Annapolis; Philip Smith and Fred. H. Gillet, at Amherst; Arthur L. Andrews, Thos. R. Kneil, Edward W. Atwater, and Chas. Holcombe, at Wesleyan; Samuel Fowler, Berlin University.

THE WESTFIELD ATHENEUM.

This institution, one of the chief objects of the pride of Westfield, was the outgrowth of the public spirit and benevolence of Samuel Mather and Hiram Harrison, Esqs., both of whom, now deceased, were natives, and for years residents, of Westfield. Shortly previous to the year 1864, Mr. Mather, then a resident of Hartford, Conn., indicated an intention to donate $10,000 toward the endowment of a library and reading-room in his native town, and it was at his suggestion that the Westfield Atheneum was incorporated, March 11, 1864. By the act, Samuel Mather, Hiram Harrison, and Cutler Lakin, their associates and successors, were made a corporation by the name of the Westfield Atheneum, to be established in the town of Westfield, for the purpose of maintaining a library and reading-room, and promoting public instruction by lectures and otherwise, with all powers, etc.

They were further empowered to hold the donation of Samuel Mather, and all other donations, etc., to be thereafter made, and to purchase and hold real estate to an amount not exceeding $30,000, and personal estate to an amount not exceeding $100,000.

The first meeting for organization was held Dec. 15, 1866, and immediately thereupon Mr. Mather delivered to the treasurer of the corporation $10,000 in United States bonds as a fund whose income should be applied toward the salary of librarian, and the heating and lighting of the library. In that year Mr. Harrison erected the present library building, at a cost of $10,000, and presented it, with the land it occupies, to the Atheneum, in pursuance of a cherished desire to promote, in Westfield, the growth of such an institution. Shortly after this, private subscriptions, aggregating $10,000, were made by citizens of Westfield, and persons from abroad, who lived here formerly, the largest of these donations being that of Mr. Henry T. Morgan, of New York City. In 1872, Mrs. John B. Eldredge, of Hartford, donated $1000 to the Atheneum. These donations were for the purpose of purchasing books, etc., for the library, while there have been privately donated as well, to this time, upward of twelve hundred volumes. There are at present in the library 9200 bound volumes. The library was opened to the public Jan. 1, 1868, and has since then been kept continuously open. Periodicals and daily newspapers are kept on file, which visitors to the library may read free of charge. There is a nominal charge of $2 per year for the privilege of withdrawing books from the library. The annual revenue from this source is about $450. The library has been in charge of P. L. Buell, Esq., as librarian, since May, 1873.

BURIAL-PLACES.

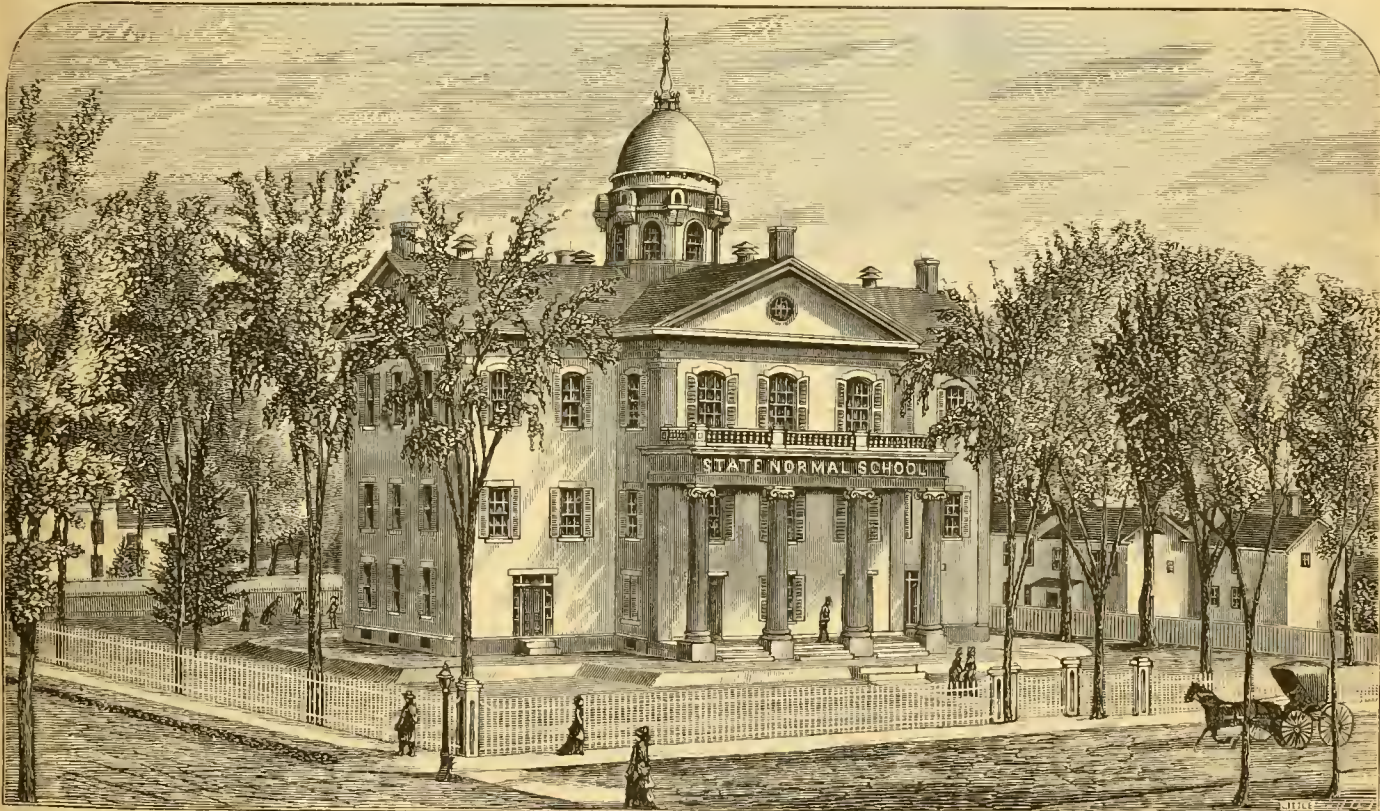

The public burial-places in Westfield are four in number. The largest is the Pine Hill Cemetery, on Court Street, about half a mile west of the village of Westfield. It occupies an elevated tract of 30 acres, and belongs to the Pine Hill Cemetery Association, which was organized in 1842, when the cemetery was first laid out. There are at present about 1000 lot-owners, and within the limits of the burial-place are many elegant monuments. The cemetery is beautified with smooth and well-kept drives and foot-paths, abounds in the luxuriant shade of hundreds of pines, and promises to become in time a very beautiful city of the dead. There is a small burying-ground at West Farms, one at West Parish, and another north of Westfield village, belonging to the Catholic Church.

These grounds, already mentioned, are of comparatively recent origin. The oldest graveyard in the town is found on Mechanics Street, Westfield, for there the earliest settlers buried their dead, and there may be seen many old headstones dating as far back as the seventeenth century, the oldest now discernible being of date 1683. There are doubtless in that ground graves of earlier date, but they bear no headstones to mark their age, or to say who sleeps below. Appended will be found a record of some of the earliest inscriptions:

"Abigail, wife of John Sackett, 1690; John Root, 1687; Edward, son of Geo. Griswold, 1688, aged 27; Cornet Thomas Dewey, 1690, aged 32; Elizabeth, wife

SETH BUSH.

Seth Bush, son of Asabel and Sally Bush, was born on the premises where he now lives, May 5, 1820. Upon arriving at the age of manhood he did not, like many others, leave the parental roof to seek a fortune in new lands far from the land of his birth, but contentedly remained on the old place, where five generations of this family have lived.

He was married, Jan. 20, 1847, to Lucy A. Kellogg, a native of Southwick, daughter of Alva Kellogg, one of the pioneers of that town. Their family includes the following: Homer, Lucy A., Mary K., Emma E., and William S.

Mr. Bush has ever been ranked among the progressive agriculturists of the town, and is locally celebrated as a dealer in fattened cattle. In 1878 he fattened eighteen cattle, the total weight of which was thirty-six thousand three hundred and forty pounds, an average of over two thousand pounds each. He shipped them alive to England, and received $2180 for them.

SETH BUSH.

The present residence of Mr. Bush is one of the old landmarks of Westfield, built by his great-grandfather, Aaron Bush, a descendant of Samuel Bush, who moved to Westfield from Springfield, Mass., in about the year 1686. It was noted as a hotel, and for many years in "ye olden time" was one of the famous wayside inns in this section. It is located on Silver Street.

Mr. Bush is a member of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Westfield. Politically he is a Democrat, and has always remained true to the principles of his party.

This old burying-ground is in a state of excellent repair, and, as a rule, the old headstones are erect, while much care is evidently bestowed upon their preservation. The ground is still used for burial purposes, but only to a limited extent.

INDUSTRIES.

Until about 1800 the inhabitants of Westfield devoted their energies almost exclusively to the pursuit of agriculture, and upon that interest the substantial prosperity of the town rested.

Shortly after the beginning of the present century, manufactures began to flourish upon the many valuable mill-streams, and, having gained a permanent foothold, flourished apace as time progressed, and became ere long what they are now,—the chief element in Westfield's industries, and the medium for the production of millions of dollars' worth of goods annually, and the employment of hundreds of people.

The three leading branches of manufacture are whips, cigars, and paper, the two former ranking about equal in the value of annual product.

The appended table, taken from the State census reports of 1875, will show the value of manufactures, classified in the order of rank: whips, $880,000; cigars, $854,416; paper, $400,000; lumber, $140,000; steam heaters, $140,000; organs, $120,000; distilled liquors, $80,000; flour, feed, etc., $80,000; cigar-boxes, $53,617; bricks, $45,000; flavoring extracts, $40,000; cotton batting, $36,500; gunpowder, $30,000; piano-legs, $30,000; coffins, $2000; boots, $1500.

The same report gives the total value of manufactures for 1875 as $3,446,358, and the value of agricultural products for the same period $362,900. About 1600 persons are employed in the various manufactories of the town, and of these 500 are women. One hundred and twenty-three buildings, valued at $500,450, are occupied for manufacturing purposes, and contain machinery of the value of $226,265.

WHIP-FACTORIES.

The leading whip-factory is that of The American Whip Company, which was organized in 1855, with a capital of $100,000, the first of the kind organized in this country. The factory building, a brick structure, is located on Main Street, in the heart of Westfield village, and represents, with current stock on hand, an invested capital of $300,000. Whips of almost every description are manufactured to the value of from $250,000 to $400,000 annually, the latter amount representing the result when the factory works up to its full capacity. The number of people employed will vary from 150 to 250, according to the demands of trade.

The Hampden Whip Company, next in importance, occupies a fine brick edifice on Elm Street. The company was organized in 1875, with a capital of $80,000, and employing, in 1878, 60 people, and manufacturing goods to the value of $150,000.

Besides the two establishments above noted, there were, in 1878, 25 firms and corporations engaged in the manufacture of whips, as follows: W. G. Bailey & Co., John J. Bohler, Samuel E. Chadwick, Oscar Clark, Edmund Cooper, W. O. Daniels, L. Danks & Son, Charles Douglas & Co., Solomon Ensign, J. B. Fuller & Co., D. D. Griffin & Co., Harmonica Whip Company, Holcomb & Cook, Knowles & Hastings, E. R. Lay & Son, L. B. Lewis, E. S. Miller, George T. Moore, W. H. Owen & Co., Peck, Osden & Co., William Provin, Jr., J. C. Schmidt, Charles W. Spencer, A. J. Smith, and C. M. Whipple & Co.

CIGAR-MAKING.

As has been already shown, Westfield is a prominent point in the manufacture of cigars, of which the value yearly is nearly as great as that of the whip-product. This branch of manufacture is represented by 30 firms and corporations.

The American Cigar Company, organized in 1873, has a nominal capital of $52,000, and an invested capital of $100,000, occupies a factory which cost $10,000, employs from 100 to 200 people, and claims to produce $300,000 worth of cigars yearly. Other parties engaged in this business are Benjamin Asher, James Barkley, J. C. Barthe, Beckman, Noble & Co., Willis E. Boyden, Brueggeman & Son, Bryan, Keef & Co., Bush, Ensign & Chace, L. E. Chester, Eastern Cigar Company, Hiram Freed, Hampden Cigar Company, H. C. Hayden, Henry Hoey, Thomas Jarrold, Henry Kolb, James N. Lewis, A. A. Lloyd, Thomas F. McMain, Massachusetts Co-operative Association, David Noble, Phoenix Cigar Co-operative Association, George Phillips, M. Rice, H. J. Smith, W. L. Van Deusen & Co., Westfield Cigar Company, H. S. Woodworth, and M. Worthington & Son.

STEAM HEATERS.

Two firms are largely engaged in the manufacture of steam heaters, radiators, etc. Messrs. H. B. Smith & Co., successors of H. B. Smith, who started in this trade in Westfield, have a capital of $100,000, and are located on Main Street, Westfield village, in a brick manufactory which cost upward of $40,000. They employ about 60 people. The Laflin Manufacturing Company is also extensively occupied in similar manufacture.

CHURCH ORGANS.

Westfield enjoys distinction as a place where some of the finest and largest church organs are manufactured. Specimens of the product in this direction may be seen in many magnificent churches, and it is believed to be generally understood that Westfield church organs take rank with the best manufactures. Johnson & Son and Steer & Turner are engaged in this department of manufacture, in which about 100 persons are employed, and a capital of from $100,000 to $150,000 invested. Johnson & Son occupy a commodious manufactory on the Westfield River, in Westfield village, and, near by, Steer & Turner carried on their enterprise until their works were utterly swept away by the flood of December, 1878. They are now (1879) located on Mechanics Street.

PAPER-MILLS.

Crane Brothers are engaged on Little River, near Westfield village, in the manufacture of bank-ledger, record, and "all-linen" papers, linen-fibre baskets, etc., and machine belting. This firm is famous for the production of fine paper, and is the only firm that manufactures Crane's patent linen-fibre baskets for plantation, household, and business use. The Messrs. Crane removed from Ballston Spa in 1869 to Westfield, and in that year purchased the mill property of Taylor & Stiles, then occupying the site of Crane Bros.' present mill, and devoted to the manufacture of paper belting. The new firm materially enlarged the mill and continued to use it for the production of belting. In 1870 the mill was destroyed by fire, and in less than a twelvemonth was replaced by the present fine brick structure. The main building, two stories and basement in height, measures 130 by 50 feet; the rag-room, two stories and basement, is 75 by 40 feet, and the machine-room, one story high, is 80 by 30 feet. The mill trimmings, three carriage-makers, three civil engineers, two coal dealers, five clothiers, two express companies, six confectioners, five dentists, three restaurateurs, three sash-and-blind makers, one drain-tile dealer, eight dry-goods dealers, one dyer, three fish dealers, three florists, two flouring-mills, one property, including machinery, etc., represents an invested capital of $100,000; 75 persons are employed, and two tons of paper are manufactured daily.

The Pultze Walkley Company, whose paper-mills are on Little River, near Westfield village, began there in 1872 the manufacture of manilla-paper, in a frame mill purchased that year of Samuel Horton, who had for some time been engaged in manilla-paper making. This frame mill was burned in 1875, and in the same year was succeeded by the present substantial brick structure, built on the same site. The main building, two stories in height, is 30 feet in width, and the machine-room, one story in height, 26 feet wide, both structures having a length on the river of 110 feet. The company has an invested capital of $70,000 in this mill, employs 10 men, and manufactures daily 2600 pounds of manilla-paper.

THE MANUFACTURERS' CORPORATE ASSOCIATION was organized in 1871, with a capital of $50,000, for the purpose of furnishing steam- or water-power to such manufacturers as might desire to be thus provided. The company built a dam in Little River, and in conducting the water-power through Westfield village, and to factories, use the bed of the old canal, which was many years ago a transportation highway between New Haven and Northampton. The president of the company is James H. Bryan, and the secretary R. B. Robinson. This corporation owns the fine brick edifice occupied by the Hampden Whip Company, as well as other similar property.

MISCELLANEOUS MANUFACTURES.

Among these may be mentioned that of the Vitrified Wheel and Emery Company, organized in 1873, with a capital of $100,000; the pianoforte-leg factory of Chas. N. Stimpson, the paper-box factories of Brown & Hutchinson and T. B. Seymour, and the cigar-box factories of Peter Calens and P. L. Reilly. Bricks are made by L. B. Walkley and S. P. Harrison, cotton batting by J. Olmstead & Co., distilled spirits by G. H. Bush & Co., whip machinery, etc., by Emerson Sizer, and steam-engines by Lyman Wheeler.

The other mercantile and professional pursuits of the town are represented by four dealers in agricultural implements, five druggists, four architects, six attorneys, four auctioneers, four wood-turners, two bakers, five blacksmiths, four book-binders, six boot and shoe dealers, two building-movers, fifteen master-carpenters, three carpet dealers, one manufacturer of cask undertaker, one furniture dealer, twenty grocers, eight hair-dressers, three hardware dealers, five harness-shops, eight hotel-keepers, three ice dealers, eleven insurance agents, one laundryman, eight liverymen, six lumber dealers, three machinists, two marble-works, eight butchers, five merchant tailors, two news-rooms, two photographers, fourteen physicians, and five jewelers.

Westfield is a rich agricultural town, and contains within its borders vast tracts of excellent grazing-lands. Swamp, sandy plain, and mountain furnish a great variety of soil, which in the three sections yields bounteous crops of vegetables of nearly all kinds. It is claimed that Westfield produces sixty varieties of meadow-grass, and that of these some are found only in this locality.

BANKS.

There are two national banks in the town, with a capital of $400,000.

THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK, organized in 1864, with a capital of $150,000, was, in 1865, consolidated with the Westfield Bank (organized in 1851, with a capital of $100,000), does business as the First National, and has $250,000 capital. This bank has a line of deposits of $118,500.

THE HAMPDEN NATIONAL BANK, organized in 1825 as a State bank, and in 1865 as a national bank, has a capital of $150,000, and a deposit account of $115,000.

The Westfield Savings-Bank, organized in 1853, has on deposit $680,000.

The deposits in the Woronoco Savings-Bank, organized in 1871, amount to $592,000.

RAILROADS.

Two railroads—the Boston and Albany and the New Haven and Northampton—cross at Westfield village, an important depot on both lines. During October, 1878, the receipts of the former at Westfield station, for passengers, were $3431. During the same time 1411 tons of local freight were forwarded, and 1326 tons received. The passenger receipts of the New Haven and Northampton Railroad at Westfield for the same period were $2000. Two thousand two hundred and fifty tons of local and through freight were received, and 650 tons forwarded.

Westfield is also directly connected with Holyoke by the Holyoke and Westfield Railroad.

WATER-WORKS, Etc.

Westfield is proud of her water-works system, and, although the enterprise cost the town nearly $250,000, it has always been considered a valuable investment, chiefly because it offers excellent facilities for the prompt extinguishment of fires, and it was this motive which was the primary cause of the creation of the works. The town was authorized by the Legislature, in 1873, to construct water-works. They were begun the same year, and completed in 1874. The storage reservoir, located in Montgomery, occupies an elevation of 771.38 feet above the park, in Westfield, covers 51 acres, and has a capacity of 184,000,000 gallons.

Among the corporations may also be mentioned the Westfield Gas Company, incorporated in 1860, with a capital of $54,000, and the Westfield Mutual Fire Insurance Company, which, since its incorporation, in 1852, has been remarkably prosperous.

THE PRESS.

The Hampden Register, issued Feb. 18, 1824, by Maj. Joseph Root, was the first newspaper published in Westfield. The paper was Federal in politics at the outset, but upon a change of proprietorship, April, 1827, N. W. Smith and John B. Eldridge (the latter the original publisher of the Hampden Whig, of Springfield) assuming control, Democratic tendencies soon began to appear in its columns, and its patronage fell away. Mr. Smith withdrew the following September, and in November, 1828, Eldridge relinquished the journal into the hands of its original proprietor, Maj. Root. The latter lost no time, however, in disposing of his interest to J. D. Huntington, who, changing its name to the Westfield Register, and its politics to Whig, conducted it until Nov. 29, 1831, when it was discontinued.

In the interim—1828 and 1829—Emerson Davis, preceptor of the academy, published a small periodical called the Scholar's Journal, and on Sept. 10, 1833, the town having for two years been without a newspaper, Joseph Bull issued the first number of the Westfield Journal. Until April, 1835, it was neutral in politics, but at that time Norman T. Leonard, purchasing it, changed the name to the Democratic Herald, and its politics were, of course, appropriate to its title. It lived, however, only about a twelvemonth after the change.

About this time—April, 1836—The Talisman, published in quarto form, was issued by H. B. Smith. Its existence was limited to three months, although, as tradition has it, it did not die for lack of support.

After another blank of nearly three years, Calvin Torrey issued the Westfield Spectator in April, 1839, and, although its politics were Democratic, it received, during the first year of its existence, liberal support from members of both parties. In October, 1841, Dr. William O. Bell bought the paper, and shortly afterward changed its name to the Woronoco Palladium. He continued it under that name until the latter part of 1843, when he resold it to Mr. Torrey, its first proprietor, who changed the name back to The Spectator, but it failed of success, and expired in 1844.

Meanwhile, on the 28th of February, 1841, Elijah Porter established the Westfield News-Letter, which, as it afterward proved, was the only paper of Westfield birth that enjoyed anything like a prolonged and healthy existence.

About this time, too, the Westfield Courier, The Jeffersonian, and The Repository—a school journal—illuminated the horizon of local journalism, but passed speedily away after brief and feeble struggles.

The News-Letter prospered from the outset, and, in 1847, Samuel H. Davis, a son of Dr. Emerson Davis, of Westfield, became a partner with Mr. Porter in the enterprise. He remained, however, only until November, 1848, when he left to take the position of assistant editor of the Springfield Republican. Mr. Porter conducted the paper alone until August, 1851, when Mr. P. L. Buell, now the librarian of the Westfield Athenaeum, purchased a half-interest and assumed the editorial reins. In August, 1852, A. T. Dewey was taken in as a partner, but he withdrew, in 1854, to start The Wide-Awake American,—a Know-Nothing paper,—which, after a year's existence in Westfield, was removed to Springfield.

Porter & Buell continued The News-Letter in company until 1855, when H. N. Carter purchased Mr. Porter's interest, and Buell & Carter carried the publication forward to February, 1861, Mr. Buell having, as before, continued to be chief editor. Mr. Buell—buying Mr. Carter's interest in 1861—published on his account until November, 1871, when he sold to Sherman Adams, who was its proprietor until July, 1874, when, by Adams' sale, The Western Hampden Times, which was started in 1869, by Clark & Story, effected a consolidation with The News-Letter, and the paper has since then been continued as The Times and News-Letter, under Clark & Story's proprietorship. Mr. Buell, former editor of The News-Letter, has, since 1874, been agricultural editor of The Times and News-Letter.

Besides the newspapers here mentioned may be noted The Westfield Standard, a Democratic journal, which, first issued in 1845, was owned by a stock company, and edited successively until December, 1848, by Hiram A. Beebe, J. D. Bates, and Wm. W. Whitman. At the last-mentioned date, James M. Ely bought it, but sold it to Gilbert W. Cobb in 1852. Mr. Cobb edited it two years, when it was discontinued. Shortly after his retirement from The News-Letter, Mr. Sherman Adams began the issue of a small paper called The Westfield Advertiser, and this he still continues. It may be well to note that the newspapers herein mentioned were all weekly journals.

THE FOREST AND STREAM CLUB,

The interests of the club at the pond are carefully guarded, and thither each year the club members repair for a season of excellent angling sport.

The Western Hampden Agricultural Society, organized in 1854, has since that time held annual agricultural fairs on the society's grounds, at Westfield, and on these yearly occasions the town has always donned its holiday attire to honor the display of its rich possessions as a farming region. The Westfield Club, a social organization, dates its existence from the year 1875, and bears upon its membership roll the names of 60 of the best-known citizens of the town. The club occupies handsomely furnished quarters in the post-office building. C. K. Lamson is the president, and Isaac N. Weston secretary and treasurer. There are also the Westfield Musical Association, and two bands known respectively as Greene's Serenade Band and the Westfield Cornet Band.

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

Westfield has an efficient fire department, which, as often demonstrated, has performed valuable service, and that result has in no small measure been assisted by the excellent system of water-works provided by the town. The department was organized in 1848, and includes now in its stock of apparatus four hose-carts, two extinguishers, one hand-engine, one hook-and-ladder truck, and one steam fire-engine. The department numbers 64 members, divided as follows: Hose No. 1, H. T. Snow, foreman, 12 men; Hose No. 2, Geo. C. Parker, foreman, 12 men; Hose No. 3, John Warren, foreman, 12 men; Extinguisher No. 1, Geo. Miller, foreman, 7 men; Extinguisher No. 2, Carlos Pember, foreman, 8 men; Hook-and-Ladder No. 1, Geo. For the month of October, 1878, the money-order department of the office paid 240 orders, aggregating $4394.71, and issued 259 orders, amounting to $2968.31. The present postmaster (1879) is Hon. THE SOLDIERS' MONUMENT.

A conspicuous feature in the embellishments of the village is the soldiers' monument, which stands at the junction of Court, Elm, and Broad Streets. The base, composed of granite, is 10 feet in height, and surmounting it is the bronze figure—8 feet high—of an American soldier "on guard." The four faces of the die forming part of the base are adorned, one with the dedicatory inscription,— "Westfield honors her sons, fallen in the defense of liberty, union, and independence."

A second, with the coat-of-arms of Massachusetts; a third, with the coat-of-arms of the United States; and a fourth with a list of the names of the 66 soldiers who lost their lives in the struggle. The names are—

The monument was dedicated May 31, 1871, and in the exercises of the day a large concourse of citizens from neighboring towns took part with the inhabitants of Westfield. There was a military procession in the morning, an out-door banquet at noon, whereat 1000 persons sat down, and the unveiling of the monument in the afternoon, incidental to which Hon. E. B. H Harrison Prominently identified with the interests of his native town and county was the honored subject of this sketch. Hiram Harrison was born in the east mountain district of the town of Westfield, March, 1807. His parents were Reuben Harrison and Nancy Baldwin, both of whom were descendants of very early settlers. He was educated at the district schools of his native town, and there laid the foundation for his subsequent successful business career. His father was a farmer, and the son also followed that honorable calling until he became twenty-one years of age. It was at this time, while on the old homestead, that he commenced the whip and cigar business in company with Boardman Noble. The whips and cigars were all made by hand. Mr. Noble made the articles, and Mr. Harrison traversed the country selling them, little dreaming, doubtless, of the future gigantic development of the business. It required but little time, however, for the keen eye of Harrison to discern that with the growth of our country the demand for these articles would increase, and he soon after removed to West Springfield, and, although purchasing a farm, continued the manufacture of cigars and whips.

The small town of West Springfield could not, however, long retain the active and ambitious young manufacturer, who now saw the future rapid growth of the business, and after remaining here a time he removed to the village of Westfield, and purchased what is now known as the "Harrison Place," on the corner of Main and Cross Streets. He at once entered largely into the manufacture of whips and cigars, and the rapid increase of the business only confirmed his predictions of years previously, and not many years elapsed ere his establishment was the largest of the kind in this country. He continued the business a number of years, having various persons from time to time associated with him, when with other firms in the town he organized the American Whip Company, and he was chosen its president. This was then, and is now, the largest concern of the kind in the world, having its salesrooms in every large city in the United States. Mr. Harrison remained president of this company until 1868, when he retired from active business.

At the age of twenty-one, while he was still making whips and cigars by hand on the old homestead in the east mountain district, he was married to Martha, daughter of Samuel Lee, of Westfield. Their family consisted of the following, viz.: Juliette (deceased), wife of C. I. Snow, of Westfield; Martha Ann, married Capt. Lucius F. Thayer, a prominent citizen, and resides in Westfield; Izetta, married J. H. Waterman, M.D., a practicing physician in Westfield, and died in 1874; Hiram, the fourth child, died in infancy.

Hiram-Harrison was a self-made man.

"Honor and fame from no condition rise;
Act well your part, there all the honor lies."

He was a consistent Christian, and, in the language of one who had known him well for years, "If there ever lived in this country a man who was possessed of the Christian graces, that man was Hiram Harrison." His charities were almost boundless; they were both great and small. The poor man will not soon forget how his heart was gladdened on Thanksgiving mornings by the turkey left at his door by Mr. Harrison in person; and the citizens of Westfield will ever cherish his memory for the interest he manifested in all matters concerning the public welfare, and for the fine library-building which, during the last years of his life, he erected and donated to the village. Politically he was originally a Democrat, but finally a Republican. He manifested an interest in political matters so far as they affected the welfare of the people, and represented his town in the Legislature. In religious and educational matters he also manifested the same general interest, and was ever found leading in all movements having for their aim the good of the community wherein he resided. He was formerly a Methodist, and subsequently a member of the Congregational Church.

His was an active, and in many respects an eventful, career. Death at last laid his hand upon the strong man, and in January, 1869, he passed away.

"The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth, ere gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour:
The paths of glory lead but to the grave."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

HON. WM. GELSTON BATES, oldest child of Elijah Bates, was born at Westfield, Mass., Nov. 17, 1803. At an early age he attended the academy, then a flourishing institution, in his native town. He graduated at Yale College, class of 1825, and commenced the study of law in his father's office, at Westfield, and after a short time attended graduated at Yale College, in the class of 1794, and established himself in the practice of law in Westfield.

He was, for many years, one of the only two lawyers in that town. His mother was Hannah Church, who died at Granville, Nov. 29, 1840, at the age of ninety-one. His father was Capt. Nathaniel Bates. Elijah Bates married Mary Ash-the law-school of Hon. Elijah H. Mills and Judge Howe, at Northampton, Mass. During his residence there he was a student in the office of Hon. John H. Ashmun and Mr. Mills.

He was duly admitted to the Bar of Hampden County, in August, 1828, and began practice in Westfield, succeeding to the business of his father, who retired to his farm.

His father, Elijah Bates, was born in Granville, Mass.; and ley, the oldest daughter of Dr. Israel Ashley, a graduate of Yale, of the class of 1767.

Wm. G. Bates married Jane P. Ashley, only child of Maj. Wm. Ashley, of Ashley Falls, Sheffield, Mass., Oct. 20, 1830. They lost five children in infancy, and three survive. One is the wife of James C. Greenough, of Providence; one the wife of Edward E. Hardy, of Boston; and one is unmarried.

At the time of Mr. Bates' admission to the Bar the trial of cases was in the hands of a few leading counselors. Hon. Isaac C. Bates and Elijah H. Mills, both of Northampton, attended the courts in Hampden, and monopolized the trials of the most important causes. The late Judge Dewey and Judge Daniel Wells and a few of the older lawyers of Hampden County were occasionally called in, but the younger part of the profession were compelled to sit by and witness the efforts of these leading counselors. A circumstance occurred early in the professional practice of Mr. Bates which was extremely favorable to his success.

A suit was commenced by a plaintiff against one of Mr. Bates' friends, on a writ of right, for the recovery of a large tract of land. A trial had been had a few years before between the same parties, in a writ of entry, in which the defendant had prevailed and the plaintiff was non-suited.

Hon. Isaac C. Bates was the counsel of the defendant in that suit, and the defendant instructed his attorney to employ him again in the present action. Unfortunately the attorney omitted to retain him, and when the court began, not only he as the leading counsel did not appear, but the attorney himself was absent, and the defendant was without any counsel. In this dilemma he applied to Mr. Bates, and was informed by him that he had not been admitted to the Supreme Judicial Court, and was not entitled to appear in the case. As the cause was being disposed of, Mr. Bates took the liberty to state to the judge (Wilde) the situation of the defendant. He inquired of Mr. I. C. Bates if he was intending to engage in the trial of the action. He replied in the negative, and said that his partner was engaged to try it. "Very well," said the judge, "though it is irregular, let Mr. Dewey appear for the plaintiff, and you take the defense." Thereupon the plaintiff said, "I have employed the firm of Bates & Dewey, and I object to the appearance of Mr. Bates for the defense." The sharp gray eyes of the judge lighted up with excitement, as he perceived the device by which the plaintiff had prevented the defendant from enjoying the assistance of his former counsel. "Under the extraordinary circumstances," said he, "I will postpone this trial till to-morrow, and in the mean time you can employ new counsel, and be ready for trial in the morning." The defendant accordingly employed counsel, and engaged Mr. William G. Bates to examine the record of title, and to perform such assistance as he could do at the trial. The next morning the new counsel made a strong effort to procure a continuance; but the judge, to whom cases of that sort were familiar, and who felt that the reluctance of the counsel was rather feigned than real, refused the motion, and the case came on for trial.

Mr. Bates had in the mean time examined the record, and read, with more interest than usual, "Jackson on Real Actions," and during the trial he made such suggestions to the counsel as his information enabled him. At the termination of it the counsel again pressed a motion for a continuance, and they reflected severely upon the conduct of the plaintiff in preventing the defendant from having the assistance of the Hon. I. C. Bates, but the court refused the motion and ordered the trial to proceed; and when both the counsel refused to argue the case the judge said, "Let young Mr. Bates argue it." He excused himself as unprepared, and as not having been admitted to the Bar. The judge said, "Mr. Clerk, admit Mr. Bates as a counselor of this court. And now," said he, "address the jury." While Mr. Bates stood apparently hesitating as to what was to be done, the members of the Bar spoke encouragingly to him, and his relative and friend, the Hon. I. C. Bates, said to him, "Get up and go to the jury; you'll never have another such a chance, if you live a thousand years!" Young Mr. Bates accordingly proceeded to comment upon the law and the evidence, and the result was a partial success, which was a surprise to every one. Mr. Bates reaped a great advantage from this extemporaneous effort. It gave his friends confidence in him, and, what was more, it gave him confidence in himself. It broke up, to some extent, the custom of the older practitioners in arguing the cases, and he, as well as his associates of his own age, began to try and argue their own cases.

He was soon after appointed one of the two masters in chancery in the county, and occasionally cases in equity were referred to him for examination, whereby his knowledge of equity practice was enlarged, and his practice increased. In the year 1839 he was appointed one of the members of the board of education for the period of eight years. The appointment was made soon after the establishment of the board.

A bitter strife had at once sprung up in relation to the appointment of the original members, and their conduct was rigidly criticised and censured by those opposed to them on theological grounds. Mr. Bates took an active part in the defense of his associates on the board, and by controversial articles in the newspapers, by his reports in the board and to the Legislature, he vindicated the correctness of their conduct and the wisdom of their appointments.

One of the complaints against the board was the alleged ground that they had failed to recommend the use of the Bible as a reading-book in the common schools. Mr. Bates was appointed by the board to draw up the eighth annual report. It was adopted by the board in December, 1844, and contained an able exposition of the views of the board and of the public on that subject. The controversy soon ceased, and has not since been renewed.

In 1840 he was elected to the Senate of the commonwealth from Hampden County, and he was subsequently elected for two years to the council, for the years 1844 and 1845.

In the year 1868 he was elected to the House of Representatives from the District No. 10.

In the year 1853 he was appointed district attorney for the Western District of Massachusetts, consisting of the four western counties; but, finding that the duties of the office encroached so much upon the other duties of his profession, he resigned it after a year's trial. During his term he gave his official assistance to Rufus Choate, the attorney-general, and in his absence he conducted, in his place, the trial of an indictment for murder in the case of the Commonwealth versus Adeline Bass, or Phelps, for the murder of her father, in which case the defendant was acquitted by reason of insanity; the inducing motive for the conduct of the jury probably being that the shrewdness of the defendant herself in her address to them created the belief that she was not in the exercise of her reason.

Besides the professional labors of Mr. Bates, he has made and published the following: An address at the laying of the corner-stone of the new academy in Westfield; an address at the dedication of the Normal school-house at Bridgewater; an address at the bi-centennial celebration of the settlement of the town of Westfield, with a history of the proceedings of the celebration, and an address at the dedication of the court-house in Springfield, published by the county commissioners at the request of the Bar. The last named contains a sketch of the members of the court and the early members of the Bar, with its early history. Mr. Bates has been for a number of years the president of the Bar and of the Law Association of Hampden County. His eminence was won by unremitting labors in his professional practice. Between 1840 and 1860, he probably tried more cases before court and jury than any other lawyer in Western Massachusetts. But notwithstanding his professional labors he was called to the performance of much service for the public. As a zealous politician he frequently addressed large assemblies of the people on political subjects, and his zeal in the cause of education led him to deliver frequent lectures on literary subjects before educational conventions and agricultural societies. He was the president of the Westfield Bank from its incorporation till its merger with the First National Bank of the town of Westfield, and after that time till he resigned the office.

At the decease of the Rev. Emerson Davis he was elected as his successor, and remains to this day the president of the board of trustees of the time-honored Westfield Academy.

COL. DAVID MOSELEY*

was born in Westfield, Mass., March 6, 1798, at the old homestead, where he passed his days, and where he died, Aug. 26, 1871. He was a descendant of the ancient and respectable family of this name, who came to Westfield in 1777, and who originally settled in Dorechester, Mass. His educational advantages were such as were afforded by the common schools and Westfield Academy, which was then a flourishing institution.

Col. Moseley was interested in all social and political matters which concerned his native town, and was active in all questions of public improvement. There was probably no person in Westfield whose advice was more respected and sought for by his neighbors; and he was constantly consulted as a referee in disputed matters. He was also in frequent requisition as administrator and executor of estates; was interested in education and in institutions designed to promote it; was for some years chairman of the school committee of the town; and was also one of the trustees of Westfield Academy. He was for several years one of the board of selectmen and assessors; in 1841 he served as representative in the Legislature; and in 1851 was a member of the Senate of Massachusetts. In 1828 he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of artillery in the first brigade and fourth division of the militia of the commonwealth. He was a member of the New England Agricultural Society, and in the cultivation of his large and valuable farm took a deep interest in agriculture, especially the growing of choice fruit and forest-trees.

He had a hereditary attachment to the chain and compass of the surveyor. The old account-books of his ancestors have many records of the perambulations of town lines, and of surveying "tiers" and sections of land, and he was himself familiar with all the roads and bridges of the vicinity, and suggested many improvements in the highways and country roads. He was a man of decided convictions and fearless in the expression of them, whether or not they tallied with public opinion. He had a profound reverence for God and the Bible, and was liberal in his views, with a happy flow of spirits and a genial hospitality toward all the scions of the family-tree, who constantly drifted back to the old homestead.

The home dwelling is interesting as a well-preserved specimen of an old-time mansion. There is an older Moseley homestead, which was formerly called "the mansion-house," and which was built by the great-grandfather of the late Col. David Moseley upon the same estate which has been preserved to the Moseley name for more than two hundred years. This older house is remarkable, from the fact that fourteen brides have been married in one of its parlors, all bearing the name of Moseley, being the daughters of the house for four successive generations. But the one which we illustrate preserves the paneled walls, corner-cupboards, old-fashioned window-seats, lofty garret, with spinning-wheels and loom, and ancient ease of drawers, black with time; and above all, the huge central chimney, which radiated bright comfort from its wide fireplaces, where the firewood still burns,—remembered with warm hearts by all who have received its hospitality and good cheer.

Col. Moseley was married, Jan. 24, 1823, to Silence, daughter of Reuben and Silence Ely Champion, of West Springfield. Their children were Adelia, born Jan. 14, 1824, and married, Sept. 22, 1852, to Owen Rockwell.† Henry Champion, born March 23, 1826; married Susan Ellis Benton. Flavia Isabella, born Oct. 28, 1829; married Josiah C. Robinson, Dec. 25, 1860. Maria, born Dec. 12, 1831; married Alonzo Whitney, February, 1869. David Noble, born April 3, 1833; married Mary, daughter of Solomon Phelps, May, 1865. Edward, born March 3, 1835. Benjamin Franklin, born July 25, 1838; died June 29, 1842. Thomas Benton, born Dec. 27, 1840; married Clara, daughter of George H. Moseley, Oct. 25, 1876.

Col. Moseley had many traits of the old English gentlemen from whom he was descended, and those who knew him at his own fireside could best appreciate his worth. His remains rest in the ancient burying-ground of his native town, where the dust of five generations has found a common abiding-place.

MILTON BURRALL WHITNEY,

an attorney and counselor-at-law by profession, at Westfield, was born in the east parish of Granville, Hampden Co., Mass., Oct. 6, 1825. He is of English descent, his ancestors having emigrated from the mother-country to New England early in the last century.

His great-grandfather, Uriah Whitney, served as a private in the Continental army in the Revolutionary war, and was taken prisoner by the English at the battle of White Plains, N. Y. Owing to the limited pecuniary means of his parents, Mr. Whitney enjoyed simply the advantages of an ordinary common-school education in his youth, yet at the early age of sixteen he was well qualified to teach in the district schools, in which pursuit he met with marked success. By the advice of Rev. Timothy M. Cooley, D.D., the pastor of the Congregational Church in East Granville, who was a fine classical scholar and a successful teacher, and who took a deep interest in his welfare, he was induced to commence the study of the classics, preparatory to admission to college.

He pursued his preparatory studies under the direction of his friend, Dr. Cooley, much of the time at home, walking a distance of four miles nearly every day to recite, until he entered the sophomore class, Williams College, in 1846. Although compelled, in order to procure the funds necessary to prosecute his studies, to be absent from college for the purpose of teaching one term each year, during his collegiate course, yet he was graduated with high honors in the class of 1849, one of the largest and ablest classes which ever graduated at the college.

After graduation he taught two years, and then entered as a student the law-office of Bates & Gillett, in Westfield, Mass. He was admitted to the Bar at Springfield, Mass., in June, 1853, and immediately afterward formed a law partnership with Hon. Wm. G. Bates, with whom he continued in practice about twelve years. He is now the senior partner in the law firm of Whitney & Dunbar, and has for several years been one of the leading members of the Hampden County Bar. He has resided in Westfield, Mass., since his admission to the Bar.

Although claiming to be independent in politics, he has almost invariably voted and acted with the Republican party since its organization. He was elected to the Massachusetts Senate from the western Hampden Senatorial district in the fall of 1861, receiving all but one hundred and four votes cast, having the largest majority ever cast for any candidate in the district. Although one of the youngest members of the Senate he was appointed chairman of two important committees, and a member of several others, and discharged the duties with credit.

* The names Maudsley, Maudesley, Modesly, Madsly, Moseley, and Mosley have been indifferently applied to the same persons and places. In the earlier records of Westfield, Maudsley is frequently used, and Madsly is inscribed upon some of the time-worn monuments in the old burying-ground.

† Mrs. Rockwell is somewhat celebrated as a genealogist, and has completed an excellent genealogy of the Moseley family.

He was re-elected the following year by a handsome majority; was appointed a member of the committee on the judiciary, and chairman of the committee on Federal Relations, and took an active and leading part in the important legislation demanded by the war of the Rebellion. He was elected in the fall of 1868 as Presidential elector of the Tenth Congressional District of Massachusetts.

He is now and has been for several years past a trustee and secretary of the Westfield Savings-Bank, a director of the First National Bank of Westfield, and also a director in several manufacturing corporations. He has been a trustee and chairman of the library committee of the Westfield Athenaeum since its organization, and has always taken a deep interest in its prosperity; and the choice collection of books upon its shelves is largely due to his discriminating and scholarly taste.

Although his time and talents have been largely given to his profession, yet Mr. Whitney has taken an active interest in all enterprises tending to promote the social, intellectual, and moral prosperity of the town in which he resides.

HENRY J. BUSH,

son of Jason Bush and Miranda Noble, was born in Westfield, Mass., April 20, 1819. His ancestors on the paternal side were among the pioneers of his native town. His mother was the granddaughter of Capt. David Noble, of Pittsfield, who rendered efficient service in the colonial army during the Revolutionary struggle. He was generous and patriotic, and at his own expense recruited, armed, and equipped a company of infantry.

The childhood of Henry Bush was spent in his native town, and at the early age of fourteen he began life for himself by entering the whip-factory of Martin Day as an apprentice. Here he remained for some time, applying himself with diligence and attention. In 1839 he formed a copartnership for the manufacture of whips with his older brother, Charles Bush, and John Miller, under the firm-name of C. Bush & Co. At the expiration of one year—he being at that time only twenty-one years of age—he disposed of his interest in this firm, and formed a partnership in the same business with Emerson Howe, under the style of Howe & Bush. Two years later this firm was dissolved, and Mr. Bush then entered into partnership with Hiram Harrison, an old and successful whip-manufacturer, with whom he continued until 1855, when the American Whip Company was organized, with a capital of $100,000. Mr. Bush was a director and large stockholder, and was appointed superintendent of the company. He brought to this position a thorough knowledge of the business, and discharged its duties with credit to himself and to the satisfaction of the corporation, and upon the retirement of Mr. Harrison was chosen to the presidency of the company. He has also officiated as treasurer, and is now vice-president and manager.

He is not only thorough and active in his business, but also manifests a lively interest in all matters looking to the public welfare. In 1863 he was a member of the Legislature, and again in 1865. He has been a director of the First National Bank for many years, and is connected with the Savings-Bank. He is also president of the Jessup & Lafflin Paper Company, manufacturers of fine writing- and ledger-paper.

Politically, Mr. Bush is a Republican, which he has been since the organization of that party. He has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church since early manhood, and has contributed liberally to the advancement of religious interests. He was prominently identified with the movement to erect a new church building, and aided largely in the building of the present fine edifice, which was completed in 1876 at a cost of $53,000.

In 1842 he united in marriage with Elizabeth A. Howe, a native of Concord, Mass. Their family consists of one son, Andrew L. Bush, a resident of Westfield.

GEORGE GRENVILLE TUCKER, M.D.,

whose steel portrait accompanies this sketch, was born in the town of Warren, Worcester Co., Mass., June 21, 1834, where his father was at that time engaged in developing the manufacturing interests of that region. His parents removing to Cambridge when the son was five years old, he came at once under the fine educational influences of that renowned university town, which he was not slow to improve, and he finished here his classical education, attaining a high rank in his class.

A love of natural science and a habit of close and accurate observation early turned his attention to the profession of medicine, and at the age of sixteen years we find him an enthusiastic and hard-working student in that department, making special effort in clinical observation, thus seeing exemplified in practice what he had learned in theory. This strong desire to study disease as it actually existed led him naturally to the hospital, and in 1852, when only eighteen years of age, he received a unanimous appointment by the trustees of the Massachusetts General Hospital as one of the resident officers of that institution, several candidates competing for the situation. A reappointment for three successive years evinced the success of his administration. During this time Dr. Tucker was a member of the medical department of Harvard University, and also of the Tremont Medical School, an institution distinguished as the one that first inaugurated a more thorough system of medical education. Its teachers were the professors of the university and some of the most prominent physicians of Boston, and the ranks of European celebrities were frequently drawn upon to furnish special courses of lectures.

In the spring of 1855, after the usual thorough examination, in which he attained high rank, Dr. Tucker found himself, at the age of twenty years, in possession of the degree of Doctor of Medicine, conferred by Harvard University. After engaging for a year in private practice in Boston, he yielded to a long-cherished desire and visited Europe, where he had the opportunity in Paris of witnessing the splendid exploits of Velpeau, the Napoleon of surgery, and also of profiting by the teachings of the other distinguished men in various departments of medicine in that city and in London, who were at that time shedding such brilliant light in the scientific firmament. While in Europe, Dr. Tucker yielded to a flattering invitation to accept a position on the medical staff in the Russian service. But while preparing to depart for the Crimea, the peace congress was announced, whose deliberations at Paris were quickly followed by a cessation of hostilities.

Dr. Tucker has recently made a second and more prolonged visit to Europe, accompanied by his family, spending most of his time in Germany, now the medical centre, instead of France, as was the case at the time of his first visit.

Dr. Tucker married, Sept. 5, 1861, Miss Sarah Maria Langdon, of Westfield, granddaughter of the late Abner Post, Esq., and great-granddaughter of the late Judges Samuel and Sylvester Gilbert, of Connecticut, a lady peculiarly fitted both by nature and culture for the companionship of a professional man. A bright and promising little boy, adopted by them in 1872, worthily receives their parental care.

Early in his professional career, Dr. Tucker recognized the fact that no man can successfully serve two masters, and consequently his whole time has been devoted to the study and treatment of disease, firmly declining flattering offers of professorships and official positions, and never indulging in business pursuits or political aspirations.

Dr. Tucker extends a warm right hand to all educated and honest workers in the medical profession, but charlatany and pretension have ever received from him the severest treatment. Few men in the vigor of early manhood can look back upon the professional experience of a quarter of a century as can the subject of this sketch (now in the prime of life), with that sturdy mental and physical constitution which he inherits from his English ancestors, many of whom have attained distinction in the various professions, in literature and in politics, and whose strong originality of character found in this country perhaps the best representative in the person of Samuel Tucker, who was commissioned in the American navy, May 15, 1777; commanded the frigate "Boston," in which he conveyed John Adams, minister to France, to his destination in February, 1778; aided in the defense of Charleston, S. C.; and in 1781 took command of the "Thorn," with which he made many prizes, and received the thanks of Congress at the close of the war. He was for several years a member of the Legislatures of Maine and Massachusetts, and in 1812 captured by stratagem a British vessel which had greatly annoyed American shipping.

Dr. Tucker's paternal grandmother was Miss Olive Hartwell, of Stoughton, whose sister, Elizabeth, became the wife of Roger Sherman, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence.

Dr. Tucker's reputation and practice are not confined to the Connecticut Valley; he is constantly consulted by patients from distant parts of the country, sparing no effort or expense to keep himself thoroughly versed in the signal advances in medical science that are constantly occurring, and which render the profession of medicine of to-day so vastly different from that of a generation ago, and which is constantly tending toward the rank of one of the exact sciences.

In religious belief he is an orthodox Congregationalist, having united with that church while a student at Cambridge, where he worshiped in the congregation of Rev. Dr. Stearns, late president of Amherst College. Subsequently he became a member of the "Old South," at Boston, and superintendent of its Sunday-school, which, during his arduous duties at the hospital, afforded him on the Lord's day a certain amount of mental rest, which he thoroughly appreciated at this very busy period of his life.

Having the confidence and trust of the community to a rare degree, Dr. Tucker still actively pursues his professional work, which to him is most certainly a labor of love, keeping himself en rapport with the leading medical minds of this and the Old World, a multitude of whose portraits adorn the walls of his library, serving as most delightful companions, and as a suggestive "cloud of witnesses."

CHICOPEE.

GEOGRAPHICAL.

CHICOPEE* is the northwestern town of that portion of the county of Hampden lying east of the Connecticut River. It is bounded by the towns of Hadley and Granby on the north, by Ludlow on the east, and Springfield on the south. The Connecticut River on the west separates it from West Springfield. The town contains about 25 square miles, or 16,000 acres, is one hundred and one miles distant west from Boston, and three miles north from Springfield.

STREAMS.

The streams are the Connecticut and Chicopee Rivers. The Chicopee has its principal sources in the southeast part of the county of Franklin and west part of Worcester. It enters the town at the southeast angle, flows westerly through it, and joins the Connecticut about one mile north of the southwest angle. Its fall within the town is about 70 feet,† furnishing at Skenuwonuck or Chicopee Falls and at "Chicopee Centre" a vast power, which is utilized for manufacturing purposes. The water of this stream is dark, resembling that of Black River in New York, being colored by the deposits through which it flows. The surface is a rolling upland with a broad plain bordering the Connecticut, north of the Chicopee, in which stands the village of Willimansett. Chicopee‡ village, formerly "Cabotville," occupies chiefly the slopes and flat on the south side of the last named river, and near its mouth, while the village of Chicopee Falls, one and a half miles farther east, stands largely within a half-moon formed by the great bend of the same river to the northward.

SOIL.

The soil is chiefly sand or sandy loam, and is in general well adapted to fruit-growing.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

Nearly two hundred and twenty years ago the first pioneers came to settle near the "Chickkuppy" River, upon both sides of which the wilderness was dense and unbroken. Undoubtedly the very first to bear thither the axe of civilization were the brothers Japhet and Henry Chapin. These two young men were sons of Deacon Samuel Chapin, who was a native of England or Wales, and who settled in Springfield with his family, consisting of four sons and two daughters, in the year 1642, where another daughter was born in 1644.

Henry was probably the eldest of the two brothers, and married Bethia Cooley, daughter of Benjamin and Sarah Cooley, of Longmeadow, Dec. 5, 1664. Some years previous to his marriage he entered into a contract with John Pynchon, of Springfield, for the purchase of land in what is now the town of Chicopee, and on the north side of the river of that name. The following is a copy of the contract:

"March 9, 1659, sold to Henry Chapin 200 acres of land on ye Chickkuppy River, to run fro ye hills on ye east side to the Great river on ye west, and on the south it is to be bounded by and to join the Chickkuppy river,—only one twenty-five acres, or thirty, being by Chickkuppy river, about the place which shall be judged best for a warehous, is to be taken out and excepted out of the parcel; yet so as to be 200 acres is to be made up there together. Also, Henry is to have half of ye upper Island, which is to be as equally divided as can be, and also he is to have five acres of mowable meadow at the lower end of the muck-meadow.

"For all which he is to pay and allow me the sum of 20 pounds, in wheat at current prices, at four several payments, viz., five pounds by the first of March next, which will be anno 1660, and five pounds by the first of March, 1661, and another five pounds in 1662, and the last five pounds ye first of March, 1663,—all payments to be in wheat at prices current at the several times of payment.

* An Indian name with many orthographies, as "Chickkuppy," "Chickuppe," "Chickopee," "Chickapy," "Chicabee," "Chicenee."

† The mills at Chicopee appropriate thirty-six feet of the entire fall, and those at Chicopee Falls twenty-seven feet. The remainder of the seventy feet is above the latter village.

‡ Formerly "Cabot" or "Cabotville." The name "Chicopee" was assumed in 1848, when the town was formed. It is also called "Chicopee Centre." "Chicopee Junction" is that quarter of the village where the branch of the Connecticut River Railroad which leads to "Chicopee Falls" unites with the main line. The latter village for a time bore the name "Chicopee Factory."

RES. OF EMERSON GAYLORD, CHICOPEE, MASS.

This is the joint agreement betwixt us this 9th day of March, 1659, as witness our hands.

"HENRY CHAPIN,
"JOHN PYNCHON.

"Memorandum.—I promised Henry that if I did part with the 25 acres, or 30 acres, or with the Islands, he should have the offer of them."

Notwithstanding that his land thus purchased was on the north side of the Chicopee, it appears that he built his house on the south side of that river, on the north side of the present Ferry Street, at its junction with West Street, in the village of Chicopee, and "near the large elm." The house was burned in 1762. The residence formerly owned and occupied by William Chapin, one of Henry's descendants, was on nearly the same ground.* He was a prominent man, intimately connected with town affairs, and was a representative to the General Court in 1689. Tradition says that he was impressed into the British service, on board a man-of-war, and remained therein seven years, during which period he was engaged in a naval combat with the Dutch. He afterward commanded a merchantman, and made several voyages between London and Boston, but finally settled down in the latter city, from whence he came to Springfield, in or near 1659, the year of his purchase at Chicopee. Henry died Aug. 15, 1718. Bethia, his wife, died Dec. 11, 1711.

Their children were Henry, born June 1, 1666, died April 29, 1667; Sarah, born March 3, 1670, died Nov. 6, 1732,—was never married; Bethia, born Feb. 19, 1672, died —; Henry, born March 9, 1679, died Sept. 15, 1754; and Benjamin, born Feb. 2, 1682, died March 27, 1756.

Japhet was born in 1642, the same year his parents removed to Springfield. He married, July 22, 1664, Abilenah, daughter of Samuel Cooley, of Milford. She died Nov. 17, 1710, and was buried in the old burying-ground at Springfield, where recently a small stone marked her grave. He afterward married Dorothy Root, of Enfield, Conn., who survived him. He died Feb. 20, 1712, and was buried beside his first wife.

March 9, 1666, Deacon Samuel Chapin, his father, purchased of John Pynchon a tract of land embracing most of the river flats lying between the Chickuppee River and Willamansick Brook; and thereafter, April 16, 1673, his father conveyed to him a large part of the land so purchased. He probably remained a while in Milford before removing his bride and his possessions to join his brother in the wilderness, but he doubtless moved in as early as 1666, after his father's purchase from Mr. Pynchon. He built his house at the north end of what is now Chicopee Street, a little north and west of the house now owned by Joel Baker, where he had a charming view of the "Great River" and the hills beyond.

Henry was present at the great battle with the Indians at Turner's Falls in May, 1676. The following is his memorandum in an old account-book:

"I went out Volunteare against ingens the 17th of May, 1676, and we engaged battel the 19th of May in the morning before sunrise, and made great Spoil upon the enemy and came off the same day with the Los of 37 men and the Captain Turner, and came home the 20th of May."

Thomas Chapin, son of Japhet, was one of the original grantees of the large tract of land allotted in 1736 to the officers and soldiers concerned in this battle, and to their descendants. This tract is now the town of Bernardston.

Japhet had nine children, all by Abilenah, his first wife, viz., Samuel, born July 4, 1665; died Oct. 19, 1729. Sarah, born March 16, 1668; married Nathaniel Munn. Thomas, born May 10, 1671; died Aug. 27, 1755. John, born May 14, 1674; died June 1, 1759. Ebenezer, born June 26, 1677; died Dec. 13, 1772. Hannah, born July 18, 1680; married John Sheldon, of Deerfield; died —. David, born Nov. 16, 1682; died July 7, 1772. Jonathan, born Feb. 20, 1685; died March 1, 1686. Jonathan, born Sept. 23, 1688; died Feb. 23, 1761.

The eight sons of Henry and Japhet had each a large family, viz.: Henry, 10; Benjamin, 12; Samuel, 10; Thomas, 11; John, 8; Ebenezer, 13, of whom 11 were sons; David, 12, of whom 10 were sons; and Jonathan, 11, aggregating 87 grandchildren.

The eight sons died at an average age of eighty years. A large portion of the territory originally settled by the two brothers is now occupied by their descendants.

At the time of the settlement of Henry and Japhet in the Chicopee country the Indians had become hostile, and were a source of disquietude and alarm to the encroaching pale-faces, and to such a degree that arms were continually carried by the settlers, even to the meeting-house. To reach this they had to thread the pathless forest and ford the streams, for the nearest church was six miles distant. For many years the savages continued their warlike attitude toward this and other settlements, which culminated in the burning and massacre at Deerfield in 1704. The following incident is related concerning Hannah, the second daughter of Japhet Chapin, who had married John Sheldon, of Deerfield, Dec. 3, 1703, and removed with him to that place, where they were living in his father's house at the time of the memorable midnight attack by the Indians on the 29th of February ensuing. Unable to force an entrance to the house of Capt. Sheldon, the savages made a hole in the door, thrust in a musket, and shot the captain's wife. Hannah, with her husband, jumped from a chamber window; he escaped, but she, having sprained an ankle, was taken prisoner. She, with 111 other captives, including the minister, John Williams, and his family, was taken to Canada, and after two years redeemed. Hannah's mother seems to have had a foreboding respecting the proposed settlement of her daughter in a "frontier town," and, it is said, charged her to so make the dress upon which she was engaged that it would do "to wear into captivity."

Some time after his daughter's ill fortune, Japhet received from his brother Josiah the following letter of condolence:

"MENNON, April 8th, 1704.

"DEARE BROTHER,—I cannot with my pen express the concernedness of spirit that is in me for you and my dere cusen that is led captive by the barbarous heathen. God is by such dispensation trying the faith and patience of his children; it is therefore my dayly request that God will support her in body and spirit, and her bodely captivity may prove to her speretual enlargement, and that God will please to give you comfort in hope, knowing that God is able to find out a way for escape, tho no way appears to us. As abraham being called to offer up his son Isaac, who did it willingly, knowing that God was able to rais him from the dead. These afflictions arise not out of the dust, but there is a cause. We are redy to complaine of the french and Indian enemies but they are not the cause, but as it was sometime said to Jerusalem, yower wais and yower doings hath procured these things to thyself. so may new england say that our sins have brought the Sword of the wilderness upon us. I do therefore believe there must be a general Reformation before the rod of God will be taken off from us. Brother, I long to see you, and did intend to have given a visit this month, but multitud of busnis publik and pirtiguler throngs me, so that I have no prospect of coming this spring, though I cannot come to see you yeat I shall be glad to heare from you by all opportunities thorow the little time that is remaining to us heare, and that our prayers may dayly meet at the thron of grace, and that we may so demean ourselves heare that at last we may have a joyeful meting in the kingdom of glorey, so with kind love and Respects to yourself and my sister, with my love to all my cusens, I Rest yower loving brother,

"JOSIAH CHAPIN."

At a very early day a settlement was made at what is known as "Skipmuck," about one and a half miles above Chicopee Falls. Among the first and most prominent of the settlers at this place were Stephen Horton, Gad Horton, Phineas Stedman, Ariel Cooley, Dudley Wade, and a few others, whose names are not recorded, who came early in the year 1660. It is said that "these few families were often annoyed by the Indians,† and were frequently driven to take refuge in the old fort at Springfield." Some of the inhabitants were captured by the redskins at one time, but no traces of the Indians or their captives could be afterward found.

* See genealogy of the Chapin family. One account says that Henry built near the lower end of "Chicopee Street," but the weight of evidence accords with the text. "Chicopee Street" is a somewhat detached quarter, and runs northward from the Chicopee River, at Chicopee, to Willimansett. On either side lie, in great part, the lands first purchased by the Chapins, and here many of their descendants reside.

† Slight evidences of an Indian settlement are occasionally unearthed in the vicinity of Prospect Street, in Chicopee.

Ariel Cooley was a man of note in his day, and was especially "distinguished as the builder of the Fairmount Water-Works, at Philadelphia, and the original proprietor of the locks and canal at South Hadley Falls."

Caleb Wright is said to have built a house upon the upper terrace at Skipmuck in or near the year 1704. A tradition well authenticated narrates that the Indians one night surrounded the place, took Mrs. Wright prisoner, and scalped or partially scalped a child that lay in the cradle. Moreover, that this child, Hannah, recovered and lived to a ripe old age. Mr. Wright then moved to "Chicopee Street," where the Chapins had settled, and put up a cabin just south of the old cemetery. The Indians still annoyed him, and he often sought the fort or the strong houses for safety. He was taunted for his weakness by the boys of the period, and took permanent lodgment in his own house thereafter.*

It appears from old documents now in the possession of Sumner Van Horn, of Chicopee, that Nathaniel Ely and Rowland Thomas owned a portion of the land on the south side of the Chicopee River as early as 1664. The following paper is endorsed "A copy of Ely's land:"

"NATHANIEL ELY,—Also by the Grant of the Plantation of Twenty acres more or less of upland by Chicopee River side, Lying by the Westerly Side of the First Deep Dingle above Rowland Thomas' land, In length up and Down the River about 100 Rod, the Breadth at the East End 35 Rod, and at the West end 30 Rod. Recorded Aug. 12, 1664.

Messrs. Ely and Thomas laid out a highway, at what is now the village of Chicopee, in 1665. The ford was at that part of the river between the present Dwight Mills and the grist-mill of Edmund Wood. The following paper describes the highway:

"Here follows the return of Nathan^l Ely and Rowland Thomas, appointed to Lay out a Highway to Chicopee River.

"We, Under writ, being appointed and ordered By the Selectmen in October, 1665, To Consider of a Common way to and over Chicopee River, near to Rowland Thomas, and to lay it out, do make Return of what we have done as followeth: we do Conceive that the Common way over Chicopee River should go above the Islands about 20 Rod, where the Indians Common Wading Place was formerly, or a little Higher, and so from thence to Run up ye River on this side the River about 20 Rod or more, and then to turn off in the vacant Ground betwixt Rowland Thomas' and Nath^l Ely's land into the Pine Plain, and so to the Town. This Highway to be in breadth from Chicopee River to the Brow of the Hill, which is 7 or 8 Rod, and where it turns off from the River, there to be 20 Rod Broad. Given under our hands this 1st of Febr^y, 1665.

"NATHAL. ELY,

"Febr^y ye 5th, 1665.—The Selectmen do accept of this Return, and order the Highway abovesaid to be as is there described and appointed.

Born Van Horn settled in Springfield prior to 1713. Because of a highway which had been opened dividing his land the "Proprietors of ye Inward Commons" granted him, "March 22d, 1713-14," such another piece in exchange as "would for conveniency bring his land together." They subsequently, "January 22d, Anno Dom. 1718-19," granted him "one or two acres of land lying between Thomas Terys Home Lot and the Hill for a home Lot."†

* Dr. Holland gives a somewhat different version, as follows: "On the 26th of July, that year"—1708—"seven or eight Indians attacked the house of Lieut. Wright, at Skipmuck, in Springfield, and killed 'old Mr. Wright,' and Aaron Parsons, and Baijah Hubbard—a couple of soldiers—knocked two children on the head, one of whom died, and took Henry Wright's wife captive, and probably killed her afterward. Lieut. Wright and a daughter escaped."—Holland's Hist. of Western Massachusetts.

† The following curious prescription is written on the back of this instrument. To whom it was administered, and how many of his descendants owe their being to its use, is not revealed.

"Give a portion of the Reed Root every morning for 3 mornings going; every night going to bed give him on 2 or 3 Spoonfulls of black water according as he can bare; about 11 or 12 a clock In the Day give him a portion of Turmeric,

The family of Born Van Horn probably settled at what is now known as Chicopee Falls as early as 1739-40. The following is a copy of an original document, in size 4 by 8 inches, now in the hands of Sumner Van Horn:

"SPRINGFIELD, March 17th, 1742-3.—Pursuant to a Grant of the Proprietors of the Common land in Springfield, March 18th, 1739-40, laid out to Born Van Horn, of Springfield, 27 acres & ½ of Land in the East Precinct in said town, equal in value to 8 acres of the land at Goose Pond, as mentioned in said Grant, Lying in two Pieces; one contains 2½ acres, & is bounded as follows (viz.): East on a Highway that is at the west end of the 10-acre Lots, West on Benjaⁿ Crofoot's[†] Land, South on Common Land, and North on his own land; the other tract contains 25 acres Lying the north side of the Chicopee River, Bounded west by the foot of the hill adjoining to the Road that crosses said River at the falls, East on a road that crosses said River at the Grape Place, so called, south on the said Chicopee River, and measured 25 Rod wide from said River at the west end, and then runs Due East 172 Rod to the above said Road that goes over at the grape Place laid out by us.

Azariah Van Horn[‡] was a surveyor of highways in the town of Springfield, in 1770. His district embraced the territory south of the Chicopee River, including the sites of the present villages of Chicopee and Chicopee Falls. His warrant reads thus:

"To Mr. Azariah Vanhorn, Surveyor of Highways in Springfield: Your District or part of the Highways in said Town To Survey, Amend, & Repair is as follows, viz.: Including all the Lands, Roads, or ways From the Brow of the Hill next south of Joseph Chapin House at the lower Chicopee, & extending north to the North side of Chicopee River at the usual foding place, & from the great river on the west to the top of the great Hill next west of Skipmuck on the East.

Sumner Van Horn, son of Gad Van Horn, resides in Chicopee village. He says that formerly there was a road which led across the Chicopee a short distance below the upper dam, at Chicopee village, and that some traces of this road may yet be seen. At times of high-water the crossing was made by a sort of ferry, near the mouth of the river. That "fishing-places" existed where shad were caught in large quantities: one at the mouth of the Chicopee, one above where the Chicopee Street bridge crosses, and another at the mouth of "Ely's Brook."|| Moreover, that salmon were plentiful in the same river as far up as Jenksville; and that Azariah Van Horn, late in the last century, caught a large number in a weir placed near the site of Gaylord's Dam.

Mr. Van Horn also relates that Azariah Van Horn,[¶] his † Crofoot probably owned land that is now near the central portion of the village of Chicopee Centre, east of which lay the 2½ acres, extending undoubtedly to the highway at the "Grape Place," now Grape Street. The 25 acres was a strip along the Chicopee River, on the north side, extending from near the present grist-mill of Edmund Wood to the old road which crossed the Chicopee a little below the upper dam. This road descended the hill from Grape Street in the rear of the present residence of Mr. J. T. Ames. Gad Van Horn, father of Sumner, and grandson of Born, had a house near this road, and near the present residence of M. S. J. Chase. Gad died in 1855, aged ninety-one years. South and East Streets are substantially what was called in that early day "the path that goeth to Skipmuck," and connected at the west end with the Hampden road to Springfield. The latter extended northerly through what is now West, Exchange, and Perkins Streets,—or nearly so,—and led into the old "20-rod" road laid by Ely and Thomas, first passing easterly under the bank where the Dwight mills now stand.

‡ Azariah died early in this century, aged eighty; his father, Born, it is supposed was buried at Springfield.

|| Mr. Horton—possibly Stephen or Gad—one evening at dusk, having secured a fine string of shad, started homeward on horseback in joy ful mood. The wolves, having a method of fishing peculiar to themselves, gave eager chase. The result was that, in spite of the nearness of his home, he was obliged to drop so many fish to delay or propitiate his pursuers, that there were few, if any, left for the larder. This run of shad has never been equaled.

¶ During the Shays rebellion, the rebels had outposts in various directions about Springfield. One of their guards was stationed near the present road-crossing at Emerson Gaylord's, in Chicopee, and another near what is now the great-uncle, and a Mr. Chapman built a grist-mill and a saw-mill on the ground now occupied by the Gaylord Manufacturing Company prior to 1770. The grist-mill had one run of stone, and in time was torn down and replaced by one with two runs, and of more than double its capacity. Grain was here ground for the distilleries at Warehouse Point, Conn., and in large quantity for the time. The saw-mill was mostly supplied with logs floated down the Connecticut, though many came from the Chicopee. The lumber not needed for home consumption was rafted to Hartford and Middletown, and exchanged for supplies and merchandise of various kinds. These articles were brought up the "Great River" in boats of from eight to ten tons' burden.

Anil Cooley, son of Jabez and Abigail (Hancock), and fourth in descent from Ens. Benj. Cooley,* one of the first settlers in Longmeadow, married Lydia Warriner, daughter of Benjamin and Persis Warriner, of Wilbraham, Sept. 2, 1781, and had Calvin, born Aug. 18, 1782; Judah, March 29, 1784; Lydia, March 8, 1786; Ariel, Nov. 27, 1787; Bathsheba, Sept. 29, 1789; Ariel, May 12, 1791; Titus, Sept. 3, 1793; Chester, Jan. 23, 1797, and died Oct. 30, 1822. His widow, Lydia, born Nov. 15, 1757, died Sept. 13, 1839.

Ariel, Sr., settled near Chicopee Falls before 1786, in which year he and others conveyed lands to Byers and Smith, as elsewhere mentioned. He owned considerable tracts of land within the town and had numerous descendants, but few of whom bearing the Cooley name continue in the vicinity. "Cooley Brook" derives its name from this family. Calvin, son of Ariel, Sr., married Chloe Bliss, Oct. 14, 1806, had nine children, of whom Lucius, of Chicopee Falls, married Mary Clough, Dec. 31, 1833, and had Harriet A., who married Edwin A. Buttrick, and resides at Chicopee Centre; Ella M., who married Robert Russell, and resides at Holyoke; and Lydia S., who married Oliver Bangs, of West Springfield, Aug. 6, 1860.

The first dwelling, of which any account remains, was that erected by Henry Chapin, as described in the preceding pages.

It is claimed, but upon what authority is not known, that the first cultivation of the soil within the present town limits was on the south side of the Chicopee River, near its mouth, in 1645.† This date is fourteen years prior to the purchase made by Henry Chapin from William Pynchon.

The first tavern has left no positive evidences of its origin or situation; but as the inn described as standing at the north end of Chicopee Street in an early day, and that occupied by Japhet Chapin, on Springfield Street, were both of unknown origin, it is safe to divide the honor that history accords of priority between them. The same dilemma exists in the case of the first school-house, and so the old structure at Skipmuck and that at Chicopee Centre are entitled to the reverence of those who delve in statelier classic halls,—share and share alike.

The first church edifice was erected in 1752 for the First Congregational Society, and occupied the site of their present church, on the west side of Chicopee Street. It was removed in 1826, and the present church erected in that year.

The first merchants at Chicopee were Moses Christy and Samuel Hartman, who were partners in the dry-goods and grocery business, and occupied a store where now stands that of Lanckton & Pond, on Market Square.

lower end of Exchange Street. The government scouts one day appeared in the vicinity, and encountering John Van Horn, a brother of Azariah, who had a leaning toward the rebels, asked how matters stood. Said John, "Oh, I guess they're all gone." The scouts marched bravely on, but soon came in view of the outposts, who fired, when they took to their heels. John heard the firing and saw them coming, and in turn, fearing punishment for his duplicity, made tracks for the Great River.

* Ens. Benjamin married Sarah —, and had Obadiah, who married Rebecca Williams, and had Jonathan, who married Joanna Colton, and had Jabez, who married Abigail Hancock, and had Ariel, who settled at Chicopee Falls, then Skeneunganuck.

† Holland's Western Massachusetts.

The first postmaster at "Cabot," or Cabotville, was Moses Christy, who kept the office in the store above described. The office was afterward removed to a building which stood where the savings-bank now stands.

The first physician was probably Dr. David Bemis, at Chicopee Factory.

ORGANIZATION OF THE TOWN.

The following is a part of the act incorporating the town of Chicopee, passed April 25, 1848:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court assembled, and by authority of the same, as follows:

"SECTION 1.—All that part of the town of Springfield which lies northerly of the following described lines, namely,—beginning at a stone monument by two oak-trees standing together on the bank of Connecticut river near to and northerly of the house of Edwin Spooner, and running thence westerly by a line at right angles with the river to the easterly line of West Springfield, thence returning to said stone monument and running thence northeasterly a straight line to a stone monument standing on the southerly bank of Chicopee river at or near the westerly extremity of the 'Birchem Bend' of said river; so called, thence the same course to the thread of said Chicopee river, and thence easterly by the thread of said river to a point opposite the southwest corner of the town of Ludlow, and thence to the said corner of Ludlow, and bounded easterly by said town of Ludlow, northerly by the towns of Granby and South Hadley, and westerly by the town of West Springfield, is hereby incorporated into a separate town by the name of Chicopee; and the said town of Chicopee is hereby vested with all the powers, privileges, rights, and immunities, and shall be subject to all the duties and requisitions to which other towns are entitled and subjected by the Constitution and Laws of this Commonwealth.

"SECTION 6.—Said town of Chicopee shall continue to be a part of the town of Springfield for the purpose of electing Representatives to the General Court, State officers, Senators, Representatives to Congress, and Electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, until the next decennial census shall be taken in pursuance of the thirteenth article of Amendment of the Constitution, and all meetings for the choice of said officers shall be called by the Selectmen of Springfield, and shall be holden in the town of Springfield. The Selectmen of Chicopee shall make a true list of persons within their town qualified to vote at every such election, and shall post up the same in said town of Chicopee, and shall correct the same as required by law, and shall deliver the same to the Selectmen of Springfield before any such election, by whom the same shall be taken and used in the same manner as if it had been prepared by themselves."

At a meeting held at "Cabot Hall," in the village of Chicopee, on the 17th day of May, 1848, at one o'clock P.M., after prayer by the Rev. Crawford Nightingale, Timothy W. Carter was chosen moderator and William L. Bemis clerk. A strong feeling had sprung up in regard to the dismemberment of the old town of Springfield, with her record of more than two centuries, which called forth from Mr. Carter an admirable address, which was as "oil upon the troubled waters." He, in part, said:

"We are now invested with powers and duties which as good citizens we are bound to exercise for the good of the whole. Shall we not enter upon these duties regardless of past differences of opinion, with a determination that the new town of Chicopee shall sustain as high a character for good government, order, and respectability as the distinguished town of which she has heretofore formed a part? We commence a career among our sister towns not a feeble organization just struggling into being, but at once endowed with all the elements of vigor and maturity, with a population and valuation second to but one within the limits of the four western counties of this Commonwealth. In the exercise of strict economy in all our expenditures, carefully regarding the rights of those who are to contribute to the government and the various interests of the town, we shall be enabled to provide amply for the public convenience and all needful improvements, and bestow upon the poor that assistance to which by their misfortunes they are entitled at our hands; and, above all, liberally to endow the children and youth with such means of education and moral improvement as shall accord with the advancing spirit of the age. From this time forward our destiny, under God, is in our own hands, and praise or disgrace will be ours as we shall discharge or neglect the duties we owe to the present and the future. Let us then step forth upon this new theatre of action with high purposes of good toward ourselves and of benefit and blessings toward those who shall succeed us, that, when two centuries of our history shall be written, we may have proved a worthy descendant of our distinguished ancestor."

At this meeting five selectmen, three assessors, and three school committeemen were chosen by ballot, viz.: Selectmen, Sylvanus Adams, Harmon Rowley, Ezekiel Blake, Amos W. Stockwell, Adolphus G. Parker; Assessors, Sylvester Allen, Amaziah Bullens, Harmon Rowley; School Committee, Rev.

† In 1852 the line was run and monuments re-established between Chicopee and Springfield; and likewise, in 1853, the lines on the sides of Ludlow and South Hadley; and the same year the Granby line was run.

Jonah G. Warren, Rev. Eli B. Clark, Rev. Robert Kellen. A committee was appointed, consisting of John Wells, Charles Sherman, Samuel Mills, Jr., Samuel H. Shackford, Ira M. Bullens, A. G. Parker, Robert E. Robertson, Joseph Clough, and William R. Kentfield, who reported the nomination of the following persons elected to the several offices named: Overseers of the Poor, Clark Albro, Andrew Hubbard, and Phineas Stedman; Surveyors of Highways, Jacob P. Brown, Sidney Chapin, and Joseph B. McCune; Pound-Keeper, Almon Nelson; Constables, Sylvester Churchill, William Wheeler, Benjamin F. Willard, William L. Bemis, John C. Bartlett, Simon B. Southworth, James L. Sikes, Lucius E. Ladd, William McDermott, Ralph White, Josiah Osgood, Lester Dickinson, William Blake, and Harvey Robinson; Committee on School District Boundaries, John Wells, Edward Renney, and Phineas Stedman.

By the town regulations adopted in 1840, the selectmen, school committee, overseers of the poor, surveyors of highways, and treasurer are required to make reports, which are annually published.

Previous to the organization of the town a flood carried away two of the bridges, and otherwise did serious damage within the territory now included within its bounds. The two bridges referred to spanned the brook near Willimansett depot, and were replaced by structures of stone and brick, laid in cement. Thus the work of the town authorities was commenced under somewhat unfavorable conditions; but the inhabitants generously supported them.

Schools have been liberally maintained and ably conducted, highways kept decently and in order, the poor cared for, and all the institutions of the town efficiently administered.

Wm. L. Bemis, from its organization in 1848 until April, 1854; Jonathan R. Childs, until April, 1856; Moses W. Chapin, until April, 1857, who was succeeded by Lester Dickinson, the present clerk, who has filled the office for twenty-one consecutive years.

VILLAGES.

THE VILLAGE OF CHICOPEE, OR CHICOPEE CENTRE,

formerly "Cabotville," stands mainly on the south side of Chicopee River, near its junction with the Connecticut. It occupies a narrow plain and gently-sloping hillside, and farther east a portion of undulating table-land.

It has two hotels, one of brick, eight churches, including the ancient church in "Chicopee Street," an imposing brick structure for a town-hall, in which is the town library of 5000 volumes, three assembly-halls, and numerous fine business blocks of a progressive pattern. Besides these are several mills‡ of mammoth proportions, in which thousands of operatives are employed, and a large number of adjunct tenements, of brick, in which most of the operatives reside. The streets are irregular, but neat, generally, and many are bordered with handsome and even stately residences, both of wood and the all-abounding brick. Brick prevails for sidewalks, though many of the best walks are of a composition of tar and gravel. A crowning glory of this village is its excellent schools, in which the various grades are ably taught. The school-houses are seven in number, inclusive of the high school and "St. Joseph's,"—Catholic.

is a snug village lying on both sides of the river Chicopee at Skenungonuck or Chicopee Falls. The larger portion stands within the bend formed by the détour of the river to the northward, and occupies the adjacent slopes and terraces. It is chiefly distinguished for its manufactures, which, though existing as early as 1800, did not assume important proportions nor much affect the growth of the place until a quarter of a century later. Here also the mills and many other structures are of brick; but the residences are chiefly of wood, some large and elegant. As in Chicopee, the streets are irregular, and the sidewalks of brick and composition. The village contains one hotel, five churches, and three school-houses.

WILLIMANSETT

is a small hamlet at the northerly end of "Chicopee Street," on the east side of the Connecticut and opposite Holyoke. Its interests are principally agricultural.

SKIPMUCK.

Very little has come down respecting the earliest schools of the town, the education of the young doubtless having been conducted in connection with the affairs of the church, in a large degree, as in other portions of the colony. Districts Nos. 3 and 5 were formed as early as 1812, the latter comprising the territory between Indian Orchard on the east and Hog-Pen Dingle Brook on the west, the Chicopee River north, and what was called the "Old Morgan House" south. A school-house was erected in this district, at what is known as Skipmuck, in 1812, or soon after, which was in size 20 by 30 feet, inclosed with rough clapboards, had two small windows and a huge stone fireplace. For the seniors wide boards for desks were placed against the sides of the room at a proper angle, and in front of these three long seats with legs like milking-stools. Thus facing the wall they had a very narrow horizon, and no doubt envied the freshmen who occupied the centre of the room on similar benches. This is a sample of the provision made for a considerable period, and there was but little change until manufacturing enterprises took on a new life in the decade following the year 1822.

The following are some of the teachers of this school: John W. Belcher, Deborah W. Belcher, Sarah Snow, and a Miss Griswold.

CHICOPEE FALLS.

In the fall of 1825, a brick school-house was erected by the Boston and Springfield Manufacturing Company, where the present High School building stands, on Church Street, and presented to the district. It was at first of one story, but in time another was added, making its seating capacity 150. A swinging partition separated the departments. This was swung up and fastened by hooks to the ceiling, when the house was used for religious services. The first teacher here was Closson Pendleton; subsequent teachers, Eli Bates, Fanny Bliss, Anna Smith, Elihu Adams,‡ 1829; Alvira Childs, Ezekiel Adams, Bildad B. Belcher, about four years, to spring of 1833; Fanny G. Ames, Mary Wood, Otis A. Seaman, Samuel Alvord. This building was demolished upon the completion of the one next described.

On nearly the same ground as the preceding, in 1845, a large and convenient brick school-house was built, at a cost of $7000, and opened Jan. 7, 1846, when an address was delivered by Hon. Oliver B. Morris, of Springfield. This building was for the higher branches. The first principal was Samuel Alvord, who remained until December, 1848. He was succeeded by William Torrence, who remained but a short time, and was followed by Alonzo Leland until October, 1850; Samuel Alvord again until March, 1853; Joseph C. Barrett to November, 1854; Philip D. Hammond to November, 1855; Henry W. Peirce to November, 1856; James K. Lombard to July, 1857; Edward P. Nettleton to March, 1859; Henry A. Buddington to November, 1859; Edward P. Nettleton to February, 1862; Erskine S. Bates to November, 1863; L. M. Peirce, to June, 1871; H. C. Hallowell, to —, 1874; Frederick Lawton in 1875; A. R. Nichols in 1876 and part of 1877; W. P. Beckwith, remainder of 1877 and part of 1878. Elliott S. Miller is the present principal.

An early school-house was built for District No. 3 on the north side of the river, at the Falls, some time prior to 1829. In the winter of that year, Bildad B. Belcher began there his labors as a teacher. In 1846 the old house was superseded by one of brick. In the summer of 1870 the latter gave way for another and better building, erected in Granby Street, at a cost of about $12,000. It will seat 210 scholars. All children now attending are of foreign parentage.

The finest of all the school buildings in the town is that erected in 1875-76, on Springfield and Chestnut Streets. It cost $22,500, and was opened for use in the spring of 1876.

SCHOOLS AT CHICOPEE.

An old school-house which stood at the junction of South and Springfield Streets, in Chicopee, was removed in 1845, or thereabouts, and devoted to other uses. This structure was erected between the years 1810 and 1812, and faced south on South Street. The chimney, of brick, was a ponderous affair, whose open mouth was a serious feature for the boys who were assigned the duty of supplying it from the generous pile of huge logs at the door. Here Ezekiel Adams taught, about the year 1825. He died recently at Springfield. Dennis Bangs taught subsequently in 1829. Then followed Mr. Crosby, Miss Warner, and Miss Atkins in due order. The most anxious inquiry concerning the first teacher in this quaint structure meets no response.

In 1834 the brick school-house situated on School Street, between Cabot and Centre, was erected at a cost of $2000, and in 1842 another for the higher departments was completed, and is now known as the high-school building of the present system. It stands on Grape Street, between Elm and Grove. Nathan P. Ames gave a fine bell for this school, and John Chase gave $1000 toward the cost of the building. The first exercises therein were held in July, 1842. Charles P. Ames, a graduate of Dartmouth College, was the first principal, but died in October the same year. He was succeeded by Calvin S. Pennell until March, 1847, and he by William W. Mitchell, who remained until May, 1854, when he resigned, and was succeeded by B. H. Bailey until November, 1856; George D. Robinson, until June, 1865; Henry Lyon, until March, 1866; Alphonso E. White, until November, 1868; Warren B. Stickney, until June, 1869; Truman H. Kimpton, until November, 1873; Edward H. Rice, until —, 1875; H. R. Burrington, until —, 1878. Rufus B. Richardson is the present principal. William Valentine was principal of the grammar department in the high-school building for twenty-three years, ending in June, 1878. Miss Ellen S. Robertson, assistant in that department since December, 1857, still retains the position. A brick school-house was built at Willimansett in 1846, and one in Chicopee Street in 1846, costing $1600.

The report of the first school committee of the town of Chicopee was in March, 1849, and shows that there were then 8 school districts and 20 schools, of which 10 schools were in District No. 4, Chicopee village; and 4 in District No. 6, at Chicopee Falls. There were employed 8 male and 25 female teachers, at an average monthly salary, for the former, of $37.35, and for the latter, $14.20. In the several district libraries were 636 volumes, valued at $335.16. Value of apparatus, $10.45; school-houses, $30,735; number of children from four to sixteen years, 1698, of whom an average of 942 had attended school in the summer, and 1076 in the winter.

The report of the succeeding year notes the situation in the several school districts. District No. 1, Willimansett; No. 2, Chicopee Street; and No. 3, Chicopee Falls, had each new brick school-houses,—the latter attended mostly by children of foreign parentage. No. 4 had 1 high, 3 intermediate, and 6 primary schools; the school-houses all of brick and in good repair, "except," say the committee, "one small primary school-house, which is wooden and bare enough. Eggs might be cooked nicely on the sunny side of it in the summer; and some attention is needed before another summer, else the children may be cooked."

They further say, respecting this district, that the schools were "truly ragged schools, and as dirty as ragged, and in very bad order;" and still further, that "those who come to our shores from across the ocean are heartily welcome to a share of our privileges; but we do wish they would take with the rest a share of our soap and water."

District No. 5, East Chicopee Falls, had one school-house,—old and poor,—situated on the Boston road, "a few rods east of the town poor-house." No. 6, at Chicopee Falls, had 1 high, 1 intermediate, and 2 primary schools, all comprised in two buildings of brick, and in good condition. No. 7, opposite Indian Orchard, had one aged school-house. No. 8 had but one scholar, and that one attended school in Granby.

Upon a division of the school and surplus revenue funds of the old town of Springfield, $10,000 were allotted to the town of Chicopee, which amount, by an act incorporating the "Trustees of the School Fund," has become a permanent fund, agreeably to a vote of the inhabitants, April 2, 1849.

grade, Charles C. Foster, principal. Building Grove and Grape Streets contains first and second primaries. Intermediate school building, School Street, contains first and second primaries and first and second intermediate. First primary building, Spruce Street, contains only the primary grades. An ungraded school in Chicopee Street, and one at Willimansett, occupy each a brick building.

Besides these, there is a small school kept in the eastern portion of the town, in what is known as the "Clough district," and a first primary in a hired room at Willimansett. A large number of Catholic children were withdrawn from the town schools about the year 1871, when the St. Joseph's school was opened.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

CONGREGATIONAL.

The First Congregational Church Society, in Chicopee Street, was organized as the second church of Springfield, July 30, 1751. The church was constituted Sept. 27, 1752, and then had 20 members.

The Rev. John W. McKinstry was the first pastor, who began his term of service in September, 1752, and continued his relation of pastor until his death, Nov. 9, 1813, although his duties as preacher ceased, by consent of a mutual council, in 1789.* At the time of his ordination, Sept. 27, 1752, the following clergymen were present: Stephen Williams, of Longmeadow; Samuel Hopkins, of West Springfield; Peter Reynolds, of Enfield, Conn.; Robert Breck, of Springfield; Noah Merrick, of Wilbraham; and John McKinstry, of Ellington, Conn. At that time the meeting-house was unfinished, having been raised on the 5th of June preceding, "through the indulgence of heaven, with great joy and safety." The next December a parish-meeting voted "to cover the outside of the meeting-house with quarter-boards, to glaze all the windows, to do all the plastering overhead, and finish the lower part of the house." The structure was completed in November, 1753, and when the committee was appointed to the delicate task of seating the meeting-house, they were granted permission to "seat men and women together." The seating was regulated according to the tax list.

The first deacons were Benjamin and David Chapin, sons of the first two settlers; the former was son of Henry, the latter, son of Japhet, and both were seventy years of age. Benjamin served but three years and died; but David became a patriarch in the office, in which he continued until his death, in 1772, at the age of ninety.† Edward Chapin succeeded his father, David, and held the office for twenty-eight years. In 1786 the portion of the parish on the west side of the Connecticut River became a separate parish. From 1813 there followed a vacancy in the pastorate until April 28, 1824, when Alexander Phenix was installed, and remained until 1835. During his term, in 1826, a new church was erected. His ministry was fruitful, and 76 members were added to the church during the eleven years. Ebenezer B. Wright soon followed, and remained until the spring of 1839, when because of ill health he sought and obtained a dismissal. In October of the same year Eli B. Clark became pastor, and for thirty-six years continued to discharge all the duties of such relation to this venerable society. His able centennial discourse before his people, delivered in September, 1852, vividly presents the facts and incidents relating to the previous history of the organization. He retired in October, 1875, and was succeeded by William E. Dickinson, who is still in charge. The present church building stands where the first was erected, on the west side of what is known as "Chicopee Street," one and a half miles north of Chicopee River. This church has 72 members. The officers are William D. Chapin and Marshall Pease, Deacons; Phineas Stedman, Superintendent of Sunday-school.

* The minister's salary was to be gradually increased for four years, from £49 6s. 8d. to £62 13s. 4d., and then to remain stationary. One-half was payable in lawful money and one-half in grain at the market price. He was also to have twenty cords of wood, and one cord additional each year for ten years.

The Second Congregational Church, Chicopee Falls, was formed July 3, 1830, as the First Congregational Church in Chicopee Factory village, and then had 33 members. The society was organized Oct. 11, 1832, with the following members: Sylvester Taylor, Wait Bartlett, Silas Monson, Elisha Torrey, Gardner Kimball, Thomas Howard, Samuel Kentfield, Samuel Easton, Benjamin Day, Isaac A. Cooley, George W. Buckland, Benjamin S. Burgess, George Whittle, W. W. Hathaway, William Goodwin, Stephen Burnett, Timothy W. Carter, Benjamin B. Belcher, David M. Bryant, Alpheus Nettleton, James K. Fletcher, Wells Southworth, and Elihu Adams.

The first preaching was by Rev. George Nichols, as a missionary. The first pastor was Dorus Clark, installed March 4, 1835, who was followed, in 1840, by Ebenezer P. Rogers, who remained until 1843. The pastorate has been filled since that time by the following persons, viz.: Frederick A. Barton, until 1846; Stephen S. U. Greeley, until 1851; William Wright, Feb. 25, 1852, until July 5, 1854; Richard B. Thurston, May 20, 1855, until May 3, 1858; Frederic Alvord, July 21, 1858, until April 1, 1861; Roswell Fisher, Oct. 13, 1863, until June 26, 1867; Joshua T. Tucker, April 8, 1868, until Dec. 5, 1877; Samuel J. Austin was that day settled, and continues.

The church, erected about 1833, stands at the corner of Church and Court Streets. It was rebuilt in 1859, when a spire was added and a vestry finished beneath. Officers: George S. Taylor, Russel S. Furney, Miner Kelly, Deacons; H. E. Munn, Treasurer; Arthur B. West, Clerk. Membership, 200.

The Third Congregational Church, Chicopee, was constituted Oct. 16, 1834. There were then 10 male and 8 female members. The society was organized March 2, 1835. The first pastor was Sumner G. Clapp, who was installed April 26, 1837, and continued until Jan. 22, 1850. His successors were George A. Oviatt, from Oct. 15, 1850, until December, 1855; L. H. Cone, Feb. 19, 1857, until Nov. 15, 1867; W. S. Karr, supply, 1868; David Cushman, supply, a short time; Amos Blanchard, supply, one year; Edwin B. Palmer, June 10, 1869, until March 31, 1875; William L. Gaylord, the present pastor, who succeeded in September, 1875, and was formally installed April 5, 1876.

The house of worship of this society was erected on Springfield south of High Street, in 1836-37, and dedicated in the latter year. A liberal member of the society, Nathan P. Ames, contributed over $5000 toward the cost of this building. It was torn down in April, 1868, and the present church erected in its place, and dedicated Feb. 15, 1870. Officers: Deacons, Gamaliel Marsh, Joseph Stackpole; Parish Committee, J. W. Cunnoek, S. G. Southworth, Luther White; Clerk, D. Frank Hale; Treasurer, A. C. Woodworth.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

The Methodist Episcopal Society at Chicopee Falls is not in possession of any reliable records. According to the best attainable information the church was gathered in 1825 or a little earlier, and in 1848 had a membership of 75. Their first church building occupied the site of the present one, and was built between the years 1828 and 1830. Prior to its erection meetings were held in the house of Benjamin Belcher, and later in the old brick school-house on Church Street. Their present house of worship, at the junction of East and Springfield Streets, was erected in 1841-42, and dedicated in the latter year. The church has recently been remodeled and otherwise improved. The old church stood in or near what is now Maple, near Belcher Street. Rev. A. C. Manson is the present pastor, appointed in April, 1876. The trustees are William Blake, William B. Fay, Orrin E. Darling, Moses Gowin, H. S. Newell, Phineas W. Smith, Moses Marshall, Julius P. Bosworth, George W. Bray.

UNITARIAN.

The Unitarian Society in Chicopee was formed and legally organized March 16, 1841. The Rev. F. A. Whitney for a short time served this church, commencing his labors in the year mentioned. November 21st, the same year, the church was constituted with 16 members. Charles A. THE SECOND ADVENTISTS for a long time existed in the town in considerable numbers without a distinct organization. Some of their first gatherings were in a public-house at "Cabotville," and in a private house at Chicopee Falls. Among the earliest of their preachers were Randolph E. Ladd and William Clark. From time to time their numbers have been increased, other organizations, especially the Methodists, losing much thereby, in point of membership. In 1870 a society was formed at Chicopee Falls, by whom a chapel was erected on Maple Street. They have no settled minister, but hold meetings regularly. Officers: A. B. Howard, Deacon; A. B. Howard, Zebard Foster, Alvah Wilbur, Committee.

CATHOLIC.

The Church of the Holy Name of Jesus (Roman Catholic) in Chicopee was gathered in 1838, and their first church erected in 1840, on the north side of Pleasant Street. This building was enlarged in 1848. During the pastorate of Father Blenkinsop, in 1857-58, the present large edifice was built, and the parsonage adjacent. Since that time the parsonage has been enlarged, and the chapel extension, on the east side of the church, erected. In 1866 or '68 the convent building was finished, and immediately thereafter the parochial school. These two are connected by a structure containing a chapel on the lower floor, and a class-room above. The larger portion of the block bounded by Springfield, Chapin, Cross, and South Streets, whereon these buildings stand, is the property of the church.

John Brady was the first pastor of this church, released in 1841; John D. Brady served from 1846 until his death, in October, 1848; James A. Strain from November, that year, until September, 1850. After a short interval, William A. Blenkinsop came to the charge, and remained until April, 1862; F. Emelianus until November, that year, when Father Blenkinsop returned, and remained until Aug. 2, 1864. Very Rev. Patrick Healey succeeded, and is the present pastor. Rev. David McGrath is assistant pastor.

The St. Joseph's parochial school occupies the school building above noted, and is attended by several hundred children. The girls' department is under the care of seven or eight of the sisters of Notre Dame from the attached convent, who teach needlework in connection with the elementary branches of education. Three female lay-teachers have charge of the younger boys. John Kay is principal over all, subject to the general supervision of Father Healey.

A fine library of nearly 1000 volumes, now owned by the church, owes its existence largely to the efforts of Michael McDermott, and was organized in 1862. Fifty cents per year is charged all of the patrons, of whom nearly one hundred use their privilege weekly. Father Healey is honorary president, Michael McDermott, formerly president, is now librarian.

St. Patrick's Church, Chicopee Falls, was formed Dec. 15, 1872. Their church building is of brick, and is situated on the north side of the Chicopee River, at the junction of Summit and Granby Streets, and in the same lot with the parsonage.

The parish contains 1400 to 1500 individuals, and the Sunday-school nearly 400. This church possesses a library, for the use of its parishioners, which contains several hundred volumes. P. D. Stone is the present pastor.

The French Catholic Church was formed in 1871. Their church edifice,—which stands midway between Chicopee and Chicopee Falls,—a large wooden building, with a sharp spire, and of peculiar style and peculiar ornamentation, was erected in 1877-78. It cost about $15,000, and will seat nearly or quite 700. H. Landry,* of Indian Orchard, is the present pastor.

CEMETERIES.

CHICOPEE STREET.

The ancient burial-ground in Chicopee Street was dedicated to its present uses at an early period in the settlement of the valley. It is a short distance south of the old church.

CHICOPEE.

The Catholic Cemetery is in the southern portion of the town, was a gift from the Springfield Canal Company, and was opened in 1836.

Maple Grove Cemetery is situated in the eastern portion of the village of Chicopee, and now contains about two acres. It was originally much smaller and used as a common burial-place.

The additions to this cemetery were made by private parties, who laid out and sold the lots therein; but the whole was afterward placed under the control of an organization represented by a president, clerk, and board of trustees. The first burial in this ground was in 1836. President, Silas Mosman; Clerk, R. E. Robertson.

The new cemetery, opened by the town in 1869, contains about 25 acres, and is situated in the southern portion of the town, near the Springfield line. The land was purchased in four parcels from Robert E. Bemis, the estate of Ruel Van Horn, George W. Paine, and Michael Conway. The first burial in this ground was that of Lydia A. Hyde, wife of Chauncey H., who died March 13, 1870.

Lafayette Temple, Henry S. Herrick, and Jonathan R. Whittemore are the present cemetery committee.

CHICOPEE FALLS.

The cemetery at Chicopee Falls stretches from East Street to the Springfield road, and contains somewhat less than three acres. It originated in a lease of one acre made by Benjamin Belcher to the Chicopee Manufacturing Company for nine hundred and ninety-nine years. The same was to be used by the inhabitants of School District No. 16 for burial purposes. A condition required that a fence be built and maintained around the property. Additions, afterward made, extended the grounds to East Street. Committee in charge, T. B. Wattles, William Fay, James E. Taylor, Thomas C. Page, and Bildad B. Belcher.

* The pastor of this society was applied to for additional facts concerning it, but did not respond. What is given in the text was derived from other sources, and is believed to be correct. The pastor is therefore not directly responsible for any inaccuracies.

HOTELS AND PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

HOTELS.

The earliest hostelries of the town have passed away, and live alone in memory and tradition. In comparatively recent days,—fifty or sixty years ago,—one Japhet Chapin kept an inn on the east side of the present Springfield road, south of its junction with Newton Avenue.

It is related that the workmen at the armory in Springfield, who had tested the quality of Japhet's liquid cheer, desired a better and wider way thereto, and that the same was finally made and dubbed the "Toddy Road." This is now the southerly extension of Springfield Street.

About fifty years ago a tavern was kept near the north end of Chicopee Street, but the builder, proprietor, and host have left no register of their proceedings; the present hears no echo of the voice that at the portal

"Welcomed the coming, sped the parting, guest."

The old hotel is changed to a private residence, and is occupied by Sumner Chapin.

The Chicopee House was built in 1842-43, at "Chicopee Junction," by Abner B. Abbey. It then stood on the south side of Exchange Street, and was removed to its present position at Front and Exchange Streets about the year 1845. The first landlord was Lester Van Horn. His successors have been Rufus Mosher, Seymour Bagg, Capt. William Denison, E. M. Belden, Merrick Abbey, Hiram Morey, and Adrian Hatch, the present host.

The Cabot House was built in 1834-35 by Chester W. Chapin. The land—about three-quarters of an acre—was purchased by him from the Springfield Canal Company, Oct. 30, 1833, and the deed of that date recites that "no building or part of a building thereon shall ever be occupied or used for the sale of spirituous liquors, except as a public tavern house." The first landlord was Gardner Kimball, who was succeeded by Marvin and Ethan Chapin, and they, from 1849 to April, 1864, by Madison Kendall. William H. Dickinson then became proprietor and landlord, and continues cheerily to serve the friend and the stranger.

Wilde's Hotel, corner of Front and Church Streets, Chicopee Falls, was built in 1834, by Elihu Adams, who for a long time was its landlord. Since his time the following have catered to the public within its hospitable walls: Messrs. Newell, Dodge, Perry, Chapin, Rounds, and Anson F. Weldes, the present proprietor.

A house was opened by Monroe Chapin at the corner of Perkins and Exchange Streets, about the year 1840-45, and named the Perkins Street Lunch. This became, in process of time, the Eagle Hotel, and as such was first kept by Monroe Chapin, of lucifer-match fame, and subsequently by Rufus Mosher and Horace Adams.

A public-house was constructed of an old farm-dwelling, at the corner of Centre and West Streets, in 1840, and named the Connecticut River House. William Miller was the first landlord. It was afterward kept by Charles W. Mead and others. Fire finished its career about the year 1845, and few were they who wept above its ashes.

ALMSHOUSE.

In 1849 a farm was purchased and an almshouse erected, by which the first indebtedness was created, amounting to $5061.72. The farm was sold in 1860.

In 1877, $15,000 were appropriated by the town for the purchase of land and the erection of buildings thereon suitable for an almshouse. J. R. Wilbur, Madison Kendall, William H. West, John Dixon, and William R. Kentfield were made a committee to effect the objects of the appropriation. Their report shows that 18 acres and 9 square rods of land, a half-mile southwest from Chicopee Falls, were the same year purchased of the heirs of R. E. Bemis, deceased, for $2708.67, and that a brick house was erected thereon, 60 by 38 feet, with two L's, 21 by 18, at a cost of $7860, besides other structures costing $1504. The remainder of the appropriation was expended in obtaining water supply, furniture, farm stock, etc.

Water is obtained from an adjacent brook by means of two hydraulic rams, which raise it 60 feet to a reservoir of 1800 gallons' capacity.

Since 1876 the selectmen have performed the duties of the former "overseers of the poor," and in their report for February, 1878, say that "the town of Chicopee pays more per capita than any other town in the State for the support of its poor."

The expenses for the year 1877-78, exclusive of the almshouse, amounted to $15,391.97, and the cost of support at the almshouse, over income from the farm, was $1247.18. The house was opened on Oct. 1, 1877, and in the five months following 41 persons were admitted, of whom 15 left, 6 died, and during the year 1011 tramps were fed and lodged at town expense, all but three at the town-hall building.

TOWN-HALL.

This building,—situated on the east side of Market Square,—erected in 1871, is of brick, with stone trimmings, has a spacious recessed entrance, at each end of which is a memorial tablet of bronze, set in relief-work of Gothic form, and bearing the Rebellion necrology of Chicopee's gallant soldiery. It possesses an ornamental façade, and a lofty tower of peculiar form, but with possible Oriental precedents. In this hangs a great bell, to use on public occasions and for fire-alarms. An imposing flight of steps of Monson gneiss leads to the first floor, which contains offices for the assessors, school committee, and town clerk, and a room which is devoted to the use of the town library. The police department occupies the basement. Above is a large hall, handsomely frescoed, with stained glass windows, and a seating capacity for 900 persons.

The entire cost of this fine building, including land and furniture, was $101,360.38. Building committee, James T. Ames, E. O. Carter, Erastus Stebbins, Ezekiel Blake, and Emerson Gaylord.

POLICE DEPARTMENT.

The police court of Chicopee was established in 1855, by virtue of an act approved May 21st in that year. Mortimer D. Whittaker was the first justice of this court, and held the office until his death, which occurred in 1862. Edwin O. Carter succeeded in the same year, and still occupies the position.

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

CHICOPEE.

The fire district of Chicopee is composed of all that part of School District No. 4 which lies south of the Chicopee River.* The district was formed and separate action taken by the inhabitants thereof on the 28th day of August, 1848, in consequence of a prior refusal of the inhabitants of the town to grant any sum of money for the purchase of an engine and apparatus. An engine and appurtenances had been purchased some years before, chiefly by means contributed by the manufacturing companies. The house for this engine was erected on the grounds of the Ames Manufacturing Company, and cost $250. The engine cost $500.

At the above meeting William L. Bemis was chosen clerk of the fire district thus formed, and Benning Leavitt chief engineer. A committee on further organization was then appointed, consisting of James T. Ames, Isaac Bullens, Charles Sherman, Charles McChallen, Daniel Leavitt, John Wells, Robert E. Bemis, Rufus Whittier, and A. W. Stockwell, who reported at a meeting held Sept. 6, 1848, at Cabot Hall. The report of the committee was adopted, and provided for the election annually in the month of April, by ballot, of a clerk, a chief engineer and 4 assistants, and a prudential committee of 3. These constitute the officers of the fire district, who hold office one year and until their successors are chosen.

The board of engineers control the organization and management of the fire companies; the prudential committee manage the financial affairs of the district, have control of all its property,—except the engines and their attachments, which are controlled by the engineers of fire companies,—and make annual full report of their doings and the condition of the funds, and also return a complete inventory of the property of the district.

At a meeting held Sept. 8, 1848, the following additional officers were elected: First Assistant Engineer, James M. Smith; Second, Lucius Harthan; Third, Chester Van Horn; Fourth, Reuben Thorp; Prudential Committee, James T. Ames, Sylvanus Adams, and George Walker.

Within a short time three cisterns were constructed, viz., at Dwight and Cabot Streets, at Springfield and South Streets, and in Market Square, near the Universalist Church.

An engine-house of two stories was erected opposite Mechanics' Hall, at a cost of $1500, upon land granted rent free for twenty years by the Cabot Manufacturing Company.

The first annual muster at Chicopee was on the 9th day of October, 1851, when thirteen companies participated.

The present force of the department is as follows: Chicopee Steamer Company, No. 1; Pacific Hose Company, No. 1; Owego Hook-and-Ladder Company, No. 1; Fountain Extinguisher Company, No. 1; Independent Hose Company, No. 1. There also belong to the district 8 reservoirs, 28 hydrants, and 75 lamp-posts and lanterns.

The present officers are James E. Hosley, Chief Engineer; Timothy Canty, First Assistant; Robert Hickey, Second Assistant; S. L. Scribner, Third Assistant; John J. Lyons, Fourth Assistant; Matthew Ryan, Clerk; John B. Wood, Treasurer; S. S. Hodgkins, Michael McDermott, and S. A. Jacobs, Prudential Committee.

CHICOPEE FALLS.

The Chicopee Falls fire district was established in 1845, and its bounds were then the same as of old School District No. 16, now No. 6. In 1872 the district was extended to include that part of School District No. 3, on the north side of the river, which was most thickly settled. The fire department is managed by the board of engineers and prudential committee elected by the district annually, as at Chicopee. The department is at present in possession of but one engine. This is of Waterman's make, with 8-inch cylinder and 8½-inch stroke, and is housed in a brick building, erected for the purpose, at the intersection of Church and Market Streets. Supplementary facilities for extinguishing fire have been provided by the manufacturing companies, by way of reservoirs, force-pumps, and the like. The Chicopee Manufacturing Company have a large reservoir on the north side of the river, with connecting pipes laid under that stream, and with sufficient head to carry the water over their buildings.

The present officers are,—Chief Engineer, Geo. McQueen; First Assistant, Andrew Gale; Second Assistant, Michael Dunn; Third Assistant, Russell Markham; Prudential Committee, Wm. Blake, Jr., Norris R. Ward, George M. Morton.

The chief engineers from 1845 to the present time (1878) have been as follows: 1845-46, Timothy W. Carter; 1847-48, Harmon Rowley; 1849-50, Otis Chapman; 1851-52, '73-75, John R. Wilbur; 1853, Horace L. Hendrick; 1854-64, E. V. B. Holcomb; 1855-56, John Herrick; 1857, Varnum N. Taylor; 1858, William R. Kentfield; 1859-60, William H. Miller; 1861-62, '65-66, Asher Bartlett; 1863, Benjamin Belcher; 1867, O. S. Goodell; 1868, George S. Taylor; 1869, W. J. Sawin; 1870, William Dunham; 1871, William Blake, Jr.; 1872, Charles Chase; 1876, Frank H. Morton; 1877-78, Geo. McQueen.

MANUFACTURES.

CHICOPEE FALLS—SOUTH SIDE.

May 17, 1786, Josiah Hitchcock, Stephen Hitchcock, Ebenezer Morgan, Israel Chapin, Lemuel Stebbins, Dudley Wade, Gad Horton, Stephen Horton, Phineas Stedman, and Ariel Cooley leased, in perpetuity, "two acres of land and the water-privilege on the south side of the Chicopee River, at Skenungonuck Falls," to James Byers and Wm. Smith, of Springfield. As required by the conditions of the lease, Byers and Smith, within two years, erected "iron-works" for the manufacture of hollow-ware of that metal.* Little was done, however, until the property was purchased by Benj. Belcher, Abijah Witherell, and William Witherell, June 27, 1801. The works were conducted by this firm, or company, until May 22, 1805, when Mr. Belcher bought the interests of his partners, and continued the business alone until August, 1822, when he sold his entire property at the falls to the brothers Jonathan and Edmund Dwight. The property consisted of the blast-furnace and nearly or quite all the land whereon stands the village of Chicopee Falls. A considerable portion of this land was purchased by Mr. Belcher from Stephen Wright and Levi Hitchcock, who had settled at that place before the erection of the iron-works. Wright & Hitchcock removed from the vicinity after making the sale.

Mr. Belcher continued the business, chiefly that of a foundry, until his death, which occurred Dec. 17, 1833, when he was sixty-eight years of age. His three sons, Benjamin B., John W., and Bildad B., succeeded to the business, and pursued it until November, 1846, when they dissolved. John W. then became sole proprietor, and continued without a partner—except a single year with Jonathan R. Whittemore—until 1851. After the brothers dissolved the character of the business was somewhat changed, and included the manufacture of agricultural implements. In 1851, Jonathan R. and John R. Whittemore were admitted, under the style of Whittemore, Belcher & Co., and in another year the firm became Whittemore, Squier & Co., George L. Squier having purchased an interest in the business. The latter gentleman retired in 1857, and the Whittemores Jan. 1, 1875. John W. Belcher having died in May, 1860, his interest from that date has been represented by his son, John W., Jr. Since Jan. 1, 1875, the present firm—B. & J. W. Belcher—have continued without change.

Their manufactures embrace nearly all kinds of agricultural implements, in which an extensive trade is now established at home and in the West.

The Dwights, to whom Mr. Belcher sold, had been induced, upon the suggestion of Joseph Hall, Jr., and Joseph Brown, of Monson, Mass., to purchase the falls property for the purpose of erecting thereon a cotton-mill. With other gentlemen from Boston, they were incorporated as the Boston and Springfield Manufacturing Company, with $500,000 capital. Jonathan Dwight, Jr., was the first president, and Joseph Hall, Jr., the first agent. In the spring of 1823 the dam and canal were begun, and also a mill, which was finished in 1825. A second mill was partially or wholly erected in that year, and the year following, 1826, a third mill and a bleachery. The corporate name was changed in 1828 to "Chicopee Manufacturing Company." In 1831 the capital was increased to $600,000, and in 1835 to $700,000. The fourth mill was built in 1831.* The four mills contained, in 1848, 647 looms and 22,816 spindles. Two of the mills were burned in 1873, in place of which one large mill has since been erected.

Mr. Hall resigned the agency June 1, 1827. He was succeeded by Samuel Henshaw, until Dec. 1, 1832; Lewis Ashmun, until June 1, 1833; Benjamin Day, until Dec. 1, 1834; Timothy W. Carter, until July 1, 1846; Ezekiel Blake,† until his death, in the latter part of 1872. Josiah W. Osgood, then book-keeper, assumed the duties of agent for two years, and until the present agent, George H. Jones, was appointed.

This company now has three mills, which contain 1338 looms and 62,392 spindles, employing nearly 1000 operatives, of whom a third are males; consume 10,500 bales, or 4,813,478 pounds, of cotton annually, and produce 14,065,360 yards of cloth. The average of yarn used is No. 20. The product consists of cotton flannels, broad sheetings, and fine 4-4 sheetings, bleached and unbleached. The company control the entire water-power of the river at the falls, and have no occasion to use steam as a motor. Four large turbine wheels, aggregating 1000 horse-power, are now in use. The present officers are George H. Jones, Agent; Thomas B. Wattles, Superintendent; Josiah W. Osgood, Book-keeper and Paymaster.

This company, in 1825, purchased the water-power and land adjacent, where now stands the village of Chicopee. In 1831 this part of their property passed to the "Springfield Canal Company." In 1836 they sold a piece of their land at Chicopee Falls to the Chicopee Falls Company, with certain privileges, as hereinafter shown.

The Massachusetts Arms Company was incorporated by special act of the Legislature, March 5, 1850, authorizing Timothy W. Carter, James T. Ames, Benjamin F. Warner, and their associates, to manufacture firearms and machinery, with a capital not exceeding $100,000. The company was organized with a capital of $70,000, and commenced its operations under the agency of T. W. Carter, in the production of a revolving pistol under the Leavitt & Wesson patents. These were issued by the Patent-Office as original inventions, not interfering with any existing patent.

After the manufacture and sale of these arms had assumed considerable magnitude, a claim of infringement was made by Samuel Colt, the well-known manufacturer of a similar arm, who succeeded, after a long course of litigation in the United States Courts, in obtaining a verdict in his favor, and a perpetual injunction against this company.

Attention was then given to the manufacture of other descriptions of patent firearms, and during the war the works of the company were fully employed in furnishing breech-loading arms, chiefly of the Maynard patent, for the United States Cavalry. At the close of the war there was a consequent decrease in production, and, pending a movement of part of the stockholders to close the business, the entire stock and franchise were purchased by Mr. Carter, and for several years the business was conducted in his personal interest. On the 1st of February, 1876, the property was sold to the Lamb Knitting-Machine Manufacturing Company, who were then the owners of the water-power and shops in which the business was conducted, and who are at present manufacturing, under recent improvements by Dr. Maynard, of Washington, the celebrated hunting, sporting, and Creedmoor rifles, known as "the Maynard." William P. McFarland, formerly of the Springfield Armory, has superintended the construction of these arms from their first introduction to the public.

* John Chase was the builder of the mill, and dedicated it with a dance on Washington's Birthday in 1832. On that, as on other similar occasions, Mr. Chase and his wife led the "animating round."

† The Chicopee Manufacturing Company have erected to the memory of their valued agent a monument of granite, costing between $2000 and $3000,—an unusual testimonial.

The history of these works would include many of the leading industries of Chicopee Falls for the last forty years, and which have greatly contributed to its growth and prosperity. By deed of Oct. 3, 1836, the Chicopee Manufacturing Company sold to the Chicopee Falls Company a plat of land suitable for the works above referred to, and granted the privilege of erecting a dam upon the lower falls of the Chicopee River and of constructing a canal to the premises purchased by them. The company was organized with a capital of $60,000 for the manufacture of machinery-saws and hardware. The works were ready for occupancy the following spring. The machinery department was for some time under the charge of Mr. Harvey Waters, an inventor and mechanic of note, and the saw department in charge of a Mr. Groves, son of the celebrated English saw-manufacturer.

The buildings have at various periods been occupied wholly or in part by the Chicopee Falls Company, Ames Manufacturing Company, Chicopee Falls Hosiery Company, Bay State Faucet and Valve Company, Musgrave Alpaca Company, Massachusetts Arms Company, and the Lamb Knitting-Machine Manufacturing Company. The last three are in successful operation at the present time.

The present officers of the Massachusetts Arms Company are T. C. Page, President; T. W. Carter, Treasurer, who, together with E. O. Carter, constitute the board of directors.

In January, 1867, the Lamb Knitting-Machine Company was organized with a capital of $100,000, and purchased the water-power and shops then owned and occupied by the Massachusetts Arms Company. Since that time they have made a specialty of the manufacture of knitting-machines under the patent of I. W. Lamb, and produce thereof to the value of $150,000 per annum. Two-thirds of the machines are exported. This industry gives employment to 100 hands on an average. A turbine wheel of 60 horse-power and a steam-engine of 40 horse-power are used. Timothy W. Carter has been president of this company from its organization; Thomas C. Page treasurer until 1871, when he was succeeded by E. O. Carter. Mr. Page is the present managing agent.

In 1868 the knitting-machine company sold to the Chicopee Falls Hosiery Company a portion of the property just described, including the building known as the "Ford Shop." The latter company enlarged the works, and carried on the manufacture of hosiery for nearly three years, when, in 1870, they sold to the Bay State Faucet and Valve Company, who made plumbers' brass goods for a like term of three years. The Musgrave Alpaca Company succeeded the faucet and valve company in September, 1875. Edward Musgrave, John Anderton, and Michael Dunn constituted the partnership, which has remained unchanged. They manufacture worsted coatings and alpacas, importing for the latter fine cotton warps from England, and using weekly for the latter 5000 pounds of Australian and other wools. The company have 60 looms, employ now 76 hands, and turn out 10,000 yards per week. A single turbine wheel transmits the power. John Anderton is Treasurer; Edward Musgrave, Agent.

NORTH SIDE.

Oliver Chapin was probably the first settler on the north side of the Chicopee, at the falls, to which place he removed in April, 1801. In 1806 he sold the privilege on that side of the river to William Bowman and Benjamin and Lemuel Cox, who there erected a paper-mill, and conducted the manufacture of paper for fifteen years. They then sold the property to Chauncey Brewer and Joshua Frost, of Springfield, who continued five or six years longer, when David Ames became the owner of the property. Mr. Ames introduced paper-making machinery, which greatly lessened the cost of production. He died at Springfield Aug. 3, 1847, when his sons, David and John, succeeded to the business, and continued it until 1850. David Ames, Sr., owned one-half of the waterpower of the river at the falls, but disposed of it during his life to the Chicopee Manufacturing Company.

The Belcher and Taylor Agricultural Tool Company originated with Bildad B. Belcher, who established the business in 1852 in connection with Bailey West and George Dunlap. The works were at first on the south side of the river, at Chicopee Falls, and in two years became wholly the property of Mr. Belcher, who then conducted the business alone until the building was burned, in 1860. He was induced to re-establish the works on the north side of the river, where, on the site of the old paper-mill, the manufacture was resumed. In 1863, George S. Taylor became a partner, under the style of Belcher & Taylor. This so continued until November, 1864, when a joint stock company was formed, as at present, of which Mr. Belcher was made agent and Mr. Taylor treasurer. The latter was appointed agent and treasurer in 1867, and so continues. A small building was erected in 1861, which has been twice enlarged; the last change, to substantially its present form, was made in 1865.

In 1852 the manufacture of the Yankee Blade feed-cutter, with improvements made by Mr. Belcher, was commenced. The business, since much enlarged, now includes the production of a large variety of tools, of which corn-shellers, plows, Bullard hay-tedders, and hay-rakes are the most prominent.

John Wells and Ezekiel Blake have each served as presidents of the company, and James E. Taylor as clerk. Present officers: E. O. Carter, President; George S. Taylor, Agent and Treasurer; Andrew Gale, Superintendent; Jas. E. Taylor, Clerk; Fred. N. Wetherell, Book-keeper and Paymaster.

J. Stevens & Co. have an establishment on the north side of the river, at Chicopee Falls, and manufacture firearms, all of which are breech-loading. Joshua Stevens, the founder of the business, is an ingenious practical mechanic, and, in 1858-59, was in the employ of Samuel Colt, of Hartford. What is known as the Wesson revolver was his invention, and he came to Chicopee Falls in the fall of 1849 to engage in the extensive manufacture of that article. For this purpose the "Massachusetts Arms Company" was formed, with a capital of $70,000. This company purchased of the Ames Manufacturing Company the property now occupied by the Lamb Knitting-Machine Company, and there conducted the manufacture of pistols for a few years, when Mr. Stevens, in 1864, having invented a small single-shot pocket-pistol, moved his business to his present location, where he associated with him James E. Taylor and William B. Fay. Since then the business has expanded. There are now manufactured, under various patents issued to Mr. Stevens, double-barrel breech-loading shot-guns, single shot-guns, sporting rifles, "Hunter's Pet" rifles, pocket shot-guns, and pocket pistols; also machine screws, spring calipers and dividers, and double-lip counter-sinks. They employ from 30 to 40 skilled workmen.

The Bleachery of Anderton & Dunn was established in 1872, by John Anderton and Michael Dunn, on the north side of the river, at Chicopee Falls. Their works are situated a short distance from the river, on a small stream fed by perennial springs, and affording water of exceptional purity. A short dam across the dingle forms an ample reservoir that sets back between the sandy slopes a long distance, and retains an ample supply for all seasons. In this establishment the largest part of the bleaching is for local manufacturers,—chiefly for the Chicopee Manufacturing Company. The average daily turn-out is 25,000 yards, which can be doubled with the present facilities. This firm makes a specialty of bleaching and finishing cotton flannels.

CHICOPEE.

In 1809 or 1810, a small mill was put up near the present upper dam at Chicopee by William,* Levi, and Joseph Chapin,

* William was a son of William and Mary (Church) Chapin, and married Lucy Day. He was born and lived many years in the house now (or lately) standing in which they placed "two carding-machines and two spinning-frames of 48 spindles each." They prosecuted a small business, buying cotton at 11 or 12 cents per pound, and spinning yarn from which cloth was made by hand-looms owned by families in the town.† The product of such toil-some process was sold at from "thirty-three to forty-two cents per yard." In 1815-16 the business was discontinued, the competition with goods of foreign make rendering it unprofitable. The machinery was sold and removed to Jenksville. Carding and cloth-dressing were also carried on by a Mr. Pinney about the same period and at the same place.

The Springfield Canal Company, purchaser of the property of the Chicopee Manufacturing Company, at "Cabotville," now Chicopee, was composed mainly of the stockholders of the latter, and organized in 1831 with a capital of $90,000. John Chase was chosen agent, and from that time was the leading spirit of the place. The canal company, by Mr. Chase, commenced the construction of the canal which leads the water to the mills on the 1st day of April, 1832. Water was let into it Dec. 8, 1832. The same year a dam was constructed across the Chicopee River at the head of the canal, and machine-shops built to construct proper machinery for making cotton goods. These shops were small, and stood where the western portion of the buildings of the Ames Manufacturing Company now stands. The machinery was started March 28, 1833. The buildings were afterward much enlarged, without a stoppage of the works. Ames & Dwight purchased the property in 1834. The canal company disposed of portions of its property and water-power to corporations, which from that time were successively formed, and whose mills were all erected by Mr. Chase. Of such companies the "Cabot Manufacturing Company" was the first, and was incorporated in 1832, with a capital of $400,000. They erected a mill for the manufacture of cotton goods, and on the 12th of June, 1834, spun therein the first bobbin of yarn, and on the 1st day of July wove the first yard of cotton cloth. On that day Mr. Chase began the erection of the second mill, in which carding and spinning were commenced July 23, 1835.

Robert E. Bemis, the first agent, began his work April 1, 1834. The capital of this company was increased to $450,000 in 1836, and to $500,000 in 1839. The mills contained, in 1848, 422 looms and 14,848 spindles; employed 100 male and 300 female operatives; consumed 3000 bales of cotton, and produced 4,000,000 yards of cloth annually. Mr. Bemis continued with this company until November, 1852.

The second or "Perkins Mills" were incorporated in 1836, and had then a capital of $400,000, which was twice increased, and made $500,000. Their first mill, known as Mill No. 3, was commenced May 1, 1836, and first used March 1, 1837; their second, or Mill No. 4, was commenced July 1, 1837, and first used April 24, 1838. In 1848 these mills contained 428 looms and 14,973 spindles; consumed 1,400,000 pounds of cotton, and produced 4,325,000 yards of cloth annually. They employed 105 male and 325 female operatives. Elias Davis, the first agent, continued from the spring of 1837 until January, 1842, when he resigned, and was succeeded by Rufus Whittier, who served from that date until his death, in April, 1852.

Soon after the death of Mr. Whittier, the Cabot and Pera short distance west of the spot occupied formerly by the house of Henry, his ancestor. The "march of improvement" at Chicopee disturbed him, and occasioned his removal to a farm on Chicopee Street, where the house he occupied was standing in 1862. It is known as the Capt. Phineas Chapin residence, and is, or was recently, standing near the Connecticut River Railroad crossing. Levi and Joseph were sons of Levi and Sally (Richardson), who also resided at Chicopee.

† One deft house-wife of that day was an expert weaver, and had a husband who was proud of her abilities, and withal quite incredulous. Unaware of the then recent introduction of labor-saving machinery for weaving, and overhearing some large stories of a day's product of a single loom, he declared it "all a lie;" that his "old woman could throw a shuttle with the smartest of 'em, and she couldn't do it!"

kings companies were consolidated, and placed in charge of C. W. Blanchard, as agent, who served from November, 1852, until January, 1853. Daniel Hussey followed, and remained three months, when George D. Lund was appointed, and continued until March, 1856, when these companies and the Dwight Manufacturing Company were united, retaining the latter name.

The third corporation, The Dwight Manufacturing Company, was organized in 1841 with a capital of $500,000, which, in 1843, was increased to $700,000. Their first mill—No. 5—was built in 1839 by the Canal Company, and first used March 1, 1841; their second—No. 6—was commenced June 8, 1841, and first used Feb. 24, 1842; their third—No. 7—was begun June 8, 1844, and first used May 15, 1845. In 1848 the three mills contained 786 looms and 28,576 spindles; employed 176 male and 614 female operatives; consumed 2,000,000 pounds of cotton, and produced 5,600,000 yards of cloth, consisting of coarse shirtings and drillings, annually. Sylvanus Adams was the first agent,—appointed in 1841,—and remained in charge until January, 1867, nearly eleven years after the last consolidation, when R. A. Budlong followed, and remained until his death, May, 1868. Then followed George H. Nye, until May, 1872; George W. Bedlow, until September, 1876; E. F. Balch, from October, 1876, until December, 1877; J. W. Cumnoek,* the present agent, commenced his duties Jan. 1, 1878.

This company now owns seven mills, each of five stories, which present an almost unbroken front one-third of a mile in extent. The present capital of the company is $1,200,000. The mills contain 2700 looms and 110,000 spindles, employ 450 male and 900 female operatives, consume 427,000 pounds of cotton, and yield 460,000 yards of cloth weekly. About forty kinds of goods are made, including heavy and medium sheetings, among which are the celebrated brands "Dwight Anchor" and "Dwight Star," bleached and unbleached. A specialty is made of piqués and very fine shirtings,—84 warp and 104 pick, or "filling." The power is communicated by turbine water-wheels, supplemented at low and high stages of water by two Corliss engines,—one of 800 and one of 450 horse-power. The wheels and engines aggregate about 2000 horse-power.

The Ames Manufacturing Company.—The commonwealth of Massachusetts has ever occupied a high rank among the States of our Union for its varied and extensive manufactures; and of the many establishments none has contributed in a greater degree to render this State famous, both at home and in Europe, than the Ames Manufacturing Company of Chicopee. It is an old establishment, dating its origin back to 1791, when N. P. Ames, Sr., commenced the manufacture of edge-tools at Chelmsford, Mass. Here he continued this industry until 1829, when, together with N. P. Ames, Jr., and James T. Ames, the works were removed to Chicopee Falls, and continued until 1831, when they began the manufacture of swords for the government. They at once took a front rank in this branch of manufacture, and their high reputation has since been fully maintained; and from that time to the present a large proportion of the swords used in the army and navy of the United States, and by secret and other societies, have been made at these works.

In 1834 they removed the works to Cabotville, now Chicopee, and, with James K. Miller and Edmund Dwight, incorporated the Ames Manufacturing Company, with a capital of $30,000. The management devolved upon N. P. Ames, son of the founder, assisted by his brother, James T. In 1836 the manufacture of bronze cannon was begun, in which they became justly celebrated. At this time the company was crowded with orders for cannon and projectiles, and at the request of the officers of the ordnance department of the government N. P. Ames visited Europe and spent one year with the view of adopting any improvements in this manufacture that he might discover. In 1842 the capital was increased to $75,000, and again, in 1846, to $200,000. During this year the entire management was assumed by N. P. Ames, who has continued in that position substantially to the present time. In 1849 the capital was again increased to $250,000, and the manufacture of lathes, planing-machines, etc., added. About this time, also, was commenced the manufacture of the Boyden turbine water-wheel, cotton machinery, etc. In 1853 the establishment furnished the gun-stock and other machinery for the Enfield manufactory, near Woolwich, England. About the year 1853 they began making statuary and other bronze works of art, and it is needless to say that in this branch also the Ames works have achieved a world-wide reputation, as the bronze figures made at this establishment may be seen in very many of the large parks and squares throughout the States, while the soldiers' monuments made here are numerous in the various sections of the country, the mechanical execution of which is very generally admired. Among the prominent works are the colossal statue of De Witt Clinton, in Greenwood Cemetery, New York; the equestrian statue of Washington, in Union Square, New York; Franklin's statue and the equestrian statue of Washington, at Boston, Mass.; and the bronze doors of the Capitol, at Washington.

In 1858, Mr. J. T. Ames was sent by the government to England to procure machinery for rolling gun-barrels, and here was manufactured the machinery for the Springfield and Harper's Ferry armories. Since the Rebellion the manufacture of goods has been changed to some extent, but great attention is still given to the manufacture of fine swords and equipments.

This company has ever taken first rank in whatever branch of manufacture it has undertaken. As early as 1840 it was commissioned by the State of Virginia to furnish six swords, at a cost of $1000 each, for presentation to as many of her historic heroes, and in the same year the company received a like commission from Congress. To this company, also, may be traced the introduction of the present generally-used process of electro-plating, in 1839.

It may truthfully be said that much of the success of this establishment is due to Mr. N. P. Ames, who has ever been untiring in his efforts to advance the interests of the company, and to produce the best quality of goods possible.

The present officers of the company are as follows: A. C. Woodworth, President; Luther White, Treasurer; Nelson King, Superintendent. The board of directors is constituted as follows: A. C. Woodworth, Luther White, A. Gordon Bowles, W. H. Wilkinson, and John B. Anthony.

The Gaylord Manufacturing Company was formed in 1863, during the Rebellion, for the purpose of making military accoutrements of leather. Emerson Gaylord, one of the company, had previously been engaged in a like business. Sereno Gaylord, from Terryville, Conn., subsequently joined the company, and introduced the manufacture of cabinet locks. As the war closed, the latter business took the lead, and the former dwindled. In 1865 the company purchased the business of the "Chicopee Malleable Iron Company," and continued to make malleable iron goods for about ten years, in connection with locks, which were continued a specialty. At the end of that time the manufacture of swords for "society" and military use was started, and has since grown to a chief place in the business of the establishment. Many of the swords, especially those for society use, are of great value, being of exceedingly elaborate workmanship. The company once made steel pens. Emerson Gaylord is President, Arthur F. Gaylord, Treasurer, and James L. Pease, Agent.

The water-power used by this company is derived from a second dam, built by Mr. Chase, and completed Sept. 5, 1834, which receives the overflow from the present upper dam at the head of the canal. A turbine wheel is used, supplemented by steam-power.

The shops occupy the site of the old grist-mill erected in the last century by Van Horn & Chapman, as described elsewhere. The canal company sold the property to Benning Leavitt, and he to the present owners.

S. Blaisdell, Jr., & Co. are dealers in cotton and cotton waste, occupying quarters at "Chicopee Junction," which little indicate the magnitude of their business. This business originated in 1863, with George Mattoon and Andrew Hubbard, who established the cotton waste business at Chicopee Falls. After the death of Mr. Hubbard, in 1865, his partner transferred the enterprise to Chicopee, and continued it alone until 1868, when he was joined by S. Blaisdell, Jr. Mr. Mattoon retired in May, 1872. Mr. Blaisdell then admitted as partners his brothers, Charles M. and George A. The cotton waste business has been overshadowed by that of supplying raw cotton to the large manufacturing companies, direct from the producers, through the agency of C. H. Mallory & Co., of New York, the distributing point. The amount in value of the cotton thus handled is between one and two millions of dollars annually.*

The dam just below the Chicopee Street bridge, on Chicopee River, was built three or four years since—about 1875—by Edmund Wood, and now supplies power for his bobbin-factory and grist-mill, situated on the north bank, above the island.

It is the prevailing local belief that Chicopee bears the honor of having originated, through two of her former citizens, that now indispensable article, the friction—or Loco-Foco—match. Monroe Chapin and a Mr. Phillips commenced the manufacture of matches in a small brick structure, measuring less than ten feet each way, situated on the east side of "Chicopee Street," near the north end. At first the wood was split by hand to the proper size, and the early matches sold for fifty cents a box or gross. The blanks or splints were soon after made by sawing.

NEWSPAPERS.

The first newspaper published within the limits of the present town of Chicopee was issued in January, 1840, by Thomas D. Blossom, then late from Hingham, Mass., who was assisted in the editorship by Rev. A. A. Folsom. The name of this publication was Cabotville Chronicle and Chicopee Falls Advertiser. June 22, 1844, John L. Hall and O. Butterfield took the office under a lease from Mr. Blossom, and continued but a few months, yet long enough to change the name of the paper to Mechanics' Offering. Mr. Blossom then resumed control, and sustained it under the new name until the spring of 1846, when it went into a sudden decline because of a "withdrawal of patronage in consequence of the publication of certain offensive articles, among which were the 'Mysteries of Cabotville.' " The Mechanics' Offering then appeared, with Harvey E. Bowles as publisher and James M. Cavanaugh as editor. In August, the same year, Hervey Russell, Amos W. Stockwell, and Mr. Cavanaugh purchased the paper, and issued, in the second week of September following, the initial sheet of the Cabotville Mirror. Stockwell and Cavanaugh were the editors, who made it a Democratic organ. Fire destroyed the establishment, Jan. 8, 1848, but with assistance they resumed the publication the first of the ensuing March. In November of the next year the subscription list was transferred to the Springfield Sentinel, which issued it under the head of the Chicopee Mirror until Feb. 2, 1850. The Chicopee Telegraph, a weekly paper, was first issued on Wednesday, Feb. 11, 1846, by J. C. Stoeve & Co., in Cabotville. It was, as its opening editorial announced, devoted to "agriculture, domestic economy, the mechanic arts, literature, morality, news, and amusement." The legend at first visible among the head lines, "neutral in politics," was dropped with No. 12, of volume two, and thenceforward it became a political paper. The Telegraph ceased with No. 21, May 25, 1853, which contained the following announcement from the publisher:

"Our connection with the Telegraph has not been sufficiently long to cause us to cling to the name with any tenacity or relinquish it with many regrets. There's something in a name, after all! and in these days, when the lightnings are messengers, it seems to be stealing their thunder to appropriate the name of the thing they do it with and apply it to a message that must necessarily be somewhat old and slow."

A newspaper, 18 by 24 inches, was issued Saturday, June 4, 1853, called the Chicopee Weekly Journal, with a medallion view of the village in the heading. J. R. Childs, who had assumed the management of the Telegraph on the 1st day of May preceding its discontinuance, was editor and publisher of the new paper. It contained local, but not general, news and selected matter, and was in politics of avowedly Whig proclivities. The second volume was narrowed one column per page, and appeared as the Weekly Journal, dropping Chicopee from its title. With No. 7, vol. ii., July 15, 1854, David B. Potts became proprietor, and James C. Pratt editor. William G. Brown followed Mr. Pratt as editor, April 19, 1856, when J. C. Havens, having purchased the paper, admitted Mr. Pratt as partner. They continued the publication for two years, when George V. Wheelock was admitted. March 12, 1859, Mr. Brown sold his interest to J. C. Havens. Havens and Wheelock sustained the paper until Dec. 27, 1862, when it was discontinued with No. 30, vol. xviii., which contained among other valedictory words the following:

"We are not dead yet, it is true, or quite reduced to the starving point, and, but for the paper-makers' exorbitant demands, we should continue to dispense 'blessings' to this community every week,—and, mark it! but for the scarcity of advertisements, we should never have allowed a 'break' in the chain of publication."

The department of job-printing has since been continued by Mr. Wheelock.

TOWN LIBRARY.

The Cabot Institute, a literary club, was incorporated in 1846, and in the subsequent seven years accumulated a library of about 900 volumes. The first books, 651 in number, were purchased in 1847 with funds contributed by the various corporations and by individuals. At a meeting held at "Cabot Hall," April 4, 1853, the inhabitants voted to accept a proposition which had been made by the institute to donate this collection to the town, with the condition that the latter should for ten years appropriate annually the sum of $100 for new books, and pay the incidental expenses of the library. The books were transferred to the town on the 14th of May following. At the expiration of the ten years the supervision of the library was duly vested in a committee to be annually chosen by the selectmen. Upon the completion of the town-hall, in 1871, the library was transferred to a room therein, set apart for the purpose. The first librarian was J. R. Childs. The first catalogue was published in 1846; additions in 1862 and 1866. During 1877-78 there were added 363 volumes, making a total of 4843. The new "Encyclopædia Britannica" is among the late accessions, a gift from Hon. George Robinson. The library possesses many other valuable works of reference, and, of course, a large store of fiction, which here, as in other places, forms the bulk of the circulation. The library is practically free, subscribers paying but fifty cents per year.

The committees were,—1863-69, S. G. Southworth, John Wells, Edwin O. Carter; 1870-71, S. G. Southworth, Edwin O. Carter, T. H. Kimpton; 1872-73, S. G. Southworth, Edwin O. Carter, T. H. Kimpton, George V. Wheelock; 1874, S. G. Southworth, E. O. Carter, George V. Wheelock; 1875, Edwin O. Carter, George V. Wheelock, Luther White; 1876, Edwin O. Carter, George V. BANKING.

THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF CHICOPEE

began its existence as the "Cabot Bank," which was chartered Jan. 24, 1845, with a capital of $150,000. The first meeting of stockholders was held March 1st, at which the directors chosen were John Chase, Timothy W. Carter, Jerome Wells, Robert E. Bemis, Nathan P. Ames, John Wells, and Homer Foot. The first meeting of the directors was held on the same day, when John Chase was chosen as president. March 8th, Gilbert Walker was appointed cashier. The bank went into operation May 21st, the same year. Mr. Chase continued as president until Oct. 6, 1849, when he resigned, and John Wells was elected to the vacancy. Jerome Wells succeeded to the position Oct. 9, 1854, and has continued to the present time, a period of more than twenty-four years. James L. Warriner succeeded to the cashiership Oct. 10, 1849, and resigned March 9, 1853. Then followed H. H. Harris, until May 9, 1869; E. M. Doten, until Oct. 1, 1871, when F. B. Doten, the present cashier, took charge. Present directors, Timothy W. Carter, Edwin O. Carter, Erastus Stebbins, Lewis M. Ferry, Arthur F. Gaylord, Emerson Gaylord, Jerome Wells. This bank has now (1878) a surplus of $75,000, the capital remaining unchanged.

THE CHICOPEE SAVINGS-BANK

was organized in 1854. Jerome Wells was the first president, and continued until 1874, when George D. Robinson assumed the position, and remained until 1878. He was succeeded by Emerson Gaylord, the present president. Henry H. Harris, the present treasurer, has held that office from the date of organization.

Deposits at date of last report	$419,195.43
Guarantee fund and net profits	11,628.64
Total assets	$430,824.07

Four-fifths of the loans are on real estate. The number of depositors is nearly or quite 1200.

THE CHICOPEE FALLS SAVINGS-BANK

GAS-WORKS.

In 1849 the subject of lighting the mills was introduced, and resulted in the organization of a gas company at Chicopee Centre, in which the four large manufacturing companies—Ames, Cabot, Perkins, and Dwight—united. Gas-works were erected in 1850, with a capacity sufficient to supply the mills and meet the ordinary wants of the village, and included a retort-house for fifteen retorts, a purifying-house, and a gas-holder 60 feet in diameter and 20 feet in height. "Main" to the amount of 4000 feet was laid, and gas introduced in the mills early in May the same year. Since then the pipes have been extended through the principal streets and the village supplied with gas.

The capital is $30,000, at present owned by the Dwight Manufacturing Company. There are 52 public lamps. The officers are J. W. Cummock, Agent; Nelson Whittier, Treasurer; David Boynton, Superintendent.

WATER-WORKS.

In 1845, Charles W. McClallan and R. E. Bemis constructed the first works for supplying water through pipes to the village of Chicopee,—then Cabotville. For this purpose water was taken from springs and wells at the higher elevation just south of the village. These works answered a temporary purpose, and in 1874, after the death of Mr. Bemis, became by purchase wholly the property of Mr. McClallan. In 1876 arrangements were made for a more satisfactory supply from certain spring-fed brooks, beyond the east line of Chicopee, in Springfield, and there a dam was accordingly erected. The following year a company was incorporated with a capital limited to $75,000. The interests of Mr. McClallan were purchased by this company, he remaining a stockholder. The incorporators were Charles McClallan, Emerson Gaylord, George A. Denison, C. H. Hyde, Erastus Stebbins, and William C. McClallan. The company was organized as the "Chicopee Water Company," April 18, 1877, with $50,000 capital. The mains have been extended, and are chiefly of iron, cement-lined, though some are of iron only. The supply of water is large, and is furnished to the corporations and private dwellings, and also to the fire district.

The works have about eighty feet head. Officers: Charles McClallan, President; William C. McClallan, Treasurer.

RAILROADS.

The Connecticut River Railroad has a station at Chicopee Junction, from which point a branch road leads up the south side of the Chicopee River to Chicopee Falls. The main line was opened for travel Dec. 13, 1845,—the branch in August, 1846. The former passes just west of the village of Chicopee (centre), crossing the river of that name near its mouth, and the Connecticut at the village of Willimansett.

BRIDGES.

The first bridge across the Chicopee River, at Chicopee, was built in or about the year 1778, and crossed near where the present bridge stands. Its piers were of plank and filled with stone. This bridge was in part paid for by a lottery sanctioned by law.

The bridge crossing the Connecticut at Chicopee Junction was erected as a toll-bridge by the Chicopee and West Springfield Bridge Company, in 1848-49. It was some time since made free to the public, and is now maintained by the town. A portion of the purchase-price was assessed upon other towns, in proportion as they were benefited.

Length, between abutments, 1237 feet. The piers, 6 in number, are of sandstone.

EARLY AND PROMINENT RESIDENTS.

Bildad B. Belcher, son of Benjamin, has lived nearly all his days at Chicopee Falls, where his father so early settled. The region was almost an unbroken wilderness, with only an occasional dwelling, and those not within neighborly distance of one another, when his father made the purchase from Stephen Wright and Levi Hitchcock, who then owned nearly all the land at that place. So undisturbed had been the order of nature in the solemn aisles of the wildwood that the shy wild turkey, in considerable numbers, frequented their deeper recesses, and the gamy salmon abounded in the river.

In early deeds the place was called Skenunگونuck, and in modern days has often been confounded with Skipmuck, which is one and a half miles further east.

Mr. Belcher says that his father moved into the house that Wright had occupied, and there lived from 1802 until 1815.

Jerome Wells

R. E. Bernis

The house had no partitions, no plastered walls, but possessed a loose and airy floor. In this primitive residence he (Bildad) was born in 1812. In 1815 his father built a new house on that ground, and lived therein until his death, in December, 1833. Amos W. Page now owns this property.

Mr. Hitchcock's dwelling occupied nearly the same ground now covered by the residence of Jonathan R. Whittemore. The latter was built by Bildad B. Belcher, and stands near the corner of Springfield and Belcher Streets, and opposite the Methodist Church.

Mr. Belcher has not only been identified with the growth of the manufacturing interests of the town, but has been and still is active in matters civil and educational. He is the oldest of the early residents now living, and a patriarch among the teachers of the present century who have served within the limits of Chicopee.

John Chase was born in Litchfield, N. H., Aug. 19, 1788; died May 11, 1866. He was the seventh remove in descent from Aquilla Chase, who emigrated from Cornwall, England, before the year 1640. He remained in Litchfield until ten years of age, when his parents removed to Dunbarton, N. H., where he resided until 1812. He then removed to Pembroke, and labored as a mechanic at $1 per day. In 1813 he went to Meredith Bridge, and remained seven years, meantime, March 20, 1815, marrying Nancy Stark, daughter of Gen. John Stark, of Revolutionary fame. Sept. 20, 1820, he removed to Dover Upper Factories, and in December, 1821, began work at Dover Landing, and there remained, superintending the machine-shops, until June, 1829. On his forty-second birthday he began his labors at what is now called Chicopee Falls, and remained there until Dec. 4, 1832, when he moved to "Cabotville," now Chicopee. From this date his career as a mechanic and builder is traced in the history of the manufactures of Chicopee. When he assumed the agency of the Springfield Canal Company the ground now occupied by the village, with its immense factories and numerous dwellings, was covered with bushes, and much of it on the lower level was of a swampy character. There were then but three or four dwellings in the neighborhood. Besides the mills, he was the builder of many other buildings, private and public, that grace the village and mark its thrift.

Mr. Chase possessed unusual bodily vigor, even in old age, and in the last fourteen years of his life traveled nearly 70,000 miles. In business he was exact and methodical, and in social life genial and generous. He amassed a large property, and gave freely to worthy objects. A fitting monument in "Maple Grove Cemetery," erected by his widow, marks his place of burial.

Among other prominent residents are many whose complete biographies would reveal intimate association with enterprises tending to the advancement of the town in all its material, social, and educational interests. Of these are John Wells, the first (and for a long time) president of the Cabot Bank, who was thrice elected to the General Court of the State, and held the positions of judge of Probate and judge of the Supreme Court. He was a devoted friend of the town, and intimately connected with its institutions. He removed to Boston, near which city he died. His portrait, in oil, appropriately graces the walls of the town library.

Jerome Wells, who was representative in 1869, and is now president of the First National Bank, formerly the Cabot Bank.

Silas Mosman, who came in the spring of 1834, was representative from Springfield when Chicopee town was erected, and labored effectively in that behalf; is a superior worker in bronze, the Crawford bronze door in the east portico of the Senate extension of the Capitol, and other prominent works throughout the country, testifying to his skill. He has held many positions of responsibility in the town, and is now selectman. Sylvanus Adams, for more than twenty-five years agent of the Dwight mills, and selectman in 1848-49, was especially active in local affairs, and, as a man and citizen, is held in honorable remembrance. None of his family remain in Chicopee.

Nathan P. Ames, who came to Chicopee Falls in 1829, and established tool-works, the history of which is elsewhere given, and which in their extension and improvement have vastly benefitted the town, and become famous for their excellent products. His sons, Nathan P., Jr., and James T., have ever been closely connected with the business he thus founded, which under their management has made its greatest development. Nathan P., Jr., died in April, 1847. Timothy W. Carter, of Chicopee Falls, a man of culture and rare social and business qualities, has made enduring impress of his personality in all his varied connections with local affairs. He was instrumental in securing for Chicopee Falls the erection of the high-school building, on Church Street, elsewhere noticed. He is now treasurer of the Massachusetts Arms Company, and for twelve years, until 1836, was agent of the Chicopee Manufacturing Company.

Eli B. Clark, so long the pastor of the ancient church in Chicopee Street, has served twelve years upon the school committee with industry and efficiency, and, though now retired from the pastorate of his church, is zealous in all that pertains to the moral and material growth of the town.

Rufus Whittier, who died suddenly, April 7, 1852, for ten years previous had been the agent of the Perkins mills, was a man of prominence. He was at one time an officer of the Hampden County Agricultural Society, and at his death was treasurer of the "Cabot Institute."

Of the numerous Chapin family, three have represented the town in the General Court,—Giles S., Moses W., and Edward M.; and seven have been chosen as selectmen,—Orange, Giles S., Austin, Titus, Caleb S., Sidney, and Lucas B. Moses W. was town clerk one year, 1856-57.

Robert E. Bemis, first agent of the original "Cabot" mill, in 1834, was an enterprising and useful citizen. His son, Robert W., resides in Chicopee. William L. Bemis was town clerk and treasurer from the erection of the town until April, 1854. His memoranda of the town's early history, as entered in the first book of records, 1848, evince much labor, and have furnished many valuable facts for this history.

Lester Dickinson, since 1857 and now town clerk and treasurer, came to Chicopee Falls in 1830-31, and has witnessed the growth of the villages from their former rusticity and crudeness to their present civic dignity and fair proportions. Little is the business of the town during the last twenty-one years that has not passed under his official eye. For one to be, to marry, to die within the town, through all these years, was to be thrice the subject of his ready pen.

Isaac Bullens came to the town as early as 1833, bringing his family and worldly possessions in a wagon over the rude highways of that period. His first work was to start the machinery in the shop of the Springfield Canal Company. He afterward, 1838, started a grocery-store, and was therefore one of the earliest merchants in Chicopee. The business grew to prominence and was the foundation of a large estate. Mr. Bullens died Sept. 1, 1874. Madison Kendall began his labors at Chicopee Falls, in the works of Nathan P. Ames, in 1829. Since that time—except an interval of fourteen years, in which he was proprietor of the Cabot House—he has been engaged with Mr. Ames and the Ames Manufacturing Company as a cutler, and is even now, at an advanced age, one of the most expert temperers in the country. He recalls his first trip to "Cabotville," which was made by a path along the river Chicopee. There were then but four or five dwellings in the place, and little clearing had been done in the surrounding woods. James M. Smith, surveyor; Wallace Johnson, druggist, and several years postmaster; Benning Leavitt, Emerson Gaylord.

MILITARY.

A VETERAN OF THE REVOLUTION.

Reuben Burt, of Chicopee, a soldier of the Revolution, died on the 8th day of August, 1860, at the age of ninety-eight years and ten months. He was buried with military honors, at Chicopee Falls, a detachment of the Springfield City Guards, under the command of Lieut. G. A. Fuller, acting as escort and guard of honor on the occasion. Torrent Engine Company of that village, with colors craped, joined the large procession of citizens called out by the rare event. An appropriate address was delivered by Rev. R. K. Bellamy. Gen. — Nettleton had charge of the procession.

Mr. Burt was born in Brookfield, Mass., and first joined the patriot hosts in 1777, when he was assigned to garrison duty at Fort Ticonderoga, then containing 3000 troops, and was present at the time of Burgoyne's attack, July 5th of that year. After the retreat to Whitehall and Southern Vermont, his term of enlistment having expired, he returned home. The following year he was drafted for six months' service, and was present at the attack on Newport, then occupied by the British. This effort failed, with considerable loss to the Americans, from D'Estaing's inability to co-operate, his fleet having been scattered. Again the veteran's term expired and he went home, but soon enlisted for three years as a "Regular," and for the most of that period was stationed on the lines at and below West Point, on the Hudson. He was in many small and some serious engagements, and bore to his grave many honorable scars from "sword, bayonet, and ball," and a portion of British lead. The most notable event of his service was when a party of nineteen, of which he was one, were set upon by a superior force, and all but three slain before relief was afforded. The sixteen dead braves were buried "on the spot, in one grave."

The writer of this history of Chicopee is indebted to many residents of the town for valuable assistance. Among these are Mr. Lester Dickinson, town clerk, who has accorded every facility for the examination of records, and cheerfully borne much catechising; Mr. George V. Wheelock, librarian, for ready access to books and documents in the town library, and for other favors; to Mr. Bildad B. Belcher, Mr. Sumner Vanhorn, Hon. George S. Taylor, Hon. Silas Mosman, Hon. Edwin O. Carter, Mr. Timothy W. Carter, Mr. Wallace W. Johnson, and others, for important papers, facts, and suggestions.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

JEROME WELLS.

It is always a pleasure to place upon the page of history passing incidents in the career of one who has pursued an honorable and upright course, conducting large business transactions, and from small beginnings, by industry and foresight, accumulating a competency of this world's goods. Such a man we here speak of.

Jerome Wells was born in Greenfield, Franklin Co., Mass., April 2, 1813, and at about the age of seventeen entered the store of Howard & Lathrop, at South Hadley Falls, but soon after having chosen the silversmith's trade he went to Springfield, and worked at this business until his health failed, when he entered the store of his uncle, Daniel W. Willard, where he remained until twenty-two years of age. May 15, 1835, removed to Chicopee, where he entered the mercantile trade, and is at present largely interested in that business. Mr. Wells is regarded as a sound and careful financier, and upon the organization of the savings-bank, in 1854, was made its president, and remained as such until the year 1874. He was also a director and president of the old Cabot Bank; president upon its reorganization as a national bank in 1865, and has since officiated in that capacity. Mr. Wells is not only interested in mercantile and banking pursuits, but has been a stockholder and director in the Gaylord Manufacturing Company since its organization.

Politically, he is a Republican. In 1868 he was elected to the House of Representatives of the State, and was chairman of the committee on banks and banking. Since that time he has not been in public life, but has not ceased to take an active interest in all political movements having for their aim the welfare of the people. He is a member of the Unitarian Society in Chicopee.

July 21, 1842, Mr. Wells married Louise C. Rice, and they have one daughter, Georgianna L., wife of Capt. Frederick B. Doten, the present cashier of the National Bank of Chicopee. Their family consists of two children, a son and daughter, —Jerome W. and Florence E.

It may truthfully be said of Mr. Wells that he is essentially a self-made man. Although his business transactions have been heavy, he has passed safely through every financial revulsion, and has succeeded in amassing a competence.

SAMUEL ALVORD, M.D.,

whose long and successful professional career has given him a prominent place among the physicians of the Connecticut Valley, was born in the old town of West Springfield, and, contrary to the general custom in these changing days, has spent the greater part of an active life in the vicinity of his

Orange Chapin

ORANGE CHAPIN, son of Moses and Kezia Chapin, was born in Chicopee, Jan. 9, 1790. He remained at home until the death of his father, except when attending or teaching school, and then removed to the village of Willimansett, now Chicopee. While attending school he manifested an unusual interest in mathematics, and subsequently became a practical land surveyor and engineer. Although attending strictly to his business of farming and engineering, he was active in all interests seeking the advancement of the people and the community wherein he resided. He has served in various positions of trust and responsibility within the gift of his townsmen, always discharging the duties with great credit to himself and the entire satisfaction of the people. He served many years on the board of selectmen in Springfield before the division of the town, and one year in Chicopee. He also served as assessor in the town of Springfield for sixteen consecutive years. His services were appreciated by the people, and he represented the town of Springfield in the General Court of Massachusetts in the years 1835, 1836-39. He was very familiar with proceedings in the Probate Court, settled the estates of many deceased persons, and was guardian to many minor children. He held three military commissions, and was also justice of the peace for more than thirty years.

Mr. Chapin manifested a deep interest in church matters, and served as clerk of the parish, Chicopee Street, now First Congregational Society, in the town of Chicopee, from 1821 to 1862; was treasurer during most of that time, and deacon of the church from 1840. May 6, 1819, he married Julia Rumrill, daughter of Asa and Rhoda Rumrill, of South Hadley, born Oct. 8, 1799. Their family consisted of two adopted children, viz.: Orange Chapin Towne, son of Jonathan and Delia (Rumrill) Towne, of Belchertown, born March 20, 1823, and Julia Chapin Rumrill, daughter of Asa Rumrill, Jr., and Rebecca (Goodell) Rumrill, of South Hadley, born Oct. 16, 1839. Mr. Chapin died Sept. 9, 1867, and his wife April 4, 1866. He was an active man, an influential citizen, and did much to advance the interests of his native town and county.

CHARLES McCLALLAN.

Charles McClallan was born in Lancaster, Mass., Aug. 11, 1803. At the age of seventeen he came to Springfield, and began the trade of bricklayer with the late Charles Stearns. He exhibited such skill and diligence in his business, and such maturity of judgment, that he was made the foreman of his employer in the second year of his apprenticeship, and he commenced his career as a contractor with the building of the masonry of No. 4 Cotton-Mill at Chicopee Falls, in 1832, in which year he removed to that village.

The native ability of Mr. McClallan, and the thoroughness of his work, as exhibited in the course and completion of this contract, together with his comprehensive ideas of construction, attracted the attention of the Boston capitalists who were about developing the water-power at Chicopee, and they gave him the contract for building the dam and all the mills at that place.

These works so extended his reputation that he became the acknowledged contractor for masonry in this section, and erected nearly all the brick buildings in Chicopee, among which may be mentioned the extensive mills of the Dwight Company, and the shops of the Ames Company.

The greater portion of the brick buildings at Indian Orchard, including mills, boarding-houses, etc., and the stone dam, were also built by Charles McClallan.

In 1847, under the administration of the Hadley Falls Company, the projectors of Holyoke, he built the masonry of the Hampden and Lyman Cotton-Mills, and various other large mills, boarding-houses, and blocks of that manufacturing city; also the Glasgow Mills, on the opposite bank of the Connecticut River, at South Hadley Falls. His operations at this time, however, were not confined to this State, as he erected extensive works at Augusta, Ga., in New York State, and in other sections of the country.

In 1856 he formed a copartnership with his son, William C., and the business has since been conducted under the firm-name of C. McClallan & Son.

Among the many large contracts of the firm may be mentioned the extensive water-works at New Haven, Conn.; the Windsor Reservoir; the brick mill and stone dam of the Hurlbut Paper Company; the canal and stone dam of the Collins Paper Company, together with the masonry of the mill and numerous brick blocks; the large, new mill at Chicopee Falls; Section 13 of the Boston Water-Works, called the syphon section. Since 1872 they have done a large amount of work for the State on the Hoosac Tunnel and Troy and Greenfield Railroad. The large granite façades of the tunnel will doubtless stand for centuries as a monument of their workmanship.

C. McClallan & Son have probably built a larger number of stone dams than any other firm in the State, and not one has been destroyed,—certainly a good guarantee of the substantial character of their work, when dams are annually being swept away in consequence of poor work and faulty engineering.

Charles McClallan has ever manifested a lively interest in all improvements tending toward the public welfare, and was the first to introduce water into Chicopee. A charter was subsequently granted to a company formed for the purpose of increasing the supply of water, and the works were built and largely owned by Mr. McClallan.

As Mr. McClallan's habits of life have always been pure and simple, his temper has been equable, his intercourse with all others affable, and his knowledge expert, he has always been able to manage his large business with little friction; and it may truly be said of him, as of but few others, that he has made friends and no foes in its transactions, and that all men who know him are his well-wishers. He still, at the age of seventy-six, retains much of the vigor and elasticity of youth. He has resided at Chicopee since 1833.

birthplace, being located in the pleasant village of Chicopee Falls, and having an extensive practice throughout the county.

Like many another New England boy, his early advantages were narrowed by circumstances, and his schooling was limited to the old-fashioned district school at home and a few terms at the academies of Wilbraham and Westfield; but at the latter institution it was his good fortune to come under the teaching of that noted instructor, Master Davis, afterward the Rev. Dr. Davis, of revered memory, and to the tact and thoroughness of that masterly educator was largely due that broad and thorough scholarship which has made Dr. Alvord eminent not only for professional learning, but also for general attainments, especially in the higher mathematics and kindred branches of study.

After leaving the academy he took up the work of a teacher for a considerable period, but never lost sight of his intended life-work, the practice of medicine.

As principal of the High School at Chicopee Falls he received the thorough methods of his old preceptor, and many young men whom he fitted for college and for business bear willing testimony that their success in life has been largely due to the early and controlling impulse in the direction of thoroughness and accuracy imparted by him. He was a born educator, sparing no labor himself in the mastery of knowledge, and unwilling that any of his pupils should come short of the same standard of scholarship which he had attained.

After entering active professional life he kept up a lively interest in popular education, and has been for many years prominent in the control of the public schools of his town.

But his life-work has been in his chosen field, to which he brought the same breadth of culture and thoroughness of research which he had developed in the work of a teacher. The power to diagnose disease with almost unerring certainty, whether it comes as the result of a long and varied experience or of hard study, or of an innate quality of mind, seems to have been at the foundation of his professional success. It may be safely said that no homœopathic physician in the Connecticut Valley commands a wider or more successful range of practice, or stands higher in the confidence of his patients and the community.

Notwithstanding his years and the exacting demands of his practice, he pursues his researches in medical science, as well as his favorite studies outside of the beaten path of his profession, as regularly and enthusiastically as in his earlier years, the former as a duty he owes to his patients, and the latter for recreation. Possibly this relief in outside studies may be the reason why his years and labors sit lightly upon him. Certain it is that his powers of mind and body seem in nowise impaired by the wear and tear of a long and arduous professional life, and bid fair to hold out for many years to come.

Dr. Alvord has been for many years a member of the Massachusetts Homœopathic Medical Society and of the American Institute of Homœopathy.

SAMUEL BLAISDELL, JR.,

was born in Boston in 1833. At the age of eleven years he removed to Great Falls, and did his first work in the cotton-mills of the Great Falls Manufacturing Company. At the age of eighteen he returned to Boston, and after trying several occupations, none of which suited his taste, he entered the employ of the Boston and Providence Railroad Company, and remained with them nine years, filling nearly every position of trust and responsibility on the road. Later he connected himself with the New York and Providence Steamship Company, removed to New York, and took charge of the business of the company at Pier 11, North River. At this time the company had the only line in the country carrying through freight from the east to the west, and frequently loaded three large steamers per day, which at that time was justly considered a very large business. Mr. Blaisdell's business habits and the executive ability displayed attracted the attention of business-men, and upon the organization of the New York and Baltimore Steamship Company he became resident agent and business manager of the line at Baltimore. The organization of this company proved a success, and its business was heavy. At the close of the war lines were put in operation to Savannah, Charleston, and Mobile, and Mr. Blaisdell cleared for Charleston and Savannah the first steamers that left the port of Baltimore after the Rebellion. He also sent the steamer "Kingfisher," Capt. Rector, into Southern waters as a dispatch boat, bearing dispatches from Grant to Sherman. This was the first vessel that passed Fort Sumter with the United States flag flying after the evacuation. He remained in Baltimore five years, during which time he furnished the government with a large number of steamers for the transportation of troops and supplies.

In 1868, Mr. Blaisdell came to Chicopee, established the cotton business, and from small beginnings has built up an extensive business, aggregating one million five hundred thousand dollars annually. He is transacting the largest business of the kind in the United States outside the city of New York. In speaking of this enterprise The South says:

"The magnitude of the cotton interest demands the most economical treatment in all particulars, if the best results are to be sought and secured. The changed condition of affairs, imposed by the severity of the times, requires the utmost care at every point. To buy cotton cheap is not always to buy it well. Quality must determine value, and if it be not right in this particular, it may prove a dear bargain indeed.

"The merchant who buys and sells cotton does not always prove equal to the task of determining its quality. It is a weighty matter to make an inspection which shall prove entirely reliable. Could the merchant have the co-operation of the producer, he would err far less frequently than is at present the case. To secure this, one condition is essential, and that is interest. Could the man who packs and ships cotton feel that his reputation and his success were at stake in every transaction he made, a motive would exist which would insure a great benefit to all interested.

"That this may be done, and that it is done with marked and gratifying results, is shown in the case of the house of Messrs. Samuel Blaisdell, Jr., & Co., of Chicopee, Mass., who have developed this subject to large proportions. A few years since they established the business of supplying large corporations with cotton. Practically educated in its culture, and possessing a critical knowledge of its quality, they undertook to stand between the consumer and the producer, and to see that exact justice was done both. As a consequence the consumer soon found that his welfare was being very materially promoted, and that while he was paying no more for his cotton, he was actually making considerable saving, both in quality and in price.

"This became the general experience of manufacturers whose orders were supplied through this house, whose business was soon largely increased, inasmuch that shippers of the staple in all parts of the South became anxious to deal with them. From these numerous applicants they were enabled to choose those whose location and standing were such as to insure excellence and reliability. A standard was established, and its due observance must, in the inevitable course of affairs, determine the duration of business intercourse. All the while the consumer was receiving shipments of cotton, which, for uniformity and general excellence, surpassed his former experience. His orders became constant, and the demand on the shipper was also large and frequent. All this came from a critical method in the business, which did justice to all concerned. Now the transactions of Messrs. Samuel Blaisdell, Jr., & Co. have reached a significance which would surprise one not conversant with their history.

"The large shipments direct from the Southern planters are all consigned to Messrs. C. H. Mallory & Co., of New York, who attend to the distribution to all parts of the country as ordered by Messrs. Samuel Blaisdell, Jr., & Co. It will thus be seen this house possesses unsurpassed facilities in this respect, by which means the consumer is saved the expense of rehandling, storage, shipping, and insurance. The magnitude of their business secures for the buyer the cheapest freights, while their intimate knowledge of values is of great and constant service to him. Their large pecuniary resources enable them to complete the most weighty transactions. They would appear to have in their power to confer great favors on both shipper and consumer, and they are surely accomplishing their work."

It is said that "nothing succeeds like success." Mr. Blaisdell almost from boyhood has occupied positions of trust and responsibility, and has brought to the discharge of his duty that foresight and executive ability which characterizes the lives of successful men. He has not taken an active part in politics since leaving Baltimore, although he has had tendered to him many positions of trust. He is and always has been a Republican. In 1860, Mr. Blaisdell, married the only daughter of L. H. Crane, of Brattleboro', Vt.*

EMERSON GAYLORD,

son of Josiah Gaylord and Lucinda Smith Gaylord, was born in South Hadley, Mass., Sept. 2, 1817. His father died when he was seven years of age, and, the family not being in very good circumstances financially, he was early left to depend upon his own individual resources. At the age of seventeen he was apprenticed to Seth Nym's, of Amherst, to learn the harness-making business. An apprentice in those days was called upon to do "chores," and render assistance in various ways outside the legitimate business. So it was with young Gaylord. He was ambitious and eager to succeed; but, soon finding that he had so much farming and choring on hand that it left but little time to work at the trade, he remained but two months, when he returned to South Hadley and began the shoemaker's trade with George Kilbourn. He afterward purchased "his time" of Kilbourn for fifty dollars. The determination to succeed and become master of whatever business he engaged in was characteristic of him then as well as in later life, and he gave a Mr. Ely one dollar per week to teach him the art of making a first-class gaiter-boot. He continued working at his trade, and at the age of twenty-one years had saved forty dollars. After leaving the employ of Mr. Kilbourn, he worked for John Gaylord in the shoe business until 1840, and in the following year—1841—came to Chicopee and entered the employ of the N. P. Ames Company, manufacturer of cannon, swords, and military accoutrements, including artillery-harness and saddles. His first work here was making harnesses for the Texan trade, and soon after it was extended to sword-scabards and other military accoutrements. Mr. Gaylord entered this establishment with the will that characterized his previous career; and, as illustrative of the esteem in which he was held by the company, it is stated that he first received seven shillings per day, which was after one month increased to one dollar and twenty-five cents. And in 1843, when the health of the foreman failed, Mr. Ames solicited him to take charge of the shop; but, instead of longer continuing as an employé, he contracted with the Ames Company for furnishing the leather goods. He continued in this business until January 1, 1856, when he purchased that part of the business, and added to the manufacture leather hose and machine-beltting.

In 1856 he received orders from the War Department for infantry accoutrements, and continued to fill orders for the same every three months up to 1861. Prior to the breaking out of the Rebellion he furnished first-class military accoutrements to the following Southern States,—Maryland, Virginia, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi,—little thinking that those very accoutrements would so soon be used in a war to perpetuate slavery, and to break up the union of States in which the commonwealth of Massachusetts has ever played an important rôle. On the day Fort Sumter fell, Mr. Gaylord had a stock of accoutrements for the South on hand, and on the afternoon of the same day received a dispatch from Col. Thornton, commanding at Governor's Island, N. Y., to ship to the government all goods on hand and all in process of construction. Soon after, a messenger arrived from Gov. Andrew with the same request for Massachusetts. He resolved to divide them equally between the government and the State, and did so. Before night of the same day a noted speculator from New York arrived and offered Mr. Gaylord five thousand dollars more than he would otherwise receive. Mr. Gaylord's keen eye took it all in at a glance. He saw that they would, if once in the hands of this man, be sold to the Southern States, and, being more patriotic than many in the North during the dark days of 1861-62, promptly refused the offer. The demand from the government for this line of goods now became large, and to fill it he rapidly erected new and large buildings, increased his force to four hundred and fifty men, and shipped from eighteen thousand to twenty thousand dollars' worth of goods per week. In 1861 he also contracted for furnishing the government with leather mail-bags for a term of four years, and has taken it at three successive lettings since,—twelve years in all.

In April, 1863, Mr. Gaylord organized his establishment into a stock company. He owns a majority of the stock, and has been president since its organization. Since the Rebellion, the business has been chiefly confined to cabinet-locks and regulation and society swords of the finest workmanship.

Politically, Mr. Gaylord has been a Republican since the organization of the party. He has manifested an interest in political matters, and was a member of the Legislature in 1866. He is a member of the Third Congregational Church. He married, in 1844, Jane Burnett, a native of South Hadley. They have one son, A. F. Gaylord, who is one of the stockholders in, and treasurer of, the Gaylord Manufacturing Company.

It is readily seen that Mr. Gaylord has depended upon his own resources, but, being possessed of a determined will, coupled with business foresight, has been eminently successful; and the poor boy of 1830 is now one of the substantial and wealthy manufacturers of the Connecticut Valley.

EZEKIEL BLAKE.

The subject of this memoir was born in Londonderry, N. H., Jan. 9, 1811. His early days, without much opportunity for schooling, were spent in the cooper-shop of his father. But his home was not inviting at that period, for reasons needless to repeat, and after patiently enduring many trials he left his father's house at the age of seventeen. With all his worldly estate in a small bundle of clothes under his arm, he started on foot for Methuen, Mass., to see what he could do toward making his own way in life. Presenting himself to Mr. A. Adams, the manager of the cotton-mills there, he at once found employment. His purpose was to learn to be a manufacturer, and, like the sensible boy he was, he was willing to begin at the bottom. His engagement was for three years, at fifty dollars for the first, one hundred for the second, and one hundred and twenty dollars for the third, inclusive of board. Commencing in the mill-yard, he worked up gradually through the picker-room, card-room, spinning-room, weaving-room, until, under the agency of Daniel Balch, he became an overseer in the mills which he had so lately entered as a boy with everything to learn. Energetic, observing, faithful in every position he held, from the lowest upward, he soon became thorough master of his business, and he did not fail to attract notice and lucrative offers in larger manufactories which required him.

While at Methuen he became an earnest Christian, and in his twenty-first year united with the Baptist Church in that place, then under the care of Rev. C. O. Kimball. In the year 1833 he married Miss Mercie Perkins, of Jaffrey, N. H., who still survives him after a happy union in a married life of nearly forty years. In 1835 a more important and lucrative post as overseer of the weaving in the "Boott Corporation" at Lowell called and kept him there for five successive years. In 1840 the charge both of weaving and dressing was pressed upon him from the Amoskeag corporation, at Manchester, N. H., which he accepted and most successfully held until the year 1846. During that year, after accepting and retaining for a time the office of superintendent of the Lowell Machine-Works, he resigned that post to accept the agency of the Chicopee Manufacturing Company, at Chicopee Falls, in the active duties of which most responsible position he remained till the morning of his sudden death,—a period of twenty-seven years. Under his agency the mills rose to be regarded as one of the most valuable and successful manufacturing properties in the country.

Ezekiel Blake for twenty-seven years occupied an official position which, in a village like Chicopee Falls, identified him directly or indirectly in some way with the life of almost every individual. Coming into the agency of the Chicopee mills in 1846, he as the years went on grew more and more into the thorough respect, confidence, and love of his neighbors and of all who knew him. This village, in which the best years of his life were spent, was very dear to him. Its interests were his interests; its prosperity was his prosperity. Vigilant and faithful as he proverbially was to the special interests of his own great charge, he had ever an eye and an ear and a helping hand for every new business enterprise which promised to bring thrift and additional prosperity to the village in which he lived. As president of two corporations, as director and stockholder in others, he has ever had an active share in the business life of the village. His co-operation and his counsel will long be missed in many a circle and by many a man. Though by his own special office placed in a position of great responsibility, and intensely devoted to his proper duties there, he was nevertheless emphatically a man of the people. He was not only the thorough master of his business as a great manufacturer in all the details of its operations, but also in every department of business outside his own calling with which he was connected. His strong native intellect, his long experience, his clear practical judgment, joined with his sterling integrity of character, rendered him a counselor in many circles whose loss will long be felt. He was a member of the Baptist Church, and manifested a deep interest in religious matters. He died Nov. 27, 1872.

GEORGE DEXTER ROBINSON.

The Robinson family appears in the earliest records of the ancient town of Lexington, Mass., and its connexions were participants in the memorable affray upon Lexington Common, April 19, 1775. The mother of the subject of this sketch, Mary Davis Robinson, is a descendant of the Davis and Hosmer families of Concord and Acton, Mass., many of whose members fought for American liberty at Concord,

"Where the embattled farmers stood
And fired the shot heard round the world."

George D. Robinson, son of Charles and Mary Davis Robinson, was born in Lexington, Mass., Jan. 20, 1834. The family consisted of two children, George D. and an older brother, Charles Robinson, Jr., who has been mayor of the city of Charlestown, Mass., and is now a prominent lawyer in Boston. The Robinson home was upon a farm remote from neighbors and two miles distant from Lexington village. In his early boyhood George D. attended the district school, ranking first among his associates. At the age of sixteen he began attendance at the Lexington Academy, where he remained one year, and was then sent to the Hopkins classical school at Cambridge, Mass., the design of his father being to give him a good education, but with no purpose looking to the benefits of a collegiate training. While in the latter school he made such progress that the principal of the institution persuaded his father to send him to Harvard College, and accordingly, in July, 1852, he presented himself for examination, and was admitted without conditions,—the only member of the class from that school who passed as creditably. Mr. Robinson took high rank in his class in college, and in July, 1856, graduated among the foremost of its 92 members. In the winters of his junior and senior years he taught the district school in Lexington, where he had formerly been a pupil. Upon graduation he accepted the principalship of the high school in Chicopee, Mass., and assumed the duties of the position Sept. 20, 1856, and remained in charge of this large school—averaging 125 pupils—until March, 1865, when he resigned. Mr. Robinson was very successful in the management of this school, and during his administration a course of study was adopted and many other reforms inaugurated which have contributed to the present high standing of the school, and it is but justice to say that his resignation was accepted with much regret. He at once went to Charlestown, Mass., and commenced the study of the law in the office of his brother, and after eleven months was, upon examination, admitted to the Bar at Cambridge, Mass., and on the 1st of April, 1866, returned to Chicopee and there entered upon the practice of the law, which he has since continued with marked success.

Politically, Mr. Robinson is a Republican, and, like every true citizen, has ever taken an active interest in political matters. He was in the Massachusetts Legislature in 1874 as a member of the House of Representatives, serving on the judiciary committee. In 1876 he was a member of the State Senate, serving as chairman of the committees on the judiciary, probate and chancery, and constitutional amendments. In the fall of 1876 he was elected representative to the Forty-Fifth Congress of the United States from the Eleventh District of Massachusetts to succeed Hon. Chester W. Chapin, and in that body was assigned to the committee on the improvement of the Mississippi River, and the committee of expenditures in the department of justice. In the fall of 1878 he was re-elected to Congress, and is now a member of the committee on the judiciary.

Mr. Robinson has ever been actively interested in the advancement of the interests of the town and State, and has always considered it his duty to meet unhesitatingly all the claims fairly made upon the citizens. He has always manifested an active interest in religious matters, is a Unitarian, and has been thoroughly and earnestly alive to the support of the liberal faith, rendering assistance in the Sunday-school and in all departments of church work.

Mr. Robinson rose rapidly in his profession, and soon took front rank among the leading members of the Bar of Western Massachusetts. As a legislator he was watchful of the interests of the whole people, and measures touching the advancement and welfare of the State found in him a fearless advocate.

GEORGE SYLVESTER TAYLOR,

son of Sylvester Taylor and Sarah Eaton Taylor, was born in South Hadley, Hampshire Co., Mass., March 2, 1822. He removed with his parents to Chicopee Falls when but six years of age, and attended school at Chicopee and Springfield, laying the foundation for his subsequent successful business career. He commenced a general mercantile business at Chicopee in 1844, in company with Mr. Shackford, under the firm-name of Shackford & Taylor. He continued in this business nineteen years, and then formed a copartnership with Bildad B. Belcher, in the manufacture of agricultural implements at Chicopee Falls. In 1864 the firm was changed to a corporation, with Mr. Taylor treasurer, and Mr. Belcher agent. In 1868 the latter resigned, and Mr. Taylor was appointed, since which time he has held the position of agent and treasurer. In 1863 the business was not in a prosperous condition, but since that time has increased gradually, and is now large and highly successful.

Politically, he is a member of the Republican party, and has served in various official positions within the gift of his fellow-citizens. He has filled various town offices, and was special judge of the Chicopee police court, upon its organization in 1860. In the same year he represented this district in the Legislature, and in 1869 represented the Western Hampden District in the State Senate.

In religious matters he has also been active. He is a member of the Congregational Church, and has officiated as superintendent of the Sunday-school a quarter of a century, and as deacon twenty-two years, having been chosen to the latter position June 20, 1857. Mr. Taylor married, Nov. 25, 1845, Asenath B. Cobb, a native of Princeton, Mass. Their family consisted of seven children, four of whom are living, viz., Ella S., wife of Henry Lyon, of Chicopee; Edward S., who resides in Chicopee, and is paymaster at the Musgrave Alpaca Company; William C., who is now engaged in the mercantile business in Boston; and Albert E.

It comprises 17,216 acres of land.

NATURAL FEATURES.

The town is rugged in aspect, though abundantly interspersed with productive vales and meadow-lands. Many hills, some of them aspiring to the appellation of mountains, diversify the landscape. Of these, the most noted—not because of altitude or dimensions, but because of the relation which it bore to the first settlement of the town—is Pattaquatic Hill, in the northeastern section.

The water-courses are especially abundant, and afford excellent water-power, which is utilized by various manufacturing establishments. Swift River traverses the northwestern border, on its way southward to the Chicopee, and partially divides the town from Belchertown, Hampshire County. Ware River enters the town from the northeast, and passes down through the centre to a junction with the Swift River at the northwestern border. The Quaboag River traverses the eastern and southern borders to a point a mile below the village of Palmer, where it bears to the north and northwest, and at the village of Three Rivers unites with the waters of the Swift and Ware Rivers and forms the Chicopee River. Numerous affluents of the larger streams, in the form of brooks, supply all parts of the town with abundance of water, and several of the larger streams have been and are still utilized for water-power.

Several ponds of water exist in different parts of the town, the largest and most important of which are Calkins', or Yellow Lily Pond, near the centre, and Newell's, or Pattaquatic Pond, about two miles to the north. The geologic and mineral characteristics are not of special importance, but conform to the description of those features in the eastern part of the county discussed in a general chapter of this work.

RAILROADS.

The town enjoys excellent railroad facilities, and the introduction of these formed the starting-point of its present manufacturing and commercial importance. Prior to the construction of the Boston and Albany Railroad along its eastern and southern borders, in 1840, it was not equal in enterprise and industrial importance to the neighboring towns, and one of its leading villages, Palmer Depot, has grown up wholly in consequence of the building of that road.

The New London and Northern Railroad also passes through its western section, affording shipping facilities to the important manufacturing enterprises in the village of Three Rivers, and also at Palmer Depot.

The Ware River Railroad also passes through the town, having stations at Palmer Depot and at the manufacturing village of Thorndike.

The Springfield, Athol and Northeastern Railroad enters from Ludlow on the west, and passes in a northeasterly direction through the town, touching at Three Rivers and Bond's village.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

The honor of being the first settler of Palmer probably belongs to John King, who established himself about the year 1717. A letter from his mother, dated "Ednarston (England), April 20, 1718," speaks of him as having been married and having one son born,—it is supposed in Boston. She refers to the hardships he had experienced since he left home, and expresses her sorrow to hear that he "lived in such a desert place without neighbors." She also says, "I shall never overcome my grief to think you are so far off," but adds, "I am glad to hear you live under the ministry of the gospel; I pray God to give you grace to improve by it." He probably attended the church in Brimfield.

The spot where the rude log house was first erected by him cannot now be precisely determined. It was somewhere on the plain where the village of Palmer Depot now is. Tradition says that this pioneer family spent the first night of their sojourn at the spring on the hill-side, near the old graveyard where they are interred. Some apple-trees are said to have sprung up near by from seed dropped by them.

Several of Mr. King's sons, of whom he had eight, and three daughters settled in the immediate vicinity of their father, along the north bank of the Quaboag River. From them not only the neighborhood where they lived became known as "King's Row," but the whole town was often called Kingsfield or Kingstown in the county and colonial records. The more usual name, however, was the "Elbow-tract," or the "Elbows," a designation probably derived from the angles made by the union of the Swift and Ware Rivers with the Chicopee. This part of the town was first occupied by James Shearer, who died in 1745. It was sometimes called the "Dark Corner," because it was at first occupied by only three families, and most of the land was covered with a dense forest.

The formal settlement of the town was not undertaken until the year 1727, when a company of Scotch-Irish emigrants* began to establish themselves under grants or permits from the proprietors of Lambstown (now Hardwicke), who claimed an extensive tract of land by virtue of a purchase from the Indians, Dec. 27, 1686, "for the sum of £20 current money of New England." The colonial government, however, did not admit their title to the land, and accordingly 56 of the inhabitants, mostly Scotch-Irish, but some from Springfield and other New England towns, presented the following petition for a grant of this tract of land:

"To His Excellency Jonathan Belcher, Esq., Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief in and over his Majesty's Province of the Massachusetts Bay, in New England. The Honorable His Majesty's Council and House of Representatives in General Court assembled, May 31, 1732.

"The petition of the subscribers, dwelling and residing on a tract and parcel of land lying and situate between Springfield and Brookfield, Brimfield and the land called the Equivalent land and Cold Spring, Humbly Sheweth:

"That they are sensible the said land belongs to the said Province; yet the reason why your petitioners entered on the said land was as follows: Some from the encouragement of Joshua Lamb, Esq., and Company, that the said land belonged to them, and that they would give to such of your petitioners as entered thereon under them a good right and title to such a part thereof as they respectively contracted for. Yet, notwithstanding, your petitioners are now sensible that the said Lamb & Co. have no right to the said land, and that the same will prove greatly to your petitioners' damage; that is, to such as hold under them, unless relieved by your Excellency and Honors; and that others of your petitioners entered on them from necessity, not having wherewith of their own to provide. Yet nevertheless, your petitioners are duly sensible that they deserve your discompenance. But, confiding in the reasons offered, they humbly request your compassionate consideration, that they may be put under such regulation as may have a tendency to promote the flourishing of religion, &c.

"Therefore your petitioners most humbly pray that your Excellency and Honors would take the premises into your wise consideration, and either grant them the said tract of land, or put them under such restrictions and regulations as in your consummate wisdom shall be thought most reasonable, and your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray (signed): James Dorchester, Joseph Wright, Bernard McNitt, Daniel Fuller, Andrew Mackie, James Shearer, James Stevens, Daniel Killam, David Spear, Thomas Little, Samuel Doolittle, James Brakenridge, Robert Harper, William Shaw, John Harvey, John Bemon, Duncan Quintin, Isaac Magoon, Isaac Magoon, Jr., Micah Tonsley, Elijah Vose, Elisha Hall, Alexander Tackell, Robert Farrell, Joseph Fleming, Aaron Nelson, John Henderson, David Nevins, Joseph Brooks, Robert Nevins, Humphrey Gardner, Nicholas Blancher, William Crawford, Samuel Nevins, John Gerish, Samuel Shaw, Andrew Rutherford, Daniel Parsons, James McClenathan, James Lambertson, Thomas McClenathan, Robert Thompson, Joseph Wright, Jr., Samuel Brooks, Robert Dunlap, Benjamin Parsons, James Lambertson, Jr., Timothy McElwean, Matthew Brown, Patrick Smith, John Brown, Aaron Parsons, Andrew Farrand."

In answer to this petition the General Court voted that Col. John Alden, of Duxbury, and Samuel Bradford, of Plympton, with such others as the Governor and council should appoint, be a committee to repair to the land in question, and view "the situation and circumstances thereof, as well as those of the petitioners." The committee performed their labor, and reported at the next session as follows:

"We find the land petitioned for to be a tract of land commonly called the 'Elbow tract,' lying near Springfield and the 'Equivalent lands,' containing 17,014 acres (viz., contents of five miles square and 1014 acres over), exclusive of particular grants taken up and laid out within the same, bounded and included within the lines and boundaries of the adjacent land as hereafter laid down, viz.: Easterly in part upon the west line of Brookfield township; from the Northwest corner the said line runs South two deg. West to the river called Quaboug alias Chicopee River; thence bounding on Brimfield township, as the said river runs, Easterly in part and Southerly, and in part Westerly so far down said river as to where the South end line of a tract of Equivalent lands called Cold Spring township [now Belchertown] crosses or skirts the said river; then bounding Northerly on the said line, as it keeps East by the needle of the surveying instrument, to the Southeast corner of said tract or township, which is the mouth of Swift River; thence bounding Westerly in part on the said tract or township of equivalent land as the river runs, to where the South line of another tract of Equivalent land [now Ware], containing 10,000 acres, belonging to John Read, Esq., strikes up or runs from said river; thence bounding Northerly upon said line as it runs East, and by North to the Southeast corner of said tract, being a heap of stones by the root of a great red oak-tree, fallen close by one on the West side of a run of water, about eighteen rods Southerly of the river, called the Ware River; thence bounding Westerly on the East line of said tract, as it runs North by the needle, until on East line, there will strike the Northeast corner tree of Brookfield."

The committee further reported that they found the greater part of the tract "to be pine land, high hills, and low valleys; the hills very poor and mean, the valleys pretty good." They further reported that about 80 persons had settled upon the land, or were about settling, the most of them families who had built houses and made considerable improvements, and that for three years past they had supported, by free contribution, a minister of the gospel. They found affairs greatly mixed, the lots of the settlers encroaching one upon the other. Other matters of like nature were referred to in detail, and recommendations relative to grants of the land were made. The report was adopted by the General Court, June 21, 1733.

The result was that specific grants were made to 44 different persons, mostly of 100 acres each, and they alone were constituted proprietors or grantees, with power to take and divide among themselves all lands within the limits of the town not otherwise appropriated. One of the conditions of this adjustment of affairs was "that such of the aforesaid-named persons or grantees as are non-residents, and their lots not settled, shall forthwith settle them by their own persons, or by such credible wholesome inhabitants as shall be accepted by the major part of the resident settlers." Another was that they should "lay out, in some suitable and convenient place, one lot, not less than 100 acres, to be to and for the first settled and ordained minister; and also two other lots of the same contents, one for the ministry and the other for a school."

Grants of a single lot were also made to each of 31 other persons who had "presumed to enter upon the Province land in the said tract without any leave or order from this court." The general conditions applicable to both sets of grantees were that they pay into the public treasury the sum of £500 within two years, and that they pay the further sum of £67 11s. 9d., the charge and expense of the committee. Provisions were also made for the forfeiture of the lands in case of default, and they were required to build a suitable house for public worship and settle a minister within two years.

In June, 1735, the proprietors granted a 100-acre lot to each member of the committee, as a "grateful acknowledgment of their great and good service to the settlement, in dispatching the affairs thereof by a full and particular report, superseding the charge and difficulty of a committee of regulation." Ebenezer Burrill, of Lynn, who acted as the third member of the committee, was one of the grantees.

The inhabitants found it impossible to pay the tax levied by the General Court, although it only amounted to about $630, or less than 4 cents an acre for the 17,014 acres, which the town contained. Execution was issued against them by the province treasurer, and their collectors were exposed to imprisonment for not meeting the demand of the general government. A petition for relief was addressed to the General Court in September, 1743, setting forth the claims to further forbearance of "this little, poor, infant plantation," and representing the inhabitants to be "a poor people on a small, mean tract of land," and averring that their taxes were "very hard and grievous, and wholly insupportable." The tax was divided up into four parts, payable at different times, which they finally succeeded in paying.

The earliest date of the laying out of any land is June 11, 1728. This was Obadiah Cooley's lot, now within the limits of Warren. There were many lots laid out in 1728, most of them in December of that year. Andrew Farrand's (No. 2) was laid out Dec. 15, 1728. Ebenezer Merriek's lot was laid out Jan. 21, 1729. Rev. Moses Baldwin afterward resided there. It was originally laid out to James Dorchester, who probably abandoned his right to Merriek. James McElwean's lot was laid out on Dec. 1, 1728. The first proprietors' meeting was held on Aug. 7, 1734, under a warrant from William Pynchon, of Springfield.

The first house built in Palmer, with the exception of that erected by John King already referred to, was by James Dorchester. It stood on a piece of land that Capt. J. Cooley purchased of Moses Baldwin, where there was a cellar, about 1720. The lot was originally called No. 9. In 1733 the court granted a lot to Dorchester east of Dumplin. The oldest houses now standing in Palmer are the Nutting house, in the north part of the town, now occupied by Myron Bartlett, and which was erected by David Spear about 1765, and the Joe Lee house, built over one hundred years ago, on Pataquatic Hill.

Of the first settlers of the town, James Shearer lived near the village of Three Rivers, which his grant originally included. He divided his property among his children. David Spear lived in the north part of the town. James Breckenridge lived east of Palmer Centre. Duncan Quintin was a surveyor, acted as proprietors' clerk for years, and lived at Palmer Centre. Alexander Tackels owned east of Thorndike. Robert Farrell lived where Jacob Stever now resides, and his descendants intermarried with the McMaster family, who came to this country from Ireland in the same ship with the Farrells. John McMaster lived where King Knox now lives. Hugh McMaster lived near Pattaquattic Pond. Joshua McMaster lived in the northeast part of the town, on the Reuben Shaw place. Joseph Fleming lived southeast of the meeting-house about two miles. James McClenathan lived on the east side of the Pattaquattic Hill. Benjamin Parsons lived in the east part of the town, near the John Gamwell farm.

Timothy McElwean came from Bruchean, Ireland, about 1720, and took up a large tract of land near the village of Thorndike. He was a blacksmith by trade, and was probably the first in the town to engage in that occupation. Wm. Sloan located near Thorndike, on the north side of the river. John Brown located in the east part of the town. Patrick Smith located on the west side of Pattaquattic Hill, where Charles Smith now lives, and Aaron Parsons in the east part of the town, on the Gamwell place.

The descendants of several of these pioneer settlers are yet living in the town, notably the Smiths, McElweans, and Farrells.

TAVERNS.

Tradition says that the oldest tavern which existed within the confines of the town of Palmer stood near the present residence of Ebenezer Brown, over a hundred years ago. The oldest inhabitants remember simply to have heard traditions regarding it, and to have seen the chimney standing which was formerly used in connection with the house.

A man named Scott kept tavern at Four Corners over one hundred years ago, which, probably, was the next one. Tales of horrible tragedies which are said to have occurred within its walls are yet remembered by the old people, but their facts are not authenticated by any reliable evidence. Those were days of witches, hobgoblins, and ghostly appearances. James Bates and his father succeeded Scott in hotel-keeping at Four Corners. Then John Sedgwick left Palmer Centre and erected a large hotel at Four Corners, which he kept for a number of years. The first meeting of the citizens of Palmer to consult upon the survey for the Boston and Albany Railroad was held at this house. It was afterward removed to Palmer Depot, and is still used as a dwelling-house, standing on Park Street, near the Congregational Church.

John King kept a tavern about 1805 or 1806 at Palmer Centre. He was succeeded by Sedgwick & Gardner, and they by John Frink, who kept it as late as 1833.* Abner Allen and Elias Turner then kept it successively. Alfred Trumbull now occupies the building as a dwelling-house. Numerous small inns or taverns existed in different parts of the town at later periods.

STORES AND MERCHANTS.

One of the earliest stores kept in the town was by Amos Hamilton, at Palmer Centre, about 1802. Small trading-posts may have existed at earlier dates. Hamilton's store stood near the old meeting-house. Knights & Ward traded there subsequently, and Benjamin Fuller was in trade there about 1824 or 1825.

LAW AND MEDICINE.

Of the early physicians, Dr. Jonathan Shearer practiced in the southwest part of the town, near the Monson line, as early as 1800, and perhaps earlier. Dr. Aaron King practiced at Palmer Centre about 1810. Dr. Alanson Moody and Dr. Marcus Shearer afterward engaged in practice there.

The first lawyer was Daniel Shearer, who practiced over one hundred years ago in the west part of the town. He afterward moved into the centre. The next lawyer to locate at

* Frink was afterward proprietor of several great stage-lines in the West, in company with Mr. Walker, of Chicago.

Palmer was James Stebbins, who was admitted to the Bar in 1813, and immediately commenced practice there. In his old age he removed to Springfield, his native place, where he died.

ORGANIZATION.

The first attempt at organization in Palmer was made in the year 1735, when the inhabitants petitioned to be set off into a town, but failed.† They made several other attempts among themselves, but either could not agree or the General Court refused permission. In 1743 leave was granted to bring in a bill, on petition, but nothing was accomplished.

Finally, Jan. 23, 1752, Palmer was incorporated a district, with the following bounds: "Easterly, on the town of Western [now Warren]; Northerly, partly on the plantation called Cold Spring [Belchertown], and partly on Ware River Precinct, called Read's farm [Ware]; Southerly and Westerly, on the town of Brimfield." All the privileges, powers, and immunities usually conferred upon towns were bestowed upon the new district, with the exception of the right of representation in the Legislature. It is stated in the act, by way of semi-apology, that the people of the new district were not "desirous of" this privilege.

By a statute for the regulation of towns, passed March 23, 1786, all places incorporated as districts, prior to Jan. 1, 1777, were declared to be towns "to every intent and purpose whatever," and it was by virtue of this enactment that Palmer was raised to a position of equality with the other towns of the commonwealth.

On the 3d of June, by a special act, John Sherman, a justice of Brimfield, was empowered, "upon application to him made for that purpose" by five of the inhabitants, to issue his warrant for a meeting, when they might "choose and appoint such town officers as the law directs." In accordance with this provision, the first official meeting was held "at the public Meeting-House, on Tuesday, the 30th day of June, 1752."

The act contained no name for the new district, although the inhabitants had petitioned for that of Kingstown, by which it had previously been called. Perhaps the explanation why that name was not conferred lay in the fact that "Kingston" already existed in Plymouth County. Lieut.-Gov. Spencer Phipps, in accordance with a not unusual custom of the day, bestowed the name of Palmer upon the new district, in honor of his relative, Thomas Palmer, who had recently died in Scotland.

Among other votes of interest that have been passed by the town was one on March 15, 1768, as follows:

"Whereas, the excessive use of foreign superfluities is one great cause of the present distressed state of this country in general, and the happiness of the communities depends on industry, economy, and good morals; and this district, taking into serious consideration the great decay of trade, the scarcity of money, the heavy debt contracted in the last war,‡ which still remains upon the people, and the great difficulties to which, by these means, they are reduced: Therefore voted, unanimously, that this District will use their utmost endeavors by example, in suppressing extravagance, idleness, and vice, and promoting industry, economy, and good manners. And in order to prevent the unnecessary exportation of money, of which the continent has of late been so much drained, it is, therefore, Voted that this District will, by all prudent means, endeavor to discountenance the use of foreign superfluities, and encourage the manufactures of the whole continent in general and of this Province in particular."

The principal officers and representatives of the town, so far as we have been able to obtain them,§ have been as follows:

VILLAGES.

PALMER DEPOT,

in the south part of the town, is a flourishing village of 1500 inhabitants, situated at the junction of the Boston and Albany and New London Railroads. The Quaboag River flows past the village, but lacks sufficient fall to make that point equal in manufacturing facilities to other villages in the town. It has principally grown up since the establishment of the Boston and Albany Railroad, in 1840, and partakes rather of the character of a railroad centre than of a manufacturing village. It contains extensive stores, which are largely patronized by the residents of the surrounding towns. Several branches of industry are pursued, which are elsewhere named. Congregational, Baptist, and Catholic Churches are also to be found there, and a Universalist Church is in course of erection.

Three excellent hotels, the Nassowanno, Toekwotton, and Antique, furnish accommodations to the traveling public. The Palmer National Bank is also located here.

The first store established in the village was by Amos C. Billings, shortly before the Boston and Albany Railroad was completed. It stood a little west of Commercial block. Daniel King had a grain and flour store soon after 1840, which stood near where the foundry now stands.

In 1824 an old house stood where the Nassowanno House now is, which occasionally served the purposes of an inn. A. N. Dewey had a tavern, about 1838, in the village, where the Antique House now stands, and it has continued to be kept there by different persons ever since. A man named Morrill kept a tavern where the Toekwotton House stands, but the building, which was of wood, was burned in the disastrous fire by which nearly half the village was destroyed. The Nassowanno House was erected by Chester Strong, soon after the fire, and has been kept by different proprietors since. C. P. Stone is the present popular proprietor.

PHYSICIANS.

Of the physicians who have practiced in the village, Dr. Wm. Holbrook came from Bonds village about 1849 or 1850, and is still in active practice. Dr. White practiced in the village about twenty years ago. A little later Dr. Barrom and Dr. Cummings engaged in practice there. Besides Dr. Holbrook, Dr. W. H. Stowe, Dr. J. K. Warren, and Dr. A. C. Downing are now in practice in the village.

The legal profession was early represented. Calvin Torrey practiced about the time the Boston & Albany Railroad was built. Frederick T. Wallace practiced about 1852, and about the same time lawyers Barlow and Granger were also in practice. The lawyers at present are J. C. Allen, who also officiates as judge of the District Court, Chas. L. Gardner, recently re-elected State Senator, and S. S. Taft.

POST-OFFICE.

The village post-office was established some time prior to 1840, and Amos C. Billings was the first postmaster. The office was subsequently held by Chester Strong, John Bolles, Abner Allen, Dr. Holbrook, C. C. Shaw, Daniel Granger, Cyrus Knox, and others. The present postmaster is Cyrus Knox, a son of a former postmaster; he was first appointed to the position March 16, 1864.

NEWSPAPERS.

The first newspaper published in Palmer was the Palmer Sentinel, the publishers being Whittemore & Tenney. The first number was issued in January, 1846. In the spring of 1847 the paper was moved to Springfield. The Palmer Times, printed in Springfield, was started in the spring of 1847, by D. F. Ashley, of Springfield, but only one number was published.

The Palmer Journal, a newspaper having a large circulation in Palmer and adjoining towns, was first issued on April 6, 1850, by Gordon M. Fisk, in behalf of the "Palmer Publishing Association," and came into the possession of Mr. Fisk April 5, 1851. It is now published by G. M. Fisk & Co., Charles B. Fisk, a son of Gordon M., being associated in the enterprise.

An excellent poor-farm, the property of the town, is situated about two miles from the village.

is a pleasant manufacturing village situated on the Ware River, northwest of the centre of the town, and distant from Palmer Depot about three miles. The water-power of the village is excellent, and has been utilized since 1837 by the Thorndike Manufacturing Company, who have two large and handsome cotton-mills. Besides these there are three stores, a Catholic and a Congregational Church, and a number of pleasant dwelling-houses. A Methodist Church stands about half-way between the village and Three Rivers, convenient for both. The Ware River Railroad passes through the village.

Thorndike has attained its chief importance during the last forty years. Prior to that time it was but little known. The first tavern was established about 1852, and was kept by Charles Foster. It was afterward kept by Elias Paul, by Mr. Slade, Elias Turner, and Stephen Newton. There is no hotel at present.

The first store was established in the village about 1837 by the Thorndike Manufacturing Company. Some time after, Wm. N. Packard commenced trading, and continued until his death, Nov. 3, 1878. George A. Murdock, Henry T. Bishop, and Wm. J. McCormick have the three general stores at present in the place.

PHYSICIANS.

Of the physicians who have practiced at Thorndike may be mentioned Dr. Calkins and Dr. Silas Ruggles, the latter now practicing at Three Rivers. Dr. Jason B. Thomas is at present located in Thorndike.

POST-OFFICE.

A post-office was first established in Palmer Centre about 1805 or 1806. The first postmaster was Amos Hamilton, who died in 1843. Theophilus H. Knight was the next postmaster, and so remained until the removal of the office to Thorndike, about 1840. The first postmaster at Thorndike was Abram R. Murdock. The office has since been filled by Nathan Sibley, Gamaliel Collins, and Dr. Silas Ruggles. Hiram E. W. Clark, the present postmaster, was appointed to that office in 1870.

THREE RIVERS.

The village of Three Rivers is situated in the western part of the town, and is distant from Palmer Depot about four miles. It derives its name from the fact of its location at the point where the united waters of the Ware, Swift, and Quaboug Rivers form the Chicopee. The water-power of the village was first utilized to any considerable extent by the Palmer Manufacturing Company in 1824. The Otis Manufacturing Company now have an excellent mill. Prior to 1824 not even a bridge existed there. The village contains a Baptist and a Catholic Church, and a neat house of worship belonging to the Union Evangelical Society.

The first hotel established in the village was kept by Erastus Hunt, in 1825. The building has since been destroyed by fire. About 1832 or 1833, Abel Calkins also kept hotel there. Ephraim Allen followed Calkins, and erected a new tavern where the boarding-house now is. It was afterward kept by Elias Paul, Andrew Holt, and Samuel Bullock, and was finally burned. No regular hotel has since existed in the place.

The Palmer Manufacturing Company established a store at Three Rivers in 1826. Atwood & Shumway commenced trading there in August, 1833, and remained together until 1844. Asa Shumway then continued in trade alone, and Samuel Atwood erected a new store. The latter subsequently withdrew from business, but Mr. Shumway continued until 1865. About 1853 or 1854, Walter Snow had a store below the old tavern-stand. The village at present contains three principal stores, of which that of Holden Brothers is the largest. The others are kept by Charles Squiers and Julius Thayer & Co.

The Reading-Room Association at Three Rivers is in a flourishing condition, and has elected these officers for the present term (1879): President, Charles McFarlin; Vice-President, E. O. Cummings; Secretary and Treasurer, Charles Squier; Executive Committee, Charles McFarlin, J. R. Perkins, and Charles H. Murdock.

PHYSICIANS.

Of the physicians, mention may be made of Dr. Amasa Davis, who practiced there a number of years ago. Dr. Silas Ruggles has been in successful business for a long time. For a few years past Dr. Granville E. Barstow has also practiced in the village.

POST-OFFICE.

The post-office at Three Rivers was established about 1825. Pascal P. Russell was the first to fill the office of postmaster. He remained in office until 1831, when James G. Hale was appointed. Nathan M. Cutler was appointed in 1834. In 1837, Asa Shumway became postmaster. Otis Packard was appointed in 1862. George W. Randall and Abel Webber next filled the office in turn. Charles Murdock was appointed in 1873. Daniel Holden, the present postmaster, was appointed in April, 1877.

The New London and Northern Railroad passes through the village.

is located in the northern part of the town, on the Swift River, and distant from Palmer Depot about five miles. Its northern extremity is designated as Duckville. This village, like those of Thorndike and Three Rivers, has also grown up around the excellent water-power furnished by the Swift River. The principal of these is the Boston Duck Company, which was established in 1844 or 1845, and still continues. Several saw-mills are also located at the village. An attractive Methodist Church stands on the principal street.

Taverns were early kept at Bonds village and Duckville.

In 1824 or 1825 a store was kept in Bonds village by Bond & Merriek. The two stores there at present are by Murdock & Bros. and O. A. Parent.

PHYSICIANS.

Of the early physicians of the village, Dr. Blair practiced about twenty-five years ago. Dr. William Holbrook, now of Palmer Depot, was engaged there for a time. Dr. William Walradt has been in business for a short time.

POST-OFFICE.

The village post-office was established in 1849, and Nathan D. Wight was the first postmaster, and continued in office until Jan. 1, 1878, when Emelius B. Murdock, the present incumbent, was appointed.

PALMER CENTRE,

as its name implies, is located near the centre of the town. It is often called Old Centre. Here the first town-plat was established and the first meeting-house erected. The oldest cemetery in the town is also at this point. The old meeting-house has long been abandoned, and, having passed through different hands, stands unused. A few scattered houses constitute the village, and no industries of special importance are pursued. The water-power and railroad facilities of the surrounding villages have enabled them to outstrip this ancient hamlet.

TENNYVILLE and BLANCHARDVILLE are names given to the outlying suburbs of Palmer Depot, to the southeast.

FOUR CORNERS is a name given to the crossing of two wagon-roads, centrally located between the villages of Three Rivers, Thorndike, Palmer Depot, and Bonds village. On account of its convenience of access the town-hall is located here. A Methodist Church is also situated at this point, the members being residents of the surrounding villages.

SCHOOLS.

Education early received the attention of the settlers of the town. In the original grant to the proprietors certain lands were set apart as a school-lot, and continued to be appropriated to that purpose, in the face of several attempts to divert them from that object, until Feb. 4, 1793, when a committee was chosen by a vote of the town to sell the lot at public auction. Aaron Merrick, David Shaw, and Urijah Ward were chosen for that purpose, and the lot was sold to John Hamilton for £121, who gave his note for the same. On Jan. 19, 1796, it was voted to appropriate the proceeds of the school-lot and other money in the treasury (vested in securities) toward building the new meeting-house, the church-people binding themselves to refund the same whenever it should be necessary, and the town's funds were accordingly used for that purpose.

The records show that regular annual provision has been made by the town for the support of its schools. In 1833 there were 10 school districts in the town. There are at present 18 of these schools, having in attendance about 1000 children. The last regular appropriation was $7700. In addition to this, the income received from the State, dog tax, and private receipts of the schools increased the amount devoted to school purposes to the sum of $8351.13. A high school exists at Palmer Depot. The other schools are divided into grammar, intermediate, and primary departments. They are in a prosperous condition, and are under the control of a school board, consisting of three members, one of whom is elected each year, and one retired.

RELIGIOUS.

The proprietors of Palmer made arrangements for the erection of a place of public worship as early as August, 1733. The size of the house determined upon was 30 by 36 feet, and the first place selected was "near James Lamberton's fence, by the pine-tree marked H, standing on the north side of the path." The exact present location of that spot cannot be definitely fixed upon. But the meeting-house was not located there, and its proposed site was changed several times. At last, to make a final decision of the vexed question, the proprietors voted, on Feb. 10, 1735, that it should be decided by popular vote, and the two places receiving the highest number of votes should be chosen as those for which lots should be drawn to fix the location.

The plan was duly carried out, when "it appeared that a spott on ye knowl near Crawford's house, and a spott on ye east side of Cedar Swamp Brook, on ye North side of ye road near where Wm. Kelson's hay-stack stood, were the two spots highest in nomination." Rev. John Harvey, the minister, then drew the lot, and the location was chosen on which the meeting-house stood for more than a century. The town appropriated £7 "to make provision for raising the meeting-house," and a committee was appointed "to make provision of drink and cakes suitable, and to order and dispose of the same at the time of the raising." The house thus erected was used for sixty-five years. At the end of that time a more commodious one was erected, and the old church became a sort of town-hall for the transaction of public business.

Religious meetings were held in Palmer as early as 1730, and were in form Scotch Presbyterian. The first minister in the settlement was Rev. Mr. Kilpatrick, who preached five Sabbaths. Rev. Mr. Weld followed him, and preached three months. Rev. Benjamin Dickinson preached six months, and was followed by Rev. John Harvey, who, after preaching four years, and assisting in the formation of a church, was settled as the pastor. He was ordained June 5, 1734, the services being performed by the Londonderry Presbytery under a large white oak, standing on the plain on the east side of a meadow called "Cedar Swamp Meadow." Mr. Harvey was dismissed in 1748, and was succeeded, in 1753, by Rev. Robert Burns, whose connection with the church was dissolved two or three years afterward. Previous to Mr. Burns, several persons had supplied the pulpit, including Rev. Dr. Lord, Rev. Jas. Morton, Rev. John McKinstry, Rev. Ebenezer Knibblows, and others. Regarding the compensation of the latter, the inhabitants of the district voted, Aug. 23, 1753, "that Rev. Ebenezer Knibblows, from New London, Conn., be allowed four pounds Sixteen shillings, which is eight shillings, Lawful money, for each Sermon he Preached on Sabbath Days, in this District, except three Sermons in which we can prove he preached other men's works."

Rev. Moses Baldwin was installed pastor after Mr. Burns, on June 17, 1761, and was not dismissed until June 19, 1811. Rev. Simeon Colton, of Longmeadow, was ordained over the church on the day of Mr. Baldwin's dismissal. About this time the church changed its form of government and became Congregational. Mr. Colton was dismissed in 1821, and was followed by Rev. Henry H. F. Sweet, who was ordained Nov. 9, 1825. He died Feb. 20, 1827, at the age of thirty-one. Rev. Joseph K. Ware was ordained Dec. 12, 1827, and was dismissed by his own request, March 16, 1831. In September, 1831, Rev. Samuel Backus, a native of Canterbury, Conn., was invited to preach, and continued until his installation as pastor, Jan. 11, 1832. He was dismissed May 4, 1841. Rev. Mr. Wetherell supplied the pulpit during the summer. In September, Rev. Moses K. Cross was engaged as a candidate for settlement, and ordained Feb. 2, 1842. He continued pastor of the church at the centre of the town until an amicable and nearly equal division took place, April 1, 1847, on territorial grounds. The pastor went with the First Church to Thorndike village, where they worshiped for a time in a hall, but soon erected a neat and pleasant sanctuary, which is still standing. The society is now known as

THE FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH IN PALMER.

Rev. Mr. Cross was dismissed March 7, 1849. Rev. Levi Smith and Rev. Plinius Moody supplied the church for a time. Nov. 19, 1851, Rev. Sylvester Hine was installed pastor. Since Mr. Hine the regular pastors of the church have been Rev. John H. M. Leland and Rev. Jeremy W. Tuck. Rev. Mr. Bond, Rev. Theodore A. Leet, Rev. Charles A. White, and others have supplied the pulpit. There is no regular pastor at present.

The present membership of the church is 70. The Sabbath-school comprises about 80 children.

SECOND CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH IN PALMER.*

Reference has been made in the preceding sketch of the early church history of Palmer to a separation of the old church into two parts, the one going to Thorndike, the other to Palmer Depot. The latter church became the Second Congregational Church in Palmer, and was thus organized:

A council of churches convened in Palmer at the hall in the McGilvray Block, April 1, 1847, pursuant to letters missive from the Rev. Moses K. Cross, now of Waterloo, Iowa, then pastor of the old church. The Rev. Alfred Ely, D.D., then senior pastor of the church in Monson, was moderator, and the Rev. D. N. Coburn, of Monson, then pastor of the West Church in Ware, was scribe of the council. Fifty-four members of the original church presented themselves before it with letters of dismission from "the Congregational Church in Palmer," and, in the afternoon of that day, the articles of faith and covenant which they offered having been approved, this ecclesiastical colony was formally recognized as "the Second Congregational Church in Palmer." The Rev. Sumner G. Clapp, then of Cabotville (Chicopee), preached the sermon. Fifteen men and thirty-nine women were organized into the new church. The Sunday-school was established the next Lord's day. Public worship was maintained at first in McGilvray's Hall. The Rev. Alfred Ely, D.D., and subsequently Mr. Thomas Wilson, "supplied the desk."

The following were the first officers elected by the church: Deacons, Lebbeus Chapin and Benjamin Converse; Clerk, Alonzo V. Blanchard; Treasurer, Arza Blodgett; Standing Committee, Alanson C. Merrick, Azel Brukenridge, and Lambert Allen, together with the deacons.

* From a sketch by the pastor, Rev. Bradford M. Fullerton.

The parish or society was organized April 30, 1847, and chose these officers: Cyrus Knox, Lambert Allen, Alanson C. Merrick, William J. Blanchard, and Wilson Brainard, Standing Committee; Cyrus Knox, Alonzo V. Blanchard, and Alonzo N. Dewey, Assessors; Abner Allen, Treasurer; and Hiram Converse, Collector.

In the spring and summer of 1847 individuals interested in the prosperity of the church undertook the building of a meeting-house for its use, taking stock in the enterprise according to pecuniary ability and inclination. The lecture-room was occupied early in the fall. The house was finished at a cost of about $5000. It was dedicated Dec. 22, 1847, and is still the regular place of worship. The Rev. Dr. Ezekiel Russell, then pastor of the Olivet Church in Springfield, now of Holbrook, preached the sermon.

Mr. Thomas Wilson, of Lowell, was ordained to the ministry and installed the first pastor by a council, which met Feb. 23, 1848, in the lecture-room of the new church edifice, and which held the public service of ordination and installation, in the forenoon of March 1, 1848, in the audience-room of the church, the Rev. Dr. Lyman Whiting, then of Lawrence, and more recently of Philadelphia, preaching the sermon. The Rev. Mr. Wilson's ministry was terminated at his own request, July 1, 1852.

The Rev. Joseph Vaill, D.D., of Somers, Conn., was installed pastor of the church by a council, Dec. 7, 1854, the Rev. Dr. Alvan Bond, of Norwich, Conn., preaching the sermon. His resignation was accepted Oct. 13, 1867.

The present pastor, Rev. Bradford Morton Fullerton, of Abington, was ordained to the ministry and installed, by advice of council, Feb. 12, 1868, at which date also his predecessor was dismissed. The sermon was preached by Prof. William S. Tyler, D.D., of Amherst.

Of all who have united with the church since its organization, forty per cent. have been received during the present pastorate.

It is in a prosperous condition and comprises a membership of 200. A large and interesting Sabbath-school is connected with the church.

THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF THORNDIKE AND THREE RIVERS.*

The origin of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Palmer was the formation of a class of ten persons in the village of Three Rivers in 1833, by Rev. A. Taylor, Royal Buffington being appointed leader. The class was connected with the Brookfield circuit, which then embraced Brookfield, Sturbridge, Wales, Brimfield, Monson, Belchertown, and Palmer. It was subsequently connected with South Belchertown, and Rev. H. Perry was preacher in charge. At this time a small chapel was erected and made comfortable for worship, but not completed until 1839. In 1841 the society at Three Rivers was made a separate station, and Rev. J. Nichols was appointed preacher in charge; he served two years, and was succeeded by Rev. D. L. Winslow, who reported at the close of his first and only year a membership of 130. Down to 1856 the society was served successively by Revs. J. Cadwell, Amos Binney, Daniel Chapin, C. L. McCurdy, J. W. Mowry, N. J. Merrill, E. B. Morgan, and F. Fisk. In 1847 the class, which had previously been organized in Thorndike, and connected with the church in Three Rivers, applied to the conference holding its session in Lynn for a preacher, and received Rev. N. E. Cobleigh as their pastor. They worshiped in the hall of the new school-house, a large and convenient room, seating about 350 persons. A church was here organized June 23, 1847, containing in all 32 members. At the close of the second year a total membership of 75 was reported. In 1849 and '50, Rev. Wm. M. Hubbard, a local preacher, took charge of the society, but at the close of his services, the hall, which was owned by the district, was to be occupied for a town-school, and the society, having no place of worship, was left without a preacher.

They continued to hold services, however, meeting in the Tavern Hall, in the village, and were supplied mostly by students from Wilbraham. In 1852 the society worshiped in the Congregational meeting-house in the "Old Centre," and were supplied by Revs. D. K. Merrill and J. A. Ames. In 1853, Palmer Centre and South Belchertown were connected as one station, and Rev. D. Atkins appointed pastor, and in 1854 it was connected with Three Rivers, Rev. E. Morgan pastor.

During this year the two societies worshiped in the town-house, "Four Corners," until cold weather compelled them to return to the old chapel at Three Rivers. In 1855, Rev. F. Fisk was preacher of the two societies, and the following year, 1856, they were left to be supplied. During this year a consultation of all the friends of the church in town resulted in the harmonious decision to build a house of worship at the "Four Corners," which would be central for all. The work was begun in September, 1856, and the house was dedicated June 16, 1857, Bishop O. C. Baker preaching the sermon on the occasion.

The following have successively served this church as pastors: Jonas M. Clark, L. R. Bolls, Jr., D. K. Bannister, I. B. Bigelow, C. H. Hannaford, A. F. Bailey, A. P. Aiken, N. Fellows, J. M. Clark, O. W. Adams, Wm. Gordon, W. R. Tisdale, Chas. T. Johnson.

For several years the church at "Four Corners," which was regarded by many as a very doubtful expedient, has been quite successful. Good congregations have assembled, the preachers receive a comfortable support, and additions are constantly made. But as the villages have grown stronger, and the religious wants have been largely met in them, there has been less inclination to go away from them for worship. The society has also suffered somewhat from the necessity of holding its social meetings in so many different places. There remains, however, a good congregation, and the members work together in harmony. The society owns a pleasant and comfortable parsonage in the village of Thorndike. Social meetings are held in Thorndike, Three Rivers, Old Centre, Palmer Depot, and South Belchertown.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH (UNIVERSALIST), PALMER DEPOT.†

After several efforts extending over many years a Universalist Church was formed in this place on May 28, 1876. The church was organized by Rev. A. J. Patterson, D.D., of Boston, 21 persons presenting themselves at the first communion for baptism and confirmation. The first measures toward this successful issue were taken by the missionary of the State Convention, Rev. Benton Smith. The early meetings were held under great disadvantages. Through the opposition of more powerful and longer-established churches one place of worship after another was closed, until it became necessary to meet in private houses, or in the parlor of one of the hotels in town. Freedom to worship and grow as a religious organization became possible only when a defender of the "faith," Mr. M. W. French, built Wales Hall, which, at the time of writing, is the place of meeting. The church listened to "supplies" for one year, and then settled their first minister, Rev. C. H. Eaton, June 29, 1877. Since the settlement of a pastor the growth of the church has been very encouraging.

The following résumé of the work of the church for two years of its existence will, it is thought, at once disclose the need and justify the establishment of a church of liberal faith in the town.

Résumé.—Number of church members, 60. Number of families in 1876, 40; in 1878, 110. Number in congregation

* By the pastor, Rev. Chas. T. Johnson.

† By Rev. C. H. Eaton.

in 1876, 70; in 1878, 200. Number in Sunday-school in 1876, 35; in 1878, 125. Money raised for current expenses, charities, etc, $4000.

A church edifice will immediately be built, to cost about $15,000, and to be located on the corner of Park and Central Streets.

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH IN PALMER

was organized in the south part of Belchertown, under the name of the "Belchertown" and Palmer Baptist Church, on Nov. 16, 1825. The meeting-house in which the church worshiped was occupied in common with the Methodist Society. The church and society erected their present edifice at the village of Three Rivers during 1832, and occupied it in January, 1833. The name of the church was then changed to the "Baptist Church in Three Rivers." The number of original members was 24,—11 males and 13 females. Among the pastors who have supplied the church have been Rev. Messrs. Alvin Bennett, Henry Archibald, Tubal Wakefield, David Pease, John R. Bigelow, Prosper Powell, N. B. Jones, Chester Tilden, Joseph Hodges, Jr., Sandford Leach, Addison Parker, and Levi H. Wakeman. Clarkson F. Russell is the present pastor, having assumed that relation July 1, 1878. The church is in a prosperous condition.

THE SECOND BAPTIST CHURCH IN PALMER

is located at the Depot village. It was founded by a colony from the First Church; and the public recognition of the same, and the installation of its first pastor, Rev. Samuel A. Collins, took place on the 29th of September, 1852. Under the charge of Mr. Collins the prosperity of the church was such that a commodious house of worship was erected by the society during the summer and autumn of 1853, and dedicated Feb. 22, 1854. The church cost $5000. Mr. Collins retired from his charge in the following April. Several persons have since officiated as pastor, the last being Rev. Philip Berry, who withdrew in April, 1878. The pastor of the "Baptist Church in Three Rivers" at present supplies the pulpit. The church edifice stands near the bridge at the upper end of the village of Palmer, and presents a pleasing and attractive appearance.

CATHOLIC CHURCHES.

These, up to July 1, 1878, were under the entire charge of Rev. F. J. Lynch, of the village of Three Rivers. At that time the parish was divided, and a separate charge established at Palmer Depot. The pastor there is the Rev. Thomas J. Sullivan, a graduate of one of the colleges connected with his denomination, and an earnest worker. Since his installation, July 1, 1878, a handsome new church edifice has been erected at a cost of over $4000. The church is calculated to seat 250 people, is of neat Gothic style, unique in design, and is surmounted with a steeple and bell. It is located on Thorndike Street, opposite the old cemetery.

The chief Catholic work in Palmer is at the village of Thorndike. Here a handsome church edifice is standing, and there is also another at Three Rivers. A handsome parsonage has just been erected at Thorndike, and here the Rev. F. J. Lynch resides. He has been identified for many years with the growth and development of the church in Palmer and surrounding towns.

THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF BONDS VILLAGE.

In the month of April, 1866, a few members of the South Belchertown Church and others residing in Bonds village and vicinity opened meetings in Union Hall. Rev. John Cadwell was appointed preacher in charge at the close of the Conference year. A class of 15 members was formed, which soon doubled in numbers. A Sabbath-school was organized, consisting of about 70 scholars, officers, and teachers, and about 100 volumes of books were purchased for its use. At the close of the next Conference year the society was free from debt. Rev. Mr. Cadwell was succeeded in the pastorate by Rev. Wm. N. Hubbard, for two years. In 1870, Rev. Wm. P. Blackmar was appointed pastor, and remained two years. In 1872, Rev. J. W. Cole served as pastor for one year. In April, 1873, Rev. George E. Chapman was appointed pastor, and remained two years. Rev. Alfred Noon, in 1875 and 1876, acted as the sixth pastor of the church. During the year 1875 a new and beautiful house of worship was erected, at a cost of $6000. The corner-stone was the gift of Rev. John Cadwell, the first pastor of the church, and was laid early in September. Ground was broken August 15th or 16th, and the dedication took place Jan. 13, 1876, the dedicatory sermon being preached by Rev. J. M. Barclay, D.D.

In April, 1877, Rev. David K. Merrill was appointed pastor, and is now in his second year. The church is in a prosperous condition, and arrangements are being made to liquidate the entire church debt. The present membership is about 80; of the Sabbath-school, about 90; number of volumes in Sabbath-school library, nearly 400.

UNION EVANGELICAL SOCIETY, THREE RIVERS.

This is a small but active religious organization at the village of Three Rivers. It is composed of the members of different Christian churches, but approaches most nearly to the Congregational form of worship. A neat house of worship was erected in July, 1877, and the first pastor of the society was the Rev. M. M. Tracy. Rev. F. W. Cobb has recently been installed. The membership of the society is about 40, and the average attendance at the Sabbath-school is 58.

ADVENTISTS.

This society has an organization at Palmer Depot; meetings are held, but no regular pastor is in charge.

BURIAL-PLACES.

The oldest place of burial in Palmer is located at the centre. It was laid out in 1735, and the first gravestone erected was that of Samuel Nevins, who died at the age of ninety-six years. He was not, however, the first person buried there. The ground comprises two acres, and is in a fair condition. Interred beneath its sod are the remains of many of the first settlers. Numerous antiquated stones mark their solemn resting-places and testify to their virtues. The Shaws, Browns, McMasters, McElweans, Brackenridges, Spences, and others, are among the number whose tombstones bear early dates of sepulture. It is still in use.

The cemetery at Palmer Depot, on Thorndike Street, was laid out as early as 1750, and perhaps earlier. The oldest stone standing at present is that of Lieut. Gideon Merriek, who died of small-pox, Feb. 28, 1753, at the age of thirty years. This disease seems to have been common and fatal in those early days, for many early tombstones assign that as the cause of death. The Scotts, Cooleys, Kings, Graves, Walkers, and Merrieks are buried there, and the yard is still in use. It is in a good condition, and contains many handsome monuments.

The cemetery at Three Rivers was laid out in 1825, comprises a little over two acres, and is in use by the residents of that section of the town.

The cemetery at Four Corners consists of about 2½ acres, and was laid out in 1851, the first burial taking place on May 16th of that year.

The handsome Catholic cemetery at Thorndike village was laid out in 1863. A new Catholic cemetery has just been laid out north of Palmer Depot, on the road to Thorndike.

INDUSTRIAL PURSUITS.

The principal occupation of the inhabitants of Palmer prior to 1824 was the pursuit of agriculture. A few scattered enterprises existed, however, anterior to that time.

At the meeting of the proprietors of the district held Nov. 13, 1736, it was "voted that the Grist-mill built by Robert Fernal and Thomas Harmon be accepted as a good and sufficient mill for our service, and in full satisfaction of the condition enjoined on Steward Southgate, by the Act of the General Court." This was the first grist-mill in the town. Steward Southgate erected one on Potaquatick Brook in 1737. The following minutes, taken from the proprietors' records, will prove of interest, as indicating the erection of the first saw-mills in the town:

"On Tuesday, the 3d day of September, 1730, the foundation of the dam on the northeast corner of Potaquatick was laid; on the 14th of October, 1730, Potaquatick Saw-Mill was raised; and on the 5th day of March, next after, the saw-mill first went; on the 13th day of December, 1732, the said mill was burnt down. It stood, after it was raised, two years and two months, wanting one day; after it first went it stood but one year, nine months, and eight days.

"The second saw-mill at Potaquatick pond, rebuilt on the same spot, viz.: it was raised on the 8th day of October, 1733, and first went on the 6th day of November, 1734, and on the 26th day of April, 1736, it was undermined by the water, and broken down after it had stood two and a half years; and after it first went, one year and five months.

"The third saw-mill, built on a new spot, was raised the 20th of September, 1736, and first went on the 5th of May, 1737."

A. V. Blanchard

The Blanchard family originated in Normandy, and at an early day two of its representatives, who were brothers, came to this country and settled, the one in the eastern part of the State of Massachusetts, and the other in the western. From these two originated the two branches of the family now represented in the State.

The subject of this sketch is descended from the western branch of the family. His grandfather, Samuel, lived at Sutton, Mass., a hundred years ago or more, and engaged in farming. He had seven children,—Samuel, Stephen, John B., Mary, Thomas, Abiatha, and Susan. Of these sons, Thomas was one of the most celebrated inventors that the United States has ever seen, his fertility of invention being wonderful and the scope of his inventive powers seemingly unlimited.

Among other things that he invented were machines for heading tacks, for bending wood, and for turning irregular forms. This latter invention was of incalculable value. It was first applied to turning the stocks of guns, and was at once adopted by the government armories; then to the making of the indentation for letting the gunlock into the stock; to the turning out of busts and casts from hard substances; and to a thousand and one branches of mechanical art. After inventing various other patents, and achieving a wide reputation as an inventor throughout the world, he died in the year 1865, at the age of seventy-six.

John Brewer, father of Alonzo V., was born, May 2, 1780, at Sutton, Mass. He was a scythe-maker by trade, and followed that occupation throughout his life, settling in Palmer, Mass., in the year 1824; and, still pursuing the manufacture of scythes, he acquired the highest reputation for the superiority of his goods. He married Silence, daughter of Reuben Barton, of Sutton, and died in October, 1850. His children were Alonzo V., Wm. J., Emily, John D., and Franklin, all of whom attained mature years, the boys becoming scythe-makers by trade; of these children only Alonzo V. and Franklin are now living, each at Blanchardville, in the town of Palmer, Mass.

Alonzo V. Blanchard was born in the northeastern part of Sutton, Mass. (now the town of Millbury), on Dec. 2, 1805. He passed his early life in learning the trade of a scythe-maker and in acquiring an education, attending first the common schools of his native town, and finishing at Dudley Academy and Harrison Academy; at the age of nineteen his father located in Palmer, Alonzo V. accompanying him and engaging in the manufacture of scythes for him. After a few years he entered into partnership with his father in the same enterprise; a little later his father withdrew from the business, and Alonzo V. took into partnership with him his brother William J. The latter being obliged to withdraw on account of health, the business was first run by Alonzo V. and John D., in partnership, the fourth brother, Franklin, joining the firm a little later. This business connection continued for many years and achieved great success, and was only dissolved by the sudden death of John D., in the year 1872. During the time that these brothers were in partnership they were burned out three times; but, nothing daunted, steadily pursued their avocation.

In addition to scythe-making, the Blanchard Brothers also engaged largely in the manufacture of plough and shovel handles, ox-yokes, and other bent-wood articles, having purchased of their Uncle Thomas his patent for bending wood. This department of their business reached in some years the handsome sum of $20,000, and they manufactured annually, in addition, about two thousand dozen of scythes, the market value of these being about the same sum.

When the Blanchard family first settled at the point that bears their name, but meagre improvements had been made, there being there simply a grist- and saw-mill and two dwelling houses; now there are some twelve dwelling-houses and other improvements, the whole making a pleasant little settlement about one mile and a quarter east of Palmer Depot. Mr. Blanchard occupies a handsome and homelike residence at Blanchardville, and is now engaged in agricultural pursuits, and in negotiating the favorable sale of the excellent water-privileges owned by himself, his brother Franklin, and the heirs of his brother John D.

Besides devoting his energies to his business enterprises, Mr. Blanchard has found time to perform various public duties. For the period of ten years he was one of the supervisors of the public schools of Palmer, an office requiring great tact, discrimination, and good judgment; he has also been a selectman of the town for many years, and overseer of the poor. In the years 1836, 1845, and 1847 he represented the town in the State Legislature. He has always been a member of the Democratic party, and was several times a candidate for important offices, being a candidate for Congress on two occasions, and for State Senator several times, coming within eight votes of being elected to the latter office in a county largely Republican. Mr. Blanchard was also one of the first inspectors of the State almshouse at Monson, and filled that position for several years.

In religious affairs Mr. Blanchard is a member of the Congregational Church of Palmer Depot, and has been an active and prominent member for many years, contributing largely to its benevolent and missionary enterprises, and filling offices of responsibility in the church.

On Oct. 25, 1827, Mr. Blanchard was united in marriage to Elvira Ann, daughter of Daniel Shearer, who was the first to practice the legal profession in the town of Palmer. But one child has been born to them, Mary King, who was born June 18, 1830; married Albert P. Chapman, Oct. 25, 1847, and died April 8, 1865. Mrs. Blanchard is still living.

The fiftieth anniversary of the wedding of this memorable couple, on Oct. 25, 1877, was celebrated with appropriate ceremonies. They left their home to revisit the "old King homestead," in the east part of the town, where they were married, and, standing on the identical spot where they stood fifty years before, there commemorated the important step they had then taken. What cares, troubles, and vicissitudes had they not experienced since then! Returning to their home, they found it in charge of many kind friends, who gave them a hearty reception and made them the recipients of costly and elegant gifts, fitly recognizing the long life of domestic peace that they had spent together.

John Henry Woolrich is the second son of Henry Woolrich, of Curvey Hall, Handley, Cheshire, England. His ancestry dates back many hundred years, and the old church is still standing at Handley to which the family have paid tithes for upward of four hundred years. His mother was a Vernon, and a connection of that family to which Admiral Vernon belonged, after whom Mount Vernon, the home of Washington, was named.

The subject of this sketch was born at Handley, county of Cheshire, March 14, 1837. His early days were passed in attaining an education near the old city of Chester. From about the age of fourteen to that of twenty he served a full apprenticeship, under indentures, in the acquirement of the profession of a chemist, and thus laid the foundation of that chemical knowledge and experience that has proved so useful to him in his present business. In the year 1860, Mr. Woolrich left his native country, and removed to Halifax, Nova Scotia, soon after engaging in the drug business in that place. He still retains an interest there in the same enterprise. During the time that he was engaged in the drug business, Mr. Woolrich also acted as agent for the firm in England who were manufacturing Ridge's patent food for infants and invalids. In the year 1870, in connection with others, Mr. Woolrich undertook the manufacture of this article at Malden, Mass. After remaining there five years the enterprise was transferred to Palmer, for the purpose of securing better shipping facilities, where it has since continued under his management and control. The business has now attained large proportions, and the article manufactured has deservedly achieved great popularity as an article of domestic use.

On Aug. 19, 1862, Mr. Woolrich was united in marriage to Louisa, eldest daughter of Robert Woodell, of the city of Halifax. But one child has been born to them,—Vernon Henry Woolrich, born May 22, 1863, now attending school at Mount Allison Academy, in New Brunswick.

Mr. Woolrich has permanently located in the village of Palmer, and occupies a pleasant residence on Thorndike Street, which he erected for his own use in the spring of 1877, and which he calls "Tushingham Cottage," after the ancestral estate of the Vernon family.

RIDGE'S PATENT FOOD FACTORY.

WOOLRICH & CO., PALMER, MASS.

The first mills probably stood at the northeastern corner of Pataquatuck Pond.

Saw- and grist-mills have existed in different parts of the town since that time. William Mason had a tannery at Blanchardville, in the early part of the present century. Asa Gates carried on a small carding and cloth-dressing establishment in Thorndike about 1822 or '23. Hancock & Burnett had a lock-manufactory at Thorndike about twenty years ago. Horace Clark manufactured cotton batting, where the Palmer Carpet Company now is, about the same time.

In 1824, John B. Blanchard came to Palmer from the town of Dudley (afterward Webster), and began the manufacture of scythes at Blanchardville. He continued in that business until 1840, when he retired, and his four sons—Alonzo V., William J., John D., and Franklin—continued the business in partnership until 1872, when the death of John D. dissolved the firm, and the business was discontinued. When in operation these works produced about 2000 dozen scythes annually, at an average valuation of $9 per dozen.

The water-privilege at Bond's village was early utilized by Emelius Bond and others. A small woolen-mill existed there prior to 1850, but was destroyed by fire in that year.

THE BOSTON DUCK COMPANY, at Bond's village, was organized about 1844. It now has an excellent mill at that point, and is engaged in the manufacture of cotton duck. The mill contains 15,000 spindles. The number of hands employed is 350, and the average annual production is 4,500,000 yards. In 1877, 2,388,000 pounds of cotton were used. The pay-roll averages about $7000 per month. The capital stock is $350,000. Oren B. Smith has been the resident agent of the company since 1870.

THE BONDSVILLE DYE-WORKS

are also owned and controlled by the Boston Duck Company. They occupy a large brick building, which was erected in 1876, and are doing a large business. All varieties of cloth and flannels are colored at the works.

THE OTIS COMPANY

is located at Three Rivers, and engaged in the manufacture of fancy dress goods. The Palmer Manufacturing Company located on the site in 1824, but failed in 1828. In 1830, Joseph Brown went to Three Rivers and took charge of the enterprise for another company, and in 1832 commenced the manufacture of common white cotton goods. Brown left in 1861. Samuel Haines succeeded him, and engaged in the manufacture of fancy dress goods. The mill was burned May 10, 1863, and the privilege was unused for nine years. The Otis Company erected their present handsome mill in 1872. They employ between 500 and 600 hands, their pay-roll amounting to from $10,000 to $11,000 monthly. The mill contains 451 looms, uses about 3000 bales of cotton annually, and produces from 300,000 to 400,000 yards of fancy dress goods per month. Edwin H. Barker is acting agent, and Albert A. Barker resident superintendent.

THE THORNDIKE MANUFACTURING COMPANY

commenced operations in that village in 1837, when they erected a stone cotton-mill. In 1846 and 1847 they erected a second mill, and in both these establishments are now employing about 450 persons. Cotton ticks, denims, and stripes are the goods manufactured. Over 3000 bales of raw material are annually used, producing about 5,500,000 yards of manufactured goods. Cornelius Wilson, of Thorndike, is the agent, and exercises a general superintendence over the mills. The capital stock of the company is $450,000.

THE PALMER CARPET COMPANY, about a mile above Palmer Depot, was established Nov. 16, 1874. It is an incorporated joint-stock enterprise, with a capital of $50,000, and is principally engaged in the manufacture of Brussels and Wilton carpets, of which about 125,000 yards are annually produced. The number of persons employed is 55, receiving about $1800 per month. The company use about 150,000 pounds of worsted yarn annually. The works used by the concern were erected in 1871 by the Parks Carpet Company, and came into the possession of the present owners in 1874, since which time a new boiler-room has been added. Andrew Pinney is the superintendent of the works.

THE HAMPDEN HAT-MILLS

are located at Palmer Depot, and were established in 1869. S. N. Davis first engaged in the business of straw-hat finishing, and continued therein upward of three years, when he was succeeded by Robert L. Goddard, the present owner, who has since pursued that branch of manufacture. When running, the establishment employs from 50 to 60 hands. In 1877 over 100,000 dozens of straw-hats were finished in the mills, and over 40,000 dozens were trimmed.

RIDGE'S PATENT-FOOD FACTORY, located on Thorndike Street, Palmer Depot, is one of the most widely known enterprises in the country. Woolrich & Co., the owners, removed from Malden, Mass., to Palmer, in the winter of 1874. From 6 to 10 persons are engaged in the manufacture of the patent food.* The factory is a model of cleanliness and order. Hundreds of dozens of boxes of the food are annually produced.

THE PALMER IRON-FOUNDRY, at Palmer Depot, has been run by Edgerton & Davis since 1874, succeeding Julius C. Shaw. They employ from 12 to 15 men in the manufacture of hollow-ware, sinks, and various kinds of machinery.

THE PALMER PLANING-MILLS were established at Palmer Depot in 1873 by Francis Keyer, the present proprietor.

THE MARCHANT & WING HAT-FACTORY

at Palmer Depot was established in 1876 by Reuben C. Wing. George W. Marchant became associated in the enterprise in the fall of 1878, and the firm are now engaged in the manufacture of straw hats, and in finishing and pressing the same variety of goods. The proprietors have recently remodeled the factory, with a view to increasing its production.

SAWYER & GALLOP have been engaged in the manufacture of soft soap since 1851 at Thorndyke, succeeding Smith, Blanchard, and others in the same business. Upward of 1000 barrels are annually produced.

MILITARY.

The military history of Palmer has been highly creditable. In the early wars the town contributed such assistance as was in her power cheerfully and patriotically. In the war of the Revolution she was not behind her sister-towns in the exhibition of those qualities which nerved the arms and cheered the hearts of a liberty-loving people. On June 17, 1776, stirring resolutions, breathing the spirit of independence, and devoting the "lives and fortunes" of the citizens to the support of the General Congress, were adopted by the town. Many of her citizens joined the ranks of the patriots. John A. McElwean was among this number, and was at the battle of Bunker Hill and at the surrender of Burgoyne.

To the late war Palmer contributed her full quota of men, and supported every active measure for the overthrow of the Rebellion.

The following is a list of the soldiers who served from Palmer in the war of 1861-65:

BRIMFIELD.

GEOGRAPHICAL.

THIS town is situated on the eastern border of the county of Hampden, and bounded as follows: On the north by the town of Warren, Worcester Co.; on the south by the towns of Wales and Holland, Hampden Co.; on the east by the town of Sturbridge, Worcester Co.; and on the west by the towns of Monson and Palmer, Hampden Co., the last named town being separated from it by the Quaboag River, a branch of the Chicopee River. The east, west, and south lines are straight, and correspond nearly with the cardinal points. The north and northwest lines are irregular. The area included within its limits is given at 21,618 acres.

NATURAL FEATURES.

Situated upon the highlands which separate the waters of the Thames from those of the Connecticut, the greater portion of the town is quite elevated, the highest points reaching an altitude of more than 1200 feet above the sea.

Its general topography is made up of a series of lofty ridges and isolated hills, many of which approach the dignity of mountains, and all more or less irregular and rugged in outline, and consisting of crystalline and metamorphic rocks, of which gneiss forms a prominent feature. The general direction of these ridges is a little northeast and southwest, and they are found in all parts of the town. The principal elevations are known by the following names: East and West Waddaquaduck Mountains, Steerage Rock,—a prominent feature in the landscape, whose lofty heights the Indians were wont to ascend in order to get their bearings for Agawam and Nonotuck, and from which circumstance it is said to have derived its name,—Chamberlain Mountain, Great Mountain, Mill-Stone Mountain, Saw-Mill Mountain, Cook's Mountain, Hubbard's Hill, Sheep-Pasture Hill, Indian Hill, Grass Hill, Mount Misery, Burt Hill, Breakneck Hill, Haynes' Hill, Bush Hill, James Hill, and Wache-Queeche Hill. Many of these are exceedingly rough and rugged in their outlines, and are a marked feature in the landscape as seen from any direction.

The principal streams are the Quinnebaug and Quaboag Rivers and their branches. The major portion of the town is drained by Mill Brook, an important affluent of the Quinnebaug River, a branch of the Thames, which discharges into Long Island Sound at New London, Conn. The Quinnebaug receives the waters from all the eastern portions of the town, including those of two considerable ponds, known as Sherman, or Brimfield, and Allum Pond.* Sherman's Pond is situated near the centre of the town, and contains about 80 acres.

* According to Roger Williams, who wrote upon the language of the New England Indians, Allum, or Alnu, was the Nipmuck word for dog.

Allum Pond lies near the east boundary, in a deep basin, surrounded by precipitous ridges, and covers an area of about 100 acres. Brimfield, or Sherman's Pond, discharges into Mill Brook. The western part of the town is drained by three considerable affluents of the Quaboag River, the most important of which is Elbow Brook, in the southwest part of the town. All these streams furnish water-power to a greater or less extent, which has been utilized in various places.

Interspersed among these hills and mountains are numerous valleys, or intervalles, of greater or less dimensions, and generally composed of a sandy loam, and producing fair crops of grass and some varieties of grain. Many of the upland farms are stony or gravelly. A few like those on Tower Hill are composed of a rich loam, but the meadow-lands of the valleys are generally considered the choicest for all purposes. The town may with propriety be called one of the "hill-towns" of the county, and includes almost every variety of soil and location.

Among the local names of the smaller streams are Erwin's Brook, in the south part of the town; Hitchcock's Brook, running through the village of Brimfield; and Treat Brook, a little west of the village, named in honor of the first settled minister. Perry and Bottle Brooks are small streams in the northwest part of the town, flowing into the Quaboag River.

There are still remaining upon the hills and mountains considerable quantities of timber, consisting mainly of oak, maple, elm, chestnut, pine, and white birch. Minerals abound in various places, among the most important being bog-iron ore, which was formerly worked to a considerable extent on the farm of Charles Bugbee, since occupied by Michael Travers.†

The early settlers prized the natural grass of the water-courses very highly, and they had recourse to various methods to increase the crop. Among other expedients, they dammed the streams to produce an overflow, which materially benefited the natural grasses and added largely to the crop of wild-hay. The introduction of English grasses upon the uplands was found a difficult experiment to make successful, and the "swale hay" was the more highly prized in consequence.

STATISTICAL.

According to the census taken in 1771, there were 230 polls, 146 dwellings, 8 mills, 5 shops, 143 horses, 478 cows, 256 oxen, 342 swine, 856 acres in tillage; 1249 acres in grass, producing 823 tons of English hay; 535 acres fresh meadow, producing 490 tons of hay; and a total valuation in the town of £7481 8s.

By the census returns of 1875, it appears that there were 298 polls, 257 dwellings, and 275 families. There were 12,300 acres of improved lands, with products valued at $272,740, and the total valuation of property was $567,200.

EMINENT CITIZENS.

Of the men of distinction which Brimfield has produced may be mentioned Timothy Danielson, a leading spirit during the Revolutionary period. He was a man of great physical energy and endurance, and possessed of good education. He served as a general in the Revolutionary war for a time, and filled many important civil offices. In after-years he was a Senator and member of the council, and was the first chief-justice of the Court of Common Pleas. He died at Brimfield in 1791, at the age of fifty-eight.

Jonathan Thompson, of Brimfield, attained to a colonelcy in the army of the Revolution; was in active service, and present at the siege of Yorktown. Lieut. Thompson, also of Brimfield, is said to have been the last man killed in the Revolution. Abner Morgan held the rank of major in the same army. Christopher Ward was a trusted and efficient soldier of that period, had many stirring experiences, and was trusted with the conduct of many enterprises requiring courage and ingenuity. Mr. Blodgett also saw much active service.

Gen. Wm. Eaton, noted for his exploits in the war against Tripoli, undertaken for the suppression of piratical assaults upon our commerce in the Mediterranean, was long a resident of the town. He married the widow of Gen. Timothy Danielson, and lies buried in the cemetery at Brimfield.

Charles Prentiss, the author of a history of the United States, and the biographer of Gen. Eaton and Robert Treat Paine, resided at Brimfield for a time.

Erastus Fairbanks, ex-Governor of Vermont, is a native of the town; also Josiah Stebbins and Samuel Hitchcock, both of whom attained to the Bench, the one in Vermont, the other in Maine.

INDIAN OCCUPATION AND RELICS.

The region of country which afterward became Brimfield at the time of its first settlement is presumed to have been one vast forest. The Indians had probably burned over about 2000 acres for the purpose of cultivation, and to make early grazing-places for the deer.

It is not certain that there was any regular Indian village on this land, although a few wigwams are said to have occupied Indian Hill. It was a part of the Nipmuck country, a tribe which seems to have had no one acknowledged head.* Brookfield was the home of the Quaboag tribe.

The hill known as Indian Hill was cultivated by the Indians, as was also the East Hill. The early settlers followed the customs of the Indians in planting corn. The proper time was when the young oak-leaf was as big as a mouse's ear. The proper method was to hill the corn, planting beneath the seed a fish for plant food.

Near the outlet of Sherman's Pond many arrow-heads are frequently found. While living in the western part of the town William H. Sherman found a stone utensil and a pot or mortar, but so broken that it could not be restored to its original shape. Stone hatchets or tomahawks have also been found at Sherman's and Alum Pond, and around a rock on the old C. R. Brown farm. An Indian family, John and Sarah Quan, with their children, once lived near Alum Pond, and were of the Mohican tribe. John had been a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and came from Norwich, Conn. These relics and the names of some of the hills and water-courses are the only traces of the Indians left.†

* Three renegade Narragansett Indians—Allumps, Massashowell, and Agunties—are said to have exercised authority over these Indians, who owed a quasi-allegiance to Uncas as the nominal head of the tribe east of the Connecticut River.

† It is at least questionable whether the modern Indians ever manufactured or made use of any description of stone implements excepting pots of soapstone. They most probably are relics of a semi-civilized race long since passed away,—possibly identical with the "mound-builders" of the West.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

On the 20th day of June, 1701, the General Court, in compliance with a petition of 21 residents of Springfield,‡ appointed Col. John Pynchon, Capt. Thomas Colton, Pelatiah Glover, James Warriner, David Morgan, and Joseph Stebbins a committee to lay out a new town-ship, eight miles square, on the eastern boundary of Springfield. They were to settle thereon, distribute it to 60 families, settle 20 families within two years from May, 1702, and make provision by grants for entertaining 70 families if the land would conveniently accommodate so many. Also to settle an "able orthodox minister of the gospel there as soon as may be." No one person was to be granted more than 120 acres of land.

The first visit of the committee was made Sept. 22, 1701, 20 other persons accompanying them. After two days they returned to Springfield, being unable to decide where to locate the central village of the town or "town plot." A second attempt was made, with no better success. Grout's Hill, now in the town of Monson, was finally selected as the proper spot. The first grants of land were made Dec. 31, 1701, to 13 persons, on condition that they should commence work thereon the following spring. This they failed to do. For a number of years no further grants were made. The reason assigned was that the war "did hinder the proceedings of us so that we Could not full fill the Conditions of our Grant by Reason of the Great danger we should be in of the los of our lives."

When Brimfield was first settled there was no other settlement east of Springfield and south of Brookfield as far as Oxford, and it was in old Hampshire County. On May 22, 1761, the town voted against removing the court to Northampton, also appointing a committee, who presented six cogent reasons against the project.§

As originally laid out Brimfield included the present towns of Monson, Wales, Holland, part of Palmer, and part of the town of Warren, formerly called Western.|| Monson was incorporated as a district on April 25, 1760, with all the rights of a town except that of corporate representation in the Legislature, and in 1775 became a town, its first town-meeting being held December 29th of that year. Wales and Holland were formerly included in the district of South Brimfield. Wales was incorporated as a district Sept. 18, 1762, and became the town of Wales, Feb. 20, 1828. Previous to the latter date it had retained the name of South Brimfield. Holland was incorporated as a district by virtue of an act passed July 5, 1783, and as a town May 1, 1836.

The town was first designated as "the plantation adjoining Springfield to the east of Springfield." The records of the committee show that for the sake of convenience alone they changed the name of the town to Brimfield.

The inhabitants were at first greatly annoyed by the Indians. The trouble from this source was so serious that two block-houses were erected where the residents could take refuge at night, or in case of attack. The site of one was south of the mill-pond, near the present residence of John S. Needham. The other stood where the almshouse now is.

In the Massachusetts Archives (xci., page 62) is a muster-roll of men posted, July 24, 1722, under Col. Samuel Partridge, at Brookfield and Brimfield.¶ There is also a letter from John Sherman, bearing date July 10, 1725, asking that a guard may be stationed at Brimfield. In the muster-roll of Sergt. Joseph Knowlton's company of Springfield, dated Nov. 19, 1725, the names of twelve men designated as the "Brimfield scout" are given.—[Mass. Archives.]

On June 15, 1709, the General Court prolonged the time originally allotted for the settlement of Brimfield to four years after the conclusion of the war with France and Spain. Maj. John Pynchon was appointed a member of the committee in place of his father, who had died in 1703. The further settlement of the town, from some cause, was very slow, but on June 10, 1714, the Brimfield committee petitioned the General Court for a further grant of land, three miles in width, on the eastern border, which petition was granted. The location on Grout's Hill was then abandoned, and the present and more desirable one selected. A road was laid out over Hubbard's Hill (now Tower Hill) northward eight rods wide. This was the town street. On each side of this road were located the lots of the settlers, 40 rods wide by 160 in length.

Considerable difficulty was experienced by the committee by reason of a claim to a portion of the land made by the heirs of Judge Waitstill Winthrop. The subject was the cause of several petitions for a new survey by the Brimfield people, which request was finally granted. A new survey was made, and accepted Dec. 18, 1728, making the colony line the southern boundary of the Winthrop farm.

The settlement of the town progressed so slowly, and some of the settlers were so dissatisfied with the committee, that on June 12, 1723, the General Court appointed a new committee, consisting of John Chandler, Henry Dwight, and Joseph Jennings, to "perfect the Settlement of Said Town in all respects according to the True Intent and Meaning of the General Court in Making Brimfield a township."

This committee proposed to the General Court to annul the grants made by the previous committee, and to make new allotments of the land. The inhabitants presented a remonstrance against this, Feb. 16, 1731, insisting that, "In their humble opinion, y^e General Court did not annul y^e acts and grants of the former committee, but only determine the Power of s^d committee for the future, nor did the last Committee Ever receive any Power to vacate or abridge the former Committee's Grants."

The General Court, with the approval of the royal Governor, ordered that several of the principal inhabitants be cited to appear at the next session of that body, and show cause why a new allotment should not be made.

The inhabitants were to exercise the privileges of a town, but were not to pass any acts affecting the rights of property. Capt. John Sherman was instructed to "Notifye and Warn the Freeholders and other Inhabitants of said Precinct to Assemble and Convene in some publick place in Brimfield, aforesaid," to choose all town officers. This order and decree were made on Feb. 22, 1731.

On June 18, 1731, the General Court confirmed the title to the occupants of lands granted by the original committee, declaring the claims of some non-residents void, and making some special grants. The town was permitted to have and enjoy the privileges and immunities of other towns in the province. Other provisions were made for allotting the remaining land to certain persons named in the act. Grants of 120 acres each, made by the first committee, were confirmed to the following persons, viz.: Nathaniel Hitchcock, Ebenezer Graves, David Hitchcock, Benjamin Cooley, Leonard Hoar, Capt. John Sherman, David Morgan, and Nathan Collins, and a lot of like quantity to one of the sons of each of them, to be designated by them. Also one each to Deliverance Brooks, Daniel Hubbard, John Atchinson, and one to his son; one to Park Williams in his "own rite," and one purchased by him, originally granted to Robert Old; one each to John Stebbins, William Nelson, and John Charles, and one to each of their sons; one to John Lumbard, David Lumbard, Samuel Hubbard, Peter Haynes, Joseph Haynes, Peter Montague, Henry Burt, Thomas Stebbins, William Nichols' heirs, Micah Touseley, Eleazer Foot, William Warriner, James Thompson, Francis Baxter's heirs and assigns, George Erwin, Joseph Frost, David Shaw, John alias Daniel Burt, Joshua Shaw, Samuel Bliss, Thomas Foot and assigns, John Keep, Samuel

Allen, Nathaniel Miller, Ezra King, Robert Old (called Capt. Ashley's lot), Samuel King, Anthony Needham, Robert Moulton, Robert Moulton, Jr., John Nilson, John Danielson, John Miller, John Mighell, Joseph Davis, Benjamin Warner, Daniel Graves, Benjamin Mun, Daniel Fuller, Nathaniel Clark, and John Bullen, amounting to 69 lots of 120 acres each. To Samuel Munger, Thomas Green, Joshua Old, Ebenezer Scott, Mark Ferry, Samuel Allen, Jr., Samuel Shaw, Seth Shaw, and Daniel Kellum or assigns, each a home-lot of 60 acres was granted, already laid out, and if they had more than that, they were to retain the same, the surplus to be deducted from their "after-rights."

To Rev. Mr. Treat, the minister of the town, a lot of 120 acres was granted with all after-rights; also a lot to Samuel Chandler, son of John Chandler, who had built a house there; another to Seth Dwight, son of Henry Dwight, and one to Joseph Jennings, in consideration of their services as a prudential committee; also to William Pynchon and Obadiah Cooley, who, although they did not reside on the grants, "Did provide some materials for finishing the meeting-house, and have since made some improvements thereon;" also a lot to them jointly, "in consideration that they provided iron-work for the first saw-mill, they drawing no after-rights;" also to Capt. George Colton and David Ingersole a lot of 120 acres, "in consideration of their providing Nails of all sorts Sufficient for finishing the meeting-house;" also to the heirs of Lieut.-Col. Pynchon, Capt. Thomas Colton, James Warriner, David Morgan, Joseph Stebbins, all deceased, and to Pelatiah Glover 120 acres each.

To Thomas Ingersole, in consideration of expenses incurred on the first committee, to Thomas Mirrick, Thomas Mirrick, Jr., the heirs of Nathaniel Sikes, Increase Sikes, Samuel Keep, and Tilly Mirrick, in consideration of money paid, lots were granted and confirmed without after-rights or divisions. The grants previously made to William Brewer, William Hamilton, Patrick Marshall, Andrew Bayley, Pelatiah Grover, Jr., John Evans, and Ebenezer Cooley were declared void, they "having in no measure answered the good Design of the general court."

The names of most of the earliest settlers of Brimfield are included among the grantees named in these grants. On Sept. 27, 1655, Rev. John Eliot, commonly known as "the Apostle to the Indians," bought 1000 acres of land near Quabog of two Indians,—Wattatooweelein or Wattawoolekin, and Nekan or Nakin.* He died May 20, 1690. On Dec. 9, 1715, the General Court confirmed his title to the lands to his grandson, John Eliot.

Oct. 23, 1657, the General Court granted to Richard Fellows† "200 acres of upland and meadow, to be laid out to him at Checcoepy river." He was to "build a house there for the entertainment of travelers, both for House-rooms for horse and man, and some lodging and provision for both, with beere, wine, and strong liquors." He built a tavern, but did not reside there more than two years. It is supposed that fear of the Indians compelled him to abandon the place.‡ The location of the tavern was in the fork formed by the union of Chicopee Brook with Chicopee River, in the northern part of what is now the town of Monson.

Nathaniel Hitchcock appears to have been the earliest of the permanent settlers of the town. The first house was built by him on the ground afterward owned by Alfred L. Converse, and now occupied by Henry F. Brown. The second house

* Two hundred acres of this tract fell within Brimfield when the eastern boundary was extended three miles.

‡ The grant was made to Fellows, as an individual, forty-four years before the formal settlement of the town. It was surveyed in 1657. The tavern is said not to have complied with the specifications required. On June 22, 1733, the General Court confirmed the grant to the heirs of Thomas Clark, to whom Fellows had assigned it. Fellows died at Hatfield in 1663. (MSS. Records of General Court, Vol. XIV., p. 277, and Springfield Registry I., 302.)

built was probably the old Townsley House, which David Morgan erected. It has since been taken down.

The first tavern was built on the hill-side by the Warren road, nearly opposite the house formerly occupied by Rev. Dr. Vaill. A blanket is said to have served as a door.

Moses Brooks, a son of Deliverance Brooks, born in 1717, is said to have been the first white child born in the town. The Thompson family came from Woburn, and the Russell and Blodgett families from Lexington. The great majority of the early settlers came from Springfield, and their names appear there as holding various offices. John Atchinson was hog-reeve; William Warriner and Nathaniel Hitchcock, highway surveyors; and Samuel Keep, fence-viewer.

Gen. Timothy Danielson, an officer in the Revolutionary war, was born in the town in 1733, and died there Sept. 19, 1791.

John Sherman, another of the early settlers, was a teacher in Springfield from 1702 to 1716, when he became a physician. He removed to Brimfield about 1721, was elected town-clerk in 1732, and held that office for thirty consecutive years. His records are as easily read to-day as when first made, so carefully and regularly are they written. He is the ancestor of all the Sherman families living in Brimfield. Elijah T. Sherman, living now on the spot selected by John Sherman for a home, has in his possession the account-book and mortar of his ancestor.

* PHYSICIANS.

The first physician's name that appears on the town records is that of Dr. Thomas Green. Dr. James Lawrence came to Brimfield about 1746, and continued the successful practice of his profession until May 14, 1778, when he died of small-pox, at the age of fifty-eight. Dr. John Butler, once a surgeon in the United States navy, practiced in Brimfield until his death. Dr. Israel Trask was a native of the town, born March 18, 1775. He was an active and energetic man, and prominent in town affairs. He is said to have introduced the practice of vaccination in the town, and asked permission to establish a hospital, under regulations made by a committee of seven. On March 11, 1793, the town voted that "the small-pox be set up at Oliver Mason's one fortnite to continue at Simeon Hubbard's and Thomas Bliss one fortnite from this time and no longer." Dr. Rufus Guthrie was another of the early physicians of Brimfield. Dr. Joseph Moffatt practiced for more than forty years in Brimfield, where he was born. He died Aug. 12, 1802. Dr. Martin Hersey was another of the early physicians of the town. Dr. Justus Keyes moved to Brimfield Centre about 1809. He sold his practice, in 1815, to Dr. Ebenezer Knight, who succeeded him, and a few years after Dr. Keyes died in the old Noah Hitchcock house, which he then owned. Dr. Asa Lincoln commenced practice at Brimfield about 1804, and continued until July 7, 1854, when he died, aged seventy-two years. He filled various town offices, was a member of the State Senate, and is credited with establishing a system of practice at variance with that usually adopted by his compeers, and more in accordance with the principles of medical practice at the present day.

ATTORNEYS.

Abner Morgan was the first to study law and practice as an attorney. He was born in Brimfield, Jan. 9, 1746. He represented the town at the General Court, which met at Watertown, July 19, 1775; was afterward a major in the Continental army, where he filled other important positions, and was an advocate of ability.

Stephen Pyncheon was another of the early lawyers of Brimfield. He took up his residence there after 1790, and filled all the important town and legislative offices. He was the first postmaster of the town, being appointed in 1806, and filled that office until his death, Feb. 5, 1823.

John B. Cooley was admitted to the Bar in 1818, and opened a law-office in Brimfield. He removed to the State of New York in 1831. Francis B. Stebbins was admitted to the Bar March 10, 1824, when he settled in Brimfield and continued in practice for ten years, when he removed to the town of Ware.

Shoemakers were among the earliest settlers of the town. They were sometimes denominated "cord-wainers." Nathan Read, Jonathan Brown, and Thomas Patrick were among the early carpenters. The first mason mentioned is Reuben Lilly, in 1759. He was a captain in the Revolutionary war. The first house-painter was Artemas Sargent. Lemuel Baker was a saddler as early as 1773. Marquis Converse and James Brown were also early engaged in the same trade.

At the first town-meeting held in Brimfield it was voted to build a pound. The first one actually established, however, was in 1746, on what is now the northwest corner of the park, south of the present school-house. It was repaired in 1759, but in 1762 a new one was built of stone by Noah Hitchcock, 40 feet square, on what is now the park. The town refused to pay for "what Mr. Hitchcock calls a pound," and the refusal to accept his work rankled in Mr. Hitchcock's mind. In 1775 he presented his bill for £3 6s. 8d., with interest for twelve years. The present pound is located north of the church on the Warren road, and was erected in 1811.

BRIDGES.

In 1732 there were twelve bridges in the town, among them being one at Mr. Treat's (Ward's), one at the Plain Brook, one over Elbow Brook, near the saw-mill south of Wight's, one near Robert Moulton's (South Pond), and one near John Sherman's. Just before Monson was incorporated as a town, some of the inhabitants petitioned for a bridge over "Chickuppee Brook," averring that "the place where the Road is Now is Soe bad, that it is Morally Impossible to get over with a horse." The bridge where King's iron bridge now is, on the old Bay path, was built by subscription in 1783. On Feb. 7, 1763, the General Court annexed the bridge over the Chicopee River to Brimfield, for the purpose of keeping it in repair.

The first roads in Brimfield were bridle-paths, crooked and irregular, marked by blazed trees. Stumps of burnt trees encumbered them. The first highways were located about 1730. Courses and distances were not recorded until the year 1797. Much trouble had before existed from the indefinite location of the roads, "across land of Joshua Shaw, where there is the best going, leading from a big rock in the line of said Joshua's plain lot to a black-oak saddle over a squeachy place."

From September, 1731, to March, 1739, twenty roads, leading in various directions, were authorized and laid out by the town. The town street was laid out eight rods wide, other roads six and four rods. May 15, 1794, a committee was appointed to make all the highways of the uniform width of four rods, except the Tower Hill road, and sell to the owners of adjacent lands the strips taken from the highway. On May 19, 1738, the town voted the sum of £50 for mending the highways, and established a highway tax, which the highway surveyors were ordered to collect.

STAGES.

The first stage-coaches seen in the town belonged to the Hartford and Worcester line. Their route was from Wales over Haynes' Hill, and thence to Brookfield via Sherman's Pond. In 1848 a daily stage run from Warren to Stafford, passing through Brimfield.

TAVERNS.

Tavern-keeping was quite extensively engaged in, in "ye olden time." Houses were kept by Josiah Smith, at the old turn of the Palmer road, down the hill, north of the present turn; by Aaron Charles, where Edwin B. Webber now resides; by Nathaniel Danielson, in a house that stood near where Emory Livermore now lives; by Isaac Powers, at West Brimfield; by Benjamin Lombard, on the old road from East Brimfield to Holland; by Col. Alfred Lyon, where now stands the house of W. H. Wyles; and by Ichabod Bliss, who, in 1796, built for a tavern the house afterward occupied by Dr. Knight, and kept it for that purpose until his death, in 1836.

ORGANIZATION.

The first town-meeting was held on March 16, 1731, in pursuance of a warrant issued by John Sherman, who was designated by the General Court.

The meeting duly convened, and Robert Moulton was chosen moderator. The town officers elected were: Clerk, Robert Moulton; Selectmen, Robert Moulton, John Stebbins, Ezra King, David Morgan, and David Shaw; Town Treasurer, John Stebbins; Assessors, Joseph Blodgett, Joseph Haynes, and David Hitchcock; Constables, John Charles and George Erwen; Surveyors of Highways, James Thompson, Joseph Frost, Samuel Allen, and Nathan Collins; Tithingmen, Ebenezer Scott and Henry Burt; Fence-Viewers, Thomas Stebbins, John Nelson, and John Keep; Hog-Reeves, Samuel Bliss and Benjamin Coley.

On May 4, 1731, John Stebbins, Robert Moulton, and David Shaw were selected "to goe to the General Court to manage affairs their for the town of Brimfield."

On May 24, 1731, Robert Moulton was chosen representative to the General Court to be held at Boston, May 26, 1731.

On Sept. 8, 1731, it was voted at a town-meeting that the representative at court "should act according to his best understanding in the great and waiitty affare att Court, with respect In standing for our rights and privileges."

In 1736, Peter Haynes was appointed sealer of leather, and such an official was chosen each year thereafter. In 1738, Henry Burt was chosen sealer of weights and measures. In 1771 the office of packer of beef and pork appears. In 1793 the office of "euller of shingles and staves" was created. In 1823 the first "field-drivers" were elected.

The following persons have filled the principal offices of the town:

VILLAGES.

BRIMFIELD CENTRE

is the principal village in the town, and is situated where the old town-plat of the early settlers was established. As its name implies, it is situated in about the centre of the town, and is eight miles from Palmer and six from Warren, the nearest railroad stations. It contains 84 houses and about 400 inhabitants, two general stores, a neat Congregational church, a small chapel of the Adventists, a hotel, a high school, a district school, a cemetery, an almshouse, and two blacksmith-shops. A town-house is in course of erection in the village, the main hall to be 41 feet 2 inches by 67 feet, and the annex 34 by 18½ feet. There is also a town library, containing about 600 volumes, and a post-office. Two stages of different lines pass through the village twice each day. A beautiful soldiers' monument, commemorative of the dead in the late Rebellion, is situated in the centre of the village. The houses are neatly painted and tasteful in appearance, the inhabitants intelligent, frugal, and public-spirited. No liquor is allowed to be sold in the village.

Post-Office.—The post-office was established Sept. 5, 1806, Stephen Pynchon being the first postmaster, and retaining the office until his death. It was first kept at his house, and afterward at the hotel. A box two feet square held all the mail for a number of years. Since 1867 it has been kept where it now is. The postmasters since Mr. Pynchon have been Marquis Converse, Feb. 19, 1823, to Feb. 17, 1842; Otis Lane, Feb. 17, 1842, to Feb. 17, 1845; Asa Lincoln, Feb. 17, 1845, to Jan. 3, 1850; Henry F. Brown, Jan. 3, 1850, to May 1, 1852; George C. Homer, May 1, 1852, to June 25, 1853; N. F. Robinson, June 25, 1853, to May 4, 1861; Silas C. Herring, May 4, 1861, to April 16, 1867; Henry F. Brown, the present postmaster, was reappointed April 16, 1867.

Hotels.—The present hotel was erected in 1808. It is a commodious and attractive building, situated in the centre of the village. In 1859, Silas C. Herring, the then owner, entirely remodeled the hotel, greatly improving its appearance and general appointments. Its interior arrangements are convenient, and it has been kept since 1869 by Amos Munroe, the present proprietor. He also kept it from 1861 to 1864. It has before been kept by Elias Carter, Marquis Converse, Joshua B. Vinton, Eaton Hitchcock, J. D. Browing, Nye Moulton, D. N. Green, Henry F. Brown, George C. Homer, W. F. Tarbell, Brown & White, George S. Osgood, Charles Andrews, and Edward W. Sherman.

The almshouse is located south of the main street, on the road to Wales. In 1837 the town purchased the Thompson farm (where the old block-house used to stand) for the purpose of establishing the pauper farm there, and such it has ever since remained. The price paid for it was $2300. Additional land was purchased in 1850. In 1851 a new building was erected, costing about $1300. A new barn in 1863 cost $1042.22. In 1877 the buildings were enlarged at a cost of nearly $800. The average number of paupers is 14.

EAST BRIMFIELD VILLAGE

is situated in the southeasterly part of the town. It contains about 30 houses and about 200 inhabitants, a post-office, a general store, a manufactory of shoe tools and pegging-machines, a grist-mill, saw-mill, and planing-mill, a church, and a blacksmith-shop. It is distant about three miles and a half from Brimfield Centre. The post-office was established in 1858, and Maj. Erastus Lombard appointed postmaster. Charles Varney has since filled the position.

WEST BRIMFIELD, OR POWERS' CORNERS, is situated in the northwestern part of the town, about six miles from Brimfield Centre, on the Boston and Albany Railroad. It contains about 15 houses, a meeting-house, and two saw-mills. Large quantities of brick are manufactured and shipped to various points.

FOSKET'S MILLS

(formerly Parksville Post-Office) is a small settlement about three miles and a half from Brimfield Centre. It contains a few dwelling-houses. It is the site of the best mill-privilege in the town, being located in a valley and on a large stream, known as Elbow Brook, which is fed by perennial springs. It contains a lumber-mill and a wool-carding mill. Parks' woolen-mills, formerly located there, were destroyed, and have not been rebuilt.

LITTLE REST,

a small village containing about 12 houses and 60 inhabitants, is situated about two miles northeast of Brimfield Centre. It contains a grist-, saw-, and shingle-mill, a blacksmith-shop, and a wagon repair-shop. Harness-hames and saw-frames are also manufactured in the village.

SCHOOLS.

The town of Brimfield has enjoyed the ordinary advantages of education from the earliest period of its settlement. Dec. 28, 1731, it was "voted that the town have a school." At first one teacher alone was employed for the whole town, spending a certain number of weeks in each section thereof. The town was divided into three of these sections, or districts, Jan. 29, 1736, and was regularly partitioned off Dec. 7, 1742. May 28, 1753, it was voted to have schools kept in seven places. As the population increased regular school districts were established. In 1766 there were ten of these districts.

The first appropriation to build school-houses was made Dec. 9, 1742. A tax of £80 was voted to pay for work and materials, and the first school-house was erected on the common east of the meeting-house. It stood there until 1804, when a new one was erected on the Warren road north of the meeting-house. A brick school-house was erected in June, 1824, by District No. 1, at a cost of $725.48. In 1866 the old brick building was taken down, and a tasteful and commodious structure 60 by 30 feet erected near the park, its present site, at a cost of about $4500.

March 9, 1747, £60 was appropriated to build a school-house in the south part of the town, now Wales. May 17, 1754, a committee was appointed to locate a school-house in the west part of the town. But it was not till March 8, 1760, that the town appropriated £8 to Thomas King and others to erect this building.

The first schoolmaster named in the records is David Hitchcock. In 1742 he received £7 10s. for his services. On May 19, 1755, the town voted that there be a grammar school kept. It was voted, Nov. 19, 1755, to appropriate £30 for schooling, of which £3 6s. 8d. was to go to the teacher of the grammar school, the balance to be equitably distributed to each district. The schools were generally taught by women in the summer, when the larger boys were at work, and by men in the winter.

Among the early female teachers may be mentioned Mehitabel Moffat, in 1769; Hannah Bugbee, in 1796; Lydia Winslow, in 1804; Susan Warren, in 1824; Lucretia Morgan, in 1835; Damaris Tarbell and Melina Hitchcock. Among the early male teachers we find Moses Lyon, in 1753; Timothy Danielson, in 1766; Abner Morgan and Caleb Hitchcock, in 1767; Issachar Brown, Col. Abner Brown, and Capt. Cyril R. Brown.

In 1766 the town was fined £30 for not maintaining a grammar school, but, upon explanation* of the matter by the selectmen, the fine was remitted.

In 1807 the first committee to inspect schools was chosen. In 1819 a committee of ten, one for each district, was appointed to assist Rev. Mr. Vaill in the examination of teachers and care of the schools. Before that time the whole matter had devolved upon the minister. After 1828 a school committee was annually chosen, but not till 1838 were they paid for their services. In 1843 a town committee of three was chosen to have the general oversight of schools. In 1859 the annual school reports were for the first time printed.

The town at the present time supports ten public schools. The old district schools were abolished by legislative enactment, April 16, 1870.

For the year ending March, 1878, the average attendance upon these schools was 186, and 11 teachers were employed. They are reported in good condition.

One of the principal objects of interest at Brimfield Centre, and one which reflects equal credit upon its founder (Samuel A. Hitchcock†) and the public-spirited citizens, is the

which was originally incorporated April 26, 1855, under the title of "The Trustees of the Brimfield Free Grammar School," and opened in December of the same year. In June, 1856, its name was changed to "The Hitchcock Free Grammar School," and in March, 1871, it was again changed to its present title.

The total amount of Mr. Hitchcock's contributions to the institutions was $75,000. In addition, upward of $6000 has been raised by private subscriptions at various times. In 1868, Mr. John Wyles gave $1000 as a permanent "repair fund." The present total fund of the institution is $80,000.

The school is free to citizens of Brimfield, and, after they are provided for, to the citizens of the surrounding towns to the extent of its capacity, and many avail themselves of its advantages. It has four teachers, and the number of scholars in attendance during the year 1878 was 147. There are two courses of study, English and classical, the latter of which occupies four years, and aims to prepare its pupils for admission to college. The school is provided with a library comprising 1200 selected volumes, and with apparatus designed to assist in explaining the principles of experimental science. The building is a large frame structure, situated in the centre of the village, surrounded by pleasant grounds, and presents a tasteful and attractive appearance.

CHURCHES.

The earliest church in Brimfield, as in most New England towns, and the one which received the support of the corporate body, was the Congregational. The first meeting-house was erected in the year 1722, on the spot where the present edifice stands. It was a frame building, 45 by 40 feet in dimensions. It had no chimneys, tower, or steeple. It had numerous windows and doors on its east, west, and south sides. The pulpit occupied the north side. The seats were long benches with no backs, but simply with legs driven in as in the common milking-stool. The deacons' seat was in front of and beneath the high pulpit, facing the congregation. Its occupants were unable to see the preacher.

Dec. 28, 1731, it was voted "that the women sit in the West End of the meeting-house." The men occupied a separate place. The seats were assigned according to age and estate. The duty of assigning these was performed by a committee, and was called "dignifying the seats." In 1757 the committee was instructed "to seat men and their wives together in the Pews." On Nov. 16, 1761, it was voted "to color the outside of the meeting-house, and to raise £8 to do the same." March 11, 1793, an item in the treasurer's account is for "sweeping, repairing, and propping the meeting-house," a good indication of its long-continued services.

April 2, 1804, the town voted to build a new meeting-house by selling the pews as far as they would go toward that object. It was erected upon the site of the old one, at a cost of over $6000. The day of its raising was one of general festivity and rejoicing. Meals were furnished at the town's expense. The bill for "Rum, Sugar, Brandy, Lemmons, and Wine for raising the Meeting-house" was $121.22. The committee who prepared the ground for the underpinning laid in "rum and sugar" to the value of $3.50. The superintendent had "1½ mugs Brandy" at 27 cents.

The new house was a "commodious and beautiful" one. It had columns in front, which faced the south, a steeple, and a bell. Deaf persons sat in the pulpit by the side of the minister. It was remodeled in 1838 at an expense of $4600, and destroyed by fire Feb. 21, 1847. The present edifice, a neat frame structure, having a steeple and bell, and occupying the old site, was immediately erected, and was dedicated Jan. 19, 1848. It cost over $6000. In 1862, $3400 were expended for new pews and furniture. The basement story has also since been remodeled. The present membership is about 125. It is controlled by the parish, and not by the town, as formerly. An excellent pastoral library containing about 600 volumes is owned by the parish. The Sunday-school was established in 1819, and is now in an active and flourishing condition, the average attendance being 110.

The earliest deacons of the church were John Sherman, David Morgan, Henry Burt, Luke Blachfield, Joseph Hitchcock, Joseph Hoar, Joseph Hitchcock, Jr., Samuel Sessions, and Jonathan Morgan. A movement looking to the formation of a second church organization and Sunday-school is being agitated, but has not yet assumed definite shape.

On Nov. 18, 1724, the Rev. Richard Treat, the first minister, was ordained. He was granted 120 acres of land, with future rights, and was paid an annual salary of £85. This was subsequently increased to £105. His pastoral relation was dissolved by his own request, March 25, 1734.

Jan. 29, 1736, Rev. James Bridgman, the next pastor, was called by the town. He was to have "£300 settlement in Bills of Credit as now passes between man and man," and "£120 Sallery Yearly in Bills of Credit as they now pass." Subsequently it was further stipulated that the town should pay "one-third part of the Sallery after the rate of Silver at 27 shillings per ounce." The balance was paid in provisions and labor. During his forty years' pastorate 139 members were added to the church. He died Sept. 19, 1776, at the age of sixty-nine years, and was buried in the town.

Oct. 27, 1774, the town voted to call Rev. Nehemiah Williams, £200 to be paid him for the settlement, and an annual salary of £70. He was ordained Feb. 9, 1775, served a successful pastorate of twenty-one years, and died Nov. 26, 1796, in his forty-eighth year. He was buried in the town cemetery.

Rev. Clark Brown was next ordained, June 20, 1798, and dismissed Nov. 2, 1803.

Aug. 17, 1808, the church voted to call the Rev. Warren Fay, and August 29th the town concurred. The salary offered was $500 and 25 cords of wood. Mr. Fay was ordained Nov. 2, 1808. He remained until June 26, 1811, when he was dismissed at his own request.

The next pastor was Rev. Joseph Vaill, Jr., who was called Nov. 19, 1813. His salary was fixed at $550. He was ordained Feb. 2, 1814, and continued twenty-two years, during a period of remarkable progress in the church. He was dismissed Sept. 16, 1834, at his own request.

Rev. Joseph Fuller was called to the pastorate, and installed March 11, 1835. He resigned May 4, 1837, and was dismissed by council on June 7th, following.

Rev. Joseph Vaill was again pastor from Nov. 1, 1837, to Oct. 19, 1841, when he resigned to act as financial agent of Amherst College. He died in 1869, at Palmer, Mass., and was buried in Brimfield cemetery.

Rev. George C. Partridge succeeded Dr. Vaill. He was installed Nov. 18, 1842, and dismissed April 11, 1846.

Feb. 21, 1847, the meeting-house was burned. The present edifice was erected in the same year.

Rev. B. E. Hale acted as pastor from November, 1847, to February, 1849. Rev. Jason Morse was the next regular pastor, and was ordained Dec. 12, 1849. He died Oct. 14, 1861, at the age of forty years.

Rev. Charles M. Hyde was ordained pastor Aug. 18, 1862. He continued eight years, tendering his resignation May 8, 1870.

Rev. Moses B. Boardman was installed Dec. 1, 1870. Owing to ill health he resigned, and was dismissed Nov. 1, 1873.

He was succeeded on April 30, 1874, by the Rev. Webster K. Pierce, who continued until Aug. 6, 1878, when the relationship was dissolved. The church at the present time is without a regular pastor.

ADVENTISTS.

In March, 1844, Dr. Alva Higgins and wife, and Miss Lavinia Collier, commenced holding Advent meetings in Conference Hall, at Brimfield Centre. They continued about nine months, and then rented a room in the Gen. Eaton house, which they occupied until 1859. They now occupy a neat chapel, which was erected in 1866, at a cost of $1200. The Christian Advent Society was organized July 6, 1867, and numbers at present about 30 members. They have never had a regular pastor, but meet usually every Sabbath, and have preaching about twice a month.

CHURCH OF CHRIST.

This church is located at East Brimfield, and was erected in 1871, at a cost of $3000. It was dedicated Jan. 5, 1872. The church organization was effected July 25, 1869, with 18 members. Rev. O. C. Atwater commenced preaching July 20, 1873, and continued one year. Prior to that time only general supplies had been furnished by various pastors. Afterward Rev. James Dockery, of Wales, was employed for a year or more. Services are now only held occasionally. A Sabbath-school has been organized, and meets every Sunday.

MORAVIANS, OR UNITED BRETHREN.

The first meetings of this branch of the Christian Church were held at West Brimfield in 1855 or '56. A minister was at that time sent there by the Missionary Society. The interest so far increased that it was thought expedient to erect a church for the accommodation of that part of Brimfield, and the adjoining sections of Palmer and Warren; and in 1857 such an edifice was constructed. It was destroyed by fire July 21, 1861, rebuilt in 1864, and occupied until 1867. Several persons, whose names we cannot give because of the absence of the church records from the State, were employed as preachers until 1867, and meetings were sometimes held by pastors of churches from neighboring towns.

BURIAL-PLACES.

The cemetery located at Brimfield Centre, on the east side of the road to Wales, has been in use since the earliest settlement of the town. The original lot contained about one-quarter of an acre at the northwest corner of the present inclosure. In 1732 the proprietors of the town, by vote, enlarged it to two acres, and adopted it as a place of burial. It was reached by a lane leading from the town street near the present road to Wales. Access was also had to the cemetery on the east by a lane from the Sturbridge road, with a bridge across the brook. In 1845 land was added to the cemetery from the south, and in 1860 still further additions were made. In 1878 over an acre more was added. It is a beautiful spot, containing many handsome monuments, and kept in good condition by a keeper appointed by the town. It is laid out in plats, which are assigned to the inhabitants by the selectmen. A hearse was first purchased in 1804.

The Brimfield cemetery contains the remains of nearly all the early settlers of the town and of such of their descendants as have died. Gen. Timothy Danielson, of Revolutionary fame, and Gen. Wm. Eaton, renowned for his exploits in Africa, repose there, and several of the pioneer pastors of the town. From a few of its many tombstones we take the following unique inscriptions:

"Daniel Bart, Esq., who died Feb. 27, 1771, in his 68th year. He early in life exposed himself in a dangerous enterprise against the common enemy, and in our late expedition he served as a Captain and a Major, was loved and respected in the army. As a selectman, a Justice of the Peace, and a Representative he served his Town, County, & Country to good acceptance. Having served his generation, by the will of God, he is fallen asleep and is laid with his fathers." "In memory of Eleazer Foot, who died Novemb^r ye 17, 1758, in ye 75th year of his age. He gave his estate to Azariah Cooley." "Ezra Wood, died 6 Nov., 1812, aged 20. His death was occasioned by a blow of a stone upon the head from the hand of Hiram Stebbins, maliciously thrown at him."

Another stone commemorates the death of John Bliss, July 18, 1782, at the age of thirty-five years, "by turning over of a cart," and another the death of his son, John Bliss, June 28, 1804, "by a hurt from a plow." Another stone is erected "in commemoration of the sobriety, modesty, industry, and virtue of John B. Hubbard," who died July 24, 1803.

Many of the older monuments are of coarse sandstone, and their inscriptions are so denuded by the "tooth of time" as to be nearly illegible.

As the south part of the town became more thickly settled a necessity arose for a burial-place. One was established, Sept. 5, 1732, by vote of "ye Proprietors," at the southeasterly part of the South Pond, where Robert Moulton, Sr., then resided. This ground, in which the early settlers of the south part of the town repose, was appropriated by adjoining residents after a time, and converted to agricultural purposes.

On March 19, 1755, a petition was presented by certain inhabitants of the west part of the town, humbly showing, "Whereas we, living a great Way from town, and see from ye Present Burying-place, by reason of the Badness and length of ye way cannot Bury our Dead with that Convenience and Order which such solemnities require, It being no matter to the Body where it lies when Dead. Therefore we request the town would be pleased to grant us a Burying-place among Our Selves, that we may bury our Dead out of sight with less Difficulty and Trouble." The lot granted was not laid out until 1760. Capt. Hitchcock, the first person buried in it, died in 1762. It laid half a mile from the church in Monson, near to a road that ran from Palmer. It is now out of use.

SOCIETIES.

HUMANITY LODGE OF FREE AND ACCEPTED MASONS

was organized in the town of Holland in 1811. The charter was granted by the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts. On June 11, 1813, a petition was presented to the Grand Lodge by Humanity Lodge, asking for the removal of the lodge to Brimfield. This was granted, and the removal effected. The lodge flourished for a number of years, but is not mentioned in the Grand Lodge records after Dec. 28, 1829. Its last meeting was held Jan. 15, 1834. There is now no regularly organized body of the order in the town.

The early settlers were accustomed to indulge in alcoholic beverages quite freely. Flip, a mixture of half a pint of rum to a quart of beer, stirred with a red-hot iron, and toddy, a mixture of rum and water, sugar and nutmeg, stirred with a toddy-stick, were the favorite drinks. These habits were universal, pastors and flock alike indulging in spirituous liquors. The books of the storekeepers were filled with charges for rum, brandy, and wine. In an old account-book kept by a neighbor of Rev. Nehemiah Williams are found several charges against the minister for rum; and at the bottom of one account are written the words, "this all settled, except the rum."

INDUSTRIAL PURSUITS.

It was the agricultural advantages of Brimfield that first invited the early settlers to locate there, and this pursuit has ever since proved the principal occupation of its inhabitants. The first efforts at tilling the soil were crude and laborious, and the crops were probably anything but remunerative. The invention of improved utensils for farming, and the more tractable nature of the soil from continual working, have since made the pursuit of agriculture more profitable. At the date of the last census there were 187 farms in the town, having an aggregate valuation of $524,279. The agricultural implements in use were valued at $16,632; the domestic products for the year were valued at $37,644; other products, including the cereals, fruits, vegetables, poultry, wool, and meat, at $73,450; and the number of tons of hay produced, 3587, with a valuation of $58,208. There were 333 persons engaged in agricultural pursuits, and the amount of wages paid them for the year ending May 1, 1875, was $20,861. The principal products are butter, cheese, apples, cider, Indian corn, eggs, hay, berries, milk, oats, potatoes, pumpkins, rye, fruit, and meats.

Potash was made by the early settlers by felling trees, piling them together, and when thoroughly dry burning them. The ashes were leached in large vessels, producing a strong lye. This when boiled down left a crude potash. Saltpetre was also made for several years by leaching earth taken from under buildings. Dr. James Lawrence, who resided in that part of the town now Wales had a tar-kiln on his land. Fat pine-logs were piled up, a trench dug around them, the logs set on fire, and the resin which the heat drove out into the trench was scooped up and packed for market.

Pottery-making was once a branch of industry in the town. The clay was dug out of Sherman's Pond, the water being dammed out when the pond was low, and the clay dug at the south end. Bricks were made in various parts of the town, and the manufacture is continued at West Brimfield at the present day. Wool hats were also manufactured by various parties. Tailoring was carried on to considerable extent, and the business of dressing woolen cloths in what were called clothing-works, which were established on small brooks, was also engaged in.

The mill-privilege at East Brimfield is supposed to have been first used by the saw- and grist-mill of Wm. Janes. The Brimfield Cotton and Woollen Manufacturing Company was afterward established there, but the enterprise proved unprofitable. Other parties soon after established the Union Cotton-Factory Company at East Brimfield. In 1820 the Monson and Brimfield Manufacturing Company was established at the same place. In 1853 the factory passed into new hands, and in 1854 it was destroyed by fire. It was rebuilt of stone, and used from 1856 to 1865 for the manufacture of shoemakers' tools. In 1865 it was changed to a factory for making machines for pegging shoes.

The first grist-mill in the town of Brimfield was built by Ezra King, before 1753, on Elbow Brook. On Nov. 3, 1856, a company was organized as the Brimfield Stockinet Company, who purchased this mill, erected a factory, and commenced the manufacture of stockinet, but failed of success. On May 1, 1863, the property passed into other hands, who engaged in the manufacture of woolen goods until April 18, 1870, when the factory was destroyed by fire, and has not been rebuilt.

The first grist- and saw-mills at Little Rest were located lower down the stream than the present mills. About 1812 the manufacture of nails was commenced at these mills. The enterprise was continued for more than twenty years, when it was relinquished. The business was recommenced about 1840, and continued until 1850, when it was again abandoned.

The tanning and currying business was successfully pursued in Brimfield until about 1850, when the principal shops were destroyed. The manufacture of boots and shoes was also once a prominent industry of the town. The first ready-made boots offered for sale in Hartford and the Southern cities were made in Brimfield. Blacksmith-shops have existed in various parts of the town since the earliest settlement. Cabinet-making was also pursued to some extent. Dish-turning, watch-making, and silversmithing have also received attention.

The earliest store was established by Timothy Danielson in the rear of the old Danielson house. Other stores were kept by David Shaw, Maj. Abner Morgan, Samuel W. Brown, Capt. Joseph Hoar, Enos Hitchcock, and John Park.

MILITARY.

The Brimfield Rifle Company was recruited in 1828, and continued its organization until 1840, when it was disbanded. The town has experienced the martial glories and vain-glories of training and general muster-day, when with life and drum the "bold soldier boys" of yore displayed themselves in the public places of the town, closing the festivities of the day with feasting, drinking, and general social enjoyments, to the great delight of juvenile Brimfield.

The town does not seem to have taken any active part in the "old French war," as the records contain but slight reference to it.

On June 14, 1749 (Massachusetts Archives), Mary Hitchcock, of Brimfield, petitioned the General Court for relief. Her husband, Nathaniel Hitchcock, went from her "very well clad, and with a good new gun." "He was in His Majesty's service in Fort Massachusetts when beset by and delivered up to our French-and-Indian Enemies." "He lived in captivity from August to the 23d day of May, and then died." She was awarded £12 5s., and a good gun. In the Massachusetts Archives (vol. xcii., p. 49) is a list of sixteen officers and men who were "sent to the Western Frontiers for Defence in the Time of the Alarm, in June, 1747."

Five companies from Brimfield were engaged in the French-and-Indian war: one under Capt. Ebenezer Moulton (Massachusetts Archives, Book 94, p. 95), from Sept. 11 to Dec. 25 1755; another under Capt. Daniel Burt (Massachusetts Archives, Book 94, p. 90), March 30, 1755, to Jan. 3, 1756; another under Capt. Trustram Davis (Massachusetts Archives, Book 94, pp. 419, 420, 533, 545, 546, 557); another under Capt. Davis (Massachusetts Archives, Book 98, pp. 271-274), Feb. 14 to Dec. 16, 1760; and a fifth under Capt. Daniel Burt (Massachusetts Archives, Book 96, pp. 384-386), March 13 to Feb. 20, 1758. Other companies, in which Brimfield men served, are mentioned in Massachusetts Archives, Book 94, page 153; and Book 98, p. 271. Reuben Townsley was taken captive by the Indians and compelled to run the gauntlet. He was adopted by the tribe, and lived with them for ten years. After a brief sojourn at Brimfield he returned to the Indians, and ended his life with them.

The following are the names of those of the residents of Brimfield who served in the expedition against the French and Indians at the time of the seizure of Fort Massachusetts, in 1747:

REVOLUTIONARY PERIOD.

The town of Brimfield bore a patriotic and honorable part in the Revolutionary war. The records of the town during the period of its continuance are replete with the exhibition of practical patriotism on the part of the inhabitants.

On Sept. 26, 1768, Timothy Danielson was chosen to attend a convention to be held at Boston, "in order that such measures may be consulted and advised as his Majesty's service and the peace and safety of his subjects may require." Jan. 21, 1773, the town passed a series of resolutions claiming the right to meet and consult upon public affairs, and declaring certain acts of the ministry and of Parliament to be endangering the rights and liberties of the people of the colonies. On April 15, 1774, the town appropriated £1 14s., their proportion of £500 assessed by the House of Representatives against the State of Massachusetts, to defray the expenses of the first Congress.

On July 1, 1774, a covenant was drawn up and signed by the 189 voters of the town agreeing to suspend all commercial intercourse with Great Britain, to neither "purchase or consume or suffer any person by, for, or under" them "to purchase or consume" any articles imported from Great Britain, and to purchase only of those who had signed this covenant, or who had made oath that the goods offered for sale were not imported from Great Britain after August, 1774. It was understood that to be binding this covenant was to receive the approval of the Continental Congress, and one of similar tenor must be adopted by the other towns in Massachusetts and of other of the colonies.

Timothy Danielson, of Brimfield, also acted as chairman of a congress of committees held at Northampton, Sept. 22, 1774, "to consult upon measures to be taken in this time of general distress in the province," and Oct. 5, 1774, he was chosen a delegate to attend the Provincial Congress, which met at Concord October 11th.

All the male residents of the town were divided into two military companies. The officers chosen were, of the east: Captain, Jas. Sherman; First Lieutenant, Jonathan Charles; Second Lieutenant, Phineas Sherman; Ensign, Daniel Burt. Of the west: Captain, Samuel Nicoll; First Lieutenant, Jonathan Brown; Second Lieutenant, Nathan Hoar; Ensign, Abner Stebbins. Oct. 5, 1774, the town voted "to co-operate with the Joint Committees of Boston and the Neighboring Towns not to supply the Troops with Joists, etc., Materials to fortify with." Jan. 11, 1775, the town voted to join with Monson and South Brimfield in sending a delegate to the Provincial Congress, and January 18th Timothy Danielson was chosen such delegate. May 26th following Mr. Danielson was commissioned a colonel, and re-elected a delegate to the Congress of 1775 the day before. Four pounds ten shillings were allowed him for Brimfield's proportion of his expenses.

Many patriotic resolutions follow in the town records, and men, money, and supplies were freely furnished. The following citizens of Brimfield served as soldiers in the Revolutionary war:

SHAYS' REBELLION.

The town does not appear to have taken any direct interest in the causes that conspired to instigate this violent attack upon law and order, but, when the time for action arrived, supported the government.

On Sept. 25, 1786, the two militia companies of Brimfield were ordered to Springfield by the State authorities, and remained six days. They were again ordered to the same place Jan. 17, 1787, and remained twenty-four days. Another company was enlisted by Capt. John Sherman, and did duty from Feb. 7, 1787, to March 12th of the same year.

The following are the names of those persons from Brimfield who aided in the suppression of the rebellion:*

WAR OF 1812.

With the causes which led to this struggle, and the policy in view in prosecuting it, the people of Brimfield never had any active sympathy. On the contrary, the resolutions adopted by the town Sept. 30, 1814, were decidedly antagonistic to the governmental policy, and a resolution adopted June 23, 1815, in reference to certain internal duties imposed by the United States government, even suggested the policy of armed resistance on the part of the State.

But one company was furnished to the war, and this by Monson, Brimfield, and South Brimfield combined. Isaac Fuller, of Monson, was captain, and Abner Brown lieutenant. The following are the names of those who served from Brimfield:

Abner Brown, lieutenant; Daniel Frost, sergeant-major; Julius Ward, Erastus Lumbar, sergeants; Zadoc Nichols, corporal; Saunders Allen, Lemuel Allen, Shubael Butterworth, Wm. Marshall S. Durkee, of Brimfield, who enlisted in 1808 for five years, served under Gen. Harrison, was in the battles of Tippecanoe and Brownstown, and in the army surrendered by Gen. Hull at Detroit; was confined in prison-ship at Quebec for several months, and discharged at Boston in 1813.

WAR OF THE REBELLION.

In the war of the Rebellion the inhabitants of Brimfield manifested that lofty patriotism, and that self-sacrificing spirit, which fired the hearts and toughened the sinews of their ancestors in the Revolution.

The town of Brimfield furnished to the war 138 men, being 5 more than the quota assigned it. The amount of money appropriated and expended for military purposes, exclusive of State aid, was $15,064.33. The amount raised and expended for State aid to soldiers' families during the war, and which was afterward repaid by the State, was $5853.11. The ladies of Brimfield by subscriptions and fairs raised $1803.25 for the Sanitary and Christian Commissions.

Brimfield was among the first towns in Massachusetts to erect a soldiers' monument. On March 12, 1866, the town appropriated $1250 for this purpose, and on July 4, 1866, it was formally dedicated. It stands on a grassy mound, nearly in front of the hotel, and is surrounded by a neat iron fence, the gift of Silas C. Herring and Elijah T. Sherman, of New York. The material of the monument is from the quarry in Monson, and it is 18 feet 6 inches in height, with a base 4 feet 5 inches. On the north side it bears the inscription: "Our Country's Defenders in the War of the Rebellion. Erected by the Town, 1866." On the east, south, and west sides are inscribed the names of the following Brimfield soldiers who perished in the war: H. W. King, G. W. Paige, R. A. Parker, E. E. Parker, E. F. Manning, A. N. Manning, M. H. Smith, G. H. Dimick, James Crosby, A. W. Latham, H. W. Robinson, Silas Phelps, G. W. Allen, William Kenney, L. P. Parker, C. E. Alexander, J. Cronin, P. Barry.

In the compilation of the history of this town the writer has been chiefly assisted by Henry F. Brown, Esq., both personally and by the loan of important documents. Liberal extracts have also been made from a history of the town which is in course of preparation by a committee appointed by the town for that purpose. Other citizens deserve thanks.

WILBRAHAM.

GEOGRAPHICAL.

THIS town, which was one of the early outlying precincts of Springfield, is located about the centre of the eastern part of Hampden County, and is bounded north by the town of Ludlow, in the same county, south by the town of Hampden, also in Hampden County, east by Monson, Hampden Co., and west by Springfield. The total acreage of the town is 12,570.

NATURAL FEATURES.

The surface in the western part of the town is level, and scarcely broken by a single hill. East of the central line, however, a considerable range of hills extends the entire length of the town, some of them reaching an altitude of several hundred feet, and from their summit afford excellent views of the surrounding country.* The soil is productive, and gives fair returns to those who devote their attention to agricultural pursuits. The cereals are readily produced, the quantity of rye and Indian corn raised exceeding that of wheat. The mineral characteristics of the town are not of special importance. The geology conforms to the general description given elsewhere in this work. The Chicopee River flows along the northern border of the town, separating it from Ludlow, and affording excellent water-power for manufacturing enterprises. Several small streams of minor importance traverse the different sections of the town, the most prominent of which are Pole Bridge Brook, in the western part of the town, Twelve-Mile Brook, in the northeastern corner, and Big Brook, flowing from the southern part of the town down into Hampden. Spectacle Pond lies near the northern border of the town. Just south of it is Nine-Mile Pond, so named because of its distance from Springfield. These are the only natural ponds in the town. Stebbins' Pond, sometimes covering an area of perhaps 20 acres, is an artificial pond in the southwestern part of the town.

RAILROADS.

The Boston and Albany Railroad passes through the northern border of the town, having a station at North Wilbraham, and affording excellent railroad facilities to the inhabitants.

EMINENT CITIZENS.

Among men of distinction natives of Wilbraham may be mentioned Pliny Merriek, a son of the first clergyman. He early represented the town in the Legislature, was a lawyer prominent in his profession, and spent the greater part of his life in Brookfield.

John Bliss was the first representative to the General Court, and was a man of great influence and native talent. He was born in 1727, was an ardent Whig in the Revolution, a member of the Provincial Congress, a representative in the Legislature for many years, a Senator, a judge of the Court of Common Pleas, a colonel of militia, and held numerous other offices of trust and responsibility. He died in 1809.

Oliver B. Morris was born in Wilbraham in 1782. He removed to Springfield at the age of nineteen, and after his admission to the Bar commenced the practice of the law. In early life he represented the town of Springfield in the Legislature for several years. He was appointed judge of Probate in 1829, and filled that office with great acceptance for many years.†

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

What is now the town of Wilbraham was formerly a part of the territory of Springfield, and was originally set off to certain proprietors to avoid the reversion of the unappropriated lands of Springfield, called the "outward commons," to the royal government.

The first actual settler to establish himself within the confines of the present town was Nathaniel Hitchcock. In the summer of 1730 he came from Springfield, cleared and broke up two acres of land, and erected a log house where the house of James Merriek, the great-grandson of the first minister, afterward stood. He passed the subsequent winter in Springfield, but in May, 1731, took up his permanent abode with his family in Wilbraham.

The next regular settler was Noah Alvord, who came out from Springfield in the spring of 1732, and located on the place since occupied by Lorenzo Kibbe. The next year Daniel Warner settled where Brainard Brewer afterward resided. In 1734, Nathaniel Warriner located where Mrs. Mears now resides. Of these four earliest settlers no descendants now live in Wilbraham.

Moses Burt followed in 1733, and located on what afterward became well known as the Burt farm. Then Samuel Warner settled on Stony Hill, and Samuel Stebbins on the mountain, near Mr. Richards' house. David Merriek built his house where John M. Merriek now resides; John Jones settled on Mr. Buell's place; Abel Bliss on the Bliss farm; Daniel Lamb on the Bay road, west of Jenksville; Thomas Merriek on Mr. Cross' farm; David Warriner on the academy lot; Isaac Brewer on Edwin Brewer's place; David Chapin and Moses Bartlett beyond and on the mountain; and Nathaniel Bliss near Samuel Stebbins'. Other early settlers prior to 1741 were Aaron and Daniel Parsons, Cornelius Webb, Benjamin Warriner, Benjamin Wright, Henry Wright, Thomas Glover, and Joseph Sikes. No formal settlements were made in the south part of the town, now Hampden, before 1741.

After 1741, Jonathan Ely settled on the mountain in the north part of the town, on the middle road. Caleb Stebbins located on the farm afterward occupied by his great-grandsons, Jason and George; Daniel Cadwell near him; Joseph Sikes on the great Bay road; Philip Lyon south of "Wigwam Hill;" Benoni Atchinson on Stony Hill; and Ezra Barker near Atchinson.

During the first ten years of the settlement there were 38 children born, and but three persons died, of whom none were buried in the town. Elizabeth Cockril, who had come from Boston to reside with a relative, and who died April 26, 1741, was the "first person y^e was Bured in y^e town." Comfort

* The central part of this range is known as "Wigwam Hill," so named because a lone Indian squaw inhabited it after the settlement of the town began.

† See general chapter on the Bar of the Connecticut Valley.

Warner, daughter of Daniel Warner, was the first child born in the "outward commons, on the east side of the Great River," March 15, 1734. The first death was that of "David Jones, son of David Jones and Hannah Jones, his wife, Aug. 19, 1736."

The inhabitants of the town were at first compelled to go all the way to Springfield, a distance of nine miles, for the purpose of public worship; but, soon tiring of this, they presented, June 26, 1740, with the concurrence of Longmeadow and First Parishes, a petition to Gov. Jonathan Belcher and the General Court, asking to be set off as a separate precinct.

After passing through the usual legal formalities the petition was granted, and on Jan. 6, 1741, Wilbraham became the "Fourth Precinct of Springfield," with "all the Powers, liberties, Privileges, and immunities as other Precincts hold and Enjoy, and that all the lands Petitioned lying Southward of the River as aforesaid be subjected to a tax of 2*l.* (old tenor) Bills p*r* acre p*r* annum for the space of Four years; Next Coming the money arising thereby to be applied for the building of a Meeting-house Settlement and support of the Ministry among them."*

The first precinct-meeting was held March 12, 1741, at the house of David Merrick, pursuant to a warrant issued for that purpose on Feb. 13, 1741, by "Wm. Pyncheon, Esq., one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace for Hampshire County." The precinct was organized by the choice of the following officers: William Pyncheon, acting as Moderator; David Merrick, Clerk; Thomas Merrick (2d), Isaac Brewer, Nathaniel Warriner, Committee of the Precinct; Isaac Brewer, Treasurer; David Merrick, Thomas Merrick (2d), Samuel Stebbins, Assessors; Nathaniel Warriner, Collector.

The history of the precinct government of Wilbraham consists chiefly of the choice and settlement of a minister and the location and erection of a meeting-house,—the most important problems which the pioneer settlers of New England had to encounter. The Rev. Noah Merrick was chosen the first minister, and was duly ordained by a competent council in the month of June, 1741. The ceremonies attending the installation of the new pastor were to have been held beneath the spreading branches of a large oak-tree which stood in front of the Brainard Brewer house, but the weather proving inclement the meeting adjourned to a barn on the place where Mrs. Mears now resides. Next, follows a struggle of six years' duration in reference to the location and construction of a meeting-house. Two separate committees, composed of inhabitants of the neighboring towns, were chosen to settle the vexed question.

Finally, in May, 1747, the spot was chosen,—“on the hill commonly called the Wigwam Hill, the centre of said spot being att a walnut staddle of about four or five inches Diameter, there being a fast stone in the Ground, about two feet and a-half northwest of said staddle, said staddle standing twenty-eight Rods and sixteen Links, Running by a point of compass from the southwest corner of Mr. Noah Mirick's dwelling-house, south sixteen degrees thirty minutes East, into said staddle.” Here the first meeting-house was erected in 1747, so that it could be occupied, but was not finally completed until the summer of 1761, sixteen years after it was opened for worship.

The first record of a road laid by the town of Springfield, in the territory of Wilbraham, is made in March, 1744. A change was made in the "West Road," from Stephen Stebbins', south, over the Scantie; also from Stebbins', east, to Brimfield line (Monson), about as it now runs. Also, from Brimfield line on the overplus land, in the second division, to the middle road, "Provided the Same or Either of them, or any Part of them, do not Prove Chargeable to the town." County roads had been laid before this time, or the proprietors had marked paths which were to be opened as roads in due time.

The first town roads were accepted March 20, 1764, the first one being within the present limits of Hampden. The second road established was in the north part of the town, running from the "West Rode," or "Main Road," west to Stony Hill, not far from the present road. From this road there ran south, through the whole length of the town, four paths, more or less used for foot travelers, bridle-paths, or for wagons. These were severally designated as the "West Road," on the west side of the mountain; the "Middle" or "Ridge Road," following the top of the mountain about a mile east of the West road; the "East Road," still another mile east, starting near "Twelve-Mile" Brook and running south to the southeast corner of the town; then one mile west of the "West Road" was the road on the west side of the "outward commons," nearly corresponding to the present road. There were also five roads crossing east and west. These roads were all laid out at different times before and, from 1763 to 1772, after the incorporation of the town.

TAVERNS.

Probably the earliest approach to a tavern that existed in Wilbraham was kept by Isaac Brewer, as early as 1741. Various public meetings and sessions of committees were held at his house.

In this connection we insert portions of a letter written by Mrs. Antoinette C. M. A. B. Speer, dated at Warsaw, Ky., Dec. 30, 1878. Mrs. Speer is a sister of John M. Merrick, Esq., to whom the letter was directed, and speaks as one who knows whereof she affirms:

"My great-grandfather, Ensign Abel Bliss, built his house, probably a log house, first, in what we used to call the 'old orchard.' I presume you have seen the cellar there,—I have many a time. Finding that too remote from a spring, or stream of water,—in those days they were not accustomed to dig wells,—they purposed moving nearer the brook, and accordingly built the barn, where it now stands, in the year 1740. The house was not built until four years afterward (1774).

"Finding it very inconvenient to come so far through the snow in winter to attend to their stock, they built a temporary house, now used as a wood-house, consisting of what is called, at the south and west, of 'two pens and a passage,' in which to reside until they could build a larger and more convenient one.

"The house was designed, as was then thought, on a magnificent scale, being the first in that part of the country which had the square glass instead of the diamond-shaped set in lead,—and altogether very large and grand for the times, inasmuch that the minister, who in those days was supreme in all matters, both spiritual and temporal, thought it incumbent upon him to preach against the folly and pride, and quoted the catechism (which in those days stood next to the Bible), making use of the following sentence: 'Build not your house too high.'

"The effect of this sermon on the said Ensign Abel was to cause him to cut off the upright timbers of the frame about a foot, thus lowering the ceiling of the lower rooms that much. I once found one of those pieces under the house.

"In building the house the great question was how they should get the cash to buy the glass and nails. Tar brought money, and this part of the question was solved by building a tar-kiln on the 'river lot,' where was a great abundance of fat-pine knots, from which they could procure the requisite means for getting the needed materials.

"It has been inexplicable to me how Mr. Stebbins could make such an error in his Wilbraham Centennial book as to locate that house where Mr. J. Wesley Bliss lives, while the old house still stood to testify to its own antiquity.

"The marks of the old bar are still to be seen on the south room floor, and the old bar-room table still exists in the kitchen. In those days they had not been entirely divested of the customs of the 'old country,' which gave the homestead to the eldest son, and consequently Oliver inherited the property, and from him it descended to John, my father. J. Wesley's grandfather was the second son of Ensign Abel.

"At what time Ensign Abel Bliss commenced 'keeping tavern,' I do not know; probably soon after the house was completed. Houses were not finished as expeditiously in those days as they are now.

"I have often heard how the soldiers, returning from the war, spent the night there, stacking their guns in the corner, and lying down on the floor to sleep, with their feet to the fire,—not one of those fires covered up at the ringing of the 'curfew bell,' but one made of immense logs, such as are not familiar to this generation, and which even the stalwart men of those times managed with difficulty; but large as they were the capacious fireplace was equal to the occasion.

* The names of the 24 settlers thus incorporated were Nathaniel Hitchcock, Noah Alvord, Daniel Warner, Nathaniel Warriner, James Brewer, David Merrick, Daniel Parsons, Samuel Warner, David Warriner, Samuel Bartlett, John Jones, Samuel Brooks, Joseph Wright, Daniel Lamb, Abel Bliss, Phineas Chapin, Jonathan Ely, David Jones, Moses Burt, Nathaniel Bliss, Samuel Stebbins, Thomas Merrick, Aaron and Stephen Stebbins.

The fireplaces have been remodeled, but the large stone chimney still occupies space enough for a small bedroom.

"In the dining-room floor, the knots corresponding showed that the rude planks were all cut from one tree.

"While occupying the then new house, the old house in the orchard was used for a hospital, where they kept any traveler or soldier who was so unfortunate as to have taken the small-pox, and some one who had passed safely through an attack of the dreaded disease was sent to attend him until he died or recovered.

"The shingles on the north side of the barn remained there from the date of its erection until 1844,—one hundred and four years,—and the roof-boards were found in sufficient state of preservation to use again. The boards were of cedar, and the knots projected above the worn-out shingles.* Portions of these boards were sent to the Antiquarian Society of Worcester.

"When the house was kept as a tavern the Boston road passed over the hill, and not along the river and through the 'dug way,' as now. When General Washington passed over this road on his way to or from Boston, he passed over the hill, and my father and some other boys went out to the corner to see him, and were much gratified when the stately chieftain bowed to them as he rode by.

"When Marcus Lyons was murdered, Halligan and Daly turned his horse into the pasture near where the railway now runs, into what we called the 'Pimley lot,' where he was found next day with the saddle on.

"Father had to go to Northampton as a witness in the Halligan and Daly case.

"I cannot tell how long the house was used as a tavern. Oliver succeeded his father in its management, and my father, when a boy, was proud to be able to tell strangers how far it was to Graves' tavern in Palmer. Father was born in 1779, and I am inclined to think the tavern was kept open as late as the close of the last century."

NOTE.—This account may conflict somewhat with matter heretofore written, but it certainly carries evidence of correct knowledge and vivid recollection. —[Historian.]

There is now standing a house about three-quarters of a mile southeast of the depot at North Wilbraham that was occupied and used as a tavern during the Revolution, at which the soldiers were entertained on the marches from different points to Boston. The barn now standing on the place was built before the house, and is more than one hundred and thirty years old. The house where John M. Merriek resides was erected about 1788 by Jonathan Merriek, his grandfather, for a tavern. He kept it there until about 1806. The same house was kept as a temperance house from about 1840 to 1843 or 1844. The house where John Baldwin resides, near the depot, was kept by him as a tavern for many years. The building first used as a boarding-house by the Wesleyan Academy in 1825 was originally erected by William Rice, for many years register of deeds for Hampden County, as a place of public entertainment. Mr. Rice was succeeded as tavern-keeper by David Warriner, who continued to perform the duties of a hospitable landlord until the property passed into the possession of the academy. It was a place of some repute and well patronized. Its sign-board, which stood on the opposite side of the road from the house, bore the figure of a woman engaged in churning. About 1807-8, Charles Brewer kept a tavern where Luther Markham now resides, and Abel Calkins, followed by Stephen Utley, kept one about fifty years ago where Mrs. Abbie Knight resides. Benjamin Fuller kept a tavern in 1828 or 1829 on the corner of the road leading to Monson. The old Joseph Sikes tavern was standing many years ago on the "Great Road," not far from Mr. Baldwin's, and is probably one of the first kept in the town, if not the first.

Of the early stores kept in the town, we are able to give but little account. It is probable that at first they were little better than trading-posts. One was kept by Augustus Sisson, in 1810, in the old building which formerly stood next to the Congregational Church, and wherein the post-office was afterward kept. Jonathan Pease had a store afterward near the house where Mrs. Abbie Knight now lives. Pliny Caldwell had charge of the store. Maj. Wm. Clarke had a store for a number of years on the south side of Mrs. Knight's residence.

PHYSICIANS.

The physicians who have practiced in Wilbraham have been Dr. John Stearns, Dr. Gordon Percival, Dr. Samuel F. Mer-

* The letter of Mrs. S. is a little ambiguous on these points, and may be understood to mean either boards or shingles. Possibly both were of cedar.

rick (who practiced as early as the Revolution, was engaged in the war, and resided in the centre of the town); Dr. Judah Bliss, who lived about a mile north of the centre, and practiced about 1800, or later; Drs. Abiah Southworth and Converse Butler; Dr. Luther Brewer, who resided where Myron Brewer now lives, and practiced about 1812; Drs. Jacob Lyman and Elisha Ladd; Dr. Gideon Kibbe, who lived where Wm. B. Twining now resides, and practiced about 1810; Dr. Jesse W. Rice, who practiced about 1820, and resided first where John M. Merriek now lives, and afterward where Luther Markham resides; Dr. Edwin Thayer, who engaged in practice about 1836 or 1838, and then removed to Palmer; and Dr. Charles Bourker, who practiced about 1862 or 1863, then entered the army as a surgeon, and is now in practice at Bernardston. The physicians now practicing in the town are Dr. Stebbins Foskit and Dr. James W. Foster at the centre, and Dr. Squiers at North Wilbraham.

The present town of Wilbraham has had only two lawyers. Of these, William Knight was admitted to the Bar in 1820, and located in the town. His practice was local, and consisted principally of what is known as office-work, as distinguished from litigation. He enjoyed the reputation of a prudent, careful, and honest lawyer. He removed to the State of Ohio about 1840. The other lawyer was Asa Olmstead, who practiced at Wilbraham about 1830 for five or six years, and resided on the corner of the road leading to Monson.

BRIDGES.

The first bridge erected in the town was a "Good Cart Bridge," "Erected and Built across the Brook called Twelve-mile Brook in the Countrey Road, with Good Large Hewed Timber at the Charge of the Town." The vote for its construction was passed by the town of Springfield, Nov. 23, 1741, and it was directed that it be "Done as soon as may be," the reason being that the grand jury had made a presentment against the town for not sooner providing a bridge.

ORGANIZATION.

As early as Jan. 16, 1749, efforts were made by the "fourth precinct of Springfield" to be set off as a town, and for fourteen successive years, with untiring pertinacity, did the inhabitants present their petitions and urge their right to municipal organization without success. "A continual dropping weareth away a stone," so finally the efforts of the precinct met with success, and on June 15, 1763, the act of incorporation by which Wilbraham became a district was signed by Sir Francis Bernard, Governor of the province. Wilbraham united with Springfield in the choice of a representative until the former became a town, in 1786.

As to the name of the new town there are two theories,—one that the name was derived from an English baronet, by the name of Wilbraham. The other and more correct view traces the name to the parish or town of Wilburgham, or Wilbraham, in the "Hundred of Staine," county of Cambridge, England. Rowland Stebbins, the ancestor of the Stebbinses, and William Pynchon, the ancestor of the Pynchons and the original proprietor of Springfield, originated in the near neighborhood of Wilbraham, in England, and came from thence to this country, and it is highly probable that through the influence of their descendants the name Wilbraham may have been selected for the new town. The Indian name of the town was Minnechang, meaning "Berry Land."†

The territory of the precinct was enlarged in the act of incorporation by the addition of a strip of land on the west side, from the "inner commons," half a mile wide, extending from the Chicopee River to the Connecticut line. In 1780 there fell to the town another strip of land, called the "Ob-long," or "Wales," about a mile in width at one end, and three-quarters of a mile at the other, across the whole width of the town. In 1799 that portion of the first division of the "outward common of Springfield" which lay on the east side of Chicopee River, now called the "Elbows," then "Kingsfield or the Elbows," was added. By these additions the town was made four and a half miles wide as far north as its western line extended. Its length on the west side was eight miles and one hundred and fifty-two rods, and on its eastern side ten miles and one hundred and thirty rods.

The warrant for the first town-meeting was issued by John Worthington, Esq., of Springfield, to Stephen Stebbins, of Wilbraham, and bore date Aug. 8, 1763. Pursuant to this warrant the inhabitants "assembled and met together" at the meeting-house, Aug. 25, 1763, and proceeded to organize the first town-meeting, Lieut. Thomas Mirick acting as "moderator." It was voted that Ezra Barker should be clerk of the town. The meeting then adjourned to enable the "clerk" to go to Springfield to be sworn, for there was as yet no justice of the peace in the new town. Re-convening the next day the following officers were chosen: selectmen, treasurer, constable, assessors, tithingmen, surveyors of highways, fence-viewers, deer-reeves, sealers of leather, hog-reeves, wardens, surveyor of shingles, clapboards, etc., and surveyors of wheat.

The usual proceedings relating to the organization of the town then follow in the records. In 1765 the people in the south part of the town made application for money to support preaching among them for the winter, which the town refused. At the December meeting, 1767, the town refused the "south part" the privilege of having "Two Months' Preaching in the Winter Season, upon their own cost." In 1772 the south part asked to be set off as a town, but were refused. In 1778 it was voted to divide the town into two parishes, but the vote was afterward reconsidered. In 1780 another effort to form a parish was made, and June 11, 1782, the south part of the town, corresponding very nearly with the present town of Hampden, became, by special enactment of the General Court, the south parish. The territory corresponding to the town of Wilbraham became the north parish, the line between the two being on the south side of David Bliss' farm, those adjoining the line being permitted to choose whichever parish they pleased.

VILLAGES.

The town of Wilbraham contains but two villages. Of these the larger is which is situated in the centre of the town, about two miles from the railroad station, and is chiefly ranged along the principal road leading from the northern end of the town into Connecticut. The village proper is about a mile in length, and is a quiet, retired place. Two handsome churches—a Congregational and Methodist—and the buildings of the Wesleyan Academy comprise its most prominent features. The dwellings are comfortable and homelike. The hills to the east form a pleasing background to the village, and afford many pleasant walks to their summit, and through the vales which separate them. The place is well filled during the summer months with those who seek retirement and rest from the more active scenes of life.

The principal store in the village is kept by George W. Ely, who has been in trade for several years past, and is also the present postmaster. Mowry & Co. also have a store adjoining the Academy Boarding-house.

Post-Office.—The post-office was established about 1821. William Knight was the first postmaster, and kept the office where Franklin Fisk now lives. Pliny Cadwell succeeded him, and kept it in his store, which stood on the open space at present between the hotel and the church. Clark B. Stebbins was the next postmaster, and kept the office where Ely's store is, and for a time where Firmin's shoe-shop is. Other postmasters have been Roderick Burt, Luther V. Bliss, Lorenzo M. Hancock, Anna E. Hempstead, and the present incumbent, George W. Ely, who was appointed in the spring of 1878.

Hotels.—The village hotel, called the Allis House, was opened in 1870 by William L. Allis and James P. Brown, the latter having previously kept it in a dwelling-house. Mr. Allis subsequently died. Nathan W. Storrs has kept it for about seven years past. It was destroyed by fire June 24, 1877, and rebuilt in January, 1878.

NORTH WILBRAHAM

has grown up around the railroad station in the northern extremity of the town. The houses here are of modern style.

Trade is brisk, the people are alert and active, and several manufacturing enterprises of importance are carried on in the village.

The principal store in the place is kept by Erasmus B. Gates, who also deals in coal, hay, straw, and other commodities. He is also clerk of the town and postmaster of North Wilbraham. The other general store is kept by W. E. Stone & Co.

Post-Office.—A post-office was established at North Wilbraham about 1846 or 1847, and Warren Collins, the first agent of the railroad, and in recognition of whose early activity in building up the village it is often called "Collins' Depot," was the first postmaster. He continued in that office until April, 1878, when Mr. Gates was appointed. The office previously existed at the North village,—sometimes called "Sodom." Jacob B. Merrick was among the postmasters at "Sodom."

Grace Chapel, a neat place of worship, used by the members of different churches in union, occupies a pleasant site in the village.

BUTLERVILLE is a small settlement about a mile east of North Wilbraham, and the site of an important manufacturing enterprise. It was formerly called the North village.

GLENDAL, or EAST WILBRAHAM, is the name given to the collection of houses along the "east road" and at the "four corners," in the east part of the town.

SCHOOLS.

As early as 1737 the town of Springfield appropriated £3 for the support of a school in the "outward commons on the east side." The same amount was appropriated the following year. In 1739 the sum was increased to £4, and in 1740, £2 more were added. Various other sums were appropriated to the precinct prior to the incorporation of the town, the whole amount appropriated up to 1755 being £155 13s. and 6d., averaging £10 7s. and 6d. a year. Before 1754 a school-house was built nearly opposite to where the present Congregational Church stands. Ten school districts existed in 1775.

At the close of the Revolution there were but two school-houses in the town,—the one just referred to, and another east, on the middle road on the mountain. Commencing with 1791, the town appropriated £100 for three years, to be divided among the districts in proportion to what they paid into the treasury. This was principally designed for the erection of school-houses in these districts. After this date the appropriations for school-purposes were more liberal and uniform than they had been in the past. Deacon Nathaniel Warriner died in 1780, and left a legacy of £400, one-half for the benefit of the ministry, and one-half for the benefit of schools. This generous bequest proved of great assistance to the schools, and to this day constitutes the principal item in the school fund.

There are at present but seven school districts in the town, and the sum last appropriated for their support was $1800. The average number of scholars in attendance is about 160.

Among the early schoolmasters may be mentioned Ezra Barker, for many years clerk of town and church, and generally called "Master Barker," Moses Enos, Gorham Stebbins, Anson L. Brewer, Ralph Glover, and "Elder" Bennett. Some of the "school-marns" have been Mary Newell, Miss Tenant, and Laura Merrick, afterward the wife of Dr. Brewer.

Besides the public schools there have always existed private schools in town, where higher instruction was given. These were usually taught by the ministers, among others, by Mr. Witter, of the North Parish, Mr. Warren, of the South Parish, Mr. Brown, and Elder Bennett.

WESLEYAN ACADEMY.†

Wilbraham is more widely known than most country towns in the Connecticut Valley. It is largely indebted for this to the location of the Wesleyan Academy within its limits. This school is the child of the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Its foundation and steady growth are chiefly due to the zeal, foresight, and self-denying labors of her ministry and membership. This school was first opened at Newmarket, N. H. The Conference then comprised within its boundaries all New England, except a small portion included in the New York Conference. The citizens of Newmarket furnished the land on which to erect an academy building, and made other donations in labor and money, on condition that the preachers should give bonds to provide competent instructors for five years. John Brodhead, George Pickering, Philip Munger, Charles Virgin, and Caleb Dustin, all members of the Conference, gave the required bonds. Its act of incorporation was passed by the Legislature of New Hampshire, June 23, 1818. The land was donated, a convenient building, two stories high, erected, a few books, maps, charts, etc., obtained, and the school opened. Rev. Martin Ruter, D.D., afterward noted for his piety, learning, and devotion to the cause of education, was the first principal.

* Precinct clerk to 1763.

† By Rev. N. Fellows, A.M.

The number of students was never large, and in less than five years the trustees and Conference saw that the location was not favorable for the growth of a well-appointed academy. On the 30th of December, 1823, after more than five years of valuable service, the school at Newmarket was suspended, and its founders and other friends of education in the New England Conference sought a more central location for future operations. The trustees also voted, "That whenever the New England Conference shall have located and established an academy or seminary of learning within the bounds of the Conference, this board will relinquish all the remaining funds, library, and other movable property, to be appropriated to the support of the institution, under the direction of the trustees."

The following account of its early history is mostly taken from a sketch by the Rev. Miner Raymond, D.D. The citizens of Wilbraham, greatly desiring the location of the school in this town, offered valuable inducements, and the present site was selected. Upon the application of the Rev. John Lindsey to the Legislature of Massachusetts, Amos Binney, Abel Bliss, Abraham Avery, Calvin Brewer, Enoch Mudge, Wilbur Fisk, John Lindsey, Joshua Crowell, and William Rice were created a body corporate, by the name of the "Trustees of the Wesleyan Academy," with the usual corporate powers, and the right of holding property, the annual income of which should not exceed the sum of $10,000. This act was approved by the Governor, Feb. 7, 1824, a few days more than a month after operations were suspended at Newmarket.

The Wesleyan Academy at Wilbraham and the Newmarket Wesleyan Academy are one and the same institution, with a change of location and legal authority; under the patronage of the same ecclesiastical organization, founded by the same men, sustained by the same agencies, organized for the same purpose, and are every way identical (with the exceptions just mentioned). The Wesleyan Academy, therefore, claims the honor of being the oldest literary institution existing under the patronage of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America.

On land donated by the late William Rice, Esq., of Springfield, known as the "academy lot," with the avails of donations collected by agents who traveled extensively through the Conference, the "Old Academy" building was erected. A farm of 60 acres—one-half of the Warriner homestead—was purchased, and the old farm-house was enlarged and fitted for a boarding-house. The school was opened for the reception of students Nov. 8, 1825. The number of students at its opening was 5; 3 more came in the first day, and before the term ended there were 35. From these small beginnings the institution was at once encouraged by unexpected success, and through its entire subsequent history it has received a very extensive patronage. The principal's house was built in 1827.

To assist indigent students, by making the institution, as far as means would allow, a manual-labor school, a workshop was erected, and incipient arrangements made for an agricultural department. The manual-labor department was soon abandoned, and this workshop was enlarged and converted into a laboratory, with recitation-rooms, museum, and cabinet for the department of natural science.

In 1838 a separate boarding-house for ladies was erected on the northwest corner of the academy lot. This was subsequently removed and made to form a south wing to the old boarding-house. A new dining-hall was added, and the whole thoroughly renewed, furnishing very convenient accommodations for a family of 150 students. In 1851 the seminary building known as "Fisk Hall" was erected, and in 1854 the old laboratory was removed, and "Binney Hall" erected in its place. The three academy buildings are beautifully located in a group, some 500 feet east of Main Street, on a slight eminence, furnishing an extensive and delightful prospect of the town and surrounding country.

The "Old Academy" building is in good condition, and still furnishes four fine rooms for school purposes,—the studio, a study-room, mathematical recitation-room, and commercial-room. "Fisk Hall" contains the chapel, capable of seating about 400 persons, two society halls, the museum, and two recitation-rooms. The laboratory, with chemical and philosophical apparatus rooms adjoining, is in "Binney Hall." This building also contains the library, and has recitation-rooms for the teachers of Latin, English literature, and modern languages.

In 1856 the principal's house was removed, and a new one, large and commodious, with modern improvements, was built by the generosity of Isaac Rich, Esq., of Boston. This stands on the west side of the street, directly fronting the avenue of beautiful maple-trees that extends from the street to the academy group of buildings.

On the 4th of January, 1856, the boarding-house took fire, and, with a large portion of its furniture and provisions, was entirely consumed. The erection of a new and substantial brick edifice, 242 feet by 38, with a rear part 140 feet by 38, partly three and partly four stories high, was commenced on the 1st of August following. This structure was completed in 1857, and on the 29th of September, a few weeks after its occupancy by students, it was also consumed by fire. After nearly two years' delay, another building to occupy its place was commenced, and was ready for the reception of students at the opening of the fall term in August, 1861. This noble edifice provides ample accommodations for a family of 250 persons, and it is regarded as a superior structure, unsurpassed by any of its kind in architectural taste, convenience, and general adaptation to the purpose for which it is used. It fronts to the east, and presents a most beautiful view of the academy buildings, campus, meadow, grove, and mountain. The campus has a frontage on the street of nearly a sixth of a mile. At the southern extremity stands the Methodist Church, a massive structure of red sandstone. Near to this, and in front of the boarding-hall, is an attractive croquet-ground for the young ladies, while farther to the north is located a most excellent ball-ground for the young men. The trustees now hold a farm of nearly 200 acres, suitably divided into meadow-, tillage-, and pasture-lands, which, under the careful management of a skillful farmer, supplies all the milk and vegetables needed by the boarding-house. The value of the real estate and personal property owned by the institution is as follows:

WESLEYAN ACADEMY, WILBRAHAM, MASS.

FOUNDED 1824.

WESLEYAN ACADEMY BOARDING-HOUSE, WILBRAHAM, MASS.

HON. J. M. MERRICK.

The subject of this brief notice is the sixth generation from Thomas Merrick, who was born in Wales, Great Britain, in the year 1620; emigrated to this country about 1630, and settled at Springfield, Mass., in 1638.

John M. was born in Wilbraham, May 9, 1810, and is the second son of John and Harriet (Brewer) Merrick, and grandson of Lieut. Jonathan Merrick and Mary, his wife. This lady was a sister of Timothy Merrick, whose tragic death, at an early age, is described in verse in the history of the town of Wilbraham.

John Merrick, the father of our subject, died in August, 1816. In April, 1817, his widow married John Bliss, a native of Wilbraham, and John M. at once took up his abode with his mother and her husband. His earliest years were spent in working upon the farm in the summer months, and in attendance upon the common schools in the winter-time.

At the age of fourteen he chose Abraham Avery—a tanner and currier by trade, and the maker of the famous "Presbyterian Saddle"—for his guardian, and went to live with him. Mr. Merrick, liking the business of Mr. Avery, determined to devote his attention to it. To its acquirement he devoted a large share of his time, meanwhile attending the Wesleyan Academy for four terms.

After attaining his majority, he spent a few months on his farm (the old homestead of Jonathan Merrick), and then joined in partnership with Mr. Avery. He continued in the tanning and currying business for a little more than three years. He then settled again upon his farm, where he is still engaged in agricultural pursuits.

In the month of March, 1832, Mr. Merrick married Mary Jane Thompson, of New Haven, Conn., who is still living. Three children have resulted from the union, as follows: Wm. M., born March 4, 1833, now residing in the city of Chicago, and chief of the department of designing and draughting for Baker & Co., engravers and publishers; a second son, who died in infancy; and Harriet Cornelia, born Sept. 15, 1843; April 14, 1861, she married Rev. Wm. F. Warren, now president of the Boston University.

Mr. Merrick has filled many positions of trust and responsibility. In 1836 he was elected a member of the Board of Trustees of Wesleyan Academy, and is now the senior member of the Board. He was secretary of the Board from 1836 to 1842, and again from 1853 to 1858; was treasurer from 1842 to 1861, and steward of the boarding-house connected with that institution from 1850 to 1852, and from 1855 to 1861. Near the close of the Rebellion he held the office of district provost-marshal for nearly two years. He was town-clerk of Wilbraham from 1840 to 1842, and from 1863 to 1865. In 1866 he represented his district in the State Legislature, and has been a justice of the peace for the last thirty years.

In his church affiliations, Mr. Merrick is a strict and consistent Methodist, having united with that denomination in the year 1826. In 1835 he was elected a member of the Board of Trustees of the church, which position he still holds; and was clerk and treasurer of the Board for many years. He has also held the office of church steward a large part of the time until the present. He was a member of the building committee to erect the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1834, and also of that to build Memorial Methodist Episcopal Church, dedicated in 1870.

In all the varied relations which Mr. Merrick has sustained to the world and to society, his conduct has been exemplary and praiseworthy, and to-day he is one of Wilbraham's most honored and substantial citizens.

The late Amos B. Merrill also left to the academy his private library, a very choice collection of over 1200 volumes, inventoried in his estate at $3500.

This school has had nine principals since its reopening in Wilbraham, viz.: Rev. Wilbur Fisk, D.D., 1825-31; Rev. W. McK. Bangs, A.M., 1831-32; Rev. John Foster, A.M., 1832-34; Rev. David Patten, D.D., 1834-41; Rev. Charles Adams, D.D., 1841-45; Rev. Robert Allyn, A.M., 1845-48; Rev. Miner Raymond, D.D., 1848-64; Rev. Edward Cooke, D.D., 1864-74; Rev. Nathaniel Fellows, A.M., 1874. Rev. Wilbur Fisk, D.D., the first principal, after filling that position with great success for six years, was elected president of the Wesleyan University. If we accept the statements of his students, it is hardly possible to speak too highly of his piety, learning, sound judgment, and the grace and dignity of his manner. He was equally distinguished for the skill with which he conducted the varied interests of a great school or college, and for a most impressive, convincing, and persuasive eloquence in the pulpit.*

Rev. David Patten, D.D., Rev. Charles Adams, D.D., and Rev. Robert Allyn, D.D., have each spent many years in laborious and successful educational work since leaving the academy. Rev. Miner Raymond, D.D., presided over the academy sixteen years,—longer than any other principal. He was connected with the school as pupil, teacher, and principal some twenty-five years. During his administration the present magnificent and commodious buildings were erected, and the institution prospered in all its interests. For fifteen years Dr. Raymond has been professor of theology in the Biblical Institute, at Evanston, Ill. He has recently published a very able and elaborate work on “Systematic Theology.”

Dr. Edward Cooke came to Wilbraham with the wisdom acquired from a long experience at the head of similar institutions, which eminently fitted him to improve, organize, and classify the school so that it compares favorably with the best scientific and classical schools of New England. Dr. Cooke is now president of Claflin University, South Carolina.

The Faculty is at present composed of the following persons: Rev. Nathaniel Fellows, A.M., Principal, Mental and Moral Science; Mrs. A. C. Knight, Preceptress, Modern Languages; Miss Hannah D. Morill, English Literature; Charles M. Parker, A.M., Latin; William H. H. Phillips, Ph.D., Higher Mathematics; Watson F. Lamb, Commercial Department and Fine Arts; Rev. Benjamin Gill, A.M., Greek; Edward E. Kelsey, Director of Music; Joseph C. Burke, A.M., Natural Science; Charles H. Raymond, A.B., Elocution and Physical Culture; Rev. Benjamin Gill, Librarian.

The rest of this article is mainly taken from a sketch prepared by Prof. Benjamin Gill,—“Work Accomplished.” The average number of students per term for the last thirty years is at least 250. The largest number during any single term has been 358. The whole number of different persons who have attended the academy since its foundation is something over 1700. Up to 1863 about 500 graduates had entered college, and by a careful computation we may add to that number at least 170 more. Allowing that of those who graduated here from one-fourth to one-third do not go to college, the academy has probably graduated from 900 to 1000 young men. And, as the ladies average in number about one-half, there have graduated from the school about 500 ladies. The number of ladies is now about two-fifths of the whole number in attendance. This statement is, however, a very inadequate presentation of the work of the academy. The great mass of the students have not graduated, and have in the few terms they have spent here received their only academic training, and have gone from these halls to the practical work of life. They are scattered all over the continent, and one can scarcely enter a town in Massachusetts or Connecticut without finding persons occupying prominent civil and social positions who are indebted to the Wesleyan Academy for the instruction and intellectual culture which prepared them to act well their part in life.

Before the days of normal schools it had a class for the training of teachers, and for many years each winter from 50 to 80 went out to give instruction in the schools of New England. It has always been a favorite resort for mature persons whose early education has been neglected, or those who feel their need of a more extended education after they have reached the years of manhood. Perhaps more of this class came in former times, but scarcely a term passes now when there are not a number in the school who have reached the age of twenty-five. Many of these are preparing for teaching or the ministry or missionary work. With such material for students, there is of course much earnest work done, and the school has a salutary moral and religious atmosphere.

Government.—The guardianship and general management of the school is in the hands of a board of trustees, consisting of about 30 members. This body elects its own members. It meets yearly; but for cases of emergency it chooses a prudential committee, or local board, to act with full powers in the interim of the yearly sessions. This committee is composed of men who reside either in Springfield or Wilbraham, or some place easy of access to Wilbraham. To watch over its present educational growth and advancement, a visiting board is appointed by the patronizing Conferences, the New England and the New York East. The committee for term examinations is usually chosen by the teachers.

Libraries, Cabinets, etc.—There are libraries connected with the academy, and also with each of the 4 literary societies. The number of volumes is 6366.

There are several collections in the department of natural history, containing about 500 specimens of plants, 800 geological specimens, and numerous fossils; the collection of birds is especially good. The philosophical apparatus includes, among other things, a lever air-pump, a 5-inch telescope, plate electrical machine, magneto-electric and galvanic batteries, spectroscope, compound microscope, etc. The mathematical apparatus includes a fine transit instrument, compass, level, quadrant, sextant, etc. The art-room has the finest location of any in the academy, but is entirely without furnishings, save a few busts, chromos, and paintings, used as models. There is a fine hall in the music building devoted to gymnastic purposes, supplied with Indian-clubs, dumb-bells, etc., etc. A very excellent reading-room is connected with the school, abundantly supplied with dailies, weeklies, monthlies, and quarterlies, secular and religious. The music department is supplied with 10 new pianos, one a concert grand, with pipe-organs and a cabinet-organ.

Lyceums, etc.—There are four literary societies connected with the school. The oldest is the “Young Men’s Debating Club and Lyceum,” established in 1825. A scion of this is the “Union Philosophical Society,” formed in 1832. The two ladies’ societies were formed, as they now stand, in 1851. They are named “Athena” and “Pieria.” Such a pleasant rivalry has always existed between them that they have always been prosperous and thoroughly active. “Club” and “Philo” are old familiar names to all Wilbraham boys.

* Dr. Fisk was born at Brattleboro', Vt., Aug. 31, 1792. In 1823 he was made presiding elder of the Vermont District; was delegate to the General Conference in 1824, 1828, and 1832. In 1830 he was elected the first president of the Wesleyan University, at Middletown, Conn. He died of pulmonary disease, at Middletown, Feb. 22, 1838.

Bishops, doctors of divinity, clergymen, lawyers, and doctors, by hundreds, are indebted to these societies more than any other one thing in connection with the school. The training afforded by these societies has given the students a very prominent rank in elocution and forensics in the higher institutions which they have entered.

The programme of work is essentially as follows, in both ladies' and gentlemen's societies: Declamation, or select reading, debate, paper, critic's report, and miscellaneous business. The exercises are introduced with prayer, and enlivened with singing. Each society has a finely frescoed and furnished hall in the "Fisk Hall" building. Each has a cabinet-organ or piano. Their rooms are furnished with paintings, and each has a fine library.

Expenses to Students.—The catalogue says, "Necessary school expenses need not exceed $200 per year." Some of the items are as follows: Board per week, $3,—less than a term, $3.50; steam per week, 50 cents; room-rent, $2,—front rooms, $3; tuition, in common English, as a basis, $6; church sittings, etc., $2; library, 50 cents; washing, 62 cents per dozen. For natural science, languages, higher mathematics, elocution, music, business studies, and art, the tuition is extra, as is usual in such cases. Facilities for spending money outside are very few.

Trustees.—The board of trustees is now composed of the following persons: President, Hon. Edward F. Porter, West Newton; Treasurer, Rev. N. Fellows, Wilbraham; Secretary, Rev. William Rice, D.D., Springfield; John M. Merrick, Wilbraham; Robert R. Wright, Wilbraham; Rev. Edward Otheman, A.M., Chelsea; Hon. Jacob Sleeper, Boston; Rev. Loranus Crowell, D.D., Lynn; Rev. Fales H. Newhall, D.D., Saugus; Henry J. Bush, Westfield; Wilbur F. Claflin, Hopkinton; Rev. David K. Merrill, Boston; Hon. Thomas P. Richardson, Lynn; Harrison Newhall, Lynn; Horace M. Sessions, Hamden; Horace Smith, Springfield; Lewis H. Taylor, Springfield; Edwin H. Johnson, Lynn; Emerson Warner, M.D., Worcester; William H. Smith, Springfield; Rev. Joseph Cummings, D.D., LL.D., Middletown, Conn.; Rev. Daniel Steel, D.D., Lynn; Rev. Samuel F. Upham, D.D., Springfield; George L. Wright, Springfield; Rev. Asabel C. CHURCHES.

CONGREGATIONAL.

As stated elsewhere, the Rev. Noah Merrick was the first ordained pastor of the church in Wilbraham. He died Dec. 22, 1776, at the age of sixty-six years, and after a ministry of thirty-five years and six months. When the town was divided into two parishes, in 1782, Mr. Merrick had been dead six years. The North Parish at once set about the double labor of removing their meeting-house to a more central and accessible spot than Wigwam Hill, and of settling a minister. Rev. Joshua Willard was ordained the next pastor on the fourth Wednesday in May, 1787, and remained until his dismission, in 1793. After a struggle of twelve years in regard to the location of a meeting-house, a piece of land on the north side of Jonathan Merrick's lot was purchased of him for £33, and thereon was erected the meeting-house. The next regular pastor was Rev. Ezra Witter, who was ordained Aug. 16, 1797, and dismissed April 11, 1814. During his pastorate, the meeting-house was repaired, and a bell purchased, in 1802,—the first church bell in the town. Rev. Ebenezer Brown was called as the next pastor, Dec. 16, 1818, and dismissed July 5, 1827. Since Mr. Brown, the regular pastors of the church have been Rev. John Hyde, from April 18, 1828, to Oct. 20, 1831; Rev. Israel G. Rose, from 1832 to Jan. 21, 1835; Rev. John Bowers, from Dec. 13, 1837, to May 11, 1856; Rev. John P. Skeele, from Nov. 30, 1858, to April 7, 1864; Rev. Alexander D. Stowell, from May 10, 1865, to April 11, 1867. The present pastor, Rev. Martin S. Howard, was ordained Oct. 29, 1868. The old meeting-house now does service as a livery-stable, and stands near the present church structure. The house erected in its stead was destroyed by fire June 24, 1877. The present unique, tasteful, and attractive place of worship was immediately erected, at a cost of $12,000, and dedicated June 26, 1878. The present membership of the church is 230; of Sabbath-school, 150. The Sabbath-school library was lost in the fire, and has only been partially replaced.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

In 1791 the Methodist preachers on the Hartford circuit visited the South Parish once in two weeks and held meetings in the school-house. These were the first meetings of that branch of the Christian Church held in the town. Later in the year Rev. Lemuel Smith preached the first Methodist sermon in the North Parish, at the house of Charles Brewer, and for two years services were held in the same place once in two weeks. Charles Brewer, Abel Bliss, Silas Bliss, and Mrs. Solomon Warriner were among those who joined the first Methodist class. In the year 1793 the first meeting-house was raised and covered, but not finished till 1814. During these years it was only furnished with rough slab seats.

Sept. 4, 1794, the New England Conference, consisting then of about a dozen members, convened in the new chapel, and again held its session in the same place in the year 1797.

The first corporate meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Society was organized under a warrant issued by Wm. Knight, Esq., at the petition of Abraham Avery and ten others, and was held in the Methodist meeting-house, Aug. 29, 1832. May 19, 1835, a new meeting-house, which had been erected at a cost of nearly $3000, raised by subscription to shares of stock, was dedicated by the Rev. Wilbur Fisk, D.D. It was in size 42 by 60 feet, with a tower, and is now used as a music hall and gymnasium by Wesleyan Academy. The original meeting-house is south of the present church, and is used as a dwelling. Until the year 1823 the church formed a part of the "Tolland circuit," since that time it has usually been a station by itself.

Memorial Methodist Episcopal Church.—The handsome brown-stone structure at present used by the society was erected in 1870, at a cost of over $30,000. The present membership of the church is 200. A Sabbath-school of about 80 is connected with the church; another exists at East Wilbraham, and another in connection with the academy. The Sabbath-school library comprises about 450 volumes.

The following ministers have been appointed to this church:

1791, Menzies Raynor; 1791-94, Lemuel Smith; 1792, Hope Hull, F. Aldridge; 1793-74, George Pickering; 1793, Joshua Hall; 1795, Nicholas Snethen, Christopher Spry; 1796, Eben Rogers, Thomas Coope; 1797-98, Lawrence McCombs; 1799, Daniel Ostrander; 1800, Abner Wood; 1801, Henry Eames; 1801-3, Augustus Jocelyn; 1802-3, Elijah Patchelor; 1802, Alexander McLane; 1804, John Gove; 1805, Noble W. A small chapel at East Wilbraham was recently erected by the Methodist Episcopal Society, at a cost of about $800, and services are held there by local preachers and general supplies. A Sabbath-school of about 30 is connected with the enterprise.

Grace Chapel is located at North Wilbraham, and is owned and controlled by members of the different evangelical churches resident there, though adhering more closely to the Congregational form of worship. It is supplied by the Rev. Mr. Howard, of the Congregational Church, and others. It has a congregation of about 100, and a Sabbath-school of about 65.

BAPTISTS.

This religious society first entered Wilbraham at the North village in 1765, organized a church in 1768, ordained the Rev. Seth Clark as pastor in 1770, and in 1779 built a meeting-house in the pine grove, near the house of John Powell. In 1802 the society reported 228 members, but afterward declined, and in 1807 was reported to have "lost its visibility." Occasional preaching was had in the meeting-house until about 1830. In 1833 the house was destroyed by fire.

The Glendale Church was organized about 1868. Dr. Cook, formerly principal of Wilbraham Academy, was instrumental in its organization, and was at one time its pastor. The membership is at present small, probably about 75, but the society is quite flourishing.

BURIAL-PLACES.

The oldest place of interment in the town is what is known as the Centre Cemetery, which lies about a mile south of the village. It was laid out over one hundred years ago, and contains about three acres of land. The oldest stone in the yard, and the first erected in the town, is that of Elizabeth Cockril, who died April 26, 1741. Other early monuments are those of Mary Warner, who died June 6, 1754; Miriam, wife of Ezra Barker, who died May 26, 1754; Mary, wife of Isaac Brewer, who died May 20, 1759; Timothy Merrick, who died Aug. 7, 1761; David Merrick, who died Nov. 30, 1757; Noah Alvord, who died Sept. 1, 1763; Moses Colton, who died Feb. 24, 1777; Nathaniel Bliss, who died Nov. 5, 1782; Jesse Warner, who died Feb. 20, 1784; Nathaniel Warriner, who died Jan. 10, 1780; Abel Bliss, who died April 30, 1762; Samuel Warner, who died Sept. 10, 1787; and Isaac Brewer, who died May 19, 1788. The yard is still in use.

The cemetery at East Wilbraham, comprising two or three acres, was laid out about sixty years ago, and was formerly used in connection with the old Baptist Church. The first person buried there was a Shaw, but he had no gravestone, as there were woods there at the time and a public road passed through it. The oldest stones in the yard are those of Caleb Stebbins, Jr., who died March 28, 1787, aged forty-six years, and Caleb Stebbins, who died Feb. 22, 1796, at the age of eighty-six.

The Woodland Dell Cemetery is pleasantly located near and east of the central village, and is the principal and most attractive place of burial in the town. The grounds now occupied by the cemetery, comprising ten acres and a half, were first purchased by R. R. Wright, H. B. Brewer, and John M. Merrick, at a cost of $1100. They are under the control of an association, which was organized under the general statutes Feb. 12, 1858. A board of trustees, nine in number, is chosen annually, and has the care of the property. The first burial in these grounds was Louisa W. Wright, wife of R. R. Wright, who died Dec. 26, 1851.

The President of the association is Robert R. Wright; Vice-President, George W. Ely; Clerk and Treasurer, John M. Merrick; Trustees, Robert R. Wright, J. M. Merrick, H. H. Burbank, Job W. Green, Dr. Stebbins Foskit, Orrin Daggett, Calvin G. Robbins, George W. Ely, E. B. Brewer.

NOTES.

The first potatoes were taken into Wilbraham by Deacon Nathaniel Warriner, about 1754. Broom-corn was first raised by Thomas Jones or Joshua Leonard. Plaster of paris or gypsum was first brought from West Springfield by Gad Lamb, about 1776. Calvin Stebbins brought the first plow with iron mold-board into town, and Daniel Isham used the first cast-iron plow.

It was considered disreputable in early times for farmers to go after shad. They were said by their neighbors to be "out of pork." Hence, persons going after shad went in the morning before their neighbors were up, and returned after they had retired.

The first frame house was built by Oliver Bliss in 1786. Log houses were occupied till nearly 1800. Lieut. Paul Langdon brought the first wagon into town. In 1784 there were but two two-horse wagons and five two-horse sleighs. In 1804, Jesse or Pliny Bliss introduced a one-horse wagon. The first buffalo robe was brought from Montreal in 1805, and cost $5. Lewis Langdon invented a machine for turning cider-mill screws; Walter Burt, shears for cutting the nap of cloth; Edwin Chaffee, the use of India-rubber preparations for cloth.

David Chapin brought the first rat to the town in a sack of wool from Rhode Island. Capt. Charles Sessions introduced merino sheep, and had a large flock. Capt. Joseph Lathrop and sons introduced Saxony sheep, and kept a flock of several hundred.

The legend of "Kibbe's shirt" is based upon the fact that a man named Kibbe, having discharged his gun at some game on Sunday, and, fearing punishment therefor, took off his shirt and shot a hole through it, alleging that he had been fired at by two Indians, which caused great alarm. The fact that no corresponding hole was found on Kibbe led to his detection and confession.

The history of the town would not seem to be complete without introducing the "Elegy of the Mountains," a piece of American doggerel which had its origin and incidents in Wilbraham in 1761, and which has had a more extensive circulation and reprint than any piece of like nature in the country. The original is as follows, depicting the tragic fate of a young man bitten by a rattlesnake, and is said to have been composed by the young lady to whom the victim of the tragedy, who lies buried in the town, was engaged.* It is often sung to the tune of "Old Hundred" and others.

"On Springfield mountains there did dwell
A likely youth who was knowne full well,
Lieutenant Mirick only sone,
A likely youth, nigh twenty-one.

"One friday morning he did go in to the meadow, and did mow
A round or two, then he did feal
A pisin serpent at his heal.

"When he received his deadly wound
he dropt his sithe a pon the ground,
And strate for home was his intent,
Caling aloude stil as he went.

* Other "authors" to whom it is ascribed are Daniel and Jesse Carpenter and Nathan Torrey, the latter with some plausibility.

"though all around his joys was hered, but none of his friends to him appeared;
they tho't it wase some workmen call'd, and there poor Timothy alone must fall.

"So soon his Careful father went to seek his son with discontent, and there his fond, onley son he found,
ded as a stone a pon the ground.

"And there he lay down sopose to rest, with both his hands Acrost his brest,
his mouth and eyes Closed fast,
And there, poor man, he slept his last.

"his father vicude his track with great consarn,
Where he had ran across the corn;
uneven tracks where he did go did apcar to stagger to and frow.

"The seventh of August, sixty-one,
this fatal axident was done.
Let this a warning be to all,
to be Prepared when God does call."

There were five slaves in the town. Rev. Noah Merrick had three,—Oronoke, Scipio, and Luke; David Merrick had Caesar, and Capt. John Shaw one.

The murder of Marcus Lyon, by Dominick Daly and James Halligan, on Nov. 9, 1805, occurred in Wilbraham, on the Springfield turnpike, near Sikes' Tavern. It is known as one of the earliest committed in the region, and for it Daly and Halligan were subsequently convicted and hung at Northampton.

INDUSTRIAL PURSUITS.

For many years after the settlement of the town no saw-mill existed within its limits. The earliest were erected within the present limits of the town of Hampden, where the principal manufacturing has always been carried on. In 1762 the town gave Caleb Stebbins, of Wilbraham, and Joseph Miller, of Ludlow, a deed of four acres of the "ministry lot," on Twelve-Mile Brook, as a site for a grist-mill, which Stebbins there erected, and which was the first enterprise of its kind established within the present confines of the town. The first carding-machine was brought into town from Mendon, in 1803, by A. Worthen, who placed it in a building erected by Jonathan Kilborn on the site of the present factory on Twelve-Mile Brook, by the side of Stebbins' mill. Fulling-mills and carding-machines were soon erected in other parts of the town. Thomas and Hervey Howard erected a tannery at an early day on the road from the street to Stony Hill, and Abraham Avery had one near his residence.

The principal occupation of the inhabitants of Wilbraham has always been the cultivation of the land, which in many sections of the town proves very productive, and, as a consequence, remunerative to the farmers. The leading manufacturing enterprises of the town at present are the Collins Manufacturing Company, the grain-mills at North Wilbraham, and the mill of Ellis Bros., at the North village, or Buttrville. The latter privilege has been utilized by various enterprises for many years, the factory of Gates & Nelson, near the Ellis mill, formerly turning out many thousand yards of low-grade satinet. Dr. Marcus Shearer had a saw- and grist-mill there about seventy years ago, which was run for him by Benjamin Butler for many years, after whom the place was named.

THE COLLINS MANUFACTURING COMPANY, having extensive works at North Wilbraham, was organized as a joint-stock company, in February, 1872, with a capital of $200,000, under the name of the Collins Paper Company. It continued to do business under that name until Feb. 29, 1876, when the name was changed to the Collins Manufacturing Company, and the capital was increased to $300,000. The present officers of the company are Chester W. Chapin, President; William K. Baker, Treasurer; Henry K. Baker, Agent.

The present handsome mill is run by the water-power furnished by the Chicopee, and is used in the manufacture of fine writing-paper, of which about four tons a day are produced. The enterprise furnishes employment to about 175 persons, receiving monthly about $5000 in wages.

THE ELLIS MILL

was erected by Dwight W. Ellis (the owner of another extensive mill in Monson), about twelve years ago, as a woolen-mill, and was built upon the site of a smaller one which he had previously run, and which was destroyed by fire. Stillman Ellis, a brother of Dwight W., has since become associated in the enterprise, and under the name of D. W. Ellis & Bro. the firm are now engaged in the manufacture of fancy cassimeres, of which about 500 yards a day are produced. The mill is a two-set mill, contains 16 looms, 2 sets of cards, and furnishes employment to about 38 persons.

THE NORTH WILBRAHAM GRAIN-MILLS.

The erection of these mills was commenced in the fall and winter of 1876, and the mills first started in the spring of 1877. They are run by S. N. Cutler & Co., who first carried on the business in Ashland as early as 1845, but, desiring a better site, established themselves in the present location. The mills contain five run of stone and use about 150 horse-power, supplementing the water-power furnished by the Chicopee with steam. The production of meal is 2000 bags, or 4000 bushels a day, the grain being sent in large quantities from different points in the West. A large part of the business also consists in bagging grain and jobbing it, of which about 275 car-loads a month are shipped from the mills. Employment is furnished to about 25 men, who receive in wages about $1500 a month.

MILITARY.

From the earliest date the town of Wilbraham has taken an active part in the military events of the times. Capt. Samuel Day, Lieut. Thomas Merrick, and Ens. Abel Bliss were commissioned as officers before 1754, and for the French war, which raged during this period, 1755-60, the precinct furnished at least 22 men, whose names are enrolled in the archives of the State as among the patriots of that early day. The names of these soldiers are John Langdon, Timothy Wright, Philip Lyon, William King, Jr., Daniel Cadwell, Paul Langdon, Isaac Colton, Aaron Bliss, Aaron Alvord, Benjamin Warriner, Samuel Warner, Benjamin Wright, Aaron Warriner, Stephen Bliss, Jesse Warner, Aaron Parsons, Benoni Atchinson, Moses Bartlett, Thomas Dunham, Paul Hitchcock, Samuel Warner, Sr., Samuel Warner, Jr., Moses Warriner.

In the stirring times of the Revolution the town proved staunch and true to the principles of liberty. Stebbins, and delivered in the form of an address on the occasion of the centennial celebration of the town, in 1863. Valuable assistance has also been afforded by John M. Merrick, Esq., E. B. Gates, and other citizens of the town, including the several pastors of the churches.

MONSON.

GEOGRAPHICAL.

THE town of Monson is situated in the southeastern part of the county of Hampden, and is the western and most important section of the original town of Brimfield. It is bounded north by Palmer, east by Brimfield and Wales, west by Wilbraham, all in Hampden County, and south by Stafford, Conn. It is about eight miles in length, from north to south, and five and a half miles in width, from east to west. Its area is about 44 square miles, or 28,160 acres.

* Of these McElwean and McMaster were from Palmer.

† Some few were credited to the city of Springfield.

NATURAL FEATURES.

The general character of the soil is good. A narrow valley extends the entire length of the town, from north to south, diversified by rich meadow-land, ridges of sand, and rocky outcroppings. East and west of this valley are ranges of hills, running north and south, possessing a productive soil, suitable for grazing and tillage. East of Grout's Hill, formerly called King's Hill, lies in the northeastern section of the town, and is a landmark of great interest.‡ South of it is Moulton Hill. West of Moulton Hill lies Cedar Swamp Mountain.

‡ The first town-plat of Brimfield was laid out on this hill.

Chicopee, or West Hill, is the principal elevation in the west part of the town, while Bald Peak, its northern extremity, Packard Mountain on the south, and Black Rock and Moose Mountain on the western border, stand as sentinels guarding the approaches to the town.

Chicopee Brook flows through the centre of the valley, having its rise near the Stafford line, and flowing northward to the Chicopee River. Its water-power is extensively used for manufacturing purposes. Other streams traverse the eastern and western sections of the town. Twelve-Mile Brook is a stream of some importance in the northwestern part, while minor streams are found in various localities.

RAILROADS.

The town has been greatly benefited by the railroads. The Boston and Albany road passes through its northern section. In 1850 the New London and Northern Railroad was built through the centre of the town, north and south, affording excellent shipping facilities to the already important manufacturing enterprises of the place, and opening to some of them markets before out of reach.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

Monson was originally included within the limits of the town of Brimfield; and in the history of that town will be found many facts relating to the early settlement of what is now the town of Monson.

The settlement, in 1657,* of Richard Fellows, in the north part of the town, near the junction of Chicopee Brook with Chicopee River, and the establishment by him of a tavern at that place for a short time, is often stated as the first settlement of Monson. This was, however, nearly fifty years prior to the permanent settlement, as his stay was but temporary. The petition of Fellows was as follows:

"That the General Court at Boston grant him Two Hundred Acres of upland & Meadow to be laid to George Colton & Benj. Cooley, on Chicopee River, to be Rate free under the following condition: Build a House suitable to entertain travellers, man & Beast, with lodging and food, with Beer, Wine, & strong liquors, provide they Build within one Year & Maintain & Entertain travellers for Seven Years."

It was granted Oct. 23, 1657. Fellows established his tavern, but finally abandoned it from fear of the Indians, whose depredations caused him much uneasiness and alarm. He buried some of his farming-tools, which were found many years after in plowing a field by Capt. James Merriek, much injured by rust.

Although the conditions of the grant, in point of continuance, were not complied with, yet Fellows† held and sold the land. It afterward passed into the possession of Gov. Hutchinson's family, from whom the Woods family, of Monson, obtained it, and occupied it for many years.

Between sixty and seventy years ago the remains of an Indian were found upon the land. He was apparently buried in a sitting position, accompanied by his gun and a bottle of rum, in true aboriginal style. The rum had lost its flavor, and the gun was much injured by rust. He appeared to have been a man of extraordinary stature, and from the manner of his burial is supposed to have been a chief.

The first permanent settler to locate in Monson was Robert Olds,‡ one of the original Brimfield proprietors. He was born at Windsor, Conn., Oct. 9, 1670, and was the son of Robert and Susannah Hanford Olds. He went to Monson from Springfield about the year 1715, and occupied the land afterward owned by Royal Merriek.

About one-ninth of the proprietors of Brimfield settled in the west part of the township. Soon after Robert Olds, came Ezra and Samuel King, Benjamin Munn, John Keep, John Atchinson, Mark Ferry, Daniel Killam, Obadiah Cooley, and Samuel Kilborn.

Ezra King had a house and grist-mill on Elbow Brook, and a house on King's Hill, south of the GROUT school-house. Samuel King lived near Ezra, on the Sylvanus King place. His son Samuel was the first clerk of the district of Monson. Sylvanus King is a grandson of the original Samuel.

Benjamin Munn lived at the northern extremity of King's Hill, on the premises now occupied by Edson Walker. His sons, Reuben and Jeremy Munn, lived near each other in the same neighborhood, and were farmers. Reuben was an early clerk of the district, and was also a colonel in the militia. He engaged in the suppression of Shays' rebellion. He was grandfather to the wife of Joseph L. Reynolds.

John Keep located on the westerly side of King's Hill, on the Daniel Carpenter place, about a mile east of the village. John Atchenson located on King's Hill, south of Ezra King's house-lot. Daniel Killam located on Chicopee Brook, but the exact location remains in doubt.

The rights of other proprietors were taken up by their children, and sold to different persons. Some whose rights laid in the east part of Brimfield sold or exchanged them, and removed to the west part of the town. Among these were Capt. David Hitchcock and Thomas Stebbins, the latter of whom settled in Monson about 1734. Capt. James Merriek purchased land in Monson about the same time, and made an actual settlement in 1735. Josiah Keep was another early settler. The names of Shaw, Hoar, Warner, Warriner, Chandler, Fuller, Haynes, Jennings, and Moulton likewise occur early in the settlement of Monson.

Later settlers were Abner Brown, who was a man of influence and station, as early as 1798. He represented the district for thirteen successive terms in the General Court, and did considerable business as a justice of the peace for a number of years. He formerly lived about two miles west of the centre of the town, but in later years moved into the village and resided just north of the meeting-house. During the greater part of his life he engaged in farming.

Abijah Newell was born in Roxbury, Mass., entered the matrimonial state at Dudley, and took up his residence at Monson about the year 1740. He lived southwest of the central village, where Eli Rogers now resides. He was a farmer by occupation, and had six sons and six daughters. All of these removed from town except Abijah, who remained with his father on the old farm until the latter's death, in 1807, and afterward occupied the place until the end of his life. He married Nancy Burt, of Longmeadow, who was born, however, in Monson in 1760. They had ten children, of whom only three were sons. Austin, still a resident of the town, was born Oct. 17, 1798.

Abel Goodell lived on East Hill, about two miles from the centre, where Charles Carpenter now resides, as early as 1781. He was a farmer, and is said to have been the first justice of the peace commissioned in Monson.

David Hyde lived in the north part of the town in 1796, and was a man of wealth and influence. He owned a saw- and grist-mill on the Palmer side of the Quabog River, and was there drowned in 1806.

Stephen Newton came from Hardwicke in 1789. In 1790 he married Susannah Davidson, who came from Pomfret. He was a carpenter by trade, and located where Hiram Newton now lives. His children were Voltaire, Lemuel D., Lucius F., Freeman, Hiram, and Selim. The latter two were twins, and, what is somewhat remarkable, Selim lived to be over sixty, and Hiram is still living at the age of eighty. Lucius F. is also living. Hiram has in his possession an old concordance that was printed in London in 1658, and that has been in the family for one hundred and fifty years; also an old copy of John Johnson's arithmetic, printed in London in 1657, besides other interesting relics of the olden time.

* See history of Brimfield.

† This name is sometimes written Fellis. Others claim that the name should be Weller.

‡ In the Windsor records this name is variously spelled,—Old, Olds, and Ould.

Other early settlers were Simeon Keep, who lived about a mile east of the village as early as 1780, and was a farmer; Jonathan Chapin, who lived about two miles and a half southwest of the village, and engaged in a like occupation as early as 1778; Stephen Warriner, an influential farmer, in the northwest part, early in the present century; Joshua Shaw, who resided in the southwest part; John Shield, who lived on the road to Palmer, about a mile from the village, probably as early as 1785, and who established and carried on a grist-mill on the site of the present North factory, in which occupation his son, David L., succeeded him; Aaron Merrick, who lived near Fellows' tavern; and Joseph, his brother, who resided on what is known as the Toby place, both at early dates.

TAVERNS.

The earliest tavern that existed in Monson was that of Richard Fellows, to which reference has already been made. The next one was kept by Richard Bishop, at least as early as 1762, in a gambrel-roofed house, which stood near where the barn of Cyrus W. Holmes now is. It was probably one of the earliest buildings in the town, and was taken down in 1820. The first district-meeting of Monson was held there. In 1775, Joseph Merrick kept a tavern on the Toby place, half a mile northeast of the centre. William Norcross built a tavern where Green's hotel now is, in 1796. He kept it until 1803 or 1804, when it was kept for upward of forty years by his son Amos. Its more recent history is elsewhere alluded to. Jesse Stebbins kept a tavern in the north part of the town early in the present century.

ROADS.

The first important road laid out in the town was in 1738, and was a continuation of one laid out in Brimfield in 1737. It crossed south over Grout's Hill, and continued down into Stafford, Conn. In the same year a road was laid out from Grout's Hill to the centre of the town, connecting with the one last mentioned. In 1782 a road was laid from Cedar Swamp, in the south part of Monson, to South Pond, in Wales. In 1739 a direct road was laid out from the centre of Monson to the old road running to Springfield, which traversed the northeastern section of the town.

MERCHANTS.

The first store was kept by Asa Moulton, as early as 1760, on Moulton Hill, where Lewis King now lives. The building was erected in 1757, and is very old. Probably the oldest in town is the house built by David Hitchcock, about 1730, which is at present occupied by Alfred Wallace.

An old building stood on the present site of Fowler's store, in the latter part of the last century, in which Wm. Norcross kept store for a number of years. It was removed in 1810, and Joel Norcross then erected the present structure, and traded there in connection with Timothy Packard, who subsequently kept it alone, or in connection with his son, William, for a long period of time. Stephen Toby, E. B. Miles, E. E. Towne, and the present proprietor, Charles Fowler, have since traded there.

In 1820, Artemus Wetherill had a store at the North factory, which was afterward kept by Sanford & Wetherill. James W. Hale engaged in trade there about 1825. Wm. B. Converse, Albert Norcross, and E. E. Towne each kept store there at one time, and before them the Hampden Cotton-Manufacturing Company. Rogers & Co. are now in trade there.

About the same time Rufus Flynt kept a store on the hill above the post-office, north of the meeting-house. Associated with him afterward were Dr. Ede Whittaker and William Clark. Albert Norcross and Horatio Lyon and Lyon & Brigham kept there subsequently.

In 1832-33, Dr. Oliver McKinstry erected the store now occupied by Gage Brothers in the south end of the village.

It was established during the Masonic excitement, and was designed to accommodate those opposed to the principles of that order. But the enterprise is said to have never attained a great measure of success. A Mr. Strong succeeded Dr. McKinstry as proprietor. Lucius F. Newton traded there for a few years, and George and John Newton in turn. The latter died in 1871, and Feb. 9, 1872, Alvin A. Gage, one of the present proprietors, purchased the establishment of the Newton heirs. In 1874 he associated his brother, Carlos M., with him, and the two are now carrying on the business as the firm of Gage Brothers.

Rice S. Munn and Whitney B. King had a store about twenty-five years ago where C. E. Bills now trades. Mr. Munn erected the building, and kept store there alone, or in connection with Wm. B. Converse, after the death of Whitney B. King. Chapin Brothers followed next, and then Mr. Bills, the present proprietor.

Within a few years, Albert Norcross has erected a neat, new store, northwest of Green's hotel, in the north part of the village. After keeping store there for a time, he sold the business to Frank H. King, the present proprietor.

PHYSICIANS.

Of the early physicians, Dr. Ede Whittaker came from Stafford in 1790, and engaged in practice until about 1840. He first lived and practiced in the house just north of the store of Gage Brothers. He then erected the house where Rev. Charles Hammond lived prior to his death, and resided there for a long time. It was afterward remodeled by Mr. Hammond.

Dr. Joseph Grout practiced in the east part of the town about 1785; also a Dr. Anderson about the same time.

Dr. Ephraim Allen was a contemporary of Dr. Whittaker, and perhaps preceded him in point of time a few years. His residence was on the road above the meeting-house, leading to the Flynt quarry.

Dr. Oliver McKinstry came from Ellington, Conn., about 1820, and practiced until his death, in 1845. About the same time Dr. Reuben Gardner, a son of Richard Gardner, and a native of the town, engaged in practice. He and Dr. McKinstry engaged in business transactions together to some extent. Dr. Gardner subsequently removed from town, and died in the State of Ohio about the same time that Dr. McKinstry died at Monson.

In 1817, Dr. Ware practiced for a short time. Dr. Cullen Carter was in practice in 1837.

In 1838 a Dr. Haywood came from Vermont, and remained two or three years in practice at Monson. Dr. Isaac Carpenter also came from Vermont about 1836, and practiced until his death, in 1839. Soon after came Dr. Alvin Smith, who is still in practice. His son, Homer A., is associated with him.

Dr. George E. Fuller practiced in Brimfield for two years, but located in Monson in the year 1868. He has continued in successful practice ever since.

ATTORNEYS.

The first lawyer who settled in Monson was Deodatus Dutton, who engaged in practice about 1812. His office was where Dr. Alvin Smith now resides. The town records contain a petition from him asking permission to erect an office on a part of the common. The request appears to have been granted, but the office is not known to have been erected. Mr. Dutton subsequently removed to the State of New York.

George Bliss, Jr., practiced in Monson in 1816. He soon after removed to Springfield, where he became a leading member of the Bar. He was subsequently identified with the Western Railroad, and was at different times speaker of the House of Representatives and president of the Senate.

Erasmus Norcross was a native of Monson, and engaged in practice in 1823, the year that he was admitted a member of the Bar. Richard Bliss, a nephew of George Bliss, Jr., is also said to have practiced in the town for a time.

Reuben Atwater Chapman commenced practice in Monson in 1827, and remained there until 1829, when he removed to the town of Ware. He subsequently engaged in practice in Springfield. In 1868 he was appointed to fill the vacancy in the chief-justiceship occasioned by the death of Chief-Justice Bigelow, and continued to fulfill the duties of the office until his death, June 28, 1873.

The only practicing lawyer at present in Monson is Charles R. Dudley, who located in August, 1878.

ORGANIZATION.

June 7, 1759, the people living in the western part of Brimfield petitioned to be set off as a district. (See Massachusetts Archives, cxvii., 500.) Joseph Blodgett, the representative from Brimfield in that year, was instructed to present the town's objections to this division of its territory and population;* but his efforts were of no avail, and on April 25, 1760, Monson was incorporated as a district.

The following is a copy of the warrant authorizing the first town-meeting for the election of officers:

"HAMPSHIRE, ss.

"To Samuel King, of Monson District, in the County aforesd, Gentleman, Greeting:

"In his Majesty's Name you are hereby Required to Notifie & Warn the Inhabitants of sd Monson quallified to Vote in town affairs, that they meet & assemble themselves together at the house of M^r Samuel King, in sd Monson, on Monday, the 9th Day of June next, at twelve of y^e Clock on sd Day, then and there to Elect & Chuse all Such officers as Shall be necessary to Manage the affairs of sd District. Dated at Brimfield the 28th Day of May, and 33rd year of His Majesty's Reign, annoq^{ue} Domini 1760.

"JOHN SHERMAN, Just. Pace."

The following indorsement appears on the back of this warrant:

"By virtue of this warrant I have warned the Inhabitants of Monson District according to the Direction of y^e warrant.

"SAM'L KING."†

The district continued, however, to be united with Brimfield in the choice of a representative. The name was conferred on the town by the royal Governor, Pownall, in honor of one of his friends, Monson, the president of the board of trade. Monson was incorporated as a town Oct. 20, 1775.

At the time of the incorporation of the district there were but 49 families within its limits. Three of these were tenants and one a colored family. The names of the others were J. Shields, Lieut. T. Stebbins, Capt. J. Merrick, Nathaniel Munn, J. Frost, J. Ferry, Capt. D. Hitchcock, Nathan Smith, Joseph Keep, R. Bishop, Samuel King, Thomas King, Ebenezer Merrick, Jabez Keep, Nicholas Graves, F. Sikes, B. Munn, B. Munn, Jr., Nathaniel Fuller, Joseph Moulton, John Davis, Jonas Mace, James Blodgett, Daniel Warner, Jacob Kibbee, Humphrey Gardner, Thomas Blodgett, Robert Dunkley, Joseph Shaw, Josiah Bliss, Edward Hoar, Stephen Wood, Ebenezer Wood, D. Wood, J. Wood, Ebenezer Bliss, J. Foot, J. Colton, James Shaw, Samuel Kilborn, William Gold, A. Graves, S. Hatch, M. Ferry, and Phineas Merrick.

The first annual meeting of the new district was held March 16, 1762, at the house of Richard Bishop. Lieut. Thomas Stebbins was chosen moderator.

In 1763 the inhabitants found it necessary to petition the General Court for leave to lay a tax of 2*d.* per acre on all the land in the district for two years, to meet the extra expenses of erecting a meeting-house and supporting preaching. Leave was granted to levy a tax of 1*d.* per acre.

Nov. 5, 1798, $60 was appropriated to "revive singing."

* See petition of date Jan. 10, 1760, on file in Mass. Archives, cxvii., 503.

† Tradition says the meeting, called as above, was held in the log house of Mr. Samuel King, then living where his great-grandson, Sylvanus King, now does, or nearly on the same spot, about one and a half miles east of the present centre of the town. No record of this meeting has been preserved.

VILLAGES.

The town virtually contains but one village, located in the centre, and extending about two miles north and south. Its two extremities are designated as North and South Monson. It is principally laid out on one street, which constitutes the direct road from Palmer to Stafford, Conn. Beautiful residences, surrounded by attractive gardens elegantly inclosed, stand on either side of the street, and an appearance of thrift and quiet retirement characterizes the place. Dr. Holland, in his history of Western Massachusetts, has well said:

"The valley and the stream, the hills on the right and left, and the rising grounds in the centre, when covered with the green foliage of summer, and contrasted with the neat white buildings of the inhabitants in their irregular position, exhibit to the eye a scene of beautiful and varied perspective which no one who loves nature, when mingled with the works of men, can be weary in surveying."

The village contains a Congregational, Methodist, and Catholic Church, each tasteful in appearance, and occupying excellent sites. Monson Academy is situated in the centre, and is an institution of character and standing. The Monson National Bank building, also situated near the centre, is a small but neat and substantial structure. Stores and manufacturing exist in different parts of the village, many of which are elsewhere referred to. The town-clock occupies the tower of the Congregational Church. Five hundred dollars were appropriated for its purchase on April 6, 1874.

HOTELS.

There are two hotels in the village. The Cushman House was erected by Leonard G. Cushman about 1871, and has been kept continuously by him since. It is situated near the centre of the village, on the west side of the street.

Green's Hotel is situated near the depot, in the northern part of the village, and is the natural descendant of the old Norcross Hotel referred to in the chapter on settlement. After Amos Norcross, it was kept by Lucius E. Truesdell. It was then kept by the advocates of the temperance cause for a long time; then in turn by Amasa King and Parks & Thayer. It came into the possession of Daniel G. Green, the present proprietor, in 1872, who at first leased it to different parties, but for over a year past has kept it himself.

POST-OFFICE.

A post-office exists in the village, and was established about 1821. Capt. Rufus Flynt was the first postmaster, and the mail was carried to Palmer Centre on horseback. The office has been since filled by Edwin Norcross, Timothy Packard, Foster Pepper, Lucius Truesdell, Joshua Tracy, Elmer B. Miles, Daniel G. Potter, Edwin E. Towne, and Rice S. Munn, the present incumbent.

About two and one-half miles from the village, in the north-east part of the town, lies the poor-farm. It comprises about 300 acres of land, with excellent farm-buildings, and was purchased with the surplus revenue fund distributed to the various towns during the administration of Martin Van Buren. It is sustained by the town, and the number of paupers in charge of the institution averages 15.

SCHOOLS.

Soon after the incorporation of the district, provision was made, though in a humble way, for the establishment and support of schools. At first only three schools were sustained, and these for a part of the year only. In the year 1771 the town was divided into nine school districts. The district system prevailed until its abolition by legislative enactment in 1870. Various sums have been appropriated for the support of the schools at different times. In 1765 but £10 were appropriated for that purpose; in 1768, £20; in 1769, £25; in 1798, $500; in 1801, $600; in 1814, $800; in 1844, $1100; in 1861, $1800; and in 1867, $3000. The amount of the last annual appropriation was $5000. In addition to this sum the school fund is further augmented by the State appropriation, and by a considerable annual sum raised by the taxation of dogs. There are at present 13 public schools in the town, having in attendance 553 scholars, of various ages. The total cost of these for the year ending March 31, 1878, was $4324.22, an average of $7.82 for each pupil. Of the twenty-one towns in Hampden County, Monson ranks twelfth in the amount of money appropriated for each child between five and fifteen years of age.

According to the laws of the State regulating school matters, Monson is compelled to sustain a high school. This provision is complied with by an arrangement between the town and Monson Academy, whereby the latter is made to sustain the relation of such a school to the public schools of the town. Pupils who pass through the latter are admitted, after careful examination, to the advantages of the academy, the town paying the cost of instruction. For the year ending May 31, 1878, the number of pupils in attendance upon the high school was 65; average term attendance, 45; number admitted during the year, 16; total cost of tuition, $1113.50.

MONSON ACADEMY.*

Monson Academy was incorporated June 21, 1804, with an endowment of half a township of land in Maine, in accordance with the educational policy adopted by the resolutions concerning academies passed by the Legislature, Feb. 27, 1797.

The academy (erected by subscriptions of citizens of the town amounting to about $4000) was dedicated Oct. 23, 1806, when a sermon was preached by Rev. Richard S. Storrs, of Longmeadow, one of the original trustees.

* By Rev. James Tufts.

The trustees named in the charter were 15 in number, and 70 have since been elected as their successors.

The persons named in the charter as trustees were Rev. John Willard, D.D., of Stafford, Conn.; Rev. Jesse Ives, Joel Norcross, Esq., Rufus Flynt, Esq., Dr. Ede Whittaker, Abel Goodale, Esq., Gad Colton, Esq., and Azel Utley, Esq., residents of Monson; Rev. Richard S. Storrs, of Longmeadow; Rev. Ephraim Ward, of West Brookfield; Rev. Ezra Witter, of North Wilbraham; Rev. Moses Warren, of South Wilbraham; Aaron Smith, Esq., of Palmer; Rev. Moses Baldwin, of Palmer; and Darius Munger, Esq., of South Brimfield, now Wales.

The following persons, in their order, have been elected presidents of the corporation to the present time (1879): Rev. John Willard, D.D.; Rev. Ephraim Ward, Rev. Moses Warren, Rev. Alfred Ely, D.D.; Rev. Joseph Vail, D.D.; Rev. Abram Marsh, Rev. N. E. P. Perkins, D.D.

Of the above, Dr. Ely, pastor of the Congregational Church in Monson nearly sixty years, was a trustee of Monson Academy fifty-nine, and president of its board of trustees forty-six, performing its duties with great fidelity, wisdom, and dignity. He took a deep interest in the prosperity of the academy, assisting in the selection of its teachers, attending the examinations, and was chiefly instrumental in raising the educational fund of the academy, which has contributed so much to its prosperity.

Many able and distinguished men have served as trustees from time to time, among whom were Joseph Vail, D.D.; Alvan Bond, D.D.; Lyman Coleman, D.D.; Rev. Condit, D.D.; Joseph S. Clark, D.D.; Hon. R. A. Chapman, chief-justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts; S. C. Bartlett, D.D., president of Dartmouth College; Charles Merriam, Esq., of Springfield; and the late Judge Samuel T. Spaulding, of Northampton. The trustees have uniformly taken a deep interest in the academy, and contributed greatly to its prosperity.

The first principal, Dr. Colton, was trustee ten years while pastor of the Congregational Church at Palmer; was principal of the academy ten years in two terms of service; was a man of good judgment, great energy, self-sacrifice, and enthusiasm, and did much to give a decided character to the academy in its early years. He died at Ashboro', N. C., in 1868, aged eighty-four years.

Under the administration of Mr. Fairchild and Mr. Lawton,—three years each,—the school was highly prosperous, as also under the four years of Mr. Austin.

Under the seven years' administration of Mr. Tufts there was a large number of advanced pupils, in both the English and classical departments. Over 60 students were prepared for college, and more attention was given to drawing and music. The average number of pupils was over 100, and most of them were older pupils from out of town.

The academy has always been distinguished for its excellent moral and religious influence. During these seven years, no year passed without its special religious interest, and seldom a term, making the discipline of the school easy. In the fall of 1854 over 30 pupils indulged a hope, and united afterward with various churches. Mr. Tufts, who left the school in 1859, on account of his health, has resided in Monson to the present time (1879), teaching a family school for boys.

Charles Hammond, LL.D., was born at Union, Conn., in 1813, graduated at Yale in 1839, and served as principal of Monson Academy twenty-five years, and eleven years (from 1852 to 1863) as principal of Lawrence Academy, at Groton, Mass.—a term of service more than twice that of any other teacher in Monson Academy. He was a man of broad views, extended scholarship, thoroughly devoted to the interests of the academy, and contributed largely to its prosperity. An earnest scholar and teacher, identified with the various educational societies of the State, he greatly aided the cause of education in Massachusetts. His death occurred Nov. 7, 1878, at his home in Monson. His funeral was attended by a large number of the former pupils of the academy, townspeople, and friends of education from abroad, who came to pay their tribute of respect to a noble man and to his work.

During the seventy-three years since the academy was dedicated in 1806, there have been 63 assistants employed, nearly all college graduates; and many of them have become distinguished as teachers in other institutions, and as members of the learned professions.

The first preceptress was employed in 1819, since which time 63 ladies have served in the office of preceptress or assistant. Much of the success and usefulness of the school has depended upon the character, ability, skill, and interest of its teachers in their work, together with the good-will and courtesy of the families in the village manifested toward the pupils.

Patronage and Pupils.—The academy has been from the first a mixed school, the proportions of the sexes having been, until recently, about two gentlemen to one lady, and about two-thirds of the patronage has come from non-residents.

The whole number of students connected with it since the original opening, as near as can be ascertained, has been not far from 7000. Of these, between 450 and 500 have entered college, and many have united with the professions without other preparation than that obtained at the academy. More than 200 have become ministers of the gospel.

Among the alumni may be mentioned Hon. Henry L. Barnard, LL.D., late United States Commissioner of Education; Prof. W. A. Larned, late professor at Yale College; Rev. James L. Merrick, missionary to Persia; David B. Coe, D.D., secretary of the American Home Missionary Society; Richard S. Storrs, D.D., of Brooklyn, N. Y.; George H. Gould, D.D.; Hon. Yung Wing, LL.D., of the Chinese Embassy; Rev. Samuel Curtis, professor of theology in Chicago Seminary. Two have been presidents and 4 professors in colleges; 11 have been tutors at Yale College and 4 at Amherst; 1 a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States; 1 a judge of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, and 3 have been members of Congress.

But no list of eminent men, were they three times as numerous, and far more distinguished, could represent fully the great benefits conferred on the students of Monson Academy in elevating and improving their character, and preparing them for the better discharge of the various duties of life.

Benefactions and Endowments.—The funds of the academy have always been limited and insufficient for the wants of the institution. Its great strength has been in the zeal and sympathy of devoted trustees and teachers, and the patronage of its alumni, joined with the good-will and prayers of its friends.

The whole amount of benefactions from all sources is not far from $50,000. With the exception of the original State endowment, estimated at $10,000, nearly all the funds have been subscribed by citizens of Monson. Joel Norcross, Esq., in various sums, $7250; Deacon Andrew Porter, $3200; Rufus Flynt, $2250, Rev. J. Merrick, $2000, for the Persian scholarship. In 1863, $10,000 was raised for the repair and enlargement of the buildings, and $10,000 as an addition to the general fund, mostly by citizens of the town.

The buildings of the institution are the academy structure, situated in a pleasant grove, and the chemical laboratory, erected in 1825, and furnished with a chemical apparatus. The academy was extensively enlarged and repaired in 1863.

The income from productive funds is about $2000; from tuitions, $2300. Value of real estate, $20,000; of productive funds, $25,500; of libraries and apparatus, $5000. Total assets, $50,500.

The course of study is that usually pursued in New England academies. In the classical department, under the charge of the principal, students are prepared for the New England colleges. In the English department, with a male and female assistant, the common and higher English branches are taught.

Tuition and Expenses.—The tuition fee has varied from $10 per annum to an average of $24 per annum at the present time. The school year of 40 weeks is divided into three terms. The price of board in private families varies from $3.50 to $5 per week. Three dollars a week is paid from the educational fund to suitable candidates for the ministry.

The Persian scholarship is not limited to any of the professions.

The influence of the educational fund has been highly favorable to the prosperity of the academy in securing a good class of students.

In July, 1854, a semi-centennial jubilee of the academy was celebrated, and largely attended by graduates, teachers, and friends of the institution. A discourse on "The Relations of Commerce to Letters" was delivered by Rev. Richard S. Storrs, D.D., former principal and teacher in the academy, and a historical discourse by Rev. Charles Hammond, then principal of Lawrence Academy, Groton.

Most of the facts in this sketch have been obtained from Mr. Hammond's address and "Sketch of Monson Academy."

No institution, it is believed, has left pleasanter memories on the minds of its pupils in after-life than old Monson Academy.

CHURCHES.

THE MONSON CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH*

was organized June 23, 1762. The original members—12 males and about the same number of females—were mostly received by letter from the church in Brimfield. Since the incorporation of the town, nearly two years before, Sunday services had been held alternately in the houses of Deacon Benjamin Munn and Lieutenant Thomas Stebbins, situated four miles apart, in the Southern and Northern Districts. The first meeting-house, in an unfinished state, was the place of organization. In the poverty of the people the General Court had granted a special tax of a penny an acre on all the lands in the town to help them build it. The site of this house of worship was near the centre of the township, on the summit of a hill which overlooks the valley, a little southwest of the present house. Often the expression rises to the lips of those who are passing by, "Beautiful for situation is Mount Zion."

The building was rectangular, about twenty feet high, without chimney or steeple, lighted by a single row of small windows. For some years the inside was left unfinished, seated only with rude boards. It seems to have been poorly suited to the rigor of the climate, for the town voted, Dec. 17, 1762, "to remove the meeting from the meeting-house for the winter season." At length the lower part was finished, floors laid, pews put in, and gallery-stairs built. The upper part was never finished, the rough beams, joists, rafters, boards, and bristling nails taking the place of modern frescoing. This house was used forty-one years, until another was completed, when it was taken down.

Mr. Abishai Sabin, a native of Pomfret, Conn., and a graduate of Yale College in 1759, was ordained and installed pastor, by the same council, and on the same day that the church was organized. Little is known of this pastorate of nine years beyond the use of the "half-way covenant," which was discontinued in the succeeding one. Mr. Sabin was dismissed at his own request, on account of poor health, in July, 1771, and, without having assumed another charge, died in his native place in 1782.

The Rev. Jesse Ives succeeded to the pastorate, and retained it more than thirty-two years, from June 23, 1773, till his death, Dec. 31, 1805.

Mr. Ives was born at Meriden, Conn., was a graduate of Yale College in 1758, and had been settled in the town of Norwich, Conn. He was a tall, erect man, with a bright, ready mind, and notably "gifted in prayer." His pastorate, through the most eventful period of our nation's history, was not without trials. It was, however, on the whole very peaceful and remarkably useful, leaving the number of the church membership 111. Toward its close a new meeting-house was built and the Academy Hall erected, both costing about $9000. This amount was all raised voluntarily except $300, which was voted by the town for the meeting-house.

This second house of worship, situated very near the site of the first, was dedicated Nov. 16, 1803. It was said to have been the best in the county at that time. The building was rectangular, 80 feet long by 50 wide, and of good height, lighted by a double row of windows. The steeple was the low open one, so common at that time. Originally there was but one room, with galleries on three sides. In 1838 the galleries were taken out, except across the south end; a floor put in 12 feet above the old one; the old square pews were replaced by modern ones, and the walls were frescoed. The cost of these repairs was $3000. This house, after being used sixty-eight years, was sold in 1871, and removed to the foot of the hill, where it is used for a hall and stores.

Mr. Alfred Ely, the third pastor, was retained more than sixty years, from Dec. 17, 1806, until his death, July 6, 1866. He was a man of vigorous intellect, good judgment, decided organizing and executive ability, and of a strong and leading character. His influence was felt throughout this whole region of country. His character, perhaps more than his scholarship, although that was by no means lacking, gained for him the title of Doctor of Divinity from his alma mater in 1834. For forty-six years he was president of the board of trust of Monson Academy, where he did efficient service. The year Amherst College was incorporated he was appointed one of the corporation by the Legislature, and was faithful to his trust. In 1840 he was made corporate member of the A. B. C. F. M., an appointment richly deserved for his abiding interest and valuable services in the cause of foreign missions.

During this pastorate the church grew and developed rapidly. It was one of the largest, most active, and efficient churches in Western Massachusetts. A Baptist Church was organized in 1795, in the western part of the town, and in 1825 the Methodist Church was formed; but the strength and vigor of this church did not materially suffer thereby.

The Sunday-school was organized April 21, 1819, with the pastor as superintendent, and at one time it is said to have included nearly the whole congregation.

One efficient auxiliary in the church work has been the "Female Praying Circle," formed in April, 1827. From that day the godly women have been a power for good. They have co-operated with the men in almost every branch of Christian activities. Especially was this true in the benevolent work, which was developed to a high degree for that age. Hardly less was this true in the great temperance reformation, which was at its height in 1832, when "nearly the whole population were pledged to total abstinence."

Mr. Samuel C. Bartlett was settled as colleague of Dr. Ely, Aug. 2, 1843. Mr. Bartlett was a native of Salisbury, N. H., a graduate of Dartmouth College and Andover Theological Seminary. He remained here only three years, when he took the position of professor of intellectual philosophy in Western Reserve College. Subsequently, after a short pastorate at Manchester, N. H., and at Chicago, Ill., he took the chair of Biblical Literature in Chicago Theological Seminary, and is now president of Dartmouth College.

Rev. Charles B. Kittredge, born at Mount Vernon, N. H., a graduate of Dartmouth College and Andover Theological Seminary, succeeded Mr. Bartlett as colleague pastor, from Oct. 21, 1846, to May 4, 1852. Mr. Kittredge had been previously settled at Groton and Westboro', and returned to the latter place to live without a subsequent settlement.

March 28, 1855, Rev. Theron G. Colton was installed colleague pastor. Mr. Colton was born at Westford, N. Y., graduated at Yale College and Theological Seminary, and had been settled at Fair Haven, Conn., and Ware village. He left Monson, Oct. 1, 1866, for White Water, Wis., and is now pastor at Hudson, Mich.

Mr. Charles B. Sumner, of Southbridge, a graduate of Yale College and Andover Theological Seminary, was inducted into this pastorate Jan. 2, 1868.

The following year a parsonage was built, at a cost of $7000. The same year, by the efforts of Hon. Reuben A. Chapman, then chief-justice of the Supreme Court of the State, and of Deacon Porter, a pastor's library was instituted, which now numbers about three hundred bound volumes. June 18, 1873, the third meeting-house was dedicated, on very nearly the same spot from which the second had been removed. This house, like the others, was built of wood, the main building 100 feet by 60, having a tower on one front corner, and a tall, graceful spire containing the town-clock on the other. At the rear are rooms on the ground-floor for chapel purposes, and above them social rooms. All is beautifully finished and furnished, and the main audience-room is graced with a fine organ. The entire cost of this house, with its furnishings, was about $40,000.

The deacons of this church, past and present, are Joseph Craft, Joseph Colton, Benjamin Munn, Abijah Newell, Abel Goodell, Simeon Keep, Joshua Fuller, Abel Goodell (2d), Abraham Haskell, Royal Merriek, Absalom Shaw, Jr., Andrew W. Porter, Marcus Chapin, George Morris, Edward F. Morris, Edward P. Keep, Rodolphus Homer, and A. Haskell White.

The intimate relation which this church has sustained to the academy has given to it a wider field of influence than it would otherwise have enjoyed. Its audience has often embraced representatives of different States, countries, and races. On its catalogue are the names of Greeks, Chinese, and Japanese who have completed their studies and gone back to their native lands, some of them, like Hon. Yung Wing, to return to this country on most weighty business. Revivals of religion have occurred from time to time at least as far back as the early years of this century. At times the spirit of consecration has been very marked. Nourished and inspired by these influences, we find such characters as Rev. James L. Merriek, eleven years missionary to Persia; Rev. Samuel Robbins Brown, D.D., son of Mrs. Phæbe Brown, author of some of the sweetest hymns in our language, who has devoted his life to missionary work, first in China, now in Japan;

Rev. Gilbert Rockwood, a self-denying missionary to the Indians; Revs. John Keep and William A. Thompson, home missionaries in the West; Rev. Almon Underwood, the successful evangelist of over thirty years; Rev. Charles L. Woodworth, long an efficient secretary of the American Missionary Association; Rev. William Barrows, D.D., secretary of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society; Revs. Elias C. Sharp, Luke Foster, Warren C. Fiske, and Joseph A. Collyer. Many names of excellent women might also be mentioned who have been very useful as writers, teachers, pastors' wives, and missionaries to the Indians, the Sandwich Islands, and India.

More than $170,000 have been raised by this church. Of this amount, over $40,000 have been contributed to relieve want and preach the gospel beyond the parish limits. Nor is this one-half the amount that has been given privately and by bequest by the members of this church. These facts faintly suggest the stream of influence that has been flowing from this church during the one hundred and sixteen years of its existence.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.*

The formation of the first Methodist class in Monson was in 1825. It was organized by Rev. Joel W. McKee, then the regular preacher of old Brookfield circuit. It consisted of some 20 probationers; and Horace Moulton, a young, energetic, earnest Christian, a leading spirit in the movement, was appointed its first leader.

The following winter, the class having grown larger by about one-third, Selah Stocking, afterward a member of the New England Conference, and subsequently, by transfer, a member of the New York Conference, became its second leader. The following are the names of the class-members at the date April 1, 1826: Selah Stocking (leader), Joseph Morse, Dolly Smith, Patty Smith, Anna Smith, Waite Morse, Pallas Bumstead, Harriet Bumstead, Celestia Bumstead, Mosely Dwight, Daniel Paul, Sarah Paul, Annis Chaffee, Elizabeth Scripture, John Ormsby, Aulinda Blanchard, Royal Buffington, — Buffington, Francis Bartlett, Melvina Truesdell, Sabra Bumstead, Mary A. Bidwell, Rhoda Chaffee, Theda Chaffee, Tam-mason Davis, Mrs. Bartlett, Peasley Truesdell, Jr., Calvin E. Chaffee, Marcus J. Pease, Ann Smith,—30 members in all.

Mosely Dwight, still living, one of the patriarchs of the New England Conference, was the third leader of the class. He became a Christian in a revival in his native village, Somers, Conn., under the labors of the then eminent evangelist, Asahel Nettleton. The first regular Methodist preacher in the town was Rev. Joel W. McKee, in 1825. He held his meetings in the old school-house, near the South Cotton-Factory, on week evenings, once a fortnight. He was one of the "weeping prophets," but preached with great acceptance and success. One of the circuit preachers closely following Mr. McKee was Isaac Jennison, who was appointed to Brookfield circuit in 1827-28. It is not certain whether George Sunderland followed Mr. Jennison or not, but he was assigned to this circuit in 1829 or 1830. Horace Moulton was on the circuit in 1830-31; Enoch Bradley, 1832; Ebenezer F. Newell, 1833; Amasa Taylor, 1834; Horace Moulton and George W. Green, 1835; Otis Wilder and James O. Dean, 1836; Joseph W. Lewis, 1837-38. During these two years Monson was included in Wales circuit, and preaching was enjoyed every other Sunday. Efficient aid in pulpit services was often rendered by Drs. Raymond and Patten, of Wilbraham Academy, the former then a student.

Rev. Charles Virgin was on the circuit in 1839; Rev. William Gordon, 1840; Rev. Walter Wilkie, 1841; Rev. Thomas W. Guile, 1842; H. S. Shed (a local preacher), 1843; Rev. R. P. Buffington, 1844; Rev. Spencer Tileston, 1845; Rev. William A. Clapp and Elder Bennett, 1846; Elder Bennett (a Baptist preacher), 1847; James Billings (an English local preacher), 1848. Rev. W. B. Olds, was pastor in 1849-50; Rev. John W. Dadmun, 1851-52; Revs. Charles Noble and J. Paulson, 1853; Rev. John Paulson, 1854; Rev. David K. Merrill, 1855-56; Rev. Silas Piper, 1857; Rev. Thomas B. Treadwell, 1858-59; Rev. Albinus O. Hamilton, 1860-61; Rev. Frederic Woods, 1862-63; Rev. Hiram P. Satchwell, 1864-65; Rev. Rodney H. Howard, 1866-68; Rev. Charles K. True, 1869; Rev. William J. Pomfret, 1870-72; Rev. William Silverthorne, 1873-74; Rev. Osmon W. Adams, 1875-76; Rev. Henry Lummis, 1877.

Monson first had regular Sunday preaching in 1848. Mr. Billings lived in the house opposite the grist-mill, north of Rev. Mr. Tufts. He worked at secular labor through the week, and on Sunday morning preached in the Methodist chapel, and every other Sunday evening at the North Factory school-house. At the beginning of this year there were but 8 members in the society,—Levi C. Bates, Joseph Bumstead and his daughter Harriet, Mr. and Mrs. Sanderson, Mrs. Chadwick, Mrs. Lucy Leonard (a sister of Rev. Horace Moulton), and a colored woman, Harriet Porter. Three efficient workers came into the place during the year,—Elijah Cutter, Ira Fales, and Willard Willis.

There was a gracious revival in the autumn, resulting in gathering many souls into the church. From this time on, Monson has been a station, having stated service on the Lord's day.

In 1826 a Methodist chapel was first projected; the year following, it was built. The structure was 25 by 40 feet, and cost about $500. It was dedicated free from debt, though not finished. It was about a mile and a half south of the centre, and is now converted into a dwelling, which occupies the original site.

During the pastorate of Mr. Olds a proposal was made to build a new church. Mr. Olds, Levi C. Bates, Eli Rogers, Dwight King, and Nelson F. Rogers were the building committee, and Walter Smith, Dwight King and Nelson F. Rogers the committee for the selection of a site. The whole subscription amounted to $1595. On the 8th of October, 1850, the church was dedicated by Dr. Abel Stevens. The cost of church and lot was about $3300.

In 1860, under the pastorate of Mr. Hamilton, steps were taken to enlarge and beautify the church. It was ready for dedication in March, 1861, the improvements having cost $7000.

The following representative persons have gone out from the church during its history: Rev. Horace Moulton, a pioneer itinerant, and a man of great courage and strong faith. He died Sept. 11, 1873, aged seventy-four years, and having been a member of the New England Conference forty-five years.

Rev. Selah Stocking, who joined the New England Conference, and was subsequently transferred to the New York Conference; an influential and useful minister.

Rev. Mosely Dwight, still living, a devoted man, and a zealous advocate of a holy life. He has been a member of the New England Conference for over forty-seven years.

Rev. J. W. Dadmun, who joined the New England Conference in 1842; widely known as a sweet singer. He is the chaplain of the institutions of the city of Boston on Deer Island.

Rev. William A. Braman, who joined the New England Conference in 1844, is an efficient minister in the regular work, and is stationed at the city of Lawrence.

Rev. Francis Ward died at the early age of twenty-five. Rev. Miner Raymond said of him that he had never met another like him,—never one of greater promise or nobler character.

Wesley Squier, a young man about to graduate from Amherst College with the highest honors of the institution. President Stearns remarked of him: "We believe him to have been 'an Israelite indeed, in whom there was no guile.' To him more than any other agency, it is thought, the revival enjoyed by his class in the Sophomore year was due."

Maria Stanton, sent by the missionary society of the Methodist Episcopal Church as a missionary to Africa. She ended her work in that far-off field only with her life.

George E. Ward, a young man of high promise, died in the war of the Rebellion.

Rev. Jonathan D. Bridge, a man of exceptional power and intelligence, died July 25, 1856.

Rev. Henry Ward, an earnest worker in the vineyard.

Rev. King D. Nettleton, now preaching in Central New York.

The present condition of the church is flourishing. It is free from debt, has an efficient board of trustees and stewards, has four large classes, averaging over 40 each, has a prosperous Sunday-school, and the largest attendance on social meetings in the town.

The Conference Minutes in 1878 report for Monson: church property, $12,600; church membership, 165; number of Sunday-school scholars, 216; number of officers and teachers, 25; missionary collections, $162; other benevolent collections, $74. The current expenses of the church are about $1500.

The following are the trustees, stewards, and leaders: Levi C. Bates, Dwight King, Horace Squier, Hiram Bliss, Eli Rogers, Alanson Chaffee, Geo. Topliffe, Harrison C. Day, Solomon Squier, Frank M. King, Edwin Bates, Wilbur J. McIlwain, Wm. Charles, George Thompson; Treasurer of Stewards, Horace Squier; Sunday-school Superintendent, Frank M. King; Local Preachers, Henry G. Rogers, Alvin Burley.

CATHOLICS.

The first regular establishment of Catholic worship in Monson occurred in the fall of 1878. Previous to that time the services there were of a missionary character, and were under the supervision, in latter years, of Rev. F. J. Lynch, of the village of Three Rivers, in the town of Palmer. The Rev. Mr. O'Riley was installed pastor of the church in October, 1878. A pleasant church edifice was erected in the village several years before. After the settlement of the pastor a parsonage was purchased, and several acres of land, for the purpose of establishing a Catholic cemetery in the town. The church is reported to be in a prosperous condition.

BAPTISTS.

In 1768 a Baptist Church was established in the northeastern part of Wilbraham, near the Monson line. It flourished for a number of years, and then experienced a decline. In 1807 the body was reported to the Sturbridge Baptist Association, to which it was attached, as having "lost its visibility." During the existence of this church, about 25 of its members united together and formed the "Second Baptist Church in Wilbraham," receiving fellowship July 2, 1794. In 1815 its name was changed to that of the "Wilbraham and Monson Baptist Church." At first the church had no special house of worship, but in 1817 a meeting-house was built in the western part of Monson. April 26, 1845, the name of the church was changed to "The Monson and Wilbraham Baptist Church."

The first pastor of the church was Rev. Samuel Webster. In 1799, Rev. Stephen Shepherd filled that office. In 1808, Rev. Alvin Bennett, then a licentiate, commenced preaching, and on Jan. 31, 1810, was ordained pastor, and continued in that relation twenty-six years. In April, 1837, Rev. Amos Snell became pastor, and so remained until 1840. The next regular pastor was the Rev. Uriah Underwood, who commenced in the spring of 1845. He was succeeded, in 1847, by Rev. J. M. Hunt, who remained until 1849. In April, 1853, Rev. J. C. Foster commenced his labors, and was ordained pastor September 17th of that year. For some reason, not well understood, the subsequent history of the church in Monson indicates a decline. The society was dissolved, and the church building left standing unoccupied for a time. It was destroyed by fire about 1856. No regular Baptist society at present exists in the town. The movement was continued under the Rev. J. Foster in South Wilbraham, now Hampden.

BURIAL-GROUNDS.

There are within the limits of the town of Monson no less than ten different places of burial. The first one laid out was in response to a petition of some of the inhabitants of the west part of Brimfield addressed to that town on March 19, 1755, and which has been set forth in full in the history of Brimfield. The lot granted was not laid out until 1760, and was situated half a mile from the meeting-house, near to the road that led to Palmer. Capt. David Hitchcock died in 1762, and was the first person buried in this cemetery, and the first in Monson. Only two persons have been interred there in the last eighty years. The remains of most of the early settlers lie buried beneath its sod, and but two or three crumbling headstones bear witness to the solemn character of the spot. A rail fence was put around the ground by vote of the town in 1774.

What is now known as the old or centre burying-ground was laid out about 1780, and originally consisted of less than an acre of land. It lies on the west side of the road, about a hundred yards northwest of Green's Hotel. It contains the remains of many of the first settlers of the town, the places of their interment being marked by stones bearing early dates. It is in a good state of repair, and is substantially inclosed.

The Squier burying-ground is situated in the southeasterly part of the town, and contains about two acres of land. It has been in use for upward of one hundred years, but was not declared a public burying-ground until April 4, 1803, when the town voted it as such. The Moultons, Munns, and other early settlers are buried there. It is still one of the best in the town, and is in use.

The Butler burying-ground is located in the southwest part of the town, and contains about an acre of land. It has been established about eighty years. Henry G. Cady, Jonathan Torrey, Capt. Lyman Shaw, the Bennetts, and other well-known citizens are interred there. It is still in use.

The Grout burying-ground was laid out by vote of the town, Feb. 4, 1839. It is situated about 20 rods northeast of Joseph Grout's, in the northeast part of the town, and contains 40 square rods of land. John Aldridge, Joseph Grout, and others are buried there.

The Gage burying-ground is located about three miles south of the centre, and contains less than an acre of land. It has been in use about thirty years. Philip and Aaron Gage, with others, are interred there.

The Day burying-ground lies in the west part of the town, and contains about a quarter of an acre of land.

The Catholics of the town have recently purchased seven acres of land in the northeast part of the village, and devoted them to use as a place of interment for the dead. Included within this area is the original or first cemetery of the town, to which reference has been made.

A small but neat place of burial is situated in the centre of the village, on the east side of the main street. It was laid out about 1803, and is owned by private individuals. William Norcross was the first person buried there. Deacon Abel Goodell, who died Dec. 14, 1809, at the age of sixty-seven years, was also interred there.

By vote of the town, April 8, 1842, the selectmen were directed to purchase three acres of land on the south side of the road, west of Jacob Thompson's house and adjoining J. F. Converse's land, and to fence and prepare the same for a place of burial. One-half was to be sold in lots, and the balance to be a public burying-ground. This place is now known as the new cemetery, and is the one principally in use. Benjamin Fuller was the first person buried there.

CORPORATIONS.

THE MONSON NATIONAL BANK

was incorporated March 28, 1854, with a capital of $150,000. Austin Fuller, Albert Norcross, and William N. Flynt were the original incorporators. It was originally a State bank, but was reorganized as a national bank Aug. 25, 1864, being the first bank in the county east of Springfield to make the change. The first president of the bank was William N. Flynt, and Jonathan R. Flynt was the first cashier. On Oct. 3, 1859, Jonathan R. Flynt was elected president, and E. C. Robinson cashier. Mr. Flynt died July 31, 1860, and John Wyles was chosen president on November 7th of that year. In 1864, Edward F. Morris was chosen cashier, and is still serving in that capacity. Cyrus W. Holmes, the present president, was elected to that office Jan. 14, 1871. Rice M. Reynolds was chosen vice-president Jan. 15, 1876, and is still filling that office. The present directors of the bank are Cyrus W. Holmes, Charles H. Merriek, Joshua Tracy, Edward F. Morris, Rice S. Munn, Rice M. Reynolds, and Alfred Norcross.

THE MONSON SAVINGS-BANK

Munn, Edwin E. Towne, Rufus F. Fay, and Daniel G. Potter. The present officers of the institution are, President, Charles H. Merriek; Vice-Presidents, Rice S. Munn, Timothy F. Packard; Clerk, Edwin F. Morris.

THE STATE PRIMARY SCHOOL, an institution of great interest, is located in the northern part of the town, overlooking the village of Palmer.

"On the 20th of May, 1852, the Legislature authorized Gov. Bontwell to appoint a Board of Commissioners to construct three almshouses for the accommodation of such persons as had no legal settlement within the State. These institutions were located in Monson, Bridgewater, and Tewksbury, were erected, in 1853, during the administration of Gov. Clifford, and were opened for occupancy May 1, 1854, by proclamation of Gov. Emory Washburn.

"On the 19th of May, 1855, the Legislature passed 'An Act providing for the Classification of State Paupers.' By this Act this institution was expressly 'set apart for the purpose of a State Pauper School.' This was the first attempt at classification, and went into practical operation in the month of June, the next year after the institution was opened.

"Although this Classification Act was repealed by the next Legislature, the children then here remained, and the majority of those admitted to the other almshouses were transferred to this institution for instruction till 1866, when the 'State Primary School' was established at Monson, and the 'State Work-house' at Bridgewater, during the administration of Gov. Bullock. This Act was passed on the 3d of May, providing for all the dependent and neglected children between the ages of three and sixteen gathered in the almshouses of Bridgewater, Tewksbury, and Monson.

"By the 'Act relating to the State Visiting Agency and Juvenile Offenders,' passed June 15, 1870, power was given to judges of probate to authorize the Board of State Charities to place children arraigned before said courts in the State Primary School for such times during minority as their best interest demanded.

"The Legislature of 1872, by an Act which took effect on the 1st day of May, 1872, abolished the almshouse at Monson, and the institution is now in name, as well as in fact, the 'State Primary School.' A few mothers with children are transferred from the State almshouse at Tewksbury as helpers, and also a few children, with their mothers, brothers, or sisters, too young for admission to the Primary School, are transferred here for temporary support.

"Here the children from all the towns in the commonwealth, who have no legal settlement in any town, are sent for instruction, and other children placed in the care of the Board of State Charities by the courts are sent for discipline till fitted to return to friends, or homes are provided."

The number of persons at present supported by the institution is 537. The buildings and general appointments of the place are excellent. Experienced persons are in charge of the several departments, and the utmost cleanliness and cheerfulness pervade the institution. Space will not permit a detailed account of its special excellencies, which are well known throughout the State. From Oct. 1, 1872, to Oct. 1, 1877, 2922 persons were inmates of the institution. The principal officers in charge at present are, Superintendent, Rev. James H. Bradford; Assistant Superintendent and Superintendent of Schools, J. C. Tibbets; John B. Chapman, Clerk and Steward. A farm of 200 acres is connected with the institution.

INDUSTRIAL PURSUITS.

Prior to the erection of what is known as the North factory in 1811, the manufacturing enterprises of Monson were of a minor order, and the principal occupation of the inhabitants was the pursuit of agriculture.

A saw- and oil-mill was erected in the latter part of last century where the Ellis factory now stands. It was first run by Noah Sabin and Reuben Hoar in partnership. The manufacture of linseed oil was pursued until 1808, and the saw-mill was in operation as late as 1822.

About the same time a grist-mill was built where Reynolds' Rockland mill now is, by Asa White, who operated it until 1845, when the property passed into the hands of Joseph L. Reynolds. On the opposite side of the stream bar-iron was made from scrap-iron and a little bog-iron gathered in Silver Street,* near the spring known as "Cato's Pool," by Joseph and Jeremiah Bumstead as early as 1800. Their establishment was carried off by a freshet in the month of February, 1807, and was afterward erected higher up the stream.

A saw- and grist-mill stood where the North factory now is as early as 1800, and was run by Roswell & Gideon Merrick. It was taken down in 1816, and in 1820 the Rockbottom factory was erected on its site by Witherill & Co., who engaged in the manufacture of cotton goods. The building is now the store-house of the North factory.

Early in 1890, Asa Gates had a carding-mill in a small building near Lyon's mill factory. He engaged principally in finishing woven cloth,—a business which he pursued for twelve or fifteen years. The establishment then passed into the possession of the Monson Woolen Company, of which Gates became one of the members.

Several saw-mills existed at Silver Street and in other localities in the town early in the present century.

Roswell Merrick had a tannery, about 1808, near the old burying-ground. Bela Bennett afterward carried on the business. About 1820, Stephen Tobey purchased the building, together with 30 or 40 acres of land, repaired the shops, erected several new buildings, and engaged in the tanning business for upward of forty years. His son, Clinton, in company with E. O. Fenton, subsequently pursued the business of hide-dressing for several years. The buildings were destroyed by fire some years ago.

In 1811, Roswell Merrick erected the North factory and engaged in the manufacture of cotton yarn, in company with Artemas Witherill and a man named Pierce. In 1863 the property came into the possession of Albert Norcross, who received it from Andrew W. Porter. The latter had engaged in the manufacture of cloth. Mr. Norcross sold the concern to Jared Beebe about 1870, who carried on the business of woollen manufacturing until his death, in 1877. It is now being run by his heirs and personal representatives.

Cushman's or Lyon's Mill was erected about 1813, by the Monson Woolen Company. The commodities at first manufactured were satinets and broadcloth. The business then passed successively into the hands of Joel Norcross, Chas. P. Fay, Horatio Lyon, and John Wyles, and the Hampden Cotton Manufacturing Company. It is owned by Solomon S. Cushman, and is used in the manufacture of fancy cassimeres.

The Hampden Cotton-Manufacturing Company erected the Reynolds Mill in 1813, and engaged in the manufacture of cotton cloth for a long time. Afterward satinets, cassimeres, and doeskins were manufactured in town. The property was purchased by Joseph L. Reynolds, who had long superintended the business for the company, in 1871. Mr. Reynolds has since remodeled it several times. The mill is a three-set mill, furnishes employment to about 35 persons, and manufactures about 600 yards of fancy cassimeres and doeskins per day.

The same company erected the Ellis mill in 1829. It was destroyed by fire in November, 1839, but was rebuilt. It came into the possession of C. W. Holmes & Sons, in 1869, and was again burned. In the spring of 1871, Dwight W. Ellis purchased of C. W. Holmes & Sons the middle mill-privilege and the tenements connected therewith, and immediately proceeded to erect a new mill, and fitted it up with new machinery, at an aggregate cost of $50,000, and began the manufacture of fancy cassimeres, which business is still continued. The mill gives employment to about 75 hands, and the monthly pay-roll is about $2100. The mill is what is known as a "four-set" mill. The amount of raw stock used annually is 250,000 pounds, and about 250,000 yards of goods are produced. The firm consists of Dwight W. Ellis and Arthur D. Ellis, under the firm-name of D. W. Ellis & Son.

The West Branch mill was erected by Joseph L. Reynolds in 1837. C. W. Holmes became associated with him in business, and the firm of Reynolds, Holmes & Co. engaged in the manufacture of satinet. The business was then sold to the Hampden Cotton Company. In 1868-69 the company sold it to C. W. Holmes & Sons. It afterward became the property of Holmes & Ellis, and latterly of C. W. Holmes, Jr.

In 1872 it was changed from a satinet-mill to the manufacture of fancy cassimeres, to which purpose it is at present devoted. It is a two-set mill, and employs about 35 persons. About 400 yards of fancy cassimeres are daily manufactured.

About 1857, Joseph L. Reynolds erected a two-set steam-mill on the present site of his store-house. It was destroyed by fire in about six months, and proved a heavy loss.

* This locality derives its name from the "four pence half penny" which a tax-collector gathered there after a whole day's labor.

The Rockland mill, owned by Joseph L. Reynolds, was erected in 1860-61, and was burned about 1867. It was rebuilt two or three years afterward. It was first occupied as a satinet-mill, but is now engaged in the manufacture of fancy cassimeres, of which it produces about 600 yards per day. It is a three-set mill, and employs about 40 persons.

A small woolen-mill formerly existed in the northwest part of the town, in the Silver Street district, on Twelve-Mile Brook. It was owned by Lathrop Clark in 1864.

One of the most important manufacturing enterprises of the town is the straw hat factory of Merrick & Fay, situated in the centre of the village. The business has been carried on for many years. All varieties of straw hats are manufactured. Employment is afforded to 450 persons. In 1878 goods were made exceeding in value $800,000. The goods are all sold in New York City, through Hodges, Hersey & Co., a branch of the concern. A coarser variety of the same goods is manufactured by the firm at Amherst.*

The Monson Stone Quarry is another of the important industries of the town. It lies about a mile northwest of the central village. It was first opened about seventy years ago, by agents of the United States government, who obtained permission to quarry stone for the armory at Springfield, the foundations of which are made from it. The quarry was not again worked until about the year 1825, when it was opened by Rufus Flynt, with a force of four or five men, for the purpose of supplying a merely local want, and with no realization of its future importance as a commercial enterprise. The first stone quarried at this time was to furnish trimmings for the Chicopee Bank, at Springfield, and the stone was transported to that city by teams. Lack of transportation facilities militated against the rapid and profitable development of the quarry at this time.

Rufus Flynt died in 1836, and his son, William N. Flynt, succeeded to the business. In 1840 he first placed specimens of the stone on exhibition at Springfield, with a view to its introduction into general use. He kept increasing the business and enlarging its scope, and after the building of the Boston and Albany Railroad, and especially of the New London and Northern, succeeded in establishing a large outside trade.

In the year 1875, Mr. Flynt built a private railroad, two miles in length, with a grade of 158 feet to the mile, at an expense of about $30,000. It now connects the quarry directly with the New London and Northern Railroad, and stone is shipped at the quarry for all parts of the country.

Mr. Flynt carried on the business successfully until 1875, when, owing to ill health, he was forced to retire. It is now actively operated by his son, William K. Flynt, assisted by his brothers. From 20,000 to 30,000 tons of stone are annually quarried, valued at from $150,000 to $200,000. The number of men employed is about 125. The stone is a beautiful stratified gneiss. It is chiefly of a grayish tinge (though other shades appear also), free from oxide of iron and other mineral impurities, and is easily wrought by the process of wedging, no blasting being necessary. The largest stone ever quarried there was 354 feet long, 11 feet wide, and 4 feet thick, taking 1104 wedges to split it. Many public buildings have been erected of this stone, including the court-house at Springfield, and the Boston and Albany Railroad offices. The church of St. Francis Xavier (R. C.) in New York City is now being erected of stone from this quarry.

MILITARY.

The military history of the town in the early wars will be found set forth in the history of Brimfield. In the war of the Revolution its citizens were earnest and patriotic. When the people of Boston were suffering because of the Port Bill, the town sent a contribution to aid them in their distress, and accompanied the same with a letter, which will be found printed in the Massachusetts Historical Collections, Vol. IV., 4th series. It evinces the most patriotic spirit, and contains this postscript:

"We have eighty fellows in this district, a great part of whom are disciplined and excellent marksmen. I dare to be held to say that, at about thirty rods distant, they would pick up Tories as fast as so many hawks would pick frogs from a frog-pond."

With the war of 1812 the people of the town had no sympathy, and adopted resolutions against it.

A few residents of the town were engaged in Shays' rebellion, but the majority were loyal to the government.

The town assisted actively in the suppression of the Rebellion of 1861-65, and the following soldiers went from this town:

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

CHARLES H. MERRICK.

The Merrick name is traceable to Cydovail, judge of Powys Court, in Wales, about A.D. 1200. The third son of Cydovail, named Meuric, was a captain in the guard of Henry VIII. of England. Meuric gave the family surname to his descendants, who now generally appear under the name of Merrick, or Mirick, in England and America.

In several branches of the Merrick family the tradition is

* See biography of Charles H. Merrick in this work.

C. H. Merriam

handed down that three Merrick brothers were the first to introduce the name into this country; but the fact is well authenticated that Thomas Merrick, a descendant of Menric, and ancestor of the subject of this biography, was born in 1620, and is believed to have come from Wales to America in 1630. He settled at Springfield, Mass., in 1638, and married Sarah, daughter of Howland Stebbins, of Springfield, July 14, 1639.

Gideon Merrick, of the fifth generation in lineal descent from Thomas Merrick, was born at Monson, Mass., Jan. 17, 1775, on a farm lying easterly from and adjoining the lands now occupied by the Monson State Primary School. He married Margaret White, of Monson, in September, 1797; but her married life was short, and she died July 2, 1798. For his second wife Gideon Merrick married Beulah, daughter of Jesse and Elizabeth Stebbins, of Monson, Dec. 12, 1802. April 16, 1807, he purchased, and in May following occupied, the farm where the State Primary School is now located. Himself and wife were hopeful subjects of the revival which visited the town in 1819, and united with the Congregational Church in June of that year.

Mr. Merrick sold his farm property at Monson to the State, Sept. 17, 1852, and removed to Amherst, Mass., to take up his residence with a son, where he died March 19, 1856. He was buried at Monson. Beulah, his wife, died at Amherst, Dec. 14, 1864, and was buried in the family ground with her husband.

James L. Merrick, eldest son of Gideon and Beulah Merrick, was born at Monson, Dec. 11, 1803. He continued on the farm with his parents until nearly twenty-one years of age, and contributed essentially to the family prosperity. Himself and two brothers united with the Congregational Church in Monson in October, 1825. He graduated at Amherst College in 1830, and in 1833 at the Presbyterian Theological Seminary of Columbia, S. C. April 15, 1834, Mr. Merrick was ordained in the ministry at the Second Presbyterian Church of Columbia, and from that time to 1845 he was a missionary to Persia. On the 11th of March, 1839, at Tabreez, Persia, he was united in marriage with Emma, daughter of Nathaniel and Maria Taylor, of Portsmouth, England. In the year 1845, Mr. Merrick returned with his wife to America, and Jan. 30, 1849, he was installed pastor of the Congregational Church of South Amherst, Mass. His wife died at Amherst, Dec. 14, 1858, and was buried at Monson. After a pastorate of fifteen years Mr. Merrick's connection with the Amherst church was dissolved at his own request. He died at Amherst, June 18, 1866, and was buried by the side of his wife in the family grounds at Monson.

Samuel O. Merrick, second son of Gideon and Beulah Merrick, was born at Monson, Dec. 11, 1808. In early life he developed a taste for agricultural pursuits, and devoted his life to that calling. He remained on the home-farm until 1852, when it was sold to the State of Massachusetts. He subsequently purchased and occupied a farm in Chicopee, where he now resides. May 3, 1836, he married Maria S., daughter of Sybil Abbe, of South Hadley, Mass. She died at Chicopee, May 28, 1878, at the age of sixty-four years, and was interred in the family grounds at Monson.

Etta, daughter of Samuel O. and Maria S. Merrick, was born at Monson, April 28, 1838, and married Rev. William H. Daniels, of Franklin, Mass., Sept. 11, 1861. Emma, daughter of Rev. William H. and Etta Daniels, was born March 6, 1863, at St. Johns, New Brunswick.

Charles H. Merrick, the youngest son of Gideon and Beulah Merrick, and the subject of this sketch, was born at Monson, April 11, 1812. He passed his early life on his father's farm, meantime securing an education and storing his mind with valuable information. He was employed in school-teaching several winter terms, and the opportunity of pursuing a collegiate course was offered him. But neither the pursuit of agriculture nor the attainment of a high academic education offered special attractions to Mr. Merrick. Mechanical studies and pursuits were the principal objects of his desires. In the summer of 1836 he engaged as a self-taught master-weaver in a woolen-mill, at Wales, Mass., where he put the weaving department of a two-set mill into successful operation.

Oct. 12, 1836, Mr. Merrick married Mary A., daughter of Charles and Sarah S. McMaster, of Monson. He continued in the Wales mill until it was burned in the following winter. Soon after, he was employed at Rockville, Conn., where he took charge of the weaving department in the mill there, known as the "Old Rock." He invented and applied to his looms a self-acting temple, which was the first used in that section. He also arranged and applied a combination of pulleys for operating a six-harness web, where the shades had been held in place by heavy iron rods. In April, 1838, the mill was closed from the pressure of hard times, and Mr. Merrick's connection with the Rock Company closed, with no promise of speedy re-employment.

Mr. Merrick then entertained the plan of attempting the manufacture of palm-leaf hoods, which were being secretly made in Rockville, the tools and process of manufacture being kept from the public.

Soon after, determining to return to Monson in search of employment, he had occasion to pass through Somers, Conn., where palm-leaf was prepared for braiding. He there purchased eight pounds of weaving and two of braiding-leaf, and proceeded on to Monson. Locating temporarily at North Monson, he at once commenced to construct a loom, without patterns or designs, for the weaving of palm-leaf sheets. These were soon made and put in successful operation. Immediately following the production of sheets came the necessity for shapes to make and blocks to finish the hoods. These he also originated, and with them made the first palm-leaf hood ever manufactured in Massachusetts. Mr. Merrick thus inaugurated a new business enterprise in Monson, employing but one person, and he inexperienced in any part of the work to be done.

The business, gradually developing, early demonstrated the necessity of combined effort, and the need of more men and means. This led to the formation of the firm of Merrick & Fay, in the summer of 1838, the new partner in the undertaking being Rufus F. Fay, a sketch of whose life appears elsewhere in this work.

By the use of the combined means and advantages of the new firm, a great advance was made in the production and sale of the hoods. Late in the autumn of 1838, after repeated solicitation, they were induced to sell their manufacturing interest to Messrs. Lyon & Norcross, merchants at Monson, central village, with the understanding that they should manufacture hoods for them at a stipulated price. Merrick & Fay then removed their headquarters from North Monson to the central village, and engaged in manufacturing by contract for the purchasing firm a part of the two following years.

Sept. 8, 1841, the first purchase of real estate was made by the firm, consisting of a tract of land on Main Street, in Monson, with a two-story building thereon, 36 by 25, which was arranged for the manufacture of ladies' hats and bonnets from foreign and domestic straw-braids. At this period of the straw business but little was known of the process of making braid-goods, and the firm found it desirable to arrange with a party of skill and experience in the trade, to allow them, for the sum of two hundred dollars, to gather up in the latter's factory such additional information regarding the manufacture of straw goods as they could obtain by examination and observation. By the aid of information thus obtained, and the practical knowledge the firm had already acquired in the manufacture of palm-leaf goods, they readily supplied themselves with the necessary tools and fixtures for the successful sewing and finishing of braid goods. The superiority of their finishing tools was so marked that the party who first instructed them in the process of making straw-braids at once ordered duplicates of the machines for their own use, at a cost of four hundred dollars.

The firm thus commenced the manufacture of straw-braid goods in a very small way, in 1841. But they, from time to time, increased their annual productions as their goods became more generally known to the trade. At this time all braid-sewing and finishing was done by hand, and the firm put out their braids to a large number of families in Monson, and, with colonies formed in surrounding towns, the number of sewers was increased to ten or twelve hundred. In the working of straw-braids for nearly twenty years the firm had constantly aimed to make the choicest goods, so that the demand became so extensive that they were compelled to enlarge their facilities. Accordingly, in the summer of 1856, a new and larger factory was erected by them, and occupied the following winter.

In November, 1858, the firm of Merrick & Fay was reorganized, and Henry Hodges, of Foxboro', and J. T. D. Hersey, of East Bridgewater, Mass., were admitted as equal partners in the business. Hodges and Hersey were at this time engaged in the straw-goods trade in New York. The new firm, as then organized, has since been known as Merrick, Fay & Co. at the manufactory in Monson, and Hodges, Hersey & Co. at the salesroom in New York.

The firm at once made arrangements to largely increase their production, embracing all classes and varieties of ladies' straw goods, and continued in the then only known system of hand manufacture until 1861. In that year the first power press was invented and applied in the complete finishing of a hat or bonnet at one operation, in a metal die the exact size and shape of the article to be produced, perfecting and duplicating each piece in every successive operation. Many improvements have been made in hat-pressing machines since the invention of 1861, the first being operated by hand, and deriving their power in the application of the screw and cam principle, while the later inventions give a machine capable of applying a pressure of one thousand pounds to each square inch of the goods. The power is furnished by hydraulic action, and is easily directed and applied to any desired pressure, with the capacity of rapidly repeating its operation.

In 1863 a complete revolution in the method of sewing straw-braids began to take form and effect from the invention and use of the Bosworth braid-sewing machine, which developed the process of producing the perfect form of hand-stitch by a power-machine, with a great increase in production and in nicety of execution, so that machine-sewed braids secured largely-advanced prices over hand-sewed goods. As a necessary result of the use of the sewing-machines, the number of hand-sewers was greatly diminished, while the production of hats and bonnets was rapidly increased. This opportunity for new business induced the firm in 1863 to build a large addition to their factory, for the purpose of introducing the manufacture of men's and boys' hats, which were successfully produced in that year. The two classes of goods have since been manufactured together.

While the company's introduction of sewing- and finishing-machines enabled them to produce more than ten times the number of goods they could by hand-work in each case, yet the statement is true that for the past twenty-five or thirty years one-third of the families of Monson have been furnished employment by the firm, and secured a proportionate share of the large monthly payments of the company. Besides these, many persons from places near and remote are employed. It has been the practice of the company to employ the best class of help, and men and women of character, social standing, and moral worth are to be found in their various departments of labor. The business has assumed high rank among the manufactures of the country. Beginning in a room fifteen feet square, in 1838, the works now occupy a flooring of fifty thousand square feet, and each department is crowded to its utmost capacity.

Amid the cares of business, Mr. Merrick has found time to devote some of his energies to matters relating to the material welfare of his native place. He was chosen a director of Monson National Bank in 1855 and in 1862. He is also a trustee of Monson Academy; and at the organization of the Monson Savings Institution, in 1872, he was chosen its president, and still occupies that position.

Charles Merrick, son of Charles H. and Mary A. Merrick, was born at Monson, April 17, 1853. Since finishing his education he has been engaged in the interests of the firm with which his father is connected, with a view of continuing in the business. June 19, 1878, he married Mary A., daughter of B. A. and Eunice M. Day, of Monson.

RUFUS F. FAY.

The name of Fay is of ancient origin, and can be traced back many hundred years. It is first met with in France, in the persons of Sir Gondeur du Fay, Great Baron of Normandy, and Gen. Victor Fay, one of the generals of Napoleon the First, and the father of sons distinguished as ambassadors and authors. Rodolph Fay married the daughter of Gen. Lafayette, and with his wife shared the captivity of the father in the prison of Olmutz, Prussia. M. du Fay held several important posts of honor during the reign of Louis XI., and discovered vitreous and resinous electricity. Miss Leontine Fay was a distinguished French actress, and married a gentleman of great wealth. Another Fay, an astronomer, discovered Fay's comet in 1844. The name occurs in England as early as the year 1173, and is probably traceable to Radul de Fay, a distinguished nobleman during the reign of Henry II. The name also occurred in Ireland at an early day, under the form of Fake.

The Fays were not among the first settlers of New England, but they are believed to have sprung mostly from one common ancestor. David Fay appears first as a settler at Sudbury, Mass., at an early day. He was from Wayhill, England, and is supposed to have served as a soldier under Cromwell. He returned to England soon after 1660, leaving behind him an only son, John, who was born in England in the year 1648. John came to America on board the "Speedwell," June 27, 1656, became one of the first settlers of Mari-boro', Mass., and bore a gallant part in the trials and dangers that attended the first settlements at that place. He died Dec. 5, 1690, aged forty-two.

Rufus F. Fay is in the seventh generation after the original David Fay, the descent having passed through John, Samuel, Ebenezer, Jude, his grandfather, and Rufus F., his father. Jude Fay was born in the year 1748. He married Sally Fairbanks, and settled in Monson at an early date. His daughter Betsey married Joel Norcross, and was a lady of rare excellence of character, and her death, in 1829, elicited the strongest sentiment of regret from the public prints of that day.

Rufus F. Fay, father of our subject, was born Aug. 18, 1786, in Brimfield, Mass. He located in the north part of Monson, near the line of the town of Palmer, and there owned a large farm, now occupied by his son, Eli N. Fay. In the year 1809 he was united in marriage to Rachel Taft, by whom nine children were born to him. He died March 31, 1865.

Of the children of Rufus F. Fay, his son, Rufus F., was the third, having been born at Monson, on the old farm, Feb. 9, 1814. He passed his early life upon the farm, enjoying in the winter season the benefits of such education as the common schools of his day afforded. After attaining the age of twenty-one, he entered the woolen-factory of the Rockville Manufacturing Company, at Rockville, Conn., for the purpose of learning the business of woolen-manufacture. After remaining at Rockville three years he returned to Monson, and, in partnership with Charles H. Merriek, engaged in the manufacture of straw goods, mainly palm-leaf hats, making the first Shaker hoods made in Massachusetts. This was the original establishment of the firm of Merriek & Fay, now old and well-known manufacturers of straw goods. The business connection of these gentlemen has continued uninterruptedly since. The firm have extended their manufacture to the higher grades of straw goods, and do the largest business of any manufacturers in Monson.

While occupying prominent business standing in the community, Mr. Fay has always declined to accept any of the public offices that fall in his way, preferring to devote his entire time and attention to the conduct and development of his business, and firmly believing that weakness is the natural result of divided duties. He is a member of the Congregational Church of Monson, having united with it in 1828.

On the 1st of April, 1835, Mr. Fay was united in marriage with Margaret, daughter of Charles McMaster, of Monson. She died in 1850, leaving no children. In November, 1852, he married Sarah McMaster, sister of his first wife, by whom he has had three children,—Charles, who died in infancy; Rufus, aged nineteen; and Frederick, aged seventeen. The sons are engaged in business with their father.

JOSEPH LANGFORD REYNOLDS.

The Reynolds family is of ancient and honorable origin, and has been represented in this country for many years. John Reynolds, the great-grandfather of our subject, lived at an early day at North Kingston, Washington Co., R. I. But whether he was born in this country, or emigrated from England, is not certainly known. John, his son, and grandfather of Joseph L., passed the greater part of his life at the same place, and died at the age of eighty-four. He lost his sight in the later years of his life, and was known as "Blind John," to distinguish him from several others of the same name who lived in that locality.

Eldridge Reynolds, father of Joseph L., was born at North Kingston, on the old farm that has been owned by the family for the past two hundred years. He had seven children,—John, Henry, Joseph L., Sarah, Martha L., Mary G., Sheffield C.

Joseph L. was born on the old farm at North Kingston, on the last day and the last hour of the year 1796. He passed his life, up to the age of fourteen, at North Kingston, attending school at the village of Wickford, R. I. In the year 1811 he went to Portsmouth, R. I., and engaged in farming, but returned home the following year. At the age of sixteen he went to Coventry, R. I., to learn the trade of machine-making. He served an apprenticeship of three years there with Hinds, Arnold & Co. Upon the expiration of his time he went to Bozrah, Conn., and engaged in the manufacture of brass andirons. He remained there but a short time, and went out in search of employment. He finally took service with Eli Whitney, the inventor of the cotton-gin, at Whitneyville, Conn., and engaged in the manufacture of muskets for the government. He remained there about three years, and then returned to Rhode Island and engaged in machinery-making at Pawtucket. At the expiration of about a year he went to Brimfield, Mass., and there first engaged in the manufacture of cotton sheeting, having special charge of the newly invented power-loom. This was about the year 1820.

In September, 1821, he went to Monson, Mass., and associated himself with the Hampden Cotton-Manufacturing Company. He first became general overseer for the company, and afterward acted as agent for twenty-five years. During that time Mr. Reynolds greatly increased the value of the manufacturing enterprises of that company, erected an additional mill, and added other improvements. In 1850 the company, as some mark of appreciation of the long and valuable services of Mr. Reynolds, presented him a handsome solid silver pitcher, bearing the inscription, "Presented to Joseph L. Reynolds, Esq., by the Hampden Manufacturing Company, as a token of their sense of the skill, ability, and integrity evinced by him in the management of their affairs for a quarter of a century.—1850."

During this time Mr. Reynolds was largely interested as an owner in the enterprises of the company. He afterward resigned the agency of the Hampden Manufacturing Company, and, though still acting as treasurer of that company, engaged in manufacturing on his own account, and erected two mills at South Monson,—a steam-mill, which was destroyed by fire about June, 1858, and not afterward rebuilt, and a mill that stood upon the present site of the Rockland mill.

The Hampden Company finally dissolved, and Mr. Reynolds engaged in running his own enterprise, having rebuilt the Rockland mill, and purchased of the Hampden Company, June 5, 1869, the "old cotton-mill." These mills he still owns, the business being managed by his sons, R. M. Reynolds and Theodore Reynolds. The manufactures are cassimeres and doeskins. Mr. Reynolds, having reached the age of eighty-two, is not now engaged in active business, though his mills are run in his name.

July 13, 1824, he married Sylvia, daughter of William Smith, of Brimfield, Mass. She died Aug. 9, 1836, leaving four children. He married his present wife March 8, 1837. She was Oriel, a daughter of Rice Munn, of Monson, the family having been among the very first settlers of the town. They have had three children, of whom one died in infancy. Rice M. Reynolds, born Dec. 18, 1838, and Theodore, born Oct. 31, 1843, are now engaged in the manufacturing business at Monson.

Mr. Reynolds has confined himself almost exclusively to the management of his business enterprises, public office having no attractions for him. In the year 1854 he filled the office of State Senator with great acceptance. He has filled various town offices, and was a justice of the peace for a long term of years.

In his church affiliations he is a Congregationalist, and with his wife is connected with that denomination in the town.

Through a long, active, and laborious life Mr. Reynolds has discharged the various duties that devolved upon him with singular fidelity, integrity, and success, and his career is a fitting example to the young of what earnest and systematic devotion to business interests, combined with integrity of character, can accomplish.

He has long been an active member of the Masonic fraternity, and was the first Master of Thomas Lodge, of Palmer. He was previously Master of that lodge, early in its history, when it existed at Monson. He was also the first Master of Dayspring Lodge, now at Monson, in the year 1863.

He has added much to the embellishment of the town of Monson, and now occupies a handsome and commodious residence in South Monson, which he erected in 1863.

DWIGHT WARREN ELLIS.

Dwight Warren Ellis was born in Dana, Mass., Dec. 22, 1824. While a boy he lived in Ware, Mass., and Rockville, Stafford, and Coventry, Conn., working in mills, and attending school, winters. He attended one term at Monson Academy. Commencing the woolen business when a boy, he learned it thoroughly, from "sorting" and dyeing the wool to "finishing" the manufactured cloth. His commencement of business for himself, which was in association with others, was in 1849. He purchased a small interest with the Shaws, of Wales, Mass., and remained with them four years. This business venture was not successful, its control being in other hands.

He then sold out and engaged in the shoe business, losing all he had in two years. Engaging in a business which he did not understand he considers a great mistake, but it is one which many others have made. Being now out of funds, he was obliged to work again on a salary as a superintendent. This he did for a number of years.

In 1863 he rented a small mill in North Wilbraham. His capital at that time was very limited. In about a year and a half the mill was burned. His loss was considerable, but he had quite an amount of funds remaining wherewith to commence a new business. This fire afterward proved a blessing rather than a disaster. He then bought the water-privilege and erected a larger and more modern mill, which has steadily made money since.

In 1868, in conjunction with Julius Converse, Esq., of Stafford, Conn., he purchased the Orcuttville mill in Stafford, at the same time continuing his business in Wilbraham. This venture was quite successful.

In 1870 he purchased the water-privilege, tenements, etc., in South Monson, and built a new mill in place of one which had previously been burned. This mill, like the others, yielded good returns.

Mr. Ellis has improved South Monson greatly. He has recently erected a fine residence there, which he occupies, and has constructed other buildings. Being somewhat out of health, he recently sold his interest in his Stafford manufactory and associated himself in business with a brother at Wilbraham and a son at Monson.

Mr. Ellis has never held any town or State office, or allowed his name to be used as a candidate for such, believing that division of one's time and energy injuriously affects his business prosperity.

Mr. Ellis is one of the most successful business-men in Hampden County, and has, perhaps, made a larger percentage on capital invested, during the last fifteen years, than any of them. He attributes his success to practical knowledge and reliance on his own judgment. At different times he has lost heavily by fire, freshet, and bad debts, but he looks upon these as natural occurrences, resulting in the thorough discipline of the man.

In March, 1849, Mr. Ellis was united in marriage with Mary, daughter of George Puffer, of Brimfield, Mass. The fruits of this union have been four children,—Arthur D., aged twenty-eight, now associated with his father in the manufacturing business at Monson; Frank P., who died at the age of twenty-three; Frederick W., aged twenty-two, now in attendance upon the Harvard Medical School; and Milton G., who died at the age of three years.

WILLIAM NORCROSS FLYNT

is a lineal descendant of Thomas Flint, the ancestor of the family, who is supposed to have come from Wales to this country as early as 1642. He was one of the first settlers of Salem village, now South Dana, Mass., and is first mentioned in its records in 1650. He died April 15, 1663, leaving six children. In the third generation from him the orthography of the name became changed to Flynt.

Rufus Flynt, the father of William N. Flynt, and in the sixth generation from Thomas Flint, was born in Hardwick, Mass., June 22, 1775, and removed to Monson from that place about 1790. For more than forty years he was a prominent merchant and leading citizen of the town. He was one of the incorporators and early trustees of Monson Academy, and held the office of treasurer of that institution for twenty-three years. He was appointed postmaster of Monson by President Madison, and filled the position until his death, June 15, 1836. He was a gentleman of the old school, of high character, and quiet and dignified manners. Nov. 30, 1800, he married Sarah, daughter of William Norcross, of Monson, by whom four children were born to him.

Of these, William N. Flynt was the fourth, born March 14, 1818. He received his education at Monson Academy, and subsequently entered his father's store as a clerk, continuing in this employment under his father's successors in the mercantile business after the death of the former.

In 1839 he began to open the Monson Quarry, the first stone from which had been taken out by his father in the year 1825. The character of the stone, the value and importance of the enterprise, and the prominent place which it holds among the industries of the town and State are referred to at length in the notice of the "Industrial Pursuits" of Monson contained in this work.

To the development and management of the quarry Mr. Flynt has for many years devoted his time and attention, manifesting in its control rare executive ability, enterprise, and perseverance. Finally, overcome by constant and unremitting labor, he has been compelled to retire for a time from the active management of the enterprise, which is now chiefly under the control of his son, William K. Flynt, the firm being known as W. N. Flynt & Co.

During his long and active life, Mr. Flynt has filled many offices of trust and responsibility, discharging their various duties with great acceptability. For thirty years he was treasurer of the town of Monson; in the years 1848, 1849, 1860, and 1861 he represented the town in the Legislature, and was an active and leading member of the House, receiving high encomiums from the public prints of the day. He was a member of the Executive Council of the State in the years 1865 and 1866, under the administrations of Govs. Andrew and Bullock. He was the first president of the bank in Monson, a trustee and treasurer of Monson Academy for many years, has filled the office of president of the savings-bank at Palmer, Mass., and has filled other positions of honor and usefulness.

In his religious convictions he is firm and decided, and actively identified with the Congregational Church of his town, and a prominent mover in its benevolent and philanthropic enterprises.

Mr. Flynt is eminently a domestic man, and his warmest affections have ever clustered around his own fireside. He has been twice married, having seven children,—four sons and three daughters,—all of whom are now residents of Monson. His eldest son, William K. Flynt, is the present treasurer of the town, and the successor of his father in that office.

Mr. Flynt's house at Monson is one of the most tasteful in the town. A large attractive residence, surrounded by handsome grounds, ornamented with a fine fountain, it occupies a prominent location and adds greatly to the many beauties of the place.

LUDLOW.

GEOGRAPHICAL POSITION.

THIS town is situated in the northeast corner of the original town of Springfield, and is bounded on the north by the towns of Granby and Belchertown, in Hampshire County; south by Wilbraham and Springfield; east by Belchertown; and west by Chicopee.

Its northern, eastern, and western boundaries are straight lines, with the exception of a break of a quarter of a mile in the line between it and the town of Chicopee. The southern boundary follows the devious course of the Chicopee River. Its dimensions are about four and a half by six miles, with an area of 27 square miles, or 17,280 acres, of which a large proportion is unimproved or forest land.

NATURAL FEATURES.

The surface of the town is generally comparatively level, with the exception of a few important elevations. The most prominent of these are what have long been known as the "Facing Hills," in the northern part of the town, which attain a considerable altitude, and afford, from their summits, an excellent view of the surrounding country. "*Minnechaug Mountain" is a landmark of great interest, located southeast of the geographical centre of the town. "Jefferson's Peak" is the name bestowed upon a detached elevation lying south of the "Facing Hills."

The soil is good, and has afforded rich returns to the inhabitants, who are engaged in agricultural pursuits.

Numerous small ponds of water diversify the landscape, of which the most important are "Pickarel" and "Second" Ponds, in the northern part of the town, and "Chapin," "Wood," and "Minnechaug," in the southern part.

The principal affluents of the Chicopee River are Broad Brook, which drains the larger part of the town lying east of the highlands; Chapin Brook, in the south, and Higher Brook (so called), which drains the central and southwestern portions, and discharges into the Chicopee about a mile west of the town line in the town of Chicopee. The northwestern corner of the town is drained by Stony Brook, which discharges into the Connecticut in the town of South Hadley, in Hampshire County.

The Chicopee River forms the southern boundary of the town, and in its course of three or four miles furnishes excellent water-power, the best of which is at the falls of Wallamanumps and Indian Orchard. At the former place the water descends along a narrow, rocky channel 42 feet in a distance of 100 rods, and at the latter, less than a mile distant, there is a fall of 63 feet from the top of the dam to the still water below.

Just below the falls of Wallamanumps the river in its tortuous course forms a little peninsula of a few acres of land, formerly densely wooded, and elevated about 80 feet above the water, the extremity of which has long been known by the name of "Indian Leap." The story, which is purely legendary, and of which there are several versions, is that a party of Indians, being surprised in this secluded spot, and finding no other way of escaping their enemies, sprang over the precipice in fearless desperation, and all of them save one perished in the seething waters and among the rocks below.† In this place, on the high bank of the river, is supposed to have been the encampment of 600 of King Philip's warriors the night after they had burned Springfield, in 1675, since those who went in pursuit of them the next day found here 24 camp-fires and some of their plunder left behind. The railroad-bridge spans the river at this point.

The abrupt extremity of this strip of land is composed of red sandstone, the quarrying of which constitutes an important branch of industry on the part of neighboring corporations. The nature of this deposit, and its uses, are fully treated in a general chapter.

The town has been noted for the longevity of its inhabitants.

RAILROADS.

The Springfield, Athol and Northeastern Railroad passes in an easterly direction through the southern border of the town, touching at Jenksville, Collins' Depot, and Red Bridge, and thence following the course of the Chicopee River into Palmer. It crosses the Chicopee at "Indian Leap," where also the which supplies the water for the city of Springfield, crosses. The reservoir from whence this supply is obtained is located in Ludlow, in the region formerly known as Cherry Valley, and was constructed in 1873 and '74. The number of acres in the bed of the reservoir is 445, to which must be added a marginal area of 360 acres. Of this entire territory 280 acres were woodland. Six and three-eighths acres of swamp have been covered with 13,924 cubic yards of sand, and a little over one-half as much have been sanded between the south dam and the filter. The land was purchased of Benjamin Sikes and sons, Reuben Sikes, S. Billings, A. L. Bennett, C. S. Bennett, J. L. Banister, Mrs. Margaret Sikes, M. King, and C. W. Alden. A ditch of a mile in length turns Higher Brook into the reservoir, and one longer and larger taps Broad Brook, just north of the town line.

EMINENT CITIZENS.

Rev. Joel Chapin was born in Ludlow soon after its original settlement. He served in the Revolutionary war, and afterward received a collegiate education at Dartmouth College.

Hon. Chester W. Chapin, widely known in connection with the railway, manufacturing, and commercial enterprises of the valley, and as a representative in Congress from the Springfield district, is a native of Ludlow, where he passed his early years.

Hon. Gordon M. Fisk, editor of the Palmer Journal, an enterprising newspaper published at Palmer Depot, in Hampden County, who is well known as a former member of the State Senate, and in connection with various other official positions, is also a native of the town.

Other prominent citizens of the town have been Hon. S. Bliss Stebbins, of Boston, Hon. Edwin Booth, of Philadelphia, Hon. Dexter Damon, of Willoughby, Ohio, Hon. Chas. L. Miller, and a number of prominent Christian ministers.

† The prevalent unbelief of later years has caused this legend to be doubted, and modern iconoclasts have presumed to assert that, had the Indians varied a few feet from the alleged course, they might have reached the river by an easy path. The tribe to which these Indians belonged are said to have been called the Caughnawamputs, and their chief "Roaring Thunder."

INDIAN OCCUPATION AND RELICS.

The history of this region before the white man appropriated the lands is preserved only in tradition. The territory comprised within the town of Ludlow, and indeed of all the towns lying along the Chicopee River and in the eastern portion of Hampshire County, constituted one of the principal hunting-grounds of the Indians, and through its entire extent these wild denizens of the forest were accustomed to roam at will in the pursuit of game, and when preparing for the darker deeds of the war-path. The names "Minnechang"* and "Wallamanumps" bear evidence of Indian familiarity with this region, and the relics of their savage warfare and rude agriculture abound to this day throughout the town. Numerous sharp and irregular fragments of stone,—porphyry, quartz, chalcedony, and sandstone,—the chippings thrown off by the Indians in fabricating their implements of warfare, of the chase, and for their domestic use, are found in various places. Thousands of arrow-heads of various sizes, hatchets, chisels, gouges, mortars, and pestles have been picked up within a few years, and a large spearhead, of great value as a curiosity, and also a remarkable gravestone were lately found, the latter wrought somewhat into the human form, being about 3 feet in height. It is supposed to have marked the burial-place of some distinguished chief.†

Of the Indian lore of the neighborhood two incidents have been already given. A precipice on "Facing Hills" is said to have been the theatre of another thrilling adventure. Two women, connected with a small hamlet somewhere in the valley of the Chicopee, were surprised by savages during the absence of the men in the fields. One of them successfully concealed herself under a tub in the cellar. The other was carried off, and when the Indians, closely pursued by the settlers, found their prisoner a burden, they put their victim to a savage death at the spot indicated.‡

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

The first distribution of land within the present territory of Ludlow was made to avoid the reversion of what were known as the "outward commons" of Springfield to the English crown. To avoid such a catastrophe the Springfield colonists voted in town-meeting, Feb. 3, 1685, that after reserving 300 acres for the ministry, and 150 acres for schools, on the east side of the Connecticut River, and due proportions for like purposes on the west side, the remainder should be divided among the 123 heads of families or legal citizens, adding to the latter class the names of all male persons under age.

The "commons" east of the "Great River" seem to have included two sections, bounded by a line running north and south; the line on the east side, commencing at Newbury Ditch, so called, on the boundary of William Clark's land, extending from the hill west of the Norman Lyon homestead, and passing southward near the present residence of Ezekiel Fuller, past the rear of Mr. Haviland's house, and near the crossing of the Springfield, Athol and Northeastern Railroad with the Three Rivers road, across the river and near the Stony Hill road, in Wilbraham. The land thus described was the outward commons eastward of this line. Each of the 125 took a share in the three sections east and the two west of the Great River. The northern section of the east "outward commons," and a small portion of the middle section, are within the present territory of Ludlow. In the north section, east, the school- and ministry-lots ran through Cedar Swamp, near the centre of the present town, and over the north end of Minnechang Mountain. The south boundary must have passed not far from the south shore of Wood Pond, and past the Miller Corner school-lot to the river. The original proprietors of Ludlow, under this division, were Jonathan Burt, Jr., Eliakim Cooley, John Warner, Geo. Colton, Samuel Stebbins, Samuel Marshfield, Ebenezer Jones, Benjamin Knowlton, James Petty, Joseph Ely, Increase Sikes, Sr., Obadiah Miller, Sr., Widow Sikes, Sr., James Munn, David Throw, Widow Bedortha, John Burt, Sr., James Stephenson, and Col. Pyncheon.

The middle section was the first settled, but the name of the first to locate there remains in doubt. Tradition awards the honor to Aaron Colton, whose home was situated on the bluff, above the Chicopee River, where Arthur King now lives, and who is supposed to have settled prior to 1751. James Sheldon, Shem Chapin, and Benjamin Sikes are said to have lived in the town at the same period. James Sheldon is supposed to have lived on the site now occupied by the house in which Reuben Keith resides; Benjamin Sikes, at the place next north of the George S. Page farm, on his allotment of commons; and Shem Chapin, near the home of James M. White. These four are presumed to have been the earliest white settlers of Ludlow, although it is rumored that a man named Antisel occupied a log house on the edge of "Facing Hills," subsisting on game, and that he antedated all of these settlers.

In 1751, Joseph Miller settled with his family where Elihu J. Sikes now lives. The friends in their former home, West Springfield, mourned them as dead, and it is said that a funeral sermon was preached over their departure into the wilds of that unknown region.

A little later, in 1756, Ebenezer Barber sought a home for himself near Shem Chapin's, in the inward commons.

Jonathan Lumbar commenced to clear a farm in the upper part of Cherry Valley, in 1757.

Joshua Fuller cleared a spot on the Dorman place, at the centre, in 1767.

James Kendall came from Ashford and located May 2, 1769.

In 1770, Jonathan Burr moved in an ox-cart from Connecticut, and settled between Mary Lyon's and the mountain.

In 1772 came Joel Willey, to Miller Corner; while a young man from Wilbraham, Isaac Brewer, Jr., married a daughter of Capt. Joseph Miller, and established himself in Ludlow.

Of the other families who came to town and settled about this time a few may be mentioned:

Northward of Colton and Miller, and toward the present centre, lived Benajah Willey, afterward the first district "clerk." Next south of him was a Mr. Ainesworth. Benjamin Sikes, the father of Benjamin, Abner, and John, occupied the farm afterward owned by J. Mann, north of the centre. The son, Abner, settled three miles to the eastward, near the present Alden District school-house. The Hitchcock home, occupied by Josiah and his son, Abner, with families, now forms the homestead of Lucius Simonds, while another son, Joseph, lived next west, and probably Ezra Parsons and John Hubbard not far away. Beriah Jennings was near the present site of the late Ezekiel Fuller's house. Shem Chapin's neighbors were Aaron Ferry, Jacob Cooley, at the Torrey place; Noah Bowker, on the Samuel White farm; Israel Warriner, a little below, and farther to the south. At the mill-privilege were Ezekiel Squires, who built the first grist-mill, and, hard by, Oliver Chapin and the Zachariah Warners,—father and son.

These settlers came from divers places,—from West Springfield, Ashfield, Wilbraham, Shutesbury, Ellington, Glastonbury, Somers, Brookfield, and Bridgewater,—until finally the rough places of "Stony Hill," as the region was formerly called, were made smooth. Forest and swampy dell were made productive fields, and the rocks and hills of Ludlow resounded with the glad acclaim of those who had successfully established themselves.

* This name was applied by the Indians to the whole eastern portion of Wilbraham and Ludlow, and signifies "Berry-land."

† It is more than probable that these relics belong to a much older race than the Indians, and one greatly superior to them in civilization.—[Ed.]

The first roads laid out in the town were rough bridle-paths, marked by blazed trees. After the incorporation of the town, the first mentioned are those from the present west school-house to Ludlow City, and from L. Simonds' to Jenksville. The old Cherry Valley road, through to J. P. Hubbard's, was laid out in 1782, and that from J. L. Mann's to W. G. Fuller's in the same year. A highway from the east cemetery to Miller Corner was projected in 1784, and the same year another across Cedar Swamp. The road from the Congregational Church, northward, was laid out in 1800. In 1793 a petition was sent to the county officers to lay out a road corresponding to the route from Collins' Depot to Granby, as part of a line which shall "commode the travel from the eastern part of Connecticut to Dartmouth Colledge in New Hampshire."

A pound was erected near Elisha Hubbard's in 1776, 30 feet square. Sixteen years later it had fallen into decay. Soon afterward a new one was erected of white oak, near Oliver Dutton's house.

The first reference to guide-boards is in 1795, when it needed a committee of nine to erect "way-posts."

MERCHANTS.

One of the first stores kept in the town was by Elisha Fuller at Ludlow Centre, on the corner opposite the Fuller tavern stand. The exact date of his opening the store is not known, but his book of accounts contains charges against the Rev. Antipas Steward, who was the first pastor of the town, and who was ordained in 1793. Mr. Fuller kept the store probably as late as 1840. During the latter part of the time one was kept in the L of the hotel building. About twenty years ago, Lucien Cooley traded in the Fuller store for a short time. Some time afterward Homer and Arthur King carried on the market and grocery business for a short time.

The first store at Jenksville was established by Benjamin Jenks and partners, probably as early as 1814. After the failure of the Jenks manufacturing enterprise in 1848, Ephraim Jenks & Son are supposed to have traded there for a while. Jerre Miller carried on business in the same building in 1855, and was succeeded by his son Austin. Next, Hezekiah Root & Son traded there; then Walter Miller, followed by Eli M. Smith. Later, David Joy kept store in the same building for several years. Howard & Beckwith, who are still in trade there, commenced in the spring of 1878.

About 1830, Harmon Booth kept a store at Jenksville for several years. He was succeeded by Henry Jenks, and he by Walter Miller. James Jenks and others followed for a short time, and were succeeded by Edmund Bliss, who kept it for several years, and then removed to his present store. Hezekiah Root, after disposing of his old store, established another at Jenksville, and is still in business, in connection with his sons.

TAVERNS.

The oldest tavern kept in Ludlow, it is said, was on the Dorman place, south of the centre. A tavern, called the "Old Ark," stood at the "west middle" part of the town in 1787, and was kept by Ezekiel Fuller. Amos Kendall afterward resided there. Another tavern was kept at the Jennings place by John Jennings, at an early date. One was also kept near the Ezekiel Fuller place by a man named Wright, about the same time. It was a place of popular resort and the centre of terpsichorean festivities.

The next tavern was kept at the centre by Ely Fuller for a number of years. He was there in 1833. This place was long known as the old "Fuller tavern stand," and was also a place of public resort, the town clerk's office being kept there for many successive years, Ely Fuller filling that office. After the death of Mr. Fuller, the tavern was kept by his family for some time, Isaac Plumley succeeding them as proprietor for a few years.

The first tavern at Jenksville was kept by Calvin Eaton. He was succeeded by a man named Sawin, and Ashley Haydon, in turn. It was afterward kept by Jerre Miller. Erasmus Rood kept the last one at Jenksville. There are none in town at the present time.

PHYSICIANS.

The first physician to practice in Ludlow was Dr. Aaron John Miller, who was born Jan. 11, 1750. He married Esther Burr, and died at Ludlow, Nov. 4, 1838. "He was a very tidy man, distinguished for wearing the highest-priced black broadcloth he could find, and always eating molasses instead of butter on his bread, drinking clear tea, and a very little old New England rum and water. He was a rapid talker, made his fever-powders of camphor-gum and loaf-sugar, and was never known to hurt his patients with his medicines. He usually walked on his visits to patients, always accompanied by his little yellow dog. He was intolerant of others' opinions, and emphasized his own with frequent thrusts of his cane." He was a surgeon in the Revolutionary war, and is reliably reported to have been a member of the original Boston Tea-Party.

The next physician appears to have been Dr. Francis Percival. Dr. Benjamin Trask practiced in 1777. A Dr. Wood lived down in "Miller Corner," and practiced about the same time. Dr. Simpson Ellis and Dr. David Lyon followed next in turn; also Dr. Sylvester Nash, who married a daughter of Rev. Antipas Steward, the first settled minister. Dr. Philip Lyon next engaged in practice about 1802. Drs. Taintor, Sutton, Munger, Hamilton, and Estis Howes followed. Dr. Elijah Caswell practiced for many years, until his death, March 4, 1844. He lived west of the centre, his residence being known as the "Caswell place." Dr. Washington B. Alden lived at Ludlow Centre, and practiced somewhat later. Dr. Bassett engaged in practice about 1840. He was followed by Dr. R. G. English. Dr. William B. Miller resided at Jenksville for a time and engaged in the practice of his profession. He subsequently removed to the city of Springfield, where he is now practicing. Dr. Henry M. T. Smith and Dr. C. B. Smith practiced in turn at Jenksville. Dr. Robert Wood commenced practice at Jenksville about the same time as Dr. William B. Miller, and continued until the year 1875, when he died. Dr. King practiced for a short time contemporaneously with Dr. Wood. Dr. Benjamin K. Johnson married a daughter of Dr. Caswell, and engaged in practice near Ludlow Centre. Dr. T. W. Lyman resided at the centre at the breaking out of the Rebellion, and pursued the practice of his profession. Dr. Robert Wood was the last regular practicing physician in the town, there having been none since his death, in 1875.

ATTORNEYS.

John Jennings is said to have been the only lawyer who ever practiced in the town, and that at a very early date. He is believed to have lived at one time near the residence of Ezekiel Fuller, where he had an office. His usefulness continued for many years. It is not definitely known whether he was a regularly licensed practitioner. His name does not appear in the roll of attorneys in the county of Hampshire, from 1786 to 1826, nor on the roll of Hampden County attorneys. His principal business seems to have been the drawing of papers and the giving of wholesome advice.

ORGANIZATION.

In the year 1774, the population of the town having increased to 200 or 300, measures were taken to establish a separate corporate organization, and a petition to that effect was presented to the royal Governor, Thomas Hutchinson, and the General Court. No good reason appearing why the application should not be granted, an act of incorporation was passed by the Legislature, Feb. 23, 1774, and became a law by the signature of the Governor on the 28th day of the same month. By this act that part of the township of Springfield called "Stony Hill" was erected into a separate district by the name of Ludlow, being "invested with all the powers and privileges" which towns in the province enjoyed by law, "that of choosing and sending a representative to the General Assembly only excepted."* This latter privilege was only to be exercised in conjunction with Springfield.

The boundaries of the new district of Ludlow were as follows:

"Bounding southerly on Chicopee River; east on the east line of said Springfield and west line of Belchertown; northerly on the north line of said Springfield, or partly on Belchertown and partly on Granby, and extending westward so far as to include all that part of the outward commons, so called, that lies in the northeast corner of the township of Springfield, and extending also in a line parallel with the west line of said outward commons one mile and three-quarters farther west, into the inward commons, so called, in said Springfield, north of Chicopee River."

Provision was also made for including the farms of Zachariah Warner, senior and junior, Oliver Chapin, and Ezekiel Squire, for the calling of a district meeting by warrant, and in regard to the ministry and school lands, the distribution of public funds, and general matters relating to the setting off of the district.

The warrant for the first district meeting was issued by the "Honorable John Worthington, directed to some principal inhabitant," and in the language of Benajah Willey, the first clerk of the new municipality,—

"The first town-meeting was held at the house of Abner Hitchcock, March 16, 1774. Moses Bliss, Esq., of Springfield, was chosen Moderator; Benajah Willey, Clerk; Aaron Ferry, Abner Sikes, and Joseph Miller were chosen Selectmen; Joshua Fuller and Jacob Kendall, Wardens; Joseph Jones, John Hubbard, Jr., and Joseph Hitchcock, Assessors; John Sikes and Jacob Cooley, Constables; Joseph Miller, Treasurer; Beriah Jennings, Joel Willey, and Noah Bowker were elected Surveyors; James Chapin and Oliver Chapin, Titlingmen; Israel Warriner and Isaac Brewer, Fence-Viewers; Isaac Warriner and Ezra Parsons, Hog-Reeves; Ezekiel Squires, Aaron Colton, and Jonathan Lombard, Deer-Reeves."

Of the origin of the name of "Ludlow,"† bestowed on the town by the act of incorporation, no positive information can be obtained. Investigators have been forced into the region of conjecture, and several theories have been advanced, some of them more or less plausible, but none of them bearing the indelible stamp of authenticity. The more probable theory in regard to the matter is that the town may have been named after Edmund Ludlow, who lived previous to and during the protectorate of Oliver Cromwell, in England, was a member of Parliament, and a popular leader of the people in those stormy times, and who, though one of the king's judges, was a consistent republican and an earnest supporter of the bill for the abolition of the House of Peers. It is not unreasonable to suppose that his name, associated as it was with genuine republicanism like that of John Hampden, his contemporary, whose name was afterward bestowed on the county, should, for like reasons, have been previously joined to one of its towns. Another suggested origin of the name is from one Roger Ludlow, a prominent citizen in early New England colonial history, who was a candidate for Governor of the Massachusetts Bay Colony, in 1634, and who afterward removed to Windsor, Conn., and drew up for the people a code of laws long known as "Ludlow's Code."

The bounds of the town were changed in 1805 so as to include more of the territory of Springfield, extending from the mouth of Higher Brook northward to the South Hadley line. In 1813 the original line had evidently been restored.

Nearly every highway east of the mountain was either laid out or relaid before 1811. In 1817 was established the highway from Joy's store to Plumley's, to accommodate travel from Jenksville to the Three River factories in Palmer. The only prominent highway constructed since 1848 has been the road from Eaton's Mills to Indian Orchard, including the iron bridge spanning the Chicopee River at that village, which was built by order of the county commissioners in 1866.

In earlier times only the most primitive methods of crossing the Chicopee River were employed; these were "riding-places," or fords, at Wallamanumps, and where Collins' bridge now spans the river. As early as 1781 a committee from Ludlow was to meet another from Springfield to see about the construction of a bridge at Wallamanumps. Seven years later, £50 were granted for a like purpose in April, and in November a committee on subscriptions was appointed, possibly to secure a better bridge than the town felt able to construct unassisted. In 1792 the bridge had either been carried away or become unfit for use, for the town petitioned the county authorities for another. In 1794 the Putnam's, or "Put's," bridge was erected, and stood until 1801, when another is said to have taken its place, and remained until about 1812, when the bridge known as Cooley's bridge was erected by Ariel Cooley. This having been worn out or carried away, measures were taken to build another, resulting in 1822 in the completion of the present substantial structure, at a cost of $3347.80.

The first bridge erected at Collins' Depot dates beyond 1850, but was carried away by a flood. The present structure was erected in 1851. The Red bridge was thoroughly overhauled and repaired in 1873.

VILLAGES AND HAMLETS.

The principal village in the town is what is known as situated in the southwestern part of the town, on the Chicopee River. It was formerly known as "Put's Bridge," after the bridge which was erected at that point by a man named Putnam. This village is of comparatively modern date, and has grown up around the flourishing industrial enterprises which the excellent water-power attracted there. The Ludlow Manufacturing Company now have several mills in the village. Besides these there are about fifty dwelling-houses, a boarding-house, several stores, and a church building, which was erected by the manufacturers of the village, and is now used as a union house of worship.

Post-Office.—The post-office was established about 1815. The mail-route for a while was through the town from north to south, a cavalier with drawn pistols carrying the precious bag. The first postmaster was Benjamin Jenks. His successors have been S. B. Stebbins, Jerre Miller, Walter Miller, Louis Harrington, Eli M. Smith, and David Joy.

LUDLOW CENTRE

is the oldest village of the town, where the first meeting-house was erected, the first measures for town organization adopted, and around which are to be found the most ancient landmarks.

Some fifteen or twenty neat dwelling-houses, a Methodist and a Congregational Church and chapel, comprise the village.

A post-office was established at the centre June 17, 1874, the date of the centennial celebration of the town, and in recognition of the progressive spirit of the age. Mrs. Susan A. Chapin was appointed the first postmistress, and still fills that position.

"LUDLOW CITY" is a name bestowed upon a small collection of houses in the northwestern corner of the town. The inhabitants devote themselves assiduously to the cultivation of the soil.

MOODY CORNERS is a small hamlet near the western border of the town, at the crossing of two roads, and marked by a small collection of houses.

MILLER CORNER is a name early bestowed on the southeastern corner of the town because of the first settlement in that locality of the Miller family. Quite a settlement has grown up on the Ludlow side of the river, opposite Collins' Depot, or North Wilbraham, and some of the most energetic and substantial citizens of the town reside there.

SCHOOLS.

The earliest reference to education in the town records is in 1777, when in troublous times, and with an inflated currency, the town voted £400 for the support of schools. A little later came an appropriation of £20, which in 1794 had increased to £35. In 1800 the amount raised was $133.

The management of school affairs seems to have been given at first to the selectmen, but not always to the satisfaction of the citizens, for in 1788 they voted to accept their arrangement of districts, "Except Eight Families East of Capt. Joseph Miller's; and two Families North of Zephaniah Rood's." A committee for districting, appointed the next year, did their work successfully. District No. 1 included the present 1 and 2, very nearly. No. 2 was about the same as the present No. 3. No. 3 of that day was the Miller Corner of 1878; No. 4, Cherry Valley; and No. 5, the existing No. 9. The selectmen were to hire the school-masters and maintain six months' schooling in Nos. 1 and 3.

In 1791 a committee to locate and build school-houses were intrusted with £90 for the purpose. In 1794 the school management passed into the hands of a committee from each district. The town appropriated £6 for a singing-school in 1791, and appointed a committee to hire a singing-master. The Alden District was set off in 1808, the Centre in 1809, Wallamanumps in 1814, and the Lyon District in 1822. The first reference to the West Middle District was in 1822.

Among the early school-teachers of the town may be mentioned Theodocia Howard and Mary B. Newell.

There are at present nine school districts in Ludlow, which, by a two-thirds vote of the town, are still conducted upon the district system, in accordance with the provisions of the act of the Legislature of 1870. The number of scholars in attendance is about 180. About $2000 is annually devoted to the use of the schools.

CHURCHES.

CONGREGATIONAL, LUDLOW CENTRE.

One of the earliest matters which received attention after the incorporation of the district of Ludlow was the establishment of stated religious services. The efforts to that end were more or less impeded by the unsettled condition of the times, and a long period elapsed before the religious affairs of the town assumed a definite shape.

Previous to Nov. 27, 1793, no regular pastor was employed. The first to officiate was Rev. Pelatiah Chapin, as a supply, who was hired for that purpose in accordance with a vote of the town, passed April 22, 1774. In 1779, Rev. Mr. Davenport was hired for one month. In 1783 the Rev. M. Hutchings seems to have supplied the pulpit for a time. The next year Rev. David Haskill received a call to be the regular pastor, but declined. Other persons who seem to have preached for the people in those days were Rev. Stephen Fuller, Rev. Allen Pratt, Rev. William Stone, Rev. Aaron Woodward, and the notorious Stephen Burroughs for one day.

On June 1, 1793, the town voted to give the Rev. Antipas Steward a call, and that gentleman was duly ordained the first regular pastor of Ludlow, Nov. 27, 1793. His compensation was £60 annually, with an addition of 30 cords of wood. Mr. Steward was born at Marlboro', Mass., in 1734, and was graduated at Harvard University in 1760. He continued pastor of the church until 1803, when he was duly dismissed by council. The latter part of his ministrations was attended by unseemly controversies in the church.

After the departure of Mr. Steward, Rev. Laban Thurber, a Baptist, supplied the pulpit in 1805 and 1806, and Rev. Abner Phelps in 1808. In 1810 or 1811, Rev. Elijah Hedding, then presiding elder of the New London district of the Methodist Episcopal Church, resided in Ludlow, and supplied the pulpit with great acceptance for a year. Rev. Alexander McLean, also a Methodist, was the next minister employed. He commenced his labors in 1813, and continued until 1816, when, denominational differences having arisen, he was compelled to retire, as the Congregationalists would no longer affiliate with the town's minister. In 1819 the town and society united in calling to the pulpit Rev. Ebenezer Burt Wright, who was duly ordained pastor on December 8th of that year, and continued to exercise the office with especial acceptance and benefit to the town until his dismissal, because of failing health, in October, 1835. A colleague, in the person of David R. Austin, of Norwich, Conn., had been previously settled in 1833, and continued pastor until the winter of 1835, when he assumed the principalship of the academy at Monson. The First Parish in the town of Ludlow was organized Dec. 9, 1835. The organization grew out of a controversy regarding the ministry fund, which occasioned much trouble and litigation for a time, but which the courts finally adjudged to belong to the Congregationalists.

The Rev. Alonzo Sanderson was the next regular pastor. He was settled in 1839, and continued his ministry four years, being dismissed May 11, 1843. Rev. Jeremy W. Tuck was ordained and installed Sept. 6, 1843, and was dismissed Dec. 7, 1859. Rev. Warren Mayo next filled the pastorate until 1862, when he was dismissed. An interim of two years was followed by the settlement of Rev. Chester Bridgman, whose service extended from May 18, 1864, to July 24, 1866. Rev. Chester L. Cushman was settled Nov. 2, 1866, and continued his ministry until his dismissal, Sept. 1, 1874. Rev. Samuel V. McDuffee is the present pastor, and was duly installed in 1875. The church is in a prosperous condition, the membership large, and an interesting Sabbath-school is connected therewith.

At the formation of the church, in 1789, it was presented with a heavy communion-service from the mother-town, inscribed "Springfield, First Church, 1742," which was continued in use until 1846, when it was replaced by a more costly set, the bequest of Abner Cady.

The first meeting-house was erected in 1784, and was at first merely inclosed with rough boards, without floors, plastering, or doors. On Oct. 23, 1783, the town voted "that the building committee procure a sufficient quantity of rum for raising the meeting-house frame." The second meeting-house used by the society was erected in 1840, but was destroyed by fire Jan. 15, 1859. The same year the present commodious house of worship was erected. A small but neat chapel is also owned by the society, which is located nearly opposite the church. The deacons of the church down to 1878 have been Jonathan Bartlett, Timothy Keyes, Jonathan Clough, David Lyon, Job Pease, Stephen Jones, Benjamin Sikes, Oliver Dutton, Joseph Miller, Ashbel Burr, and Alva Sikes.

METHODISTS.

The advent of Methodism in Ludlow occurred in the last decade of the last century. The first itinerant who visited the town was probably George Pickering, and the second George Roberts, whose efforts antedate 1793. The first prominent layman in town was Samuel Frost, familiarly known as "Master Frost." In 1793 he invited the itinerants to visit the town and preach at his house. Nathaniel Chapin responded, and two men, Uriah Clough and Joel Farnum, are said to have accompanied him.

In 1795 the Tolland circuit itinerants from Wilbraham supplied statedly. The most prominent of these were Menzies Rayner, Lemuel Smith, Zadoc Priest, Daniel Ostrander, and Laban Clark. In the fall of 1801, David Orentt, perhaps the first class-leader in the town, removed there, and for seven years meetings were held at Samuel Frost's. The circuit preacher who organized the class was Henry Eames, and the date March 29, 1802. There were about a dozen members. Augustin Jocelyn, the next circuit preacher, established a Sabbath appointment in Ludlow, and spent a considerable portion of his time there. The movement progressed with more or less success until the year 1828, when, through the personal efforts of Rev. Wilbur Fisk, the principal of Wilbraham Academy, a church 40 by 50 feet was erected, and dedicated July 5th of that year. Methodism was now fairly established in the town, and Rev. Isaac Jennison and Noah Perrin supplied the charge that year. About this time the itinerant ministers began to visit Jenksville. Rev. Mr. Foster, another principal of the Wilbraham Academy, was probably the pioneer, and made his first visit on invitation of John Miller. Samuel Davis was in charge in 1831, and through his efforts the interests of the denomination throughout the town were greatly advanced, and many persons were converted. The meeting-house was repaired and remodeled in 1858, and still stands at the centre, and the society is in a prosperous condition. A second Methodist meeting-house was erected in 1848, at Jenksville, but owing to the failure of the manufacturing company there the society languished, the house was sold for a nominal sum, and removed to Warren, Worcester Co., where, remodeled, it still does duty for the denomination in whose interests it was erected.

The following has been the succession of Methodist ministers at Ludlow Centre:

1826, Wilbur Fisk, D.D.; 1827, Isaac Jennison; 1829, Aaron Wait; 1830-31, Samuel Davis; 1832, Salmon Hull; 1833, Paul Townsend; 1834, Charles D. Rogers; 1835, Amasa Taylor; 1836-37, Philo Hawks; 1838, Charles Virgin; 1839-40, James Nichols; 1841, William Campbell; 1841-42, John W. Dammun; 1843, William A. Clapp; 1844, William Fleming; 1845, Asa Barnes; 1846, Ephraim Scott; 1847, Luther B. Clark; 1848-49, John Caldwell; 1850-51, Moses Stoddard; 1852-53, James W. Mowry; 1854-55, Kinsman Atkinson; 1856, Nathan A. Soule; 1857-58, Franklin Fisk; 1859-60, George Prentice; 1861, Wm. G. Leonard; 1862-63, Daniel K. Banister; 1864-66, William J. Pouffret; 1867-68, Levin A. Bosworth; 1869, Jonas M. Clark; 1870, John W. Lee; 1871-72, John W. Merrill, D.D.; 1873-74, Alfred Noon; 1875-77, N. H. Martin; 1878, Charles H. Vinton.

UNION CHURCH, JENKSVILLE.

Religious affairs at Jenksville have partaken more or less of a union character from their earliest inception. In 1845 and 1846, Daniel E. Chapin was preacher in charge of the Methodist Society. Under his popular ministry, a successful effort was made to erect a church, resulting in the edifice now standing, which was built principally by the manufacturing corporation. Rev. Dr. Holdrich, afterward connected with the American Bible Society, preached the dedicatory sermon. A question of privileges in the house arising between the Methodists and Congregationalists, the former erected for themselves the house that has been referred to. The Congregationalists had meanwhile organized a church, June 24, 1847, and called Rev. William Hall, who was settled in 1848; but, in consequence of failure of the manufacturing enterprise at Jenksville, and the loss of population, he felt compelled to resign, and was dismissed the same year. Both religious societies suffered greatly because of this failure, and it was a long time before they recovered from its effects.

An interesting revival occurred in 1857, which resulted in the coming of a Conference preacher the following spring, who, with annual successors, occupied the desk of the church until 1863. Four years later a union church was organized, which, composed of the members of both societies, has since been provided with a common pastor,—sometimes Methodist, and sometimes Congregational. Such is the present status of ecclesiastical affairs at the village. The following persons have officiated as pastors there, the letters at the end of each name indicating the denomination to which each one belonged:

1841-42, B. F. Lombard (M. E.); 1846, Daniel E. Chapin (M. E.); 1847, David Sherman (M. E.); 1848, Z. A. Mudge (M. E.); 1848, William Hall (Cong.); 1857, W. H. Daniels (M. E.); 1858, David K. Merrill (M. E.); 1859, L. R. S. Brewster (M. E.); 1860-61, George E. Chapman (M. E.); 1862, John Noon (M. E.); 1863, J. A. Kibbe (M. E.); 1864, A. Gardner (Cong.); 1872, H. E. Crocker (M. E.); 1873, J. A. De Forest (M. E.); 1874, Timothy Lyman (Cong.). The present pastor is Rev. C. L. Cushman.

BURIAL-PLACES.

The oldest place of burial in the town is located about a mile northwest of the centre, near the residence of Truman Hubbard. This piece of land was presented to the town by Benjamin Sikes, and a suitable acknowledgment of the gift is thus noted in the town records:

"Received a deed of Gift from Mr Benjamin Sikes of a Certain piece of land, in order to or as a place to bury our Dead. Voted also that the Thanks of the Town be returned for the same to the said Mr Sikes for his Benevolence."

A board fence was ordered to be put around it in 1782, and in 1825 it was repaired. The present fence was erected in 1866. The ground is in a good condition and is still in use. Many of the earliest settlers of the town are there interred. Among the inscriptions on the various tombstones is the following:

"In memory of Mrs. Sarah, wife of Mr. Timothy Root, who died Mar. 3, 1785, in her 44 year. Also an Infant buried by her side.

Other persons buried there are Lieut. John Sikes, who died July 27, 1807, in his sixtieth year; Hannah Sikes, wife of Benjamin Sikes, who died April 17, 1790, aged eighty-four years; Mrs. Hannah, wife of John Sikes, who died June 9, 1772, in her twenty-third year; Abner Sikes, who died June 24, 1800, in his seventieth year; and Beriah Jennings, who died May 12, 1776, in the forty-fifth year of her age.

What is known as the East burying-ground was laid out about 1801, and is situated on the extreme eastern border of the town. It has been recently enlarged. The ground is still in use, and contains the remains of many persons who have been early and prominently associated with the affairs of the town. Among others are David Paine, who died July 2, 1807, aged seventy, as the inscription says, "by a cart-wheel running across his breast; he expired instantly," and Nicholas Daniels, who died April 26, 1827, aged sixty-five.

The Centre burying-ground is located near the Congregational Church, and was presented to the town by Elisha Fuller in 1801. A substantial fence was placed around it in 1805, which was repaired in 1817 and 1825. Great excitement was occasioned about this time by a proposal to remove all the bodies previously interred there. Some of the stones indicate that it must have been in use as a place of burial some time before the formal ceding of the ground. It was probably laid out in 1786, the first burial taking place in that year. Among the inscriptions upon its various tombstones are the following:

"In memory of Doct Philip Lyon, who died July 26, 1802, aged 40 years, who, after having experienced the sweets of conjugal bliss, died, leaving no family. His amiable consort died at Randolph, Oct., 1801."

"Sacred to the Memory of Mrs. Mary, wife of Mr. Leonard Miller, who died in Childbed, June 6, 1790, in the 38th year of her age. Besides a birth, and she left 8 small Children to mourn her untimely fate."

"In memory of Chester, the son of Mr. Asa & Mrs. Sarah Dodge, who Died Sept^r 11th, 1805, aged 3 years 4 months and 18 days."

"With dysentery and with worms,
God did Death licence give,
To take my precious Soul away,
And say I should not live."

Among the oldest inscriptions are those of two children of Capt. Joseph Miller, who respectively died Oct. 13, 1786, and Dec. 10, 1787; Cyprian and Lucy Wright, who died, Jan. 7, 1779, in his forty-fifth year, and she, Aug. 22, 1794, in the thirty-seventh year of her age; and Capt. Joseph Miller, who died April 3, 1803, aged seventy-nine years.

"Praises on tombs are Titles vainly spent,
A man's good name is
His best monument."

What is known as the New cemetery is situated southwest of the centre, and was purchased and opened in 1842. It comprises 3 acres of land, which were originally a part of the farm of Increase Sikes, and contains many handsome monuments. It is in constant use, and is neatly fenced.

The Jenksville cemetery is situated a little northeast of the village, and was laid out probably about 1830. The first reference to it contained in the records of the town is on May 30, 1842, when the town is asked to enlarge it. It contains the remains of many persons who have been prominently associated with the growth and development of that section of the town.

NOTES AND INCIDENTS.

In 1804 the town magnanimously appropriated $25 "to the present singers, on condition they sing well and still continue to sing, to the Edification of the Inhabitants of s^d town;" and two years after, a committee was again empowered to hire a singing-master.

The voters of the town seem to have indulged in all the privileges of American citizenship. At one time they solemnly and with full assurance "voted that James Bowdoin, Esq., be governor."

In the year 1817 a man named John Annibal went from Belchertown to Connecticut to peddle wagons for one Filer. On his return he was seen to enter Ludlow about sundown. Afterward his horse, with bridle cut, was seen in Granby, near Asa Pease's house. His portmanteau and saddle were found near Ezekiel Fuller's, and blood was discovered in the road between these points. Great excitement prevailed, as every one thought he had been robbed and murdered. A vigorous search was made for the body, a pond covering an acre of land being drained; but all to no purpose, and the mystery remains unexplained to this day.

About 1830, one Wright, a deaf-mute, residing over the mountain, disappeared quite suddenly. He was supposed to have had an altercation with one of the citizens living in another part of the town, and foul play was suspected. A melancholy interest was added to the affair by the finding of a skeleton in an outlet long afterward, which bore unmistakable signs of identity with the missing man.

INDUSTRIAL PURSUITS.

The principal occupation of the inhabitants of Ludlow has been agriculture. At the present time, although several prominent manufacturing industries have become established in the town, the majority of the population devote their time and energies to tilling their excellent farms, finding a ready market for their products in the adjoining city of Springfield.

Attempts at manufacturing were made in the latter part of the last century. In the laying of a road reference is made to "the saw-mill of Jonathan Burr and Company," afterward with the water-power known as the McLean privilege. A mill of some kind was also in operation in the extreme north part of the town, at the "city." At the southwest corner there was also a saw-mill.

Early in the present century Rufus Calkins had a little chair-shop a mile up Higher Brook from the centre post-office. Here were made many of the old chairs now to be seen in the more ancient houses of the people. At one time he also adjusted a spindle, by means of which he could spin flax or wool. His was the first manufacturing of the kind in the town.

Farther down, below Warren Fuller's privilege, was, in 1814, a little fulling-mill, operated by Gustavus Pinney. Near the bank, at two different places successively, Elisha Fuller carried on an ashery, the last location being opposite the present Methodist Church, on the lot now owned by the society. Harris' mill-privilege was under improvement in 1805, under the name of the "Continental Mill."

On Broad Brook were two privileges, now unused, where were located Thornton's saw-mill at the foot of Burying-Ground Hill, and Alden's sash-and-blind shop, a few rods above. At Ludlow City was at one time a distillery. Tarkilns were set up here and there, traces being still discernible on Facing Hills and elsewhere.

Near the old Sikes place, south of the brook, a mile north of the centre churches, is still shown the ruins of the once-famous Ludlow Glass-Works, the wonder of the region. Here stood a small building, partly masonry and partly wood, in which were ponderous furnaces. The article made was green glass, mostly in the shape of bottles. It existed a few years, but finally suspended operations.

The falls of Wallamanumps early attracted attention. In 1788 reference is made to "Deacon Timothy Keyes' mill-dam" at this point. About the opening of the present century Abner Putnam came from the east, and improved the privilege by erecting a shop for the manufacture of scythes, which developed into a considerable business.

About 1840, Plumley's saw-mill at the mouth of Broad Brook utilized the fine water-power at that point, while the Alden Mills above turned out large numbers of farm-forks and rakes. Fisk's mill, at the "city," manufactured a durable and handsome woolen fabric, well known in this region. Here, too, were brought fleeces from the neighboring farms for carding. Jacob S. Eaton also had a share of this trade at his mill, near Indian Orchard, where wool was carded and satinnet manufactured.

The principal manufacturing enterprise at the present time is that of the

LUDLOW MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

The beginnings of the present important operations of the company date back to the year 1812, when Benjamin Jenks, then of Smithfield, R. I., ignoring the opportunity to purchase the present site of the city of Rochester, N. Y., with its splendid water-power, at the same sum, bought the privilege at Wallamanumps (Jenksville) of Capt. Abram Putnam.

A company was formed in 1814, and did a limited business in the manufacture of cotton warps, which were sent into families to be made into cloth with woolen "fillings."

On the 31st of December, 1821, the proprietors met and organized, according to the act of incorporation, as the Springfield Manufacturing Company. This company carried on a large business in the manufacture of cotton goods until July 14, 1848, when it failed for a large amount. In 1840-46 it manufactured gun-barrels for the United States Government at the upper privilege.

After the failure of the Springfield Manufacturing Company, the firm of Wood & Merritt carried on the business from 1848 to 1856, when it was merged into the first Ludlow Manufacturing Company. The power was for a number of years leased to George H. Doane, who fitted up the stone mills that had been erected by the old company for the manufacture of jute goods, and the upper mill for the manufacture of wadding. After the expiration of the lease, Mr. Doane purchased the property and formed the Ludlow Mills Company, which, after carrying on business for a while, sold out to the present Ludlow Manufacturing Company, of which L. H. Brigham is agent.

The enterprise is now in a prosperous condition, and new additions and improvements are being made by the company. Besides the large stone mill erected by the first company, and the mill at the upper privilege, the company erected during the past summer (1878) an extensive and elegant brick mill, near the stone mill. A canal has also during the same time been dug, at great labor and expense, across the company's site, with a view of increasing the facilities.

The goods now made are, at the stone mills, gunny-bagging, various kinds of crashes, plain and figured, and all kinds of hardware-twines and linen warps; and at the upper privilege are made cotton warps and seamless grain-bags of the same material. The company employs about 400 persons, paying monthly about $10,000 in wages. The number of employes will be greatly augmented when the new mill is completed.

MILITARY.

The town of Ludlow was barely established before it was called upon to pass through the trying times of the Revolution.

In 1774, Joseph Miller was appointed to represent the town in the several conventions which were held at Concord, Salem, Cambridge, and Watertown, and in the fearful struggle that followed, one in every seven of the town's inhabitants left, for a longer or shorter time, their homes and loves "for a life in the tented field." The records make evident the fact that every burden imposed by the war was cheerfully borne, every tax paid, and every responsibility met. The following inhabitants of the town served in the war of the Revolution:

Ichabod Barker, Ezekiel Beebe, Caesar Begory (colored), Nondiah Burr, Reuben Burt, Joel Chapin, Charles Chorley, Aaron Colton, Solomon Cooley, Edward Cotton, Oliver Dutton, Ezekiel Fuller, Lothrop Fuller, Jabez Goodale, Joseph Hitchcock, Joseph Jennings, John Johnson, David Lombard, Jonathan Lombard, Dr. Aaron J. Miller, George Miller, Jr., Leonard Miller, David Paine, Tyrus Pratt, Samuel Scranton, Thomas Temple, Moses Wilder, Cyprian Wright.

In 1786-87 occurred the Shays rebellion, in which Ludlow had her share, furnishing, it is claimed, recruits to both parties.

The Shays column of malcontents is supposed to have passed through the town on its way to Springfield, and also in its retreat. On its passage through South Hadley, Isaiah Call, a Ludlow man, was killed by a chance shot from a house. The others in the Shays forces whose names are preserved as being from Ludlow were Titus Pratt, John Jennings, and Samuel Olds.

The war of 1812 received no special notice on the records of the town, although Ludlow was not backward in furnishing her quota of men. The citizens who participated in the service were

Henry Acres, Gideon Cotton, Samuel Gates, Chester Kendall, Amos Root, Charles F. Wood, Benjamin Ainsworth, Lemuel Gardiner, John Howard, Reuben Parsons, Veranus Shattuck, Gordon B. Wood, Harvey Wood.

The Mexican war fever reached Ludlow, but only took effect in one case, Joseph Rood, who is supposed to have been wounded in one of the frays in the land of the Aztecs.

In the days of the great Rebellion but one sentiment was manifest in Ludlow. Few towns were more active, and none more loyal. As early as April 27, 1861, the citizens met and appropriated $2000 as a bounty to those who would enlist. In August of the next year $100 was offered to each of the 17 men who enlisted. Throughout the entire war the people were equally earnest and patriotic. Out of a population of 1200 souls, Ludlow furnished 120 men to the army, of which the following is a list. Those who fell are designated by a *.

The war over and some of the men returned, measures were taken in 1866 to erect a monument to the memory of the fallen. The memorial was constructed of Monson stone, and cost $1025. It was dedicated with appropriate ceremonies in the summer of 1867. It stands near the Congregational Church at Ludlow Centre,—a worthy testimonial to the bravery of the dead and the patriotism and public spirit of the living.

In preparing this history of the town, assistance, for which the writer is grateful, was cheerfully furnished by Benjamin F. Burr, Ambrose Clough, Ezekiah Root, and other citizens. Great aid was also afforded by the excellent Centennial History published in 1875, and compiled by Rev. Alfred Noon.

LONGMEADOW.

GEOGRAPHICAL.

THIS town is situated centrally on the southern line of the county, and is bounded north by Springfield, south by the towns of Enfield and Somers, in Hartford County, Conn., east by Hampden, and west by Agawam, in Hampden County, from the latter of which it is separated by the Connecticut River. Its average length, east and west, is about seven miles, and its average width a little more than three and a half miles, with an area of twenty-five square miles, or 16,000 acres.

NATURAL FEATURES.

The western half of this township is comparatively level. The lowest level is the famous "long meadow" on the river. Back of this at an average distance of about three-fourths of a mile is an abrupt rise of some sixty or eighty feet to the second "terrace" of the Connecticut River, which is on the same level as the armory in Springfield, and constitutes the principal plain of the great valley. On this plain is situated the old village of Longmeadow. Between this village and East Longmeadow lies a comparative wilderness covered with an extensive growth of forest-trees, conspicuous and important among which is the "lofty pine."

The eastern portion of the town is considerably broken by a chain of hills, many of which reach a considerable altitude. This region was formerly designated as "Poverty Hill," in allusion to its supposed sterility, but in later years, under improved systems of cultivation, it has fully redeemed itself from this stigma, and now contains the largest portion of the town's population.

The streams are quite abundant. In the western section, starting from the north and proceeding southward, Pecowsic Brook, Cooley's Brook, Wheelmeadow Brook, Longmeadow Brook, and Raspberry Brook each flow into the Connecticut River. The most important of these streams are Pecowsic Brook and Longmeadow Brook, each of which has its rise in the eastern part of the town, and both have been utilized to a greater or less extent for industrial purposes. Long Dingle and Entry Dingle Brooks are small affluents of Pecowsic Brook in the northwestern part of the town.

In the eastern section are only two streams of importance. Watchaug (sometimes written Oatchaug) Brook flows southerly into Connecticut, and, uniting with the Seantie, from Wilbraham, finds its way into the Connecticut River at East Windsor. The South Branch of Mill River rises near the eastern border of the town, and flows northerly into Springfield.

The soil of the town is quite variable. In the western part it is good and productive, yielding satisfactory returns to those engaging in agricultural pursuits. The bottom-lands along the Connecticut River are abundantly fertile. The central part of the town is sandy, and cannot be cultivated with any degree of success. In the eastern part the soil is good, and, although it requires careful cultivation, is reasonably productive. Red sandstone, which forms so prominent a geologic feature of the valley, abounds in the eastern part of the town, and is quarried to a considerable extent for building purposes.*

* See general chapter on geology.

RAILROADS.

The town enjoys an abundance of railroad facilities, each section being fully provided for. The New Haven, Hartford and Springfield Railroad passes through the western part of the town, between the village and the river, having a station at Longmeadow. It was first opened for traffic on the 9th of December, 1844. East Longmeadow is accommodated by the Connecticut Central Railroad, which passes through the town just east of the geographical centre. It has a station at the village of East Longmeadow, and was opened in the spring of 1876.

EMINENT MEN.

Longmeadow has produced her full share of men who have risen to positions of prominence in the world of religion, letters, and politics. Among these are included a large number of clergymen of eminence. Others of her citizens have achieved success in other walks of life, among whom mention may be made of Hon. Wm. Ely, a native of Longmeadow, subsequently a resident of Springfield, and a member of Congress.

INDIAN OCCUPATION.

The town of Longmeadow was without a doubt occupied by the Indians in the early days of the settlement of Springfield. Local evidences still remain, and these are supplemented by the pages of history. After the settlement of the town its territory was frequently the highway of the Indians as they passed north and south on their predatory and hostile excursions. Its forests also afforded a convenient hiding-place to the savages during the terrible events of King Philip's war. March 26, 1676, the town was the seat of a tragedy which involved the death of one of the first settlers and principal inhabitants. It was a Sabbath day, and a party of eighteen persons—men, women, and children—started from Longmeadow to attend public worship at Springfield. They had proceeded as far as Pecowsic Brook, accompanied by a small guard, when they were assaulted by a band of eight savages, and John Keep, his wife, and their infant child were killed, and several others wounded. Mr. Keep was a prominent man in the town, and held the office of selectman, Longmeadow being then a part of Springfield. Other incidents attending the occupation of the town by the Indians will be found referred to in the general history.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

The first settlement of the town of Longmeadow is said to have been made about the year 1644, eight years after the settlement of Springfield. Among the earliest settlers were Benjamin Cooley, George Colton, known in the records by the name of "Quartermaster Colton," and John Keep. These were probably the first three to establish themselves in the town, although tradition says there was still a fourth, who is supposed to have been a Burt or a Bliss. At any rate, families of both these names were early settled in the "long meadow." The Ely family probably settled as early as 1650 or 1660. They are descended from Nathaniel Ely, who came from England, and was one of the first settlers of Connecticut, but who finally removed to Springfield, where he died, Dec. 28, 1675. The Stebbins family, represented in the persons of Jonathan and Samuel Stebbins, were also early settlers of the town. They were there as early as 1717, and possibly very much earlier.

The first settlers located on the meadow which borders the Connecticut River, and were probably attracted to the town by those rich bottom-lands which, throughout the entire valley, had afforded the principal inducements to early settlement. The country was then young, the emigrants who sought its shores were poor and largely dependent upon the soil for support, agricultural implements were comparatively unknown, and they naturally selected the richest and most easily tilled soil for the establishment of their New-World homes. Here, then, about the year 1644, the fathers of Longmeadow located themselves, and engaged in agricultural pursuits. But they were soon annoyed by the annual rising of the river, which not only greatly interfered with their farming enterprises, but at times of special floods occasioned them serious alarm.

Finally, in the year 1695, a freshet of unusual magnitude occurred, which not only overflowed the lands of the settlers, but drove them in fear from their homes. The Cooley family, who had located at the north end of the "meadow," near the mouth of the brook which bears their name, fled to Springfield. The Burts and Blisses, who had established themselves near the present site of the railroad station, secured a boat, and, in their haste to escape from the angry waves, overturned it, and, crawling out upon the banks, were compelled to pass the night in the woods. The Coltons and Keeps, who were located between the two, proceeded northward, and, establishing themselves in the dwellings of the Cooley family, passed a comfortable and safe night, while the real owners of the dwellings were at Springfield, believing that their homes had been swept away.

The flood finally subsiding, the settlers returned to their homes; but the experience had been a wholesome one, and, still apprehensive of further calamities, they petitioned the town of Springfield, in 1703, for permission to move out of the meadow and build on the hill about a mile east of the river. The petition was granted, and the town voted to give them "the land from Pecowsic Brook to Enfield bounds, and from the hill eastward of Longmeadow half a mile farther eastward into the woods." The removal was not, however, immediately effected, although the street in the present village was laid out, thirty-five rods wide, in the year 1703, and probably other preparations looking to the contemplated change were made.

In the year 1709 the grand hegira to the new location took place, the inhabitants all moving at about the same time. The result was the settlement of the present village of Longmeadow.

The inhabitants scattered themselves along the wide street that had been laid out. George Colton located where David Booth now resides, near the south end of the green. The Elys established themselves at the north end of the village, opposite the present residence of Ethan C. Ely. Jonathan Stebbins located where David Hale lived, on the west side of the street. Joseph Cooley lived on the John Cooley place. Nathaniel Burt located opposite the Congregational meeting-house, and Samuel Keep about half a mile south of David Booth's. The Bliss family settled in the north end of the village, south of the Elys.

The descendants of the families bearing these names have constituted the leading inhabitants of the town for many years, and to this day are largely represented. The single exception to this is the Keep family, which has disappeared from the town. The Hale, Storrs, White, Pease, Wolcott, Taylor, Markham, Eaton, and McGregory families have also been long and favorably known in the town, some of them dating their settlement from the beginning of the eighteenth century. The original settlers of Longmeadow came for the most part from Roxbury and Dorchester, and were of good English extraction.

TAVERNS.

The first tavern or place of public entertainment established in Longmeadow is supposed to have been kept where Dr. Pynehon lived, probably by him. Simon Colton kept one in the red house still standing near the meeting-house in the village during the Revolutionary war, and perhaps earlier. About the same time, or a little later, Nathaniel Ely kept tavern on the spot where Ethan C. Ely now resides, and Nathaniel Burt kept one in the cottage now occupied by a Scotch family. Demas Colton kept one next to the post-office building, about 1802. Alpheus Colton, Stephen Chandler, Seth Steel, and others, each kept tavern in turn at a later date.

The east part of the town was not settled much anterior to the year 1748, when an enterprising genius went into "Poverty Hill" (as it was then called) to cut brooms. The first tavern is supposed to have been kept by Daniel Porter, in the early part of the present century, on the George Hunt place, in the northeast corner of the town. A tavern was erected at East Longmeadow village, about the year 1829, and was kept by Willis Phelps for about ten years. Lyman Lathrop succeeded him and kept it two or three years, and then died. A man by the name of Morrison then kept it for a year or two, and was followed by John Ives and John and Henry Crooks in succession. There have been none kept at East Longmeadow for a period of about twenty years, and there are none now in the town.

MERCHANTS.

Of the early stores, Samuel Colton, called "Marchant Colton," probably kept the first. He began business on a small scale* about the year 1749, and kept his store in his dwelling-house, now standing the third house south of the residence of David Booth. He continued business until about 1776, when, owing to his refusal to accept Continental money for his wares, the people took his goods from him by force. It is said that he barred his door against their assaults, and when his wife remonstrated and declared that his assailants would break the door down, he said "Let them break." It is said that he never spoke aloud after this assault upon his rights and privileges. He is said to have been a man of enterprise and spirit, and was the first child born in the village of Longmeadow after the removal from the "meadow." It is alleged that he built two vessels on the river at Longmeadow, and sent them to Bristol, England. His old account-books, now in the possession of David Booth, a descendant of the Colton family on the maternal side, show many interesting charges against the early settlers, among which charges for rum, brandy, sugar, and molasses preponderate. Tradition says that at the time "Marchant Colton" kept his store, there was one at Springfield and one at Enfield, Conn., and that they each did about an equal amount of business.

Calvin Burt was the next storekeeper at the village of Longmeadow. He first traded nearly opposite David Booth's, then near the meeting-house in the middle of the street, and finally he built the present store about 1806, and kept one there, either alone or in connection with his sons Solomon, Roderick, and Francis, for a number of years. His sons probably succeeded him.

Wm. White succeeded Burt & Sons, and kept the store for many years. Several parties followed him for short periods. Edwin K. Colton has carried on the business the last ten years.

Of stores in the east part of the town, Andrew McIntosh kept one in the "Baptist neighborhood" about 1820. Seth Taylor kept one at East Longmeadow from 1826 to 1833. William Lathrop, his son-in-law, succeeded him, and kept the store four or five years, in the same building now occupied by C. F. Russell, although it did not stand in the same place. Willis Phelps kept a store next door to his tavern as early as 1830. Crooks Bros. established a store at East Longmeadow about 1838-40, and were succeeded by George W. Callender, who kept it for eight or nine years, and then died. Henry Crooks followed, and finally sold out to Cortez F. Russell, who was in the Phelps store, but moved into the Lathrop store, and still keeps it. After C. F. Russell left the former store, Prescott Billings kept it about a year; then Edward Lathrop, William H. Dickinson, and James L. Pratt kept it in turn. The latter sold out to Henry Hall, who has been in business about two years.

* It is said he kept his entire stock in a few drawers.

PHYSICIANS.

Of the physicians who have practiced in Longmeadow, Dr. Charles Pynchon is believed to have been the first, and is mentioned in the precinct records as early as 1747. He lived in what is known as the "John Coomes place," and practiced as far as Enfield, Conn. Dr. Joshua Frost practiced about the year 1800, and lived where the Widow Warham Colton now resides. He left town for Springfield about 1804. He was succeeded by Dr. Oliver Bliss, who resided in the same house and continued in practice until about the year 1840, when he died. Several physicians succeeded for short periods, and, finally, Dr. Thomas L. Chapman settled here about the year 1843, and is still in practice.

In the east part of the town, Dr. Edwin McCray practiced about 1828-30, and lived where Dr. Beebe now resides. He finally removed to Agawam, and was succeeded by Dr. Reul Strickland, who resided in the same place, practiced for a number of years, and removed to Enfield, Conn., about 1860. Dr. R. P. Markham engaged in practice for a number of years in the northeast corner of the town. Dr. Eleazer S. Beebe came to the town about the year 1862, and is still in practice at the centre.

ATTORNEYS.

The only lawyer who ever settled in the town was Asa Olmstead, and he for a short time only.

The first road laid out in the town was the one on the river-bank, from Hartford to Springfield. It was laid out by the old "Court of Sessions."

ORGANIZATION.

The present town of Longmeadow was long a part of Springfield, and it was not until the year 1713 that, the population having increased to nearly 40 families, a petition was presented for incorporation as a precinct, which was favorably considered, and Longmeadow became the "Third Parish of Springfield." The reasons which led to this action upon the part of the inhabitants are presented in the opening of the act of incorporation, as follows:

"Province of the Massachusetts Bay: At a session of the Great and General Court or Assembly, held at Boston, Feb. 10, 1713, it being represented that the portion of that part of the town of Springfield commonly called Loogmeadow (although not fully up to the number of forty families) is of good and sufficient ability to maintain a minister, and sometimes can not, with any convenience, attend the public worship of the meeting-house that now is in said town, by reason of the great distance from it: Ordered that the prayer of the petition be granted; with the provision, however, that in due season the petitioners should provide themselves with a learned and orthodox minister, and agree to raise and pay the sum of £50, at least, annually, for his support."

The original bounds of the precinct were as follows:

"To be bounded northerly by a line to be drawn from the mouth of Pecowsc Brook, so called (where it falls into Connecticut River), to the province land, parallel to the southern bounds of the said town of Springfield; westerly, by Connecticut River; southerly, by the town of Enfield; and easterly, by the province line."*

The object of the incorporation having been the more convenient worship of God, one of the first enterprises of the new organization was to establish a meeting-house and a minister among them. In April, 1714, the people voted "to proceed in building a meeting-house," and Nathaniel Burt, Samuel Keep, Thomas Colton, Samuel Stebbins, and Thomas Hale were appointed a committee to superintend its erection.

The first church edifice was not ready for occupation before the early part of 1716. It was a square structure with hipped roof and central bell-tower, occupying a site on the green just south of the second one, which was built in 1767,† and removed at a quite recent date, the timbers of the latter structure being in the present church.

The question of religious worship was no sooner disposed of than the necessity of securing a school-master agitated the public mind. The first school-house was finally erected, and stood in the middle of the green in the present village of Longmeadow, a little north of the old church. The second school-house, a quaint and venerable brick structure, was built in 1791, and stood in the green thirty-five rods south of the old church, and was destroyed by fire in 1851.

The old burying-ground was laid out ten rods in length and four rods in breadth, by virtue of a vote of the parish, passed Jan. 23, 1718.

Longmeadow remained the "Third Parish of Springfield" until the year 1783, when, having become strong in numbers and prosperous in condition under the fostering care of Springfield, an ambition animated the inhabitants to become a town, and Oct. 13, 1783, it was incorporated as a town by virtue of an act of the General Court, with the following bounds:

"West, on Connecticut River; south, on the towns of Somers and Enfield; east, on Wilbraham; and north, beginning at the mouth of Pecowsc Brook, so called, and running east on the parish line to the town of Wilbraham."

These are also the present bounds of the town. The reason alleged in the petition for asking for incorporation as a town was "that they [the inhabitants] labor under great burdens by reason of their situation, and the separate interests in the said town."

The name of the precinct was adopted as the name of the town, the origin of which is readily found in the "long meadow" which extends along the east bank of the Connecticut River, and where the first settlement in the town was made. This was originally known by the Indians as Masack-sick. A change of the name of the town has been several times proposed, but never carried into effect. Nov. 2, 1812, the town voted to petition the General Court to change the name to "Lisbon;" but the discovery of the fact that another town of that name already existed in the State effectually disposed of the movement. May 2, 1825, the people voted to name the town "South Springfield," but this vote was reconsidered May 15th.

The first town-meeting convened Nov. 13, 1783, by virtue of a warrant issued by John Bliss, a justice of the peace of Wilbraham. Col. Gideon Burt was chosen moderator, and the following officers were elected: Jonathan Hale, Jr., Clerk; Nathaniel Ely, Treasurer; David Burt, Moses Field, and Jonathan Burt, Selectmen; Gideon Burt, Moses Field, and Jonathan Burt (2d), Assessors; and the minor officers of surveyor of highways, a tithingman, fence-viewers, a deer-reeve, a sealer of leather, a hog-reeve, and a surveyor of clapboards were chosen.

The work of town organization now proceeded, and a committee was appointed Nov. 20, 1783, to supply the pulpit, and were desirous to engage Stephen W. Stebbins "to preach with us a further time," at £200 settlement and £100 salary.‡

March 23, 1784, it was voted to apply to the General Court to enjoy the same privileges as when connected with Springfield, respecting the reservation of the stone-quarries and the laying out and confirmation of highways. These rights were duly conferred by an act of the General Court, passed in the month of July, 1784.

† This house was not finished until 1769, although the parish voted to build it in 1766. The posts to support the galleries were to be 25 feet high, the steeple 54 feet high and 14 feet square.

Oct. 5, 1784, the following roads were laid out and confirmed: "Beginning at Somers' line by a lot formerly Jacob Pratt's, running by Wm. Stebbins' to Springfield line; also one running from Moses Hill's to the road by Elijah Burt's; also one from Hezekiah Cooley's to Somers' road near Watchog Brook; also one from Wilbraham north road along by Thomas Hancock's to Somers' road; also one from the northeast corner of Capt. Gideon Kibbe's field along by Jabez Hancock's to Springfield line; also one from Watchog Brook to Leache's mill; also one from Springfield line by Elijah Dwight's to Mound Pond; also one from Jona. Brown's toward Sixteen Acres to Springfield line; also one from Pelatiah Bliss' by the mills to the road into the woods by Aaron Bliss'; also one from Jonathan Stebbins' field to Wm. Stebbins' meadow."

May 11, 1790, the town consented that a general field might be inclosed on the plain east of the street, provided the proprietors should make and maintain good gates where roads were included.

In 1792 it was enacted that no more clay should be dug at Wheel Meadow Brook for the purpose of making brick, or otherwise, without the consent of the selectmen. The same year a bounty of six pence for old and three pence for young crows was offered, if killed within the limits of the town.

In 1793 the town was divided into three fire wards, and in each of these a fire-master was appointed. His general duty is prescribed in a set of rules contained in the town records. This was principally in case of fire to summon all the men in his district to assist, and superintend operations at the fire. In the same year the town gave their consent that the Court of Sessions might grant to certain persons who would undertake to build shops for the use of mechanics a tract of land seven rods in length and eight rods wide, near Samuel Coomes' home-lot.

The following persons have filled the principal precinct and town offices of Longmeadow, and served as representatives from the town:

VILLAGES.

The principal village is situated about a mile east of the Connecticut River, and is known as

LONGMEADOW.

The name is still appropriate, for while the village is not located on the "long meadow" which borders the river, as in former days, yet the peculiar shape of the village is singularly illustrative of the name.

The buildings are situated on either side of a wide street, which extends north and south through the town, being about twenty rods in width through the village. In the centre of this fine street is a beautiful common or park, planted with numerous shade-trees and intersected by pleasant walks. The dwellings are generally commanding and substantial, neat and picturesque, many of them in modern style. Among these recent structures are still to be seen the homesteads of the older inhabitants, who rejoice in the ancient houses that have so long afforded their ancestors and themselves comfortable homes.

The village proper extends for about one mile, and its broad street is lined with pleasant and lofty shade-trees, principally maples and elms.

In "leafy June," when Nature puts on her wealth of green, a view of the village is most charming, recalling vividly to mind the lines of England's greatest poetess:

"The stately homes of England! How beautiful they stand, Amid the tall ancestral trees, o'er all the pleasant land!"

The place is noted for the wealth and refinement of its citizens, and for high moral and intellectual culture. The leading thought of the fathers when they founded this beautiful farmers' village was undoubtedly social and religious intercourse,—to be where they could assemble conveniently for worship on the Sabbath, and where they could, as a community, provide for the education of their children.

It is a typical New England village of "ye olden time;" one which would delight the heart of a Hawthorne or an Irving; and its quaint but substantial dwellings of a past century and generation, and its grand old trees, bring pleasant memories of the quiet pastoral days of early New England, when every family owned its "home-lot" and its "meadow-farm," and when the conscientious people lived under rigid laws, wore plain garments, and believed in and defended vigorously a system of religion which, in the present day, would seem austere and illiberal, if not even bigoted and intolerant.

The great river-road connecting Springfield and Hartford was probably, next after the traditional "Bay Path," the oldest in the valley, and was originally marked by substantial mile-stones, one of which, standing in the northern part of Longmeadow village, still shows the time-worn legend, "22 miles to Hartford," though the upper portions, which recorded the distance from Boston, have crumbled away under the frosts of many winters. It is of the "red sandstone" of the valley.

Post-Office.—The earliest post-office at Longmeadow was established about 1810, the inhabitants previously going to Springfield for their mail. The first postmaster was Solomon Burt, who kept the office in the same building where it is located at the present time.

The next was Daniel Gates, although the business was transacted by Stephen Cooley. William White was postmaster for a great many years, and until his death during the late war. Horace Newell and Lester Noble next filled the position in turn, and were succeeded by Edwin K. Colton, the present incumbent.

EAST LONGMEADOW.

This village is situated near the centre of the eastern settlements of the town, no less than seven roads centering at that point like the spokes of a wheel. The village consists of only a few houses, the Congregational and Methodist Churches and the village school-house constituting the most prominent features of the place. Besides these there are two stores and a post-office. The latter was established during the administration of President Jackson. The first postmaster was Seth Taylor, who kept it in his store, and filled the position until his death in 1835. His successor was William Lathrop, who was succeeded by Henry J. Crooks. Alfred Taylor then filled the office for two years, and was succeeded by Cortez F. Russell, the present incumbent.

SCHOOLS.

The subject of education received attention about as soon as the establishment of public worship. No sooner had the question of a meeting-house been settled than the fathers of the precinct voted to secure a schoolmaster to teach "our children to read and write." This was the summum bonum of education in those early days. Reference has already been made to the first school-houses that existed in the town.

The records are replete with the various movements which were made in the successive stages of its history for the advancement of educational interests. In the year 1784 the sum of £40 was appropriated for the support of schools. In 1786 this had increased to £55, and in 1787 to £60. In 1788 a committee was appointed to consider the propriety of building a new school-house. In 1791, £120 was appropriated to the "middle" school district for the purpose of "building a house for the use of schools and other occasional purposes of the town." The same year £30 was appropriated to the "south" district to enable them to build a school-house; and the same amount was appropriated to the "north" district for the purpose of refunding to the inhabitants the expense of building a school-house in that district the preceding fall, and to enable them to finish the house. The sum of £23 was also appropriated to the "northwest" district, in the east part of the town, to enable them to erect a school-house; £20 was appropriated to the "northeast district," in the east part of the town, for the purpose of building a school-house, and £17 was appropriated to the "southeast" district to "defray the expense of their building a school-house of late," and to enable them to finish the same. In 1795, £160 was appropriated out of the interest derived from the sale of school lands to finish the various school buildings. In 1798 the town appropriated £100 for school purposes. The appropriation in 1806 was £120; in 1807, £135; in 1809, £160; in 1815, $600; in 1817, $500; in 1840, $780; in 1844, $1000; in 1865, $2000; and in 1875, $3500.

At the present time there are in the town nine public schools, corresponding to as many districts, the district system having been abolished. The number of scholars in attendance is about 275. Two of the schools include a high-school department. The schools are under the general superintendence of a school board consisting of four persons, who are elected by the town. The sum last appropriated by the town for the support of its schools was $3500, for the year 1878. They are reported by the committee to be in a satisfactory and promising condition.

CHURCHES.

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

The first establishment of public worship in Longmeadow dates back to the incorporation of the parish, Feb. 17, 1713. In the month of April of the year following the people voted "to proceed in building a meeting-house; and that the said house should be built 38 feet square if the timber already gotten would allow it, or, if the timber should be too scant, to make it something less." The house was not ready for occupation before the early part of 1716.

In March, 1715, Rev. Stephen Williams, a son of Rev. John Williams, of Deerfield, was called to the pastorate of the church. He was to receive £200 settlement and £55 salary for five years, and then to have it increased by the addition of £5 a year until it should equal £70. Mr. Williams accepted the call, and was ordained Oct. 17, 1716, the council which conducted the ordination services including some of the most eminent clergymen of the period. Rev. Mr. Williams was born at Deerfield, May 14, 1693; subsequently suffered captivity with the Indians after the burning of Deerfield, in 1704, for a description of which see the history of Deerfield; was graduated at Harvard College in 1713; taught school in Hadley for a year, and went to Longmeadow, Nov. 4, 1714, to preach as a candidate. After his settlement he served as a chaplain in three campaigns in the old French-and-Indian wars. Dartmouth College bestowed upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity in 1773. After a long life of great usefulness he died on the 10th of June, 1782, in the ninetieth year of his age and the sixty-sixth year of his ministry. An interesting diary kept by Dr. Williams, well illustrating the trials and difficulties which he had to meet in his pioneer ministry, and breathing the spirit of an earnest and truthful reliance upon divine guidance, is still extant in the town.

The successor of Dr. Williams was the Rev. Richard Salter Storrs, a graduate of Yale in 1783. He was ordained Dec. 17, 1785. He discharged the duties of the pastoral office with marked success and ability until Oct. 3, 1819, when he suddenly died. His ministry and that of his predecessor cover nearly a century of the history of the church. Rev. Baxter Dickinson, a native of Amherst and a graduate of Yale in 1817, succeeded Mr. Storrs, March 5, 1823, and was dismissed Oct. 20, 1829. The next pastor was Rev. Jonathan B. Condit, of Hanover, N. H., who was dismissed Oct. 4, 1835. Rev. Howard Beebe, of Richmond, Va., a graduate of Williams College in 1833, was ordained as the next pastor, Oct. 18, 1837, and dismissed March 21, 1843. Rev. Samuel Wolcott was ordained in 1843, and dismissed Dec. 27, 1847.

Rev. John W. Harding, the present pastor, is the son of Rev. Sewall Harding, of Medway, Mass., graduated at Yale College in the class of 1845, and was installed in the pastoral office at Longmeadow, Jan. 1, 1850.

The church is in a prosperous condition, and has a membership of 148. The number of Sabbath-school scholars is 102, and the library contains about 400 volumes. The present church edifice is the old church remodeled and renovated, and was completed March 17, 1874. It is a beautiful and tasteful building, and occupies a prominent position on the east side of the village green.*

The following first entry on the record-book of so old a church, in the handwriting of Dr. Williams, may be of interest:

"The Seventeenth of October, 1716, I was ordained, and we had a church gathered. And those of us whose names are hereto suffix^d did give up ourselves to God, and to Jesus Christ, and did promise to walk together in a faithful attendance of all God's holy institutions in order to his glory and ye edification of our own souls and ye souls of our children."

(Signed) "Stephen Williams, Thomas Colton, Daniel Cooley, George Colton Nathaniel Burt, Jr., Nathaniel Bliss (2d), Jonathan Ely, Thomas Bliss, Samuel Bliss (1st)."

FIRST BAPTIST SOCIETY, EAST LONGMEADOW.

The formal establishment of Baptist worship in the town of Longmeadow occurred in the year 1807. September 19th of that year a petition was presented to the Second Congregational Church and the Baptist Church of Enfield by the inhabitants of the southeast section of the town, craving permission to have Elder George Atwell officiate with them as a "Preacher of Divinity" one-half of the time. The request appears to have been complied with, for, from that time to the year 1818, Mr. Atwell and Elder Alvin Bennett ministered to the religious necessities of that denomination, assisted occasionally by others.

May 16, 1818, the Baptists voted to present a petition to Enfield Church, of which it had previously been a branch, asking to be set off as a separate and independent church. The request was granted, and June 23, 1818, the First Baptist Church of East Longmeadow was formerly created and established with appropriate ceremonies. The First Baptist Society had previously been incorporated, Feb. 8, 1819.

Since the establishment of the church the pulpit has been supplied by various persons, whose names it is unnecessary to give. The regular pastors have been† Rev. George B. Atwell, from May 1, 1821, to Nov. 12, 1825, he having been ordained Sept. 11, 1822, while in charge of the church; Elder John M. Hunt, from June 6, 1835, to 1840; Rev. Moses J. Kelly, who was ordained pastor Sept. 12, 1842; Rev. F. L. Batchelor, in 1843; Rev. N. W. Minor, who was ordained Dec. 5, 1848, while in charge of the church; Rev. Mr. Farrar, July 5, 1846; Rev. Nicholas Branch, in 1853; Rev. A. S. Lovell, who became pastor in the spring of 1858, and continued several years; Rev. Levi H. Wakeman, who was settled in the spring of 1862; Rev. T. O. Judd, in the spring of 1867; Rev. H. G. Gage, who became pastor in May, 1873; Rev. Wm. S. Phillips, who was called in December, 1875; and Rev. O. R. Hunt, the present pastor, who was called March 17, 1877, and preached his first sermon April 8th of that year.

The church is in a prosperous condition, the present membership being 105. The Sabbath-school numbers 89 scholars and teachers, with an average attendance of 62; number of books in the library, about 300. The pastor of this church also serves the Baptist Church in the town of Hampden.

The house of worship occupied by the society was built about the year 1830, but has since been remodeled. It is located in the southeast corner of the town, in what is popularly known as the "Baptist neighborhood."

SECOND CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

This church was organized at East Longmeadow, the 22d of April, 1829. The parish was incorporated June 16, 1827. On the day of the organization of the church its first deacon,

* A fine and valuable town clock, the gift of an enterprising citizen, a descendant of the pioneers, adorns the tower of this church.

† The records of the church are so defective that this list is possibly erroneous in some minute particulars.

in the person of Ebenezer Burt, was chosen. The first meeting-house was erected in 1828, at a cost of $3500, and was dedicated Nov. 28, 1828. It stood on the hill at East Longmeadow, where the Congregational parsonage now stands. The present church edifice, an attractive structure, is located at the centre of the village of East Longmeadow. It is the old building remodeled, it having been raised up and a vestry put under it when it was moved down the hill, in 1859.

The first pastor of the church was Rev. Calvin Foot, who was installed April 15, 1831, and dismissed July 8, 1835. He was succeeded by Rev. Martin Tupper, of Stafford, Conn., and a graduate of Princeton College in the class of 1826. Rev. William E. Dixon, of Enfield, Conn., a graduate of Williams College in 1833, was installed over the church on Oct. 14, 1852, and was dismissed May 30, 1854. Rev. Joshua R. Brown was installed pastor Dec. 13, 1854, and died Sept. 7, 1858, at the age of forty-six. Rev. Alfred B. Peabody succeeded to the pastorate May 24, 1860, and was dismissed March 26, 1867. The church then listened to supplies for over two years, when the present pastor, Rev. Alfred J. Dutton, was installed, Dec. 8, 1869. The present deacons of the church are Roman A. Crane and Vashni Pease.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, EAST LONGMEADOW.

This church was organized in the month of June, 1853, with Rev. David K. Merrill as preacher in charge. He continued in that relation until October, 1854, when the church was supplied by Oliver Howe and other teachers from Wilbraham Academy. The following persons then administered to the church in turn: from August, 1855, to April, 1856, Rodney Gage; from April, 1856, to April, 1857, Jonas McClark; from April, 1857, to April, 1860, supplied by Rev. Miner Raymond, D.D., of Wilbraham, and Prof. White; from April, 1860, to April, 1862, Randall Mitchell; from April, 1862, to November, 1864, Thomas C. Pratt; from November, 1864, to April, 1866, William Rice, of Springfield; from April, 1866, to September, 1866, Henry T. Eddy. He died, and Guilford D. Brown preached two years, to October, 1868. From that date Joseph Candlin preached to April, 1871; J. W. Lee followed and preached one year to April, 1872; William Wignall then officiated until the month of April, 1874; N. F. Stevens succeeded until April, 1875; from April, 1875, to January, 1876, John Cadwell preached for the church. He died suddenly, and the church was supplied until the following April by John Cass. For the next two years Joseph Seeth filled the pastoral office. The present pastor, Rev. Jacob W. Price, was established over the church in April, 1878.

The society have a neat church edifice at the East Centre, which was dedicated in the fall of 1853; also a pleasant parsonage, which was built in 1860. The church is small in numbers, but strong in faith, and enjoys the rare experience of being entirely free from debt.

The church is in a prosperous and flourishing condition, the present membership being 104. The number of families attending the church is 50; average attendance on the Sabbath-school, 60; number of volumes in the library, about 300.

CATHOLICS.

The Catholics of the town hold stated meetings in a neat house of worship, erected by them about six years ago on the road running north of the old burying-ground in the village of Longmeadow. They have no settled pastor, however, but are supplied by the priests of the adjoining churches.

BURIAL-PLACES.

The town of Longmeadow contains four places of public burial. Of these, three are in the east part of the town. The oldest of these grounds is what is known as the "Old Burying-Ground," situated in the rear of the Congregational Church, at the village of Longmeadow. It was laid out in pursuance to a vote passed by the precinct, Jan. 23, 1718, "to fence and clear ten rods in length and four in breadth" for a burial-ground. Dec. 13, 1808, it was "voted to extend the new burying-yard in the meeting-house lane so far to the east as to come within twenty feet of the west side of the Widow Ann Field's dwelling-house." This seems to have been the first addition made to the yard. Another was made in 1845, and it has been fenced several times.

The ground bears evidence of its ancient character, and contains the remains of many of the oldest and most respected citizens of the town. It extends along the road passing east from the village by the meeting-house, and presents a mournfully pleasing appearance with its long rows of tombstones, many of them containing quaint and interesting inscriptions. Some of these are as follows:

"In memory of Rev. Stephen Williams, D.D., who was a prudent and laborious minister, a sound and evangelical preacher, a pious and exemplary Christian, a sincere and faithful friend, a tender and affectionate father and consort, and a real and disinterested lover of mankind: departed this life with humble and cheerful hope of a better, June 10, 1782, in the 90th year of his age, and 66th of his ministry.

"Softly, with fainting head, he lay
Upon his Maker's breast;
His Maker kissed his soul away,
And laid his flesh to rest."

"Sacred to the memory of the Rev. Richard S. Storrs, pastor of the church in Longmeadow. He was born at Mansfield, Conn., Aug. 30, 1763, graduated at Yale College in 1783, ordained Dec. 7, 1785, died Oct. 3, 1819. In the private relations of life he eminently illustrated the graces of the Christian. He was distinguished for his appropriate, perspicuous, and affectionate exhibition of evangelical truth, for propriety, richness, and fervor in social prayer, and for his instructive conversation, and Christian sympathy in pastoral duties. In testimony of their affectionate remembrance of his personal worth, and their regard for his ability, zeal, and usefulness as their Christian pastor, his mourning congregation erect this monument.

"Religion, her almighty breath,
Rebuked the winds and waves of death;
Amidst that calm of sweet repose,
To Heaven his gentle spirit rose."

"In memory of Capt. Isaac Colton, who died Jan. 23, 1757, in his 57th year. Capt. I. Colton had a military genius, commanded a company at Louisbourg, in 1745. Was respected & useful at home. Was a man of prayer.—Isa. 31, 3,—For behold the Lord doth take away the Captain."

"How art thou fallen in the midst of the battle! O very pleasant hast thou been! In memory of Lieutenant Nathaniel Burt, who was slain in the memorable battle of Lake George, Sept. 8, 1755, when his Colonel* and other brave officers fell, yet a signal victory was obtained over the enemy. Mr. Nathaniel Burt was a deacon of this church, an exemplary christian, a man of Public Spirit, & a good soldier; well beloved at home and in y^e army. A concern for pure religion caused his going into y^e military service. He died in his 45th year.—2 Chron. 35 and 25.—And Jeremiah lamented over Josiah."

"Mr. Nathaniel Burt, a respectable and worthy Father of the Town of Longmeadow, was born A.D. 1636, and died Sept. 29, 1720.

"This Monument is erected to his memory by the inhabitants of said Town as a token of gratitude for donations in lands made by him to them for the support of the Gospel and public schools.—Isaiah 30, 8,—The liberal deviseth liberal things, and by liberal things shall he stand."†

The oldest cemetery in the east part of the town was laid out over one hundred years ago, the exact date not at present being known. It is located a short distance east of the centre, and comprises about one and a half acres of land. It is neatly fenced, triangular in shape, and has entrances from two roads. It does not contain very many graves, but among them are to be seen those of some of the earliest settlers of the east section of the town.

Another cemetery is located in the southeast corner of the town, in what is known as the "Baptist neighborhood." The yard is small, not comprising much over an acre of land, and contains stones bearing dates as early as 1769. It is situated at the intersection of two roads, and is entered from each. It is still in use.

The last remaining cemetery is situated in the northeast corner of the town, and contains about an acre of ground. It was probably laid out in the early part of the present century, very likely by a committee appointed by the town, in the

* Ephraim Williams.

† A peculiarity of this cemetery is that in the original burial-ground of 1718 the graves lie north and south.

When the pioneer colony came out on their first exploring expedition toward the "Quinnebecott," or "Great River," it is stated that part of them settled at what is now the city of Hartford; a part came farther north and located at what is known as Warehouse Point, and, according to some authorities, another portion reached a point in the southern part of Springfield, near Long Hill, where they stopped for a few days to examine the surrounding country and fix upon a proper place for settlement. This was in 1635. They finally selected a location on the Agawam side of the "Great River," in what has since been known as the "House Lot," where they erected a log cabin and remained for some time.

This account undoubtedly refers to the two men stated to have been sent out in that year to build a house for the colony. The two were Woodecock and Cable, who undoubtedly built the first dwelling in Western Massachusetts, within the present limits of Agawam township. The location is on the south bank of the Agawam River, about a half-mile from its mouth, on the low bottom-land, which frequently is overflowed. The spot chosen is said to have covered originally about 10 acres of land, but the river channel has changed so much that a large portion has either been washed away or now constitutes a part of the large island lying between the arms, or in the delta, of the Agawam. The place is probably included at the present time in lands owned by Leonard Clark & Son, of Springfield.

It is not definitely known whether the two pioneers remained through the winter of 1635-36 or returned in the fall to the eastern settlements; neither can it be ascertained whether the cabin was taken down and reconstructed on the Springfield side, or carried away by the overflow in the succeeding spring.

In the town records of Springfield occurs the following:

Jan. 3, 1638.—"It is ordered by ye plantation at a general meeting, that these six men undernamed shall set out the bounds of ye plantation on ye river on both sides of ye river, and to marke ye trees for ye clearing of it. Ye persons appointed are William Pynchon, Jehu Barr, Henry Smith, John Cable, Richard Everitt, Thomas Merrick."

Feb. 14, 1638.—"It was ordered it shall be lawful for any man to put over horse, cows, or younger cattell on ye other side of ye river till the 1st of November."

Jan. 26, 1642.—Henry Smith, Elizur Holyoke, Henry Burt, Samuel Chapin, Richard Titus, Thomas Merrick were appointed a committee "by general vote and consent of ye Plantation," with full power to lay out, not to exceed 150 acres of land, to be divided among 30 families "on ye other side of ye grt river."

In the grant of lands made by the inhabitants of Springfield, in 1660, Thomas Cooper, Abel Leonard, and Thomas Merrick settled on the southwest side of the Agawam River; Cooper on the east branch of Three-Mile Brook.

The Coopers and Merrick owned large tracts of land on what was known as the "outward commons," now Feeding Hills. A part of the territory northeast from the Corners was known by the early settlers as "Brookfield," from the fact of there being many small brooks running through it.

Judge Leonard, a son of Dr. John Leonard, was the owner of a large tract southwest from the Corners, on Feeding Hills Street.

About 1764, Abram Burbank, from Suffield, Conn., purchased the land formerly owned by Cooper and Merrick from the heirs, and twenty-nine deeds recorded in the clerk's office in his name give the description and dates. Mr. Burbank located where S. R. Johnson now lives.

In the first records of Springfield, referring to the assignment of lands on the west side of the Great River, including Agawam, it says:

"All rates that shall arise upon this towne shall be layed upon lands, according to every one's proportion, aker for aker, of house-lotts, and aker for aker, of meddowe, both alike on this side, and both alike on the other side; and for farmes that shall lye farther off, a less proportion, as wee shall after agree, except wee shall see meete to remit one-half of the rate from land to other estate."

In 1699, Springfield had within its boundaries a large amount of unappropriated and undivided lands; and later, when West Springfield was set off, a division of these lands was made through Agawam, constituting what are now the Agawam Parish (the "inward commons") and Feeding Hills Parish ("the outward commons"), nearly the whole town above the meadows being occupied by the inhabitants of Springfield as pasture-lands, hence the name "Feeding Hills." A ditch was dug across the entire length to designate the dividing-line between the outward and inward commons. This ditch remains to this day, except in parts where it has been plowed up, and is probably nearly identical with the parish line. As late as 1783 there lived in Agawam Parish a few of the Stock-bridge Indians, who obtained their living by making baskets and selling them in Springfield.

INCORPORATION.

The following is the act of the Legislature to incorporate the town of Agawam, May 17, 1855:

"SECTION 1. All that part of the Town of West Springfield which lies south-erly of the line commencing at the north mouth of the Agawam River, so called, and running westerly by the course and centre of said river to the town-line of Westfield, is hereby incorporated into a separate town by the name of Agawam. And the said town of Agawam is hereby invested with all the powers and privileges, rights and immunities, and shall be subject to all the duties and requisitions, to which other towns are entitled and subjected."

The first town-meeting was called June 12, 1855, and the following is an extract from the warrant:

PARISHES.

The parish of Agawam was erected from the 2d parish of Springfield in 1757, as the 6th parish of Springfield.

In 1763, by reason of the organization of the 4th parish (Wilbraham) into a town, this parish was changed from the 6th to the 5th, and Ireland parish to the 4th; and upon the CYRUS BELL, the tenth child, and fourth son, of James and Mary Percival Bell, was born in Chester, Mass., June 14, 1813. Of his five brothers, two became physicians.

He was but sixteen years of age when his father died, and, having for some time looked with longing eyes toward a career in the medical profession, he then set about furthering his ambition. One of his elder brothers was already a practicing physician, and with him, therefore, he began his medical studies, and, shortly afterward, entering the Berkshire Medical College, Pittsfield, he graduated therefrom in 1839. After that he practiced six months with another brother, and Sept. 20, 1840, took up his residence in Feeding Hills, Mass.

Nov. 3, 1841, he married Miss Emma Chamberlain, of Ansterlitz, Columbia Co., N. Y., one of the first pupils of Miss Mary Lyon, at Holyoke Seminary. Their children were five in number,—three sons and two daughters.

A devoted lover of his profession, Dr. Bell occupied a wide field of usefulness, and exemplifying in his daily walks the highest principles of Christianity, he has ministered many a time and oft to suffering minds as well as to suffering bodies.

In politics he is a Republican, and in 1865 represented his district in the General Court.

character is his deep-rooted religious faith, and this he constantly strives to show by word and deed. Early in life he became a professed Christian, and was one of the first scholars of the first Sunday-school established in his native town, in 1825. His adherence to the cause he then embraced has since then not only remained true and steadfast, but it has strengthened with advancing years, and will continue to strengthen as the years roll on. Ever ready to offer the testimony of prayer, praise, personal labor, and bountiful charity on behalf of religion, his life has been one of rare consistency and Christian purpose.

For twenty-five years he has been senior deacon of the Congregational Church, for many years superintendent of the Sabbath-school, and, as a member of the town school committee, he has long been conspicuous for valuable labors. Of his efforts in the cause of education, one of his co-laborers says:

"Few men equal Dr. Bell in securing the love and respect of children, and in interesting them by apt address: none surpass him in a desire for the best possible education, in mind and heart, of every child in the community."

The residence which he now occupies was purchased soon after his settlement in Feeding Hills, and was built, about 1775, by the Congregational Society for Rev. Sylvanus Griswold.

L. L. Whitman

This family traces its genealogy back to the old English house of Wightman, and are lineal descendants of Edward Wightman, who was the last religious martyr burned at the stake in that country, put to death in 1612. About the year 1630 four male members of his family emigrated to this country and settled in Rhode Island, but subsequently removed to Connecticut. We have no authentic records in regard to the early generations in this country; but one Valentine, a prominent citizen of Groton, Conn., was the founder of the first Baptist Church in New England, at that place. He had a son, Timothy, who was the father of Jesse. The latter was born in Groton, Conn., Jan. 22, 1764, removed to Agawam in 1789, and was married, July 20, 1791, to Cynthia Button, a native of Agawam, who was born Feb. 7, 1770. He was in 1790 ordained a minister of the gospel, and was the first Baptist preacher in the town. He changed the spelling of his name to the present way about the commencement of the present century, which has been followed by his descendants. He had a family of six children, viz.: Jesse, Lyman, Asa B., Warren, Newbury, and Cynthia. The only one living at the present time is the fourth child, who resides at Westfield, Mass. Jesse died Sept. 20, 1817, and was followed by his wife, April 19, 1824.

Lyman, the father of the gentleman whose portrait appears above, was born in Agawam, May 20, 1794. He was a machinist by trade, and followed that business until 1830, when he engaged in the manufacture of cotton goods. He afterward opened a store for the sale of general merchandise in Agawam, and continued it until his death, June 12, 1869.

He was married, Dec. 17, 1829, to Mary Kendall, a native of Suffield, Conn., who was born Nov. 27, 1800. She enjoys the best of health, and is happy in being surrounded by loving relations and friends. Their family consisted of Lewis L., Mary F., and John L., the latter of whom died in early manhood.

Lewis L. was born in Agawam, March 24, 1831, and received his education at the district schools and at the academy at Mystic, Conn. Upon leaving school he entered his father's store as clerk, and remained until 1851, when, in company with his father, he commenced the manufacture of wall paper in Agawam. Being tired of active business life, he discontinued his manufacturing interest in 1867, and bought a farm, where he is now engaged as a tiller of the soil. He was married, Nov. 30, 1855, to Martha E., daughter of Thomas Hart and Laurette Pepper, of Southwick, Mass., where she was born Nov. 24, 1833. By this union he became the father of six children, viz.: Fred. L., born Feb. 17, 1857, and at present engaged in the study of law at Boston; Minnie A. K., born Aug. 28, 1859, and now the wife of Albert E. Worthington, of Agawam; John L., born Jan. 4, 1863, and died Jan. 14, 1874; Florrie L., born April 16, 1867; Bret Harte, born Oct. 16, 1869; and Carrie M., born Nov. 16, 1871, and died Nov. 19, 1872.

Mr. Whitman has been a life-long Democrat; has been one of the selectmen of the town for the last five years, and is chairman of the board. He has for a number of years been engaged with credit and honor to himself in the mercantile, manufacturing, and agricultural interests of the town of his birth.

organization of West Springfield in 1774, this became the 2d parish of West Springfield.

The following notes are from the Agawam parish register: The first meeting of the inhabitants of the 6th parish of Springfield was held Feb. 25, 1758, Capt. Samuel Mirick, Moderator; Moses Leonard, Clerk.

"Nov. 1, 1758.—Voted to build a meeting-house in said Parish. It was also further voted to provide Boards and shingles for the Lord's house."

"Mar. 21, 1759.—Voted to build a meeting-house in the senter of the present Inhabitants, or as near as may be."

"At a meeting Dec. 22, 1759, Voted to reconsider the vote of Mar. 21, 1759."

"May 29, 1760.—Voted that Rum and Cider shall be provided for the Raising of the Meeting-House in the Parish, at the cost and charge of the Parish."

"Voted that the meeting-house shall be set upon Esq. Reuben Leonard's land."

The first parish clerk was voted 50 cents a year for eleven successive years.

In the diary of Rev. John Ballantyne of Westfield, commenced in 1759, occurs this mention:

"Nov. 12, 1760.—Assisted in dedication of a new meeting-house in Agawam. Rev. Mr. Williams, of Springfield, preached Dec. 3d."

The first bell was the gift of Capt. John Porter, and cost $300. A chimney was added to the church in 1823. The church was painted by subscription of produce, chiefly rye and flax-seed, and the name and amount given by each are preserved.

"Nov. 19, 1793.—At this meeting a committee was appointed to oppose Elihalet Leonard in the General Court against being annexed the 1st Parish."

"April 14, 1807.—A meeting was called 'to see if the Parish would vote to set off the 2d & 4th Parishes of West Springfield as a town.'"

CHURCHES.

BAPTIST.

In Benedict's history of the Baptists, when speaking of West Springfield, he says: "As early as 1727 some persons were baptized in this town by Mr. Elisha Calender, then pastor of the First Church in Boston. Their names were John Leonard, Ebenezer Leonard, Abel Leonard, William Scott, and Thomas Lamb. These Leonards are ancestors of the numerous family of that name now residing in Agawam."

The Baptists organized a society at once, and, as often as they could obtain a minister to come among them, sustained preaching until 1740, when they, with others who had joined them, were formed into a church, and Rev. Edward Upham became their pastor. Mr. Upham preached for this church nine years at first, when he removed to Newport, R. I., but returned to Agawam after twenty years' absence, and remained until his death, in 1795, at the age of eighty-seven years.

The place of meeting of this church was on the east margin of the large plain between the Feeding Hills and Agawam Districts. After the death of Mr. Upham the church declined, and finally ceased to exist. About 1790 a number of members of the Baptist Church in Westfield, residing in Agawam, formed a new church, and were dismissed from their Westfield connection for that purpose. Their names were John Porter, Stephen Bedortha, Jonathan Purchase, Earle Bancroft, Margaret Purchase, Abigail Palmer, Eleanor Bedortha, and Roxanna Bancroft. They met on the 23d of February, 1790, and adopted the covenant and articles of faith of the church from which they were dismissed.

On the 4th of March following the constitution of the church, Rev. Jesse Wightman was called to the pastorate, but delayed his acceptance until the request of the church was renewed several times, when on the 14th of August following he wrote them "that his mind was established, and he agreed to the request." Mr. Wightman (now written Whitman) was pastor of this First Baptist Church of Agawam twenty-seven years, from Sept. 29, 1790, to Sept. 29, 1817, when he died. The records say, in reference to that period of history of the church, that Elder Whitman "was a man of eminent piety, and was much esteemed among his people. For a period of twenty-seven years he had sedulously watched over the church, from its infancy to more mature years. His ministry was a successful one, and his end peace." From 1799 to 1814, 48 persons were added to the church.

In 1814 serious difficulties arose in relation to the singing, the introduction of new tunes having debarred many of the church members from taking part in that portion of the service. This disturbance was so great that many withdrew from the church, and the communion service was suspended for several months. In 1815, through the wise administration of Elder Whitman, they voted "to forget and forgive, for the sake of the suffering cause," and it was followed by a powerful revival which effected a full reconciliation.

In May, 1819, Rev. John Grant moved to Agawam, and performed the duties of pastor for a short time, but declined a call. Following him was Rev. B. M. Hill, who came from Stafford, Conn., who was called to the pastorate, but finally declined. In 1822, Rev. Thomas Barrett, a native of Belcher-town, supplied the pulpit, until, at a meeting of the church, Jan. 27, 1823, it was "voted unanimously that they were satisfied with his improvement," and they wished him to be their minister. They were also, except one, in favor of having him preach to them every Sabbath day. He remained pastor of the church until October, 1829, and during the time the most extensive revival visited the people that ever occurred in Agawam, in 1825-26.

It was said of Mr. Barrett that he was a very able preacher and a man of earnest piety, but he was subject to frequent seasons of mental depression, in one of which, in August, 1832, he sadly terminated his own life, at the age of thirty-nine.

In August, 1831, Rev. John McDonald was ordained as pastor of the church. At a church meeting held Feb. 7, 1834, it was voted "to retain Elder McDonald for five years longer if the necessary funds could be raised to pay his salary, which has heretofore been $300 dollars a year." He remained, however, but one year, and was dismissed. His successors have been Rev. Pierpont Brockett, Rev. Mathew Bachelor, Rev. William A. Smith, Rev. Lester Lewis, Rev. John Cook, Rev. Asa A. Robinson, Rev. Thomas Dowling, Rev. Ariel Parker, Rev. George Cowlesworthy, Rev. E. P. Bond, and the present pastor, Rev. Alpha H. Simons.

This church has had during its existence eighteen different pastors, and there have probably been over 500 members at different periods. In 1813 the membership was 66; in 1860, 109; in 1878, 157. The Sabbath-school numbers 111, with Charles L. Bodurtha superintendent.

The present church edifice, located at Agawam Centre, was built in 1830. At some period in the history of the old church referred to above, which was organized one hundred and forty years ago, a tankard and two cups for the communion-service were presented to it by the First Baptist Church, in Boston. They were presented to the Boston church by a Baptist church in London, the same of which the famous preacher Spurgeon is now pastor. These pieces of communion furniture came into the possession of the present church of Agawam, and were a long time in use.

THE FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH OF AGAWAM is located in the Feeding Hills Parish. It was organized Nov. 10, 1762, as the Sixth Church of Springfield. Afterward, in 1774, when West Springfield was set off, it became the Second Church in West Springfield, and again, in 1855, when Agawam was organized as a town, it became the First Church. It was organized with nine members, besides the pastor-elect, which was two more than enough to constitute a church at that time. The following were the original members: Samuel Merriek, Joseph Bodurtha, Benjamin Leonard, John Leonard, Reuben Leonard, Abel Leonard, Joseph Selden, Joseph Flower, and Jonathan Bodurtha. Twenty others united by letter eighteen days afterward. Part of these persions were from the disbanded Baptist Church, who united with the understanding that those who preferred it should be baptized by immersion, and that infant baptism should not be insisted upon.

The house of worship first occupied by this church stood upon the plain, about halfway between what is now the Feeding Hills Parish and Agawam Parish. It was built by the parish in 1760, and was a commodious edifice, but possessed no great architectural beauty, and was never finished. In 1799 it was taken down, and removed to the spot now occupied by the Methodist Church at Feeding Hills, where it was re-erected, and remained incomplete until 1821, when it was neatly finished. It was first used by the Congregationalists, then, after the revival of the Baptist Church in 1772, by the two congregations uniting, and, after about 1802, when the Methodist Society was formed, by the three denominations conjointly. In 1834 the Congregationalists withdrew, and built their present house of worship, at a cost of $2000, furnished by individuals. In 1857 the church was re-modeled, and transferred from the proprietors to the society. The parsonage, adjoining the church, was built in 1842.

The first minister of this church was Rev. Sylvanus Griswold, who was ordained and installed over it just a week after its organization. The yearly salary upon which Mr. Griswold was settled was $225, with his wood, and a tract of forty acres of land. In consequence of the diminished ability of the society, resulting from the Revolutionary war, it is said, "they fell considerably in arrears, and the pastor agreed to release them from their obligations to him."

The following account of this first installation is from a Springfield letter to the Boston News-Letter, dated Nov. 17, 1762:

"This day the Rev. Sylvanus Griswold was (with the greatest unanimity of the people, and the high satisfaction of the Ecclesiastical Council Convened on that occasion) ordained the Pastor of a Church newly gathered in this town, consisting both of Pede-Baptists and Anti-Pede-Baptists, The latter of whom were formerly of a distinct church, under the pastoral care of Rev. Edward Upham. Notwithstanding this difference of opinion, this people have with a truly Catholic spirit, united and agreed to worship and sit down at the Lord's table together, allowing to each other, without offence, full liberty to follow the dictates of their own private judgment, with respect to baptism; Mr. Griswold, at the same time, readily consenting to administer baptism to Infants or the Adult, either by aspersion or immersion, according as each one shall desire. The candour with which this people have proceeded, the Christian Spirit with which they have united, and the Catholic foundation on which this Church is erected, give singular pleasure to the Churches in this vicinity, and doubtless will be pleasing to every generous Mind."

Mr. Griswold remained pastor until his death, in 1819. No pastor was procured to succeed him until Oct. 17, 1821, when Rev. Reuben Hazen was ordained as its second pastor. He was to minister, however, but half the time to this church, preaching on every alternate Sabbath to the new church at Agawam Parish. His salary was fixed at $190 per annum, for ten years. He ministered to the two churches till 1830, when he relinquished his charge at Feeding Hills, and devoted himself exclusively to the church at Agawam. Rev. Hervey Smith succeeded Mr. Hazen, becoming the third pastor, Aug. 11, 1830. His successors have been Rev. Horatio J. Lombard, Rev. Calvin Foote, Rev. Dillon Williams, Rev. Stephen D. Ward, Rev. William M. Birchard, and the present pastor, Rev. Charles S. Sylvester, who was settled in May, 1866. The present membership of the church is 61; the number of Sunday-school scholars, 78. The officers of the church and society are,—Deacons, Cyrus Bell, M.D., and E. G. Gaylord; Superintendent of Sunday-school, Dr. Cyrus Bell; Society Committee, J. G. Freeland, W. H. Granger, and Edwin Leonard; Church Committee, C. C. Wright, E. A. Kellogg, and R. M. Taylor.

A METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

was first organized in Agawam (Feeding Hills Parish) in 1802, by Father Washburn, but no record was kept from that time until 1844, when it was reorganized. The present church edifice was built in 1851, at a cost of $2000. The present pastor is Rev. Jonathan Neil; Superintendent of Sabbath-school, Frank Johnson; Trustees of the Church, C. L. Huntley, James Halladay, A. Halladay, C. L. Huntley, Jr., James S. Smith, and Willis Huntley. Number of church members, 54; of Sabbath-school scholars, 45.

THE SECOND CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, located at Agawam Centre, was organized Sept. 1, 1819. In 1800 the second parish was divided by an act of the Legislature into Agawam and Feeding Hills. The old meeting-house, which had been located between the two villages, was removed to Feeding Hills, and the Agawam Society built a house of worship in 1803, though no church was regularly organized until September, 1819, at which time the old society at Feeding Hills was reorganized, and both churches adopted the same confession of faith.

The meeting for the organization of the Agawam Congregational Church was held at the house of Capt. Timothy Allyn, on the 1st day of September, 1819. Rev. Richard S. Storrs, of Longmeadow, was moderator of the council. Rev. Luke Wood, who had been employed for several weeks by the Domestic Missionary Society of Massachusetts to perform the duties of a minister to the people in Agawam and Feeding Hills, made a statement to the council, from which it appeared that a distinct Congregational Church had never been organized up to that time in the Society of Agawam; and that "the church in Feeding Hills is so far reduced that they consider themselves unable to maintain a competent Christian teacher." On the 17th of October, 1821, Rev. Reuben S. Hazen was ordained as pastor of the Agawam and Feeding Hills Congregational Churches in conjunction, preaching at each place on alternate Sabbaths. Mr. Hazen was a native of West Springfield, and studied theology with Rev. Dr. Osgood, of Springfield. In 1830 he relinquished his charge of the Feeding Hills Church, and gave all his time to Agawam, where he labored with much fervor until May 17, 1843, when he was dismissed. He died in Canterbury, Conn., where he was settled in 1874.

The first deacons of this church in Agawam were Timothy Allyn and Bildad Fowler. Rev. Ralph Perry, of Manchester, Conn., was the second pastor, and was ordained over the church Jan. 3, 1844. He was dismissed, in 1846, in consequence of ill-health; but, having subsequently recovered his health by travel, he was re-installed pastor of the church, Dec. 28, 1847. He remained until Aug. 26, 1874, when he met with a severe accident at the Bridge-Street crossing of the New Haven, Hartford and Springfield Railroad, in Springfield, which has for a long time rendered him helpless. The relations of the pastor had been retained thirty years, when Mr. Perry sent a letter of resignation to the church, March 28, 1875. Rev. George H. Pratt, of Glastonbury, Conn., was invited to supply the church, Oct. 1, 1875, and was settled Sept. 27, 1876, and is the present pastor. The church membership is 170,—61 males, 109 females; Sabbath-school, 80; families connected with the church, 70. The deacons are Reuben De Witt and Charles Lewis Campbell. Superintendent Sabbath-school, Joseph Fisher.

The meeting-house of the Congregationalist Church of Agawam was at first a "Parish House," and was dedicated June 8, 1803. Rev. Dr. Latbrop, of West Springfield, preached the dedication sermon.

Deacon Timothy Allyn gave the Baptists $600 for their interest in the old meeting-house, and this placed its ownership in the hands of the Congregationalists. The frame of the body of the house was originally erected by the "Separatists" of Suffield, Conn., but was taken down and moved to Agawam. The belfry and steeple were built in 1833. The church was remodeled in 1846 and 1875. The parish has a fund of $4300, the gift of Capt. Timothy Allyn.

L. W. Fisk was born in Wales, Mass., Oct. 25, 1817. In 1820 his father removed to the town of Ludlow, and there the subject of this sketch passed his boyhood. His education was obtained solely in the district school, and he could only attend in the winter season. From his early childhood he was trained to those habits of toil and industry which are common to the homes of New England. He worked upon the farm, and also in the clothing-mill which his father carried on. He was but little more than ten years of age when he commenced working out in summer, returning home in the winter.

At the age of eighteen his father gave him his time. He then went to Palmer, and commenced work for a hotel at ten dollars a month. Like other hostler boys, he received some "scales," and at the end of six months was able to place sixty dollars on interest.

He worked at the same employment in Belchertown, Springfield, and Northampton. In November, 1839, when the cars commenced running on the Boston and Albany Railroad, Mr. Fisk was again in Springfield, and drove the first and only hack to the first train; but competition opened lively, for there were plenty of hacks ready for the second train.

From 1842 to 1850 he continued actively in the hack business, securing a large amount of patronage, and accumulating considerable property. He was able to purchase productive real-estate. His health failing, he bought, in 1850, a small place in Agawam, and somewhat later the pleasant farm upon which he now resides.

Mr. Fisk has never taken any active part in politics, but is a strong supporter of the institutions of religion, and a useful, consistent member of the church.

His success in life is due largely to industry, honesty, fidelity, and temperance.

The family of Mr. Fisk consists of himself, wife, and three sons. An infant daughter died at the age of six months.

A METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

was built in the southern part of the town, near Gallup's Grove, in 1840, by the Conference. Rev. David Taylor, a licentiate, who lived near there, held meetings in this church a few years, but it has been abandoned for several years, except that the Second Adventists have had occasional meetings.

The Adventists built a small church or chapel on Feeding Hills Plains, in 1878.

THE FRENCH CATHOLIC CHURCH ("ST. WILLIAM'S"), in the Agawam portion of Mitteneague village, was built in 1874, at a cost of $4000. It is a mission of St. Joseph's Church, Springfield, and is under the care of the Rev. L. G. Garnier. This church has a membership of 500, who are mainly Canadian-French families employed in the Agawam cotton-mills. The Sabbath-school numbers 49.

BURIAL-PLACES.

The oldest burying-ground in Agawam is in the north part of the town. It was first used by the Indians, and, although the inclosure is not a large one, it is supposed to have been the burial-place of many of the natives. In digging graves their bones are frequently found a foot or two below the ordinary depth, and the bodies are all laid with heads toward the east.

The oldest headstones in this cemetery having the names and date of death are :

Mrs. Kezia Cooley, 1742; John Leonard, 1744; Lieut. Lambertson Cooper, 1755; Mrs. Mindful Brown, 1758; Jonathan Bodurtha, 1764; Robert Corfil, 1770; Mrs. Capt. Timothy Burbank, 1773; Samuel Merrick, 1778; Isaac Stiles, 1785; Mrs. Hezekiah Warner, 1785; Samuel Leonard, 1786.

The old burying-ground at Feeding Hills, among others, has these inscriptions:

"In Memory of William McIntyre, Esq., Major under General Pepperell, at the Reduction of Cape Breton, A.D. 1744; In whose life the Sincere Christian and Brave Soldier eminently appeared."

A low slab has this inscription :

"In Memory of Rev. Jonathan Law Pomeroy, for many years Pastor of the Church in Worthington."

Also stones bearing inscriptions;

"Rev. Sylvanus Griswold, born in Lyme, Conn., Feb. 14, 1730, ordained 1st Pastor of the Congregational Church in this place, Nov. 17, 1762."

"In Memory of Mr. Joseph Flower, who died Febr'y 20th, A.D. 1763, in the 63d year of his age."

The other cemeteries in town are of recent date and modern in their appearance. They are: one at Agawam Centre, one on the back street, Feeding Hills, and a new one east of Feeding Hills village.

EARLY ROADS AND TAVERNS.

Many traces of the early roads and turnpikes connecting with the upper and lower fords of the Agawam River are still to be seen. About 1750 there were two principal turnpikes running north and south through the town,—the Springfield and Hartford and the Hartford and Northampton roads. The former passed through Agawam Street, and the latter through Feeding Hills, and crossed at the bridge near the northwest corner of the town.*

On the east line were located three taverns, viz., one at the State line, called "White's Tavern;" Worthington's, at the crossing of the Three-Mile Brook; and Leonard's, at Agawam Centre. There was also a tavern on the river-road, kept by Ruel Warriner.

On the west thoroughfare were five taverns. The most southerly one was long known as the "Leonard Tavern." The oldest was erected at Feeding Hills about 1750. It stood on the south side of the street running east and west, and was

* These turnpikes were surveyed and laid out under the superintendence of a Commission appointed by the Court of Sessions, about the year 1750, and mile-stones were erected along their courses, some of which are still standing. Earlier roads than these turnpikes had evidently existed, for they are frequently referred to in old deeds. The turnpikes were described by "metes and bounds."

long kept by Col. Morley. Another one, erected by Col. Samuel Flowers about 1760-61, stood where C. C. Wright now lives. Col. Flowers was a well-known landlord.

A fourth stood about three-fourths of a mile north of the last named, formerly kept by Azariah Lewis. At a later date it was known as the "Cochrane House," and still later was owned by the town, and used as a home for its paupers.

Within a half-mile of the town-line, on the north, stood the "Morley Tavern."

The bridge over the Agawam River, near by, was also known as the "Morley Bridge."

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND SCHOOLS.

Until 1874, town-meetings and all public assemblages were held in Bodurtha's Hall, or in the school-house at Agawam and Feeding Hills. The question of a town-hall caused considerable trouble, as Feeding Hills desired to have it located there, and Agawam District claimed its location at the "centre," until it was finally voted to erect one in each place, to be used for town- and public-meetings, and for the higher grade of the public schools.

Two handsome brick buildings were built in each place in 1874-75, the one at Agawam costing $15,000, and the one at Feeding Hills $13,000. They are well located, and ornaments to each village. Besides the schools occupying the town-halls, there are school districts with school-houses as follows: Feeding Hills Centre; Feeding Hills, East Street; North Feeding Hills, East Street, south; Feeding Hills, West Street, north; Feeding Hills, West Street, south; Agawam Centre; Agawam, north; Agawam, south; Agawam Falls; and Agawam River. The school statistics show 179 males and 167 females of school age. The town school committee and school visitors are Rev. C. S. Sylvester, Rev. A. H. Simons, and Dr. Cyrus Bell.

MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES.

In the first volume of the book of grants of the town of Springfield occurs the following record:

"There is granted unto Samuel Mashfield, Thomas Noble, Thomas Miller, & Elizur Holyoke, upon their desires, liberty for ye setting up of a saw-mill on a brook below Ensign Cooper's Farm, over Agawam River. Also there is granted them about 40 acres of land, where they shall choose it, near the place where the mill shall stand, not prejudicing any of ye Inhabitant's property on the Highway. Also there is granted them 30 acres of meadow within 2 or 3 miles of ye place, where they shall find it most convenient for their use, beginning at one end of the meadow and so proceeding till 30 acres are made up. These grants are on condition that they cause a saw-mill to be set up in the place above mentioned, and set to work in sawing by the 1st day of April, which shall be in ye year 1666. And in case the said undertakers, when they have set up such work, shall see cause to desert the work within three years from the said time, they shall yield up the place and Lands hereby granted into ye hands of ye town, or such in ye town as shall carry on ye work; Provided these undertakers be paid no charges they shall be at about the work. Also they are not to be Restrained of the Liberty of the Commons for all sorts of Timber for their use for Sawing or otherwise."

This is supposed to have been on the site of the present Farrar Mills on Three-Mile Brook, as Thomas Cooper had grants of land on Three-Mile Brook and its east branch as early as January, 1659, and in 1660.

COTTON- AND WOOLEN-MILLS.

About the year 1810, Thomas Belden, of Hartford, came to this place and associated in partnership with Amos Ambrose, and Jonathan Worthington, John Norman, and Elijah Porter.

A cotton-mill was built on the site of an old saw-mill in the south part of the town, near the mouth of the Three-Mile Brook. Yarn was spun and sent out to the women in the neighborhood to weave. They were not very successful, but the mill continued to run at intervals until about 1825, when it was closed for several years.

Leonard & Parmenter, who were running the woollen-mill at Agawam Centre, on the same creek, about 1832, moved down to this place, and manufactured cotton for about two years; but by reason of back-water from the Connecticut River for about two months in the year, they subsequently removed their machinery to Palmer.

The building remained empty until about 1840, when Lyman Whitman commenced there the manufacture of wall-paper, and continued about ten or twelve years, since which time the building has remained unoccupied. This is said to have been the earliest cotton-mill in Western Massachusetts. About the same time, one was erected in Suffield, Conn.

About 1810-11, or shortly after the building of the cotton-mill spoken of above, Justus and Calvin Bedortha erected a fulling-mill on the site of the present Agawam Company's mills, where they fulled cloth and carded wool-rolls, doing custom-work only. About 1812 they commenced the manufacture of broadcloth, and were successful until the close of the war, when business generally declined. From that time until 1840 the mill passed through many changes. At the last date Norton, Bedortha & Co. purchased it, removed the old building, erected the wooden building,—still in use,—and built up a good custom business; and May 12, 1857, the present Agawam Company was organized under the act of Legislature of 1851, with a capital stock of $10,000. Upon this organization stockinet machinery was introduced, and trade increased until it reached its present proportions.

During the war of the Rebellion the company could not supply the demand, and a factory was purchased at South Hadley to accommodate the increase of business. In 1875 the present brick building was erected. The old building is still standing.*

PAPER-MILLS.

The Worthy Paper Company† is located on the Agawam River, opposite Mitteneague, and is supplied with power from the dam that supplies the grist-mill on the other side of the river, which stands on the old mill-site of 200 years ago. The company's mill is supplied with 3 turbine water-wheels, having an aggregate of 60 horse-power. They have in their employ 50 hands, use daily 3500 pounds of stock, and manufacture daily 2800 pounds of paper. Blank-book and writing-paper are manufactured exclusively. The company was organized in 1872 with a capital of $100,000; working capital, $150,000. The present officers are J. L. Worthy, President; G. L. Wright, Treasurer; Isaac B. Lowell, Clerk; G. L. Wright, Jr., Traveling Agent.

THE AGAWAM DISTILLERY, located in the south part of the town, was established in 1801, by E. Porter. At first it was used for distilling peppermint; afterward for manufacturing whisky from potatoes. It is now used for manufacturing gin and malt from rye and corn, and has a capacity of 312 gallons of gin per day. It is conducted by Harvey Porter and Albert Adams, under the firm-name of H. Porter & Co.

REMINISCENCES AND INCIDENTS.

Maj. Jesse McIntire, at Feeding Hills, before the Revolutionary war, had a good farm and the only brick house in town. It was about 20 feet square and one and a half stories high. It accommodated a family of 10 persons. The fare of the children was very plain. Sometimes, when the pot had been boiled and the meat taken up, the liquor was thickened with flour for the children's meal. Bean porridge was a common dish. Maj. McIntire and his wife were accustomed to sit beside each other, and to eat from the same plate at the table. The major was a man of wealth and high position. An anecdote is told of him to show his reputation for truthfulness: "A man was telling a story to a company where

Rev. Dr. Lathrop was present, when some incredulity was manifested at the recital. 'It is true, every word of it,' said the man; 'I had it from Maj. McIntire.' 'Yes,' replied Dr. Lathrop, 'but we don't seem to have it direct from Maj. McIntire,'—as much as to say, "If it had been told by the major himself, we would believe it."

The plains between Agawam and Feeding Hills furnished a supply of fat-pine stumps and knots, which served for a light in the great fireplace by which Nathaniel Leonard used to work out his problems in arithmetic, and, under the instructions of his pious grandmother, learned to read the Bible, which habit he practiced daily in after-life. In those days the sound given to some of the words in reading was as follows: "Shoold for should, shault for shalt, would for would, coold for could," etc. Mr. Leonard was the father of Squire Norman T. Leonard, of Westfield, and a man of learning.

The name of Flower is of French origin, taken from the word "Fleur." Joseph Flower came to this country from England about the year 1700, and settled in Weathersfield, Conn., where he married Sarah, daughter of "Brigadier" Samuel Wright. He removed to Feeding Hills in 1751, with eleven children.

Col. Samuel Flower, the third son and eighth child of Joseph, lived on the old homestead, and died here Oct. 28, 1815. He enlisted in the old French war at the age of sixteen, and was distinguished for daring service and narrow escapes. He also enlisted in the Revolutionary war as captain of an artillery company, receiving a commission signed by John Hancock, President of Congress, which is now in possession of his family descendants.‡

He was aid to Gen. Shepard in the Shays rebellion, and in the famous fight on Springfield Hill. It was said that he incurred the intense hatred of the Shays men, who made an attempt to capture him at his home, telling his son "they had a hundred bullets to put into him if he could be found." He held many prominent positions in the town of West Springfield [see history of that town], and was said to be a man of very commanding appearance, and of almost Herculean mold.

Deacon Alfred Flower, the third son of Col. Samuel Flower, was born in the town Jan. 6, 1780, and died here Oct. 14, 1873, in the ninety-third year of his age. He married a daughter of Samuel Leonard, and they lived together sixty-three years, the wife dying seven years before her husband. Alfred Flower was prominent in town affairs for many years. Represented West Springfield in the General Court, and settled more estates than any man in this vicinity. When the town of Agawam was incorporated he was chosen the first town-clerk. He was the father of Samuel and Alfred Flower, now living.

The Burbanks were quite noted in early days. Abraham Burbank was born in Suffield, Conn., in 1739. He graduated at Yale College at the age of twenty. About the year 1764 he moved to Feeding Hills, purchased a farm of 200 or more acres, and built a house near the Congregational Church, now owned and occupied by Sylvester Johnson, and in a good state of preservation. He married for his first wife Bertha Cushing, of Scituate, Mass., who died in 1768, and was buried here. His second wife was Sara Pomeroy, of Northampton, daughter of Col. Seth Pomeroy of Revolutionary fame. Abraham Burbank was a prominent Mason, receiving his certificate from Lodge No. 7, of a New York regiment, in 1762. This certificate, with many other documents belonging to him, is in possession of Henry M. Sebmuck, Esq., his great-grandson, now living in West Springfield. One of these documents reads as follows:

"George the Third, By the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c.

‡ Probably the commission was signed when John Hancock was Governor of Massachusetts or President of the Provincial Congress.

* The present capital of the company is $27,000, and the stockholders are Newbury Norton, Pres.; Henry Kirkham, Treas.; Norman Norton and James Kirkham, Directors; Roderick Ashley, Ashbel Sykes, Samuel Pyne.

"Know ye, That we have assigned and constituted, and do by these presents assign, constitute, and appoint Our Trusty and Well Beloved Abraham Burbank, Esquire, to be one of our Justices to keep our Peace."

He was afterward commissioned as justice of the Superior Court by Gov. John Hancock.

Roland, son of Abraham Burbank, was born June 15, 1772. He had two wives, Sophia Coit and Henrietta Palmer, who both lie buried in the old Feeding Hills Cemetery. He was justice of the peace several years, and was a leading man in town affairs. Sara Burbank, daughter of Abraham, born Feb. 1, 1778, married Daniel Moore, of Hartford, Conn., and died there Dec. 25, 1868. Some of her descendants now live in West Springfield. George, son of Rowland Burbank, now lives in Cambridge, Mass.

The name of Leonard has been conspicuous from the early settlement of the town. One of the first was John, who had 14 children, the first of whom, Benjamin, was born in Springfield in 1641. Thaddeus Leonard lived in Agawam district, but most of the others of the name—Justin, Phineas, Elias, Rufus, Asaph, Reuben, and Apollos—resided in Feeding Hills district. Asaph lived to a great age, and was remembered in his last days as having an enthusiastic fondness for seine fishing.

Squire Leonard, of Westfield, from whom the above facts are recorded, relates an anecdote of a man by the name of Leonard, of Agawam: "A neighbor applied to him for a horse to make a journey. He made no direct reply. Three or four days after, meeting the applicant, he said: 'Horse! yes! Well, I don't care if you do take him.' To which the reply was, 'Mr. Leonard, I have been to Hartford and got back last night.'"

Justin Granger was regarded as a good musician for early times. He had a great fondness for music, a pleasant voice, and was to some extent a composer of music. A piece written by him, called "Repentance," was sung by the choir.

Dr. Timothy Horton, whose father was a physician before him, was a practitioner of considerable ability, and had a good reputation as a physician and as a public man. He was noted for the extremely small charges he made for his medical services. His regular fee in Agawam was 12½ cents per visit, rarely ever charging over 2s., no matter how difficult the case or the distance traveled. He was frequently known to go a distance of four or five miles, spending considerable time in holding a consultation with some brother-doctor, and charging for his fee 1s.

Dr. Cyrus Bell has for many years been the leading resident physician in Agawam. He settled in the parish of Feeding Hills in 1840, and has held various offices in the town and in the Congregational Church at Feeding Hills.

Dr. Edward G. Ufford is now located at Agawam Centre. He was for many years a practitioner at West Springfield.

Agawam points with pride to the fact that Hon. Benjamin F. Wade and Hon. Edward Wade, his brother, were natives of the town. They were born in what is known as "Shoemakers' Lane," near Feeding Hills, on the road southeast toward Col. Wolcott's. Their father, James Wade, was a native of Medford, Mass., born July, 1750; died at Feeding Hills, May, 1826. His wife was the daughter of Rev. Edward Upham. Their children, all born in Feeding Hills, were Martha, Nancy, Mary, James, Sidney, Theodore, Charles, Benjamin Franklin, and Edward. The father was a shoemaker and a common soldier in the Revolution; was at the battles of Lexington and Bunker Hill, and was confined for a long time a prisoner at Halifax, Nova Scotia. He removed with his family to Ohio, when it was a wilderness, in 1821, traveling, as was the custom for the emigrants of those times, with an ox-team and covered wagon. Benjamin F. and Edward claimed to have walked the entire distance, nearly one thousand miles. They settled on what was known as the "Western Reserve," in the town of Andover, Ashtabula Co.

The two sons referred to were "self-made" men as far as education was concerned. Both taught school and studied law, paying their own way in obtaining an education. Benjamin F. practiced law at Jefferson, the county-seat of Ashtabula; was admitted to the Bar in 1828; was elected a member of the Ohio Senate in 1837, and was chosen presiding judge of the third judicial district in that State in 1847. He was elected to the United States Senate in 1851, and held that office twenty-eight years; was made president of the Senate in 1867. In the Senate he was always known as an Abolitionist, the champion of freedom and civil rights, a terror to Southern "Fire-eaters" on account of his resolute character and inflexible fidelity to the cause of liberty. His name was frequently mentioned in connection with the Presidency. In the early days of the Rebellion he was appointed chairman of the joint committee on the conduct of the war. During his last days he was United States attorney for the Northern Pacific Railroad. He died at his home in Jefferson, March 2, 1878.

Edward settled in Cleveland, where he was a leading member of the Bar, and was identified with various improvements of that city, particularly in connection with the "Wade Alotments and Wade Avenue." He was a member of Congress for several years, and one of the committee on commerce from 1853 to 1861. He died at Cleveland in 1866. James settled in Watervliet, N. Y. He was a physician and had an extensive practice. His death occurred in 1868. Theodore, Charles, and Sidney became successful farmers in Ashtabula County, Ohio.

General Washington passed through Agawam twice, first in 1775, from Hartford to Boston, riding in a coach and four, under escort, fording the Agawam River near where stands the Agawam bridge, and again in 1789. An extract from his diary shows a favorable impression of the town and meadows. Burgoyne's army, after their surrender, passed through the town, and, as is well known, some of the stragglers fell out by the way and became the ancestors of some of our best citizens.

WAR RECORD.

Agawam furnished 172 men for the war of the Rebellion, which was a surplus of 10 over all demands. Four were commissioned officers. The amount of money expended, exclusive of State aid, was $17,077.55, and to aid the families of volunteers, $6719.14. The ladies of the town formed a Soldiers' Relief Society in October, 1861. They met once a week during the war, and made lint, bandages, and underclothing, which was sent to the front, and also sent about $1000 in money. GEOGRAPHICAL.

CHESTER is a flourishing town of Western Hampden, and occupies the extreme northwestern corner of the county. It contains an area of 20,507 acres of hill, plain, and woodland. The boundaries of Chester are Worthington and Middlefield (in Hampshire County) on the north, Blandford on the south, Huntington (in Hampshire County) on the east, and Becket (in Berkshire County) on the west. The Boston and Albany Railroad passes through the southwestern portion of the town.

NATURAL FEATURES.

Located in a region of the country noted the world over for its natural beauty, in which the hills of Hampden are impressively picturesque features, Chester contains much to charm the eye and arrest the attention of the lover of the beautiful. The Agawam River, at Huntington, is fed by three branches, two of which, flowing through Chester, are called the Western and Middle Branches.

Save where the village of Chester nestles in a lovely valley, the surface of the town is generally hilly. The nature of the soil in the elevated districts is of a gravelly composition, but on the river lowlands sandy loam prevails. The well-stocked woodlands furnish a great variety of lumber, of which beech, birch, and maple are the chief products.

Minerals abound in greater variety, it is said, in Chester than in any other town in Massachusetts. Among the best known are emery-rock, mica-slate, soapstone, gneiss, quartz, magnetic-iron, and hornblende. Specimens of gold and silver are said to have been found.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

On the 2d of June, 1762, the colony of Massachusetts being in straitened financial circumstances, the General Court issued an order for the sale of ten townships, and of these the one designated as No. 9 was sold to William Williams, for the sum of £1500. This township No. 9 embraced within its limits the present town of Chester.

Shortly after his purchase of the tract Williams transferred it to John Murray, Abijah Willard, Timothy Paine, and John Chandler, who were the original proprietors of the town.

The township included, besides the present area of Chester, a portion of what is now Huntington and a portion of what is now Middlefield, containing, in the aggregate, about 32,000 acres, of which 7500 acres had been disposed of in grants previous to the sale of the township.

In January, 1763, there being already 19 settlers in the town, the proprietors held a meeting and agreed to admit settlers upon the land on the following conditions:

"That each, within the space of three years from the first of June last, build a dwelling-house on his land of the following dimensions, to wit: 24 ft. long, 18 ft. wide, 7 feet stud, and have 7 acres of land well tilled and fenced, and brought to English grass or ploughed, and actually settle a family on the same and continue such family thereon for the space of six years, and shall also within three years from this time settle a Protestant minister of the gospel there and pay one-sixtieth part of the charge thereof. That each settler have one hundred acres of land as an encouragement."

One hundred lots were laid out to be settled on these conditions, and from the records it appears that shortly afterward there were 51 settlers in the town.

The names of these settlers are as follows: Asa Noble, Thomas Noble, Jr., John Gilmore, David Bolton, John Woods, Alex. Gordon, John Hanum, John Lyman, John Scott, Jr., John Smith, Benjamin Mathers, John Lacore, John Winterer, David Scott, Ebenezer Webber, Elias Lyman, James Black, Levi Woods, Gideon Mathison, William Kennedy, Glass Cochran, John Crooks, Abraham Fleming, Timothy Fairman, David Fleming, Jno. Webber, Jno. Crawford, Thomas Kennedy, Robert Blair, James Clark, Absalom Blair, Israel Rose, Samuel Fairman, Abner Smith, David Gilmore, William English, Nathaniel Mann, John Boyes, Andrew English, William Mann, Jonathan Webber, James Brown, Thomas Moreton, Samuel Elder, William Campbell, William Moor, Thomas Winterer, Nathan Rose, Paul Kingston, Jesse Johnson, John Woods.

The original grant, be it noted, contained about 24,700 acres, and in 1763, the proprietors claiming that they had received but little return for their investments, and that a large pond in the tract occupied 500 acres, received an additional grant of 1200 acres, west of the original grant.

As may be imagined, the dwellings of the pioneers were primitive in construction, and devoid of many conveniences known to a later period, but they were comfortable and substantial. Some of the houses were built of logs, but a majority of them were framed, according to the pattern required by the town proprietors. Few of them were ceiled, and, as to heating, the means were supplied by old-fashioned fireplaces, while cooking was effected on the hearthstone coals, or in large stone or brick ovens. Tallow-candles or pine-knots furnished the household light, the walls were devoid of paper, floors bare of carpets, while the absence of matches made it necessary to keep the fires constantly alive, for, should they go out, a relighting involved a journey to a neighbor for the aid of a burning brand. The garments and bedding of the household were all homespun, the good housewife being spinner and weaver as well.

Journeys to church were performed on horseback, and in some cases the family horse, mounted with a pillion, carried the Goodman, his wife, and perhaps a child or two.

Committees were chosen early in 1763 to lay out highways, and to agree with some person to build a mill, but this mill was probably not built until 1766. The proprietors held their early meetings in Northampton, Rutland, Worcester, Boston, and Lancaster, until as late as 1765. The settlers upon the tract between the middle and east branches of Agawam River early in 1764 were Abijah Willard, John Chandler, John Murray, Timothy Paine, and Jas. Otis. The proprietors' records indicate that in this year the inhabitants were involved in legal controversies, and that the settlement became somewhat disorganized in consequence. The proprietors addressed the people a letter counseling them to harmony and peace, but what was the original cause of the trouble does not appear. An early record states that the population of Chester was 119 in 1790 (probably 119 families), and that in ten years it advanced to 1542. This statement would seem to indicate a wonderfully rapid growth for those days.

PROMINENT SETTLERS.

The Bell family were originally from Dumfriesshire, Scotland, and were staunch followers of John Knox. When the legions of Cromwell had cleared the rebellious Irish from Ulster, and the country became open to immigration, a branch of the Bell family migrated thither.

In 1723, James Bell, the grandfather of Samuel Bell, emigrated from Ballygauley, County Tyrone, Ireland, to America, and settled in Oakham, then a part of Rutland, Mass. Another branch of the family settled in Londonderry, N. H., and a descendant, Hon. Samuel Bell, represented that State, during Gen. Jackson's administration, in the United States Senate, and, at a later period, James Bell held the same position. Hon. Samuel D. Bell, one of the chief-justices of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, was also a member of the family.

Among the early settlers of Chester were Samuel Bell, Sr., and his brothers, William and Aaron, who removed from Oakham and settled in the northwest part of the town. The country was then a wilderness, and abounded in wild animals, among which wolves were the most troublesome and dangerous. Samuel Bell passed nearly a year alone in the new location, preparing his land for cultivation and erecting a dwelling. He had many thrilling adventures with the wolves, and encountered severe hardships, but he triumphed over every obstacle, and eventually found himself the possessor of a valuable and productive farm. He made regular trips to Boston or Hartford every year to dispose of his fat cattle and the products of his dairy, and became one of the prominent men of the town, taking active part in the local politics of the region. He died at an advanced age, full of years and honors, and mourned by all the people.

Samuel Bell, his eldest son, first mentioned, was born in Chester, in 1786, twenty-one years after the incorporation of the town. He was educated at the Westfield Academy, and adopted the profession of a land-surveyor, in which he was very proficient. He held many prominent positions in the town, and was for forty years a teacher of established reputation, continuing in that vocation until he was upward of sixty years of age. He was a devoted and efficient member of the Congregational Church.

His eldest son, Benjamin F. Bell, graduated at the Wesleyan University, and died in the prime of life, while officiating as principal of the Rhinebeck Academy, in Dutchess Co., N. Y. His second son has been a leading citizen of Middlefield, Hampshire Co. His grandson, Charles M., is also a prominent citizen of his native town.

Among the distinguished men of the Bell family may be mentioned Hon. James Bell, of Skowhegan, Me.; Dr. Reuben Bell, of Hadley, Mass.; Dr. William C. Bell, of Middletown, Conn.; Dr. Lester Bell, of Williamstown, Mass.; Dr. Cyrus Bell, of Agawam; Dr. Artemas Bell, of Southampton; and Dr. William O. Bell, of Westfield.

Rufus Tinker, commonly known as "Master Tinker," was a famous teacher from about 1770 to 1790, and the first, or among the first, in the town. He was a noted pedagogue, and remarkable for his elegant penmanship as well as his peculiar method of maintaining order and discipline in his school, which he did with a long elastic rod, with which he was wont to take the boys all in a row at a single sweep.

His son, Rev. Reuben Tinker, graduated at Amherst, and was one of the earliest missionaries to the Sandwich Islands. He subsequently returned to the United States and was settled over a church in Chautauqua Co., N. Y., where he died. Another son, Deacon Rufus Tinker, lived and died on the old homestead.

Sylvester Bemis, a native of Lancaster, Worcester Co., was an early settler in Chester. He came in the spring, bringing his provisions on his shoulder, and worked through the summer preparing his land for cultivation, and at the approach of autumn had cleared and prepared 6 acres for planting, which was seeded with wheat, brought also on his back, and worked into the ground with a hoe. He also erected a log house the same season, and in the succeeding spring removed with his new bride to his home in the mountain wilderness.

In the course of years he became one of the substantial farmers and prominent men of the town, though he steadfastly declined official position. His son, Capt. Bemis, succeeded him in the occupancy of the homestead.

James Holland was a native of Ballygauley, County Tyrone, Ireland, who emigrated to America and settled in Oakham, where he married into the Bell family, and came with his brothers-in-law and settled in Chester, at what is called the "North End," on land since owned by George W. Holcomb. He was a man of strong and vigorous opinions, impatient of restraint or innovations, and a fast friend of civil and religious liberty, as then understood in New England. He was possessed of indomitable courage and perseverance, as the following incident, related by Mr. Quigley, well illustrates:

"It is stated that while residing in Oakham he resolved one day, while salting his sheep, to visit a noted rattlesnake den which existed on one corner of his farm, and exterminate the reptiles. With characteristic intrepidity he stripped off his shoes and stockings, and, being dressed in the customary short clothes of the period, the lower portion of his limbs was consequently left entirely naked. Grasping a stout stick, he resolutely commenced the attack, and was soon busily employed. But, while giving vigorous battle in front, he was stealthily assailed in the rear. A rattler of enormous size fixed his fangs deeply in the calf of his leg. Only waiting long enough to take vengeance on his crafty assailant, he quickly tied a cord around the limb between the wound and the knee, and with his knife excised the bitten flesh, filled the cavity with salt, on which he placed a quantity of tobacco, and, closely binding his handkerchief over all, leisurely proceeded homeward. No inconvenience resulted from the bite, and he ever afterward entertained the opinion that rattlesnakes were but little account, any way."

On one occasion he attended a Methodist meeting, then a curiosity among the staid Orthodox people, at which a Mr. Thrasher was the principal manager and speaker. His peculiar style and noisy manner disturbed the old gentleman's ideas of religious propriety, and greatly offended him. Listening for a time quietly, he at length arose and said, in words full of meaning, "Thrasher, you have said enough; sit down! If you don't, I'll sit ye down!" Thrasher sat down.

One of Mr. Holland's daughters married a merchant of Chester village,—Daniel Falley,—who afterward removed to Oswego, N. Y., of which he was an early settler. Thither Mr. Holland accompanied him, and was living with him at the time the British attacked the place, May 5, 1814. He was then nearly ninety years of age, but the martial spirit was kindled, and he became so uneasy that a strict watch was kept over him; but he managed to elude the vigilance of his son-in-law's family, and at the close of the day was found in the ranks with a musket in his hands, bravely doing his best toward defending the place. He was possessed of wonderful vitality, and it is said that at the time of his death his hair retained its original color, which was a jet black.

The Holland family have been noted for years in Western Massachusetts, and especially in the medical profession. Nearly all the sons of the first-named Holland entered that profession. His son James located in Westfield, and became celebrated; William, another son, practiced medicine in Belchertown, afterward in the Mamakating Valley, N. Y., and finally settled on the shores of the beautiful and romantic Canandaigua Lake, where he remained until his death; Dr. James Holland, of Westfield, is a well-known and skillful physician and surgeon, and a leading member of the profession in Western Massachusetts; Virgil Holland was a college graduate and an excellent scholar, but died young; Dr. Homer Holland was a noted scientist of his day, and died in North Carolina; Abram, George, and Aaron, sons of the elder James Holland, all entered the medical profession, and two of them settled in Weston, Middlesex Co., Mass. All three died young. Another son, Simon, became a merchant in Albany, N. Y.

Eugene Holland, son of Dr. Homer Holland, is a resident of Colorado. Henry Holland, a noted antiquarian and student of history, is a prominent druggist in Westfield.

Dr. Charles J. Holland, a grandson of James Holland, of Chester, died some years ago in Huntington, Hampshire Co.

Samuel Otis settled on the west bank of the west branch of the Agawam* River, about a mile below the line of Middlefield, and under the shadow of "Gobble Mountain." He was a deacon in the Baptist Church, a steady, sober citizen, and remarkable for his inoffensive and quiet life. His landed property was not extensive, and he often eked out a scanty subsistence by manufacturing shingles for market, in which mechanical employment he was unusually expert. Politically, he was a steadfast Democrat of the Jefferson school, "without variableness or shadow of turning." Party spirit in those days ran high, even among the quiet valleys of the Western mountains, and the good people of Chester did not escape the contagion. On one occasion, at the annual town-meeting, the river was at its spring flood and almost impassable, and, there being no bridge near, the deacon concluded for once to forego the privilege of the franchise rather than attempt to ford the swollen stream. But upon the first ballot the Federalists elected the moderator by one majority, which was a sinister omen for the Democracy, and forthwith Deacon Gamwell, another staunch Democrat, mounted his horse and rode after the recreant voter. Reaching the bank of the river opposite the dwelling of Deacon Otis, he made his business known, and urged his immediate attendance at the polls. But there was no bridge, and the deacon was not easily persuaded to venture into the swollen torrent. Deacon Gamwell insisted, and told him to strip himself and hold his clothing over his head and come on, and he accordingly did as he was commanded, and, reaching the other bank in safety, donned his clothes and saved his party.

The two political parties were very evenly balanced, and the winning of the moderator was considered almost equivalent to a victory. On one occasion there was great excitement. The place of meeting was at the meeting-house on the hill. The Federalists succeeded in electing their moderator, William Shepard, an able and popular man, and also, as clerk, Capt. Otis Taylor, another equally popular man, by a very small majority. But then they halted, and could make no further progress, and the day passed away without the election of the other town officers. At sundown the meeting adjourned over to the succeeding day.

Now began the grand strategy of the campaign. In the evening two Federalists were enticed into Whipple's tavern and made merry with copious libations of "flip" such as only Landlord Whipple could produce, "the secret of which, dying with him, has become one of the lost arts." When the luckless Federalists were well under the influence of the potent spirit they were placed in a retired room, and the door carefully fastened upon them. In the morning, upon mustering their forces, the Federalists discovered the absence of the two voters, and at once suspected its cause. To establish an equilibrium, Samuel Hamilton and Hugh Quigley, Jr., inveigled a couple of unterrified Democrats into a room in 'Squire Emmons' house and turned the key in the lock, while, to afford a reasonable solace in their imprisonment, the 'squire generously supplied them with Jamaica rum. This satisfied them, and they were quiet through the day. When it became known that two reliable Democrats were missing from the ranks there was a terrible outcry, and hot denunciations were poured upon the heads of the Federalists. In the mean time the balloting progressed, and each time ended in a tie, and so it kept on until about three o'clock P.M., when old Mr. Warfield, who carried the mail between Chester and Northampton, and who had been kept under guard by his friends, declared that he could remain no longer; that he was a day behind with his mail and must attend to his business, politics or no politics, and, breaking away, he left the Federalists in a hopeless minority of one, and the Democrats swept the field.

* This stream and its branches are often called the Westfield River, but there would be the same propriety in calling it Russell or Chester River, or in calling the Connecticut Springfield River. It should ever retain its Indian name.

Deacon Parmenter, according to Mr. Quigley, was a native of Lancaster, and came to Chester about the same date as the Abbotts, to whom he was related by marriage.

He was one of the famous teachers of the early day, ranking with Bell and Tinker, and was intimately connected with the cause of education for more than twenty years. He was one of the substantial men of the town, prominent in the church, and was elected as representative to the General Court at a period when the position was an honorable one, before the days of demagogues and "ring" politicians.

Deacon Stephen Lyman was a native of Northampton, from whence he removed to Southampton, and subsequently to Chester. He was descended, in the fifth generation, from Richard Lyman, the progenitor of all bearing the name in New England. Richard Lyman was born at High Ongar, Eng., in 1580, and died at Hartford, Conn., in 1640. He was probably one of the first settlers of that place, about 1685.

Deacon Lyman settled on a fine piece of land about one mile west of the meeting-house, and several of his sons upon their arrival at manhood settled near him, so that in time it came to be called the Lyman neighborhood. The Lyman family were among the most worthy and influential citizens in the town, both in Church and State affairs. Two of Deacon Lyman's sons, Crispus and Chester, lived and died on farms near the homestead. A daughter, Nancy, married the Rev. Henry R. Hoisington, a missionary to Ceylon, where he and his wife labored for many years. Another daughter, Sophronia, married Dr. Lester Bell, of Williamstown. His youngest son, Samuel Lyman, remained on the farm with his father, and succeeded him in the church. There have been three deacons in this family.

Timothy Lyman, a brother of Stephen, also settled in Chester, on the farm next north, at the same time as his brother. His son Timothy lived on the homestead, and a daughter married Edward Taylor, of Montgomery. Julia Taylor, who died in Huntington, and was noted for liberal bequests to religious and charitable institutions, was a granddaughter, and Deacon Edward M. Taylor, a business-man of Saginaw, Mich., is a grandson. Timothy Lyman, a graduate of Amherst College, and a prominent minister of the Congregational Church, and Joseph B. Lyman, brother of the last named, a lawyer and able writer, recently connected with the New York Tribune, are also members of the family.

Zenas Searle, a native of Southampton, settled in Chester in 1787, about a half-mile south of the meeting-house. The greater part of his farm he cleared from the forest. He lost his life by a lamentable accident in middle age. He was yoking a young pair of cattle, preparatory to hauling in some hay, when they became frightened and ran away, dragging him after them by the chain, which had caught him in some manner so that he could not release himself. His injuries proved fatal. His son, Zenas, remained on the farm until about 1866-67, when he moved to West Andover, Ashtabula Co., Ohio. His daughter, Rachel, married Luther Edwards, of Southampton, who was the father of Rev. Henry S. Edwards. Another daughter married Strong Clark, also of Southampton.

Alexander Gordon, one of the early settlers, was of an ancient Scottish family, and migrated to the North of Ireland, from whence he came to America. He married a sister of James Holland, and settled in the northern part of the town, near the line of Middlefield.

"His son, John, possessed rare ability, was an excellent scholar, and filled various civil positions. In mechanical matters his skill and ingenuity were admirable. To beguile his leisure hours, with the commonest tools and no previous instruction, he made an eight-day brass clock and presented it to his cousin, Mary Holland, afterward the wife of Capt. Quigley. It marked time with great accuracy, and remained long in the family. He never married, and died in middle age."*

John Gordon once had a thrilling adventure with a pack of wolves. It was winter, and he was on his return—horseback—from assisting a neighbor who lived near the "Den," in Middlefield, in slaughtering his hogs. He did not start on his return home until after dark, when, fastening a piece of meat upon the saddle and selecting a fire-brand, he mounted and turned his horse toward home.

He had not proceeded far when the dread howling of the gray wolves, "long, lank, and devilish,"

"With their long gallop, which can tire
The hound's deep hate and hunter's fire," admonished him of danger in his path, and he gave free rein to his "gallant gray;" but the snow was deep and the enemy were soon upon him, galloping with open mouths and snapping jaws on either side. He waved his burning brand, and, detaching his meat from the saddle, cast it upon the snow before them, hoping to see them no more. But a second's wrangling and battling, and they were again upon him. Thoroughly frightened, the noble horse made the best speed possible through the deep snow. Fiercely the infuriated brutes, maddened by the morsel flung to them, now attacked horse and rider savagely from flank and rear.

Waving his blazing brand from side to side and cheering his panting steed, the race continued for two miles amidst a terrific howling of swift-footed demons, snuffing his blood, until at last he reached his home, where his faithful horse fell, utterly exhausted, at the cabin-door. It was a terrible experience, never to be forgotten.

Among the earliest manufacturers in Chester was John Stevens, who lived at North Chester, and built an oil- and grist-mill. In early times large quantities of flax were grown in the western portions of the county, and the seed and its oil became important articles of commerce.

The Stevens family was full of ingenuity, and introduced various kinds of manufacturing, including window-curtains, or shades, made from wooden splints. Hon. Thomas F. Plunkett, in his younger days, was associated with them, and learned many useful lessons, which he turned to good account in after-years. He married a daughter of Col. Taylor, and became so popular that he was sent as representative to the Legislature.

Jude Stevens built a factory a little below the village, but the stream burst its banks and carried it away, when, becoming disgusted with the hills of Massachusetts, he sold out and removed to Western Pennsylvania. Of the descendants of John Stevens were Aaron Stevens, of Worthington, and Washington Stevens, of Westfield.

The Campbell family. Three brothers, Matthew, James, and Robert Campbell, settled on the eastern slope of the highlands overlooking the valley of the middle branch of the Agawam, or, as it was sometimes called, the East River.

* Quigley.

They were of the renowned clan Campbell, from the glens and rugged highlands of Argyleshire, on the western coast of Scotland. The head of their house was the great MacCallum More, duke of Argyle, and lord of Lorne, whom they considered of more importance as a man than the scion of the House of Hanover, George the Second, of England. Samuel Bell married into the family, and a double alliance was consummated by the marriage of Matthew Campbell with Sarah Bell. Ethan Campbell removed to Manlius, Onondaga Co., N. Y., where he became a prominent and respected citizen, filling offices of honor and trust. William Campbell was elected to the Legislature, and also Hector Campbell, the latter about the year 1840. A son of the latter, William B. Campbell, removed to California, where he accumulated a fortune in the fur trade. At the earnest solicitation of the latter, his father subsequently migrated to the Pacific coast, and settled in Clackamas Co., Oregon.

James Quigley was another pioneer settler in Chester, who located near the Holland farm, and not very far from the Worthington line. He was born in Stranorlan, County Donegal, Ireland, near Londonderry, near the head of Lough Swilly. The family had suffered from the dissensions of the times, and members of it had seen active service during the siege of Derry by James the Second.

The Quigley family did not long remain in Chester, the son of James selling out the homestead and removing to Oswego, N. Y. James Quigley, first mentioned, first landed at Boston, where he married Isabella Walker, whose father was in the colonial revenue service. Mr. Quigley after his marriage, which his namesake characterizes as a "runaway match," located in Worcester, about a mile from the court-house, where he remained until well advanced in years, when, for some reason, he sold his property and removed to the rugged hills of Chester.

Mr. Samuel Quigley, in his interesting sketches, says that after the old gentleman had cleared his farm and erected his buildings, and paid for everything, he had a half-bushel measure full of Spanish milled dollars left. He was generous in his contributions to church and charitable purposes, and was a valuable citizen. He and his consort rest in the cemetery in Chester.

One of his sons, John Quigley, was a member of the company which, under the auspices of Gen. Rufus Putnam, Gen. Arthur St. Clair, and other prominent leaders, made the first permanent settlement in the region now covered by the flourishing State of Ohio, at Marietta, situated at the mouth of the Muskingum River, on the 7th day of April, 1788. His father-in-law, Col. Oliver, accompanied him. Here he amassed a handsome property.

Another son remained in Worcester after the removal of his father to Chester, and was among the first to enlist in the American army at the outbreak of the Revolution. At the battle of Long Island, in August, 1776, he became separated from his command, but, dodging the British troops, he reached the banks of the East River, which he finally swam with three muskets—which he had picked up on the battle-field—lashed to his back, and joined the army under Washington, and was present at the battle of White Plains, in October following. He served through the war, and was present at the surrender of Yorktown, Va., in October, 1781.

Another son, Hugh Quigley, married Mary, the daughter of James Holland, and from him are descended the Quigleys of Chester.

An amusing incident, illustrating the character of Capt. Quigley,* is related by Samuel Quigley, which we give in his own words:

"It so happened that two ladies from the west side came to his house on a visit. Visits in those times were not confined to a few hours, but sometimes extended to days, and this particular visit, by the occurrence of a violent storm, was protracted to unusual length. The rain raised the water in the river, the foot-bridge was swept away, and, unless some means could be devised to enable them to cross, they would be under the necessity of remaining until the subsidence of the flood.

"After various plans had been considered and rejected, it was suggested that Capt. Quigley should ford the stream, carrying them in his arms. This was received with great favor by the ladies, who were impatient to return home, but the captain was averse to the proposal; he by no means relished the task, the water being deep and the current strong. Finally he consented to make the attempt; and, taking the smallest of the two in his arms, he succeeded in placing her in safety on the other side. The other was, in the vocabulary of the sporting fraternity, a 'heavy-weight,'—a widow of mature age. Lifting her with great apparent exertion, he staggered under the burden to the middle of the stream, when he informed her that he really believed he should have to take a new hold, a perceptible slip accompanying the remark. The lady was alarmed; she remonstrated; she entreated, but to no purpose. 'God help me, madam!' exclaimed the captain,—his peculiar expression in moments of excitement or anxiety,—'don't you see you are slipping from my grasp?' And slip she did, to the bottom, giving, at the same instant, a shrill and terrific scream. After sufficient purification, he took a new hold of the portly dowager, raised her from the cleansing element, and, without further mishap, landed her on the right bank. The ease with which the last part of the task was performed, but especially the sly twinkle of his eye when the subject was mentioned in his presence, authorized the grave suspicion that the washing of the widow in the pure waters of the West-field River was not altogether involuntary or premeditated."

Among the most prominent men who have made Chester their home was Forbes Kyle, who came from New Haven, or vicinity, to take charge of a large tannery owned by his father-in-law, Benjamin Prescott, a wealthy citizen of New Haven. Mr. Kyle soon became a prominent man in his adopted town, and he was honored with official positions for many years, until at length he was chosen to represent the community in the State Senate,—a position which he had the distinguished honor of filling alone of all the citizens of the town. He had the office of local magistrate, and, in addition to his other duties, kept a country grocery-store. He was a mild-mannered and well-bred man, courteous and upright in all his dealings. One of his sons succeeded him upon the homestead.

Zadoc Ingell is supposed to have been the first person of the Methodist denomination who settled in Chester. He was a prosperous farmer, and his piety was so sincere and unostentatious that he received the sobriquet of "Bishop." His son William removed to Oswego County, N. Y., and became a prominent citizen. The youngest son lived and died on the homestead.

Jesse Johnson was another estimable and valued citizen, and a deacon of the church. One of his descendants, Artemas B. Johnson, is quite a prominent attorney of Hardin Co., Ohio. Another is Dr. Eldridge M. Johnson, of Williamsburg, Hampshire Co. The Ingell and Johnson families resided in the northwest part of the town.

Lieut. John Hamilton was from Worcester. He married Catherine, daughter of James Quigley. His oldest son, John Hamilton, Jr., removed some years since to Schenectady Co., N. Y. Another son, Samuel Hamilton, removed to Hartford, Conn., where he accumulated a large property.

Two sons of John Hamilton, Jr.,—John A. and Henry H.,—were graduates of Amherst College, and entered the ministry. A daughter married Rev. Francis Warriner, who was some time pastor of the church in Chester.

* Mr. Quigley leaves the reader altogether in the dark as to whether the Capt. Quigley here mentioned was the original James Quigley or Hugh Quigley.

Amos Taylor is believed to have been from Hadley. He settled on the East River, a little above the village of North Chester. The Taylor family were among the most prominent and highly esteemed of the many estimable families who settled in the town. Amos, a son of the preceding, studied medicine and settled in Warwick; another son, Col. William Taylor, succeeded his father on the homestead. He married, for his first wife, a daughter of John Stevens, and for his second the widow of Dr. Abram Holland. Col. Taylor was highly esteemed. One of his daughters, Hannah, married the Hon. Thomas F. Plunkett, and another, Nancy, married the Hon. Charles H. Plunkett, of Hinsdale. Col. Taylor's son, Capt. Otis Taylor, was one of the prominent men of the town, and took a very active part in all political matters. He held various official positions, and was a member of the Legislature. His sons are enterprising business-men of New York and Massachusetts. John Taylor, son of Amos Taylor, lived in what was called the Kinney Brook neighborhood, in the eastern part of the town. Of his sons, Horace was long engaged in manufacturing in Huntington; William studied for the ministry, became a Methodist preacher, and settled in Ohio. Both represented the old town of Norwich in the General Court. Alfred Taylor, a son of Horace, became a lawyer, and located in the city of New York.

Any sketch of the early inhabitants of Chester would manifestly be incomplete without some account of Capt. William Toogood, who had been in early life an officer of the British army, but who appears to have been living in America at the commencement of the Revolution, for it seems that his knowledge of military affairs was utilized by the American government, who employed him as an officer of instruction to drill and prepare recruits for the active duties of the field, which position he filled with ability and credit. On the conclusion of peace he abandoned the profession of arms and betook himself to the cultivation of the soil, purchasing a farm and settling down to peaceful pursuits a mile north of the meeting-house in Chester. The standing of his family in England and the time and place of his birth have not been preserved, but he evidently belonged to a good stock, as the fact of his holding a commission in the British army is of itself sufficient evidence.

He was a great favorite among the people, who admired him for his cultivation and courtesy, as well as for his great fund of witticisms and pleasantries.

Great deference was always shown him in military matters; and, when in after-years, a military company was formed in the town, he was complimented upon muster-days with a temporary command, which he understood and fully appreciated.

On one occasion the company, under the command of Capt. Blackman, had a parade near the farm of Zenas Searle. After the drilling and general business of the day were over, the officers sat down to a bountiful repast, and Capt. Toogood, who was present, was assigned the post of honor. By degrees the company became unusually mellow, and the venerable captain, in particular, was wonderfully elated. At length, leaning back in his chair, his feelings found vent in words. "Gentlemen," said he, "no lord in his palace feels as happy as I do to-day, sitting in this log cabin, with its sheep-skin windows." Glass had not at that time come into general use in Western Massachusetts.

Capt. Toogood was a devout Christian and a member of the Methodist Church, which denomination had an organization, but no house for public worship, and their meetings were held in private dwellings. Habits formed in military life are not easily laid aside, and on one occasion the captain was complained of by some of his over-zealous brethren for an infraction of some portion of the discipline of the church; in short, rumor said that the doughty captain had ventured into too close proximity to a cask of cider-brandy of such stalwart age that he was worsted in the encounter. Here was a dilemma. The discipline of the church must be enforced, but the delinquent was one of its pillars, a man of property, and of marked influence. After due consideration it was resolved to choose a committee to wait upon him, receive his explanation, and report to the church. The names of only two of the committee have been preserved,—Woodruff and Smith. The gentlemen composing the "investigating committee" took hold of the matter with extreme delicacy and no small degree of tact and discretion. Procuring a bottle of the best brandy, they waited upon the captain, who received them with the greatest cordiality and hospitality, and entertained them so royally that tradition has forgotten whether they ever broached the subject upon which they came to consult. At the appointed time they reported that there was not the slightest foundation for the charge, which report was gladly received by the authorities, who congratulated themselves upon so lucky an escape from a troublesome difficulty.

Up to this time the accused had kept silent; but conscious that his honor and Christian character and standing had been in jeopardy, and feeling that the moment had come to justify himself before the world, he rose and questioned his fellow-members: "Brethren, is my moral and Christian character in your estimation as fair and spotless as it was before this charge was made against me?" He was assured that it was. "Is my standing in the church as good as it ever was?" They assured him it was. "Well, then," said he, "please to erase my name from your books." He had made his point, and withdrew from the organization with an untarnished reputation, leaving his brethren astonished at the abruptness of his leave-taking, and possibly a little chagrined at his successful manœuvre.

Capt. Toogood possessed a handsome estate, and he was ever considered one of the best citizens of the great mountain town where he so long made his home. His son, William O. Toogood, inherited his father's property and his good qualities, and, like him, possessed the respect and esteem of his fellow-townsmen. He married a daughter of Deacon Stephen Lyman.

William Moore settled on the hill in the north part of the town at an early period, and married a sister of Deacon Elder. He had a large and well-cultivated grazing-farm, and turned his attention principally to stock-raising. He reared a numerous family, and both he and his wife lived to a good old age. His son William remained upon the farm, and continued to cultivate the broad acres left him by his father. He was a man of the strictest integrity, and a most excellent neighbor and citizen. He was the first person to introduce the Devon cattle into Chester. He finally left his homestead to his eldest son, William E., and, purchasing the Daniel Smith place at the centre, removed thither and resided until his death, about 1867. Mr. Moore and his estimable wife lived together over sixty years in the greatest harmony, both being about ninety years old at the time of their deaths, which occurred only a week apart.

Appended will be found brief reference to the descendants of some of the early settlers:

Dr. Martin Phelps, prominent as a Democrat in the early political controversies of Chester, represented the town in the Legislature, stood high in the community as a medical practitioner, and, after a long life of usefulness, died in Chester in 1838, aged eighty-two years. He left a number of children, of whom were Sheriff Samuel Phelps, of Ware, and Mrs. Martha Mann, of Troy, N. Y., the latter widely known for her literary attainments. His son Martin, Jr., was for years sheriff of Chester, and died a few years ago. Martin, Jr.'s daughter, Mary, is now the wife of Dr. T. K. De Wolf, of Chester Centre.

Of the family of Rev. Mr. Bascom, three sons, Samuel Ashley, John, and Reynolds, graduated at Williams College. Samuel Ashley taught school in the South for some years, was afterward in the book trade in New York, and subsequently removed to Ohio, where he died in 1830, aged fifty. John followed the ministry, settled in the State of New York, and died there in 1828, at the age of forty-three. John, a son of the latter, was appointed tutor in Williams College in 1852, and Mary, his daughter, was some years ago principal of the Girls' High School in Northampton. Reynolds likewise followed the ministry, and died in the South in 1828.

Asahel Wright, an early settler, married one of Mr. Bascom's daughters, and, after a life spent in the legal profession at Chester Centre, died there in 1830. His son Henry, a graduate of Yale, was a professor in Knoxville College, Tennessee, for many years.

Dr. Anson Boies, a native of Blandford, married two daughters of Mr. Bascom in succession, and was the physician at Chester for many years. He died in 1820. Dr. T. K. De Wolf, a native of Otis, removed to Chester in 1832, and for forty-seven consecutive years has practiced his profession in Chester Centre.

Rev. Timothy Lyman, a grandson of Timothy Lyman, one of the first settlers, graduated at Amherst in 1844, and subsequently removed to Iowa. Joseph, his younger brother, graduated at Yale in 1850, and afterward practiced law in Wisconsin. Hon. James Bell, of Monson, Me., Dr. William O. Bell, of North Becket, Dr. William R. Elder, a graduate of Berkshire Medical College, and Dr. Joseph C. Abbott, of the Castleton Medical School, Vermont, were all descendants of the early settlers of those names.

Joseph Abbott, who removed with his four sons, Abial, Ebenezer, Joseph, and John, from Andover to Chester, in the early days, located about a mile north of what is now Chester Centre, where (on the old farm now occupied by Abial K. Abbott, the great-grandson of Joseph, whose son, Abial, was the grandfather of the present Abial K.) a brother of the latter, Charles B., is the only other direct descendant of the Abbotts living in Chester. Other descendants are living in New York State and in the West. A dwelling-house and barn, erected by the Abbotts when they located in Chester more than a hundred years ago, are still standing in a good state of preservation.

The only descendants now living in Chester of the Quigleys and Elders are "Uncle Jim" Quigley and John Elder, both of whom live on farms north of Chester Centre.

Hiram Smith, who died in 1863, a bachelor, was the only remaining descendant of Joab Smith, one of the Chester pioneers. His sister, Isabell Toogood, who died in 1869, aged eighty-four, was the widow of William Toogood, another early settler. William Toogood left one daughter by his first wife. She is now wife of Nathan Samuels, of Buffalo, N. Y. Some of the direct descendants of other early settlers still resided in Chester, but the majority have either removed to the West or passed out of existence.

NOTEWORTHY INCIDENTS.

It is related that a party of prisoners taken by the Americans at Burgoyne's surrender halted at what is now Chester Centre, en route to Boston, and were confined in the Congregational Church for the night. Among the inhabitants who assembled for a curious glance at them was pretty Fannie Holland, from the north end, and it appears that her charms so smote one of the prisoners, David Cross, a Scotchman, that upon his arrival in Worcester he managed to escape from imprisonment by means of a forged pass, made his way back to Chester, sought out Fannie, became her suitor, and eventually won her for his bride. This couple subsequently removed to Washington, Mass., where they lived happily and respected to a good old age.

Concerning the family of Smiths, who were among the earliest settlers, and famed far and wide for their physical prowess, tradition records that one of them "came over from Northampton to commence a settlement here with a five-pail iron kettle and other utensils on his person, making his way on foot by means of marked trees." Another of them, it is said, was so strong that "by grasping the whiffle-tree in his hands, he could hold a horse of ordinary strength." Another of them, reaching Hartford, "astonished the people by taking a barrel of cider from the wagon and carrying into a cellar without assistance."

In 1766 two saw-mills and a grist-mill were erected, and, in 1767, Jonathan Clapp erected a corn-mill, but where these mills were located cannot be ascertained. The first birth of which there is a record was that of James, a son of John S. Clark, April 21, 1762; and the first marriage that of Stephen Lyman, of Murrayfield to Anna Blair, of Western, Aug. 25, 1770.

The first church-bell that ever rang out over the hills of Chester was placed in the belfry of the First Congregational Church in 1800. It was the gift of Mr. John Gordon, and did service for thirty years.

In July, 1774, the inhabitants of Chester resolved in town-meeting that "we will not purchase, buy, or consume any goods or wares that shall be imported from Great Britain after the last of August next until the meeting of the General Congress at Philadelphia." Chester was intensely patriotic during the war of the Revolution, and furnished men and money, to her own impoverishment. In 1774 it was voted "to enlist men to send to Boston to take the places of some already there," and in June, 1776, the people resolved that "it is the will of the town that the Continental Congress declare independence from Great Britain to a man in full meeting." About the same time the inhabitants voted to sign "an agreement or oath that the General Court put out to see who are the friends of liberty and their country, and who are not."

Timothy Fay, who served two years and nine months in the Revolution, returned to Chester from the service in 1799, and shortly thereafter was drowned while crossing the river at Chester Factories. The gun he carried during the Revolution—a flint-lock musket, made in Scotland—is still in the possession of his son, Erastus Fay, now residing at the village of Chester, aged eighty-seven.

Chester was opposed to the war of 1812, and sent Asahel Wright as a delegate to the anti-war convention at Northampton. None of the soldiers sent by the town into that war are known to be living.

The oldest house in town is doubtless the one now occupied by Dr. T. K. De Wolf as a residence at Chester Centre. This house was built by Rev. Mr. Bascom as early as 1769, and occupied by him until his death, in 1814. The first representative to the General Court was Enoch Shepard, who was chosen in 1775, and his pay for his own time and the time of his horses was made to him in work and grain.

Isaac Mixer was probably the first tavern-keeper, and to his inn the early town-records make frequent allusion, for the reason that town-meetings were held there. Stephen Lyman, who set up a grist-mill before 1800, must have kept tavern, too, as early as 1769, inasmuch as at the ordination of Mr. Bascom, in that year, he was called upon to furnish the rum and wine needed.

In 1775 it was voted that if it was thought best to confess judgment for debts, the town ought to have a justice of the peace, and Enoch Shepard was accordingly nominated for the position. In 1780 a girl called Becky Tyler, living in Chester, murdered her child to conceal her own shame, and for the crime she was, not long afterward, hung at Northampton. In 1790 another girl, betrayed by some early settler, committed suicide, and, according to an old English law, her body was buried on the public highway, in the old village of Chester, at the nearest cross-roads, and there, it is likely, her remains lie at this day.

Asahel Wright, who flourished in Chester shortly after 1800, was the earliest lawyer. Enoch Shepard was probably the first physician. He practiced as early as 1775, and perhaps earlier. He also kept tavern, it is said, in 1790. Anson Boies, who married two of Rev. Mr. Bascom's daughters in succession, was a physician in Chester about 1800.

The first storekeeper of whom there appears to be any present knowledge was a Mr. Kendall. In 1802 and 1803, Chester was sorely afflicted with sickness among the people, and in the first-named year sixty-two deaths occurred.

The oldest person living in the town is Oliver Watson, aged ninety-six, and a native of Blandford. Erastus Fay, aged eighty-seven, has lived in Chester about eighty years.

The great flood of December, 1878, laid a heavy hand upon Chester, and caused damages to the extent of $6000.

The road of the Eighth Turnpike Association of Massachusetts passed through Chester in 1800, and there was also, about that time, a turnpike connecting the towns of Russell, Blandford, and Chester.

ORGANIZATION.

On the 31st of October, 1765, the town was incorporated under the name of Murrayfield, in honor of John Murray, one of the town proprietors, who acquired it by purchase from — Williams.

It may be noted here that this Murray, having been a Tory through the war of the Revolution, was at its close compelled by the prejudices of the people to leave this section, whence he returned to England. The lands he left here were, of course, confiscated by the government.

A historical authority claims that the town was called Murrayfield in honor of William Murray (Lord Mansfield), but the statement is not susceptible of easy confirmation.

In 1775 the inhabitants voted to have the name of the town changed to Mount Asaph, and appointed a committee to present a petition to the General Court to that effect. As no mention is made in the records of the result of the committee's efforts, no reason can be given for the failure of the scheme. Why the name of Mount Asaph was chosen is not known; but the reason then for a change of name was doubtless that which prevailed when, in 1783, the inhabitants made another effort for the change,—because, it is said, of the odium which had attached itself to the name of John Murray. The reason given in the petition for desiring a change of name was that the similarity of the name of the town to that of Merrifield, in the county of Hampshire, frequently led to confusion in many ways. Three names were presented to the Legislature,—viz., Fairmount, Fairfield, and Chester,—and the latter was chosen, in compliment, probably, to Chester, England.

In 1783 a small tract in the northern section was transferred to what is now Middlefield, and, in 1853, Chester village was set off to what is now the town of Huntington, the new name given to the old town of Norwich. A list of those who served Murrayfield and Chester as selectmen and town-clerks from 1766 to 1879, save the period between 1811 and 1849 (the town records covering the interim being lost), is herewith presented:

REPRESENTATIVES AT THE GENERAL COURT.

Chester has been represented at the General Court from 1775 to 1858—when the town became a part of the Eleventh Representative District—by the following:

Enoch Shepard, Deacon Johnson, Timothy Lyman, Reuben Hatton, Elijah Blackman, Martin Phelps, Sylvester Emmons, Lewis Collins, Wm. Henry, Forbes Kyle,* William Shepard, Joshua Stevens, Thomas S. Wade, Nathaniel Elder, Hector Campbell, William Campbell, A. C. Root, Samuel Henry, Daniel Fry, Elizur D. Cook, Otis Taylor, Samuel Stebbins.

The names of the representatives who served from 1811 to 1849 are omitted for the reason that the town records between those dates have been lost.

VILLAGES.

The villages in the town are five in number, and, named in the order of their importance, are Chester (originally Chester Factories), Chester Centre (originally Chester), North Chester, Littleville, and Dayville.

CHESTER VILLAGES

is a station on the Boston and Albany Railroad, and is located, moreover, upon what is known as the western branch of Agawam River, whence manufactories derive fine water-power. The population of this village is perhaps 400, and in its pleasantly-shaded streets and neat-looking dwellings there is much to admire. Here are the town-hall, a graded school, a hotel, post-office, three stores, two enery-factories, a mica and porcelain factory, a tannery, two bedstead-factories, and two churches.

CHESTER CENTRE,

in the mountainous districts, is the scene of the earliest settlements in the town, and until 1870 was known as Chester, and was also to that period the seat of town government. The growing importance of Chester Factories led to efforts looking to the removal of the town records to that place, and in the year named the transfer was accomplished, the name of the latter village changed to Chester, and that of old Chester to Chester Centre. The centre suffered a decline in business interests, and has now but a collection of a dozen houses, a church, and a post-office.

LITTLEVILLE and NORTH CHESTER are peopled by agriculturists, and are small but thrifty settlements. At the former there is a Union meeting-house, and at the latter a Second Adventist Church.

DAYVILLE has two shoe-peg factories and a store, and is a flourishing little village. Littleville has a lodge of Good Templars, which was organized in 1872; and at Chester, an Odd-Fellows' lodge, organized in 1873, has a membership of 65.

"In olden times the centre was an important place. The turnpike from Springfield to Pittsfield passed through it, and was constantly thronged with teams. Dr. Boies was in full practice as a physician, and Asahel Wright expounded the mysteries of the law to those who required his services. . . . Sylvester Emmons, more familiarly known as Squire Emmons, kept a large country store, and dealt extensively in general merchandise. His store was the headquarters of the Federal party, while the Democrats mostly congregated at the tavern of Isaac Whipple. Eliphalet Coleman, than whom few, if any, better men ever lived in Chester, was the village blacksmith."*

CHURCHES.

In 1766 the town resolved to build a meeting-house 45 feet long and 40 feet wide, with 20-foot posts, but the edifice was not completed until 1770. During 1768 preaching was held during the winter at the residences of Jonathan Hart Webber, Reuben Walworth, John Lacors, and Israel Rose.

A Congregational Church was organized in December, 1765, and, at the same time, Rev. Aaron Bascom, a Harvard graduate, was ordained as the first pastor. The church building was erected in what is now Chester Centre, near the site of the present Congregational Church in that village. In 1794 the old church was torn down to give place to a more convenient and commodious structure, and this latter made way in turn, in 1840, for the building now used at the centre.

Previous to Rev. Mr. Bascom's time, one Simon Miller preached for the town, and for his bill for preaching the town voted £3 12s. in December, 1768.

In 1769 the town voted that the preaching thereafter should be held exclusively at the meeting-house, religious services having been—in 1768—held at four different places. While Rev. Mr. Bascom was preaching on probation, a vote was taken, in 1769, "to see if the town will discover how they approve Mr. Bascom's performances while he has been in town." In that year there was some discussion about "seating the meeting-house, and putting in two windows and glazing them." Shortly thereafter the meeting-house must have been seated, for a record about that time noted that "those who have no pews shall sit in any pews they find empty."

About 1812 politics ran high in Chester, as between the Democrats and Federalists, and, entering even into the church, began to show dissensions. Pastor Bascom, who, it appears, was also a warm politician, and the leader of the Federal party, was opposed by Dr. Martin Phelps, who led the Democratic hosts, and so warm was the controversy between the contending parties that Bascom and Phelps became involved in a personal difficulty, and thereupon Phelps and his followers, withdrawing from Mr. Bascom's church, organized a Baptist Church.

After serving the church as its pastor for forty-five successive years, Mr. Bascom died, May 18, 1814, in the sixth-eighth year of his age. He was a prominent personage in the early history of the town, and tradition says he was the object at the hands of the people of a reverential respect akin to awe, to which his knee-breeches and three-cornered hat largely contributed. Mr. Bascom's successors have been Revs. Samuel M. Emerson, Rufus Pomeroy, Saul Clark, Alanson Alvord, S. W. Edson, Francis Warriner, David Breed, Hugh Gibson, Henry A. Dickinson, and Loring B. Marsh, the latter being the present pastor. The church congregation, which twenty years ago numbered hundreds, includes now about sixty members.

THE METHODISTS OF CHESTER

numbered upward of 100 in 1800, and in that year classes were organized by Ebenezer Washburn and Billy Hibbard, who, in 1800 and 1801, provided the preaching, which was held at the house of Capt. Alexander, two miles south of Chester Factories. For some reason the classes began to decline after 1802; for several years previous to 1819 there was no preaching and the cause languished, but there was a revival in 1819, and occasional preaching was furnished by preachers attached to the Granville circuit, up to 1842. In 1843 the church was transferred to the Troy Conference, having been organized early in that year, and, in conjunction with certain Baptists, built a Union meeting-house at Chester Factories the same year, when Rev. A. A. Farrar was settled as the pastor. The church increased in membership after this, and in 1847 the Methodists built the house of worship now used by them at the village of Chester, the church having meanwhile been returned to the New England Conference. Among the early pastors after Mr. Farrar were Revs. Kinsman Atkinson, S. Mattison, A. C. Hand, I. B. Bigelow, A. S. Flagg, I. Marcy, Jarvis Wilson, and others. In 1854 the church building was damaged by a powder explosion, said to have been instigated by anti-temperance people as a retaliation upon the church members for their labors in the temperance cause. The building was promptly repaired and restored within six months. The present pastor is Rev. A. R. Nichols, and the membership about 80.

As already noted, the withdrawal of Dr. Martin Phelps from the First Congregational Church in 1812 resulted in the organization that year at Chester of a Baptist Church. Elder John Grant was the first minister, and he was succeeded by Elder Abbott. Rev. Silas Kingsley, who followed Elder Abbott, preached for the church upward of twenty-five years. About 1845 the church began to decline, and a few years later ended its existence, having been in 1845 transferred to North Chester. There was a Methodist Church at Chester village (now a portion of Huntington) in 1836, but it was not very prosperous in its early days.

THE SECOND CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

was organized in November, 1844, at what is now the village of Chester, and in that year built a church edifice. Among the early pastors were Revs. Hubbard Beebe, P. K. Clark, Dillon Williams, and John C. Strong. Rev. C. H. Hamlin is the present pastor, and the church membership 75.

Besides the churches above noted, there is a Second Advent Church at North Chester (completed in 1878) and a Union meeting-house at Littleville.

SCHOOLS.

The attention of the people of the town seems to have been first publicly directed to educational matters in 1769, when, upon the question being presented at a town-meeting, it was

T. K. De Wolf

THADDEUS K. DE WOLF, M.D., was born, May 18, 1801, in Otis, Berkshire Co., Mass., and was the fourth son, in a family of eight children, of Capt. James and Naomi (Ames) De Wolf. His parents were both natives of Becket, Berkshire Co., Mass. Matthew, his grandfather, was one of the first settlers in the town of Washington, Mass., having emigrated from Bolton, Conn., to that locality. His father being in limited circumstances, young Thaddens' early education was only attained at the common district school. In his youth he was sent to live with his uncle, Thaddeus Kingsley, of Plattsburg, N. Y., and attended the academy in that town, receiving the benefits of a full course of studies. He commenced the study of medicine, in 1821, with Dr. Barnab Beekwith, of Plattsburg, with whom he remained about two years, and subsequently studied under Dr. Balch, of Sandisfield, Mass. He graduated, in 1825, from the Castleton Medical College, at Castleton, Vt., and commenced the practice of medicine in the same year in the village of Hitchcockville, Litchfield Co., Conn., where he remained until Feb. 1, 1832. He then removed to his present home at Chester Centre, among the hills of Massachusetts. Being in the prime of manhood, and enjoying the best of health, he pursued the upward and onward path which, with energy and perseverance, always leads to success. His practice was not confined to the town, but extended over the nine adjoining ones, necessitating a large amount of night work; and, as he says, during this period of his busy life he was almost a stranger to his family, stopping at home only for a stray meal while journeying from one patient to another.

Dr. De Wolf has during his lifetime educated eleven students in medicine, some of whom have made their mark in the profession. He was married, June 28, 1829, to Cornelia, daughter of Lieut. Benham, a prominent citizen of Hartland, Conn. By this union he became the father of four children, one of whom died in infancy. His eldest son, Oscar C., was born in Chester, Aug. 8, 1835, and his father educated him for the medical profession. He was the last student that studied under Dr. De Wolf, and his subsequent career has proved he was not the least. He graduated from the Berkshire Medical College, and the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York City, and spent two years in the hospitals of France. Upon his return to this country he accepted a chair in the Berkshire Medical College, and has filled positions in colleges in other parts of the United States. During the civil war he was brigade-surgeon. He has for the last three years been health commissioner for the city of Chicago. Homer B., born in Chester, April 15, 1837; was educated at the college of Oberlin, Ohio. He turned his attention to the study of law, commenced practice in Cleveland, Ohio, has been district attorney, and is at present one of Cleveland's leading lawyers and most influential citizens. Sarah, born in Chester, March 31, 1840; received her education at the Holyoke Female Seminary, and resides at present at Westfield, Mass., being the wife of Dr. H. Gamwell. Dr. De Wolf lost his first wife Aug. 7, 1847, and was afterward married, Sept. 28, 1848, to Mary, daughter of Martin Phelps, of Chester, by whom he has had two children,—Henry C., born May 23, 1850, died Oct. 21, 1872; De Witt C., born Feb. 10, 1864. He has always been interested in the politics of his State, and is intimately acquainted with the different political leaders of both parties. During the days of Daniel Webster he was a strong supporter of the Whig party, but since its disbandment has been a member of the Democratic party, and also an active worker in their ranks. He is well known throughout this section of the State, and is a prominent public speaker. He has held various positions of trust and honor. Was a member of the State Legislature of Massachusetts in 1868, a justice of the peace for about forty-five years, twenty of which he was justice of the Quorum, and postmaster for thirty years. In religion he is a Unitarian.

Dr. De Wolf has for a long period of time been intimately identified with the social, political, religious, and material interests of the town of his adoption. As a citizen he has been foremost in every measure that would elevate the standard of civilization in Chester. As a political man he has always been true to his convictions of duty to a degree that, in the end, secured the confidence of his opponents in his honesty and integrity. In his social relations he has made life cheerful and pleasant for his friends and neighbors, and in his declining years he takes pleasure and happiness in the welfare and prosperity of his children.

resolved not to raise any money for schools, but at a subsequent meeting the same year the matter was reconsidered, and £4 were appropriated to hire a teacher. In 1773 education had been enjoying a fair measure of prosperity, and early in that year a committee was appointed to report upon "the best places for schools to be kept in the winter for reading and writing, and in the summer for women's schools." Rufus Tinker, who taught school in Chester from 1770 to 1790, was a famous pedagogue in those days, and was, perhaps, the first schoolmaster the town had.

There are now in Chester eleven school districts and twelve schools, for whose support $2094 were expended in 1877. Besides the public schools two select schools were taught at Chester village in 1877. The public school at the latter place is the most important, and offers to pupils superior educational advantages. The children in the town between the ages of five and fifteen numbered 259 in 1877.

BURIAL-PLACES.

The oldest burying-ground in the town, and the only one laying claim to ancient date, is the one still used in Chester Centre as the village graveyard. It occupies a site directly opposite the present church, and was laid out in 1770, or perhaps in 1769. It is full of ancient tombstones, bearing many almost effaced inscriptions, the oldest of which dates back to 1770. A majority of the old inscriptions are, however, still clearly legible, although the tombstones themselves have, in many instances, fallen to the ground, while others stand erectly as when first placed in position.

There of the early settlers lie buried Rev. Aaron Bascom, who died in 1814; his wife, Theodosia, who died in 1791; Alexander Gordon, who was buried in 1802, at the age of eighty-five; John Gordon, buried in 1799; Thomas Elder, in 1814; and his wife, Margaret, in 1786.

The tombstone of Nathan Mann seems to have been the first one erected in the ground, for it bears the date of 1770. Daniel Smith, aged seventy-eight, and his wife, Abigail, aged seventy-one, were both buried in 1771. Nearly all the early settlers who lie in this burying-ground seem to have lived to a ripe old age. The most aged inhabitant was apparently Mrs. Ruth, wife of Capt. Abner Smith, who died in 1818, aged ninety-eight. Abner himself died in 1794, aged seventy-three. The following are other names on some of the old tombstones:

Sally Rust, died 1793; Mrs. Nice, wife of Ebenezer Smith, in 1785; Daniel Snow, "son of Mr. Orin Snow by Thankful, his wife," in 1795; two sons of Eli and Huldah Johnson, in 1801; Abilene, wife of John Smith, in 1800; Samuel Elder, 1791, and Betsey, his wife, 1801; Sally Mann, 1796; Abigail Bates, 1798; John Moor, 1790; Rosanna, his wife, 1803; James, son of Abner and Polly Pease, 1790; Stephen Lyman, 1811; Adah, wife of Crispus Lyman, 1798; John Smith, 1782; Eliza, wife of James Bell, 1796; Matthew Campbell, 1816, and Sarah, his wife, 1788.

There is a tomb on the farm of Mr. Carrington, about half a mile north of Chester Centre, which has frequently attracted the attention of the curious, and has also been the subject of newspaper articles. It is hollowed out of an immense rock, rising 15 feet from the ground, and measuring perhaps 15 feet square. Within it lie buried Hiram Smith (a son of Joab Smith, one of the first settlers and former owner of the farm) and his sister, Isabell Toogood, who was the wife of Samuel Toogood, also one of the earliest settlers. Hiram died in 1863, aged seventy-nine, and Isabell in 1869, aged eighty-four. Long before his death Hiram caused the tomb to be prepared as the last resting-place of himself and sister (who lived with him), "so that" (in his own language) "they might not hear Gabriel's trump at the last day."

SOCIETIES.

SAMOSSET LODGE, No. 160, I. O. O. F., was instituted Sept. 17, 1872, and has 65 members, with the following officers: Joseph C. Seagers, N. G.; Edwin H. Alvord, V. G.; Geo. H. Hapgood, Sec.; Paul R. Town, Treas.

EARLY MANUFACTURES.

One of the earliest manufacturing interests, after the primitive saw- and grist-mills, put in operation was a tannery at the Chester factories, by Spencer Clark, in the early part of the present century. Mr. Clark, after a few years, sold the property to Col. Edwards, of Northampton, who afterward sold to Edmund Hubbard, under whose control the undertaking was very prosperous. It was in operation as late as 1870.

Another enterprise was the organization of a company for the manufacture of glass, about the commencement of the war with Great Britain, in 1812. A large building was erected, a row of tenements built, and for some time matters flourished satisfactorily. The sand used was brought from Washington, Berkshire Co., and the clay from Pennsylvania. Upon the conclusion of peace with Great Britain, it was found that the company could not compete with foreign manufacturers, and the business was reluctantly abandoned. The tenement-houses changed hands, and the factory buildings went to decay. The pecuniary loss involved was considerable.

PRESENT INDUSTRIES.

The manufacturing interest is the leading element at the present time in point of value of productions in the industries of Chester. The State reports give the value of manufactures in 1875 as $174,541, and that of agricultural and domestic products, $104,071. The most important manufactures are found at the village of Chester, where water-power is furnished by the western branch of the Agawam River, and by smaller streams.

The Chester Emery Company (originally known as the Chester Iron Company) is a stock company, controlled by Jas. T. Ames, Esq., of Chicopee, Mass., and has its works in the western part of the village, where the company's mine is situated. This mine was discovered in 1864, and was in January, 1879, said to be the only mine of that kind in the United States.* Thirty-five men are employed, and 200 tons of manufactured emery, valued at $20,000, are produced yearly.

East of the village are the Hampden Emery Company's works, owned by Dr. H. S. Lucas and N. A. Harwood. This establishment is engaged in the manufacture of emery from emery-rock imported from Turkey. Geo. D. Hapgood & Son have a tannery here, and employ 10 men in the production of about $10,000 worth of leather annually. Two bedstead-factories, owned respectively by Wm. Fay and Timothy Keefe, employ each about 12 men, and produce each $20,000 worth of goods yearly. Mica and porcelain clay or kaolin were discovered in Chester by Dr. H. S. Lucas in 1875. In 1877 a stock company was formed in New York for the development of these mineral products, and in that year works were erected about three miles south of Chester village. The works employ 15 men, and since their commencement have steadily flourished.

The only other manufactories in the town, apart from saw-mills, are the two shoe-peg factories of A. C. Day & Son and N. B. Prouty & Son, at Dayville.

There are within the limits of Chester 140 farms, the lands of which are largely devoted to the production of hay. Corn is the chief grain product, and considerable attention is given to the manufacture of butter and cheese. The total valuation of the town in 1878 was $463,943, of which $384,963 was in real estate. The total tax—State, county, and town—was $9729, a rate a trifle over two cents on the dollar. The town debt, March 1, 1878, was $15,196.

CHESTER'S WAR RECORD.

The list below includes, as far as obtainable from the town records, the names of the citizens of Chester who served the United States during the war of the Rebellion, together with the name of the regiment in which each served.

* This statement refers to the special kind of mineral obtained here. Better material for the manufacture of emery is found in North Carolina.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

DR. H. S. LUCAS.

This gentleman was born in Blandford, Hampden Co., Mass., on the 10th of September, 1817. His father was a farmer, who removed from Connecticut to Blandford in 1811. In 1828 he removed to Canaan, Columbia Co., N. Y.

Here the doctor received the most of his education at the district school, which he attended during the winter months, working through the summer upon his father's farm. During the autumns of the years 1836 and '37, he attended two terms at the celebrated Wilbraham Academy. This constituted the sum-total of his educational advantages previous to his arrival at manhood.

Through these school days he was a close and industrious student, never allowing any time to be squandered in unprofitable pursuits. In addition to his regular studies, he gave considerable attention to scientific subjects.

In the summer of 1840 he began the study of medicine, under the tutelage of Dr. John Merriman, of Canaan, N. Y. During this period of study, as an aid to his financial affairs, he taught school a portion of the time, and in this way obtained the means which enabled him to attend lectures at the Berkshire Medical Institution, at Pittsfield, Mass., which he continued through the years 1840, '41, and '42, graduating in November of the latter year.

While a student at Pittsfield, he also learned the art of dentistry in the office of Dr. Willard Clough, of Pittsfield. Succeeding his college course, he practiced dentistry at South Lee, Mass., for a short time, and for about one year, in 1843-44, was in partnership with Dr. McAllister, of that town.

In July, 1841, Dr. Lucas removed to the town of Chester, Hampden Co., Mass., where he has resided to the present time, continuing the practice of the medical profession to the year 1878.

He continued his scientific investigations, and in 1853 discovered a method for producing gelatinous silica from the decomposition of serpentine rock, for which he obtained a patent. By the same process he also succeeded in producing the commercial article known as epsom salts, or sulphate of magnesia. From these discoveries originated the Hampden Paint and Chemical Company, now doing business in the city of Springfield, Mass. The doctor filled the position of analytical chemist for this company for about a year, which was the only respite from his medical practice from 1843 to 1867.

But perhaps the most remarkable event in his career was the discovery of what was for some time supposed to be a vast deposit of iron ore in the mountains around Chester. This occurred in 1856, and arrangements were at once made for the opening and working of the mine, and in the course of about one year twelve hundred tons of mineral were taken out and transported to the furnaces of Stockbridge, Lenox, and Hudson.

The financial crisis of 1857 compelled a discontinuance of the business, and it was not renewed until 1863. In the last-mentioned year, in company with his brother, John E. Lucas, and Henry D. Wilcox, he resumed the business. A blast-furnace and forge were erected in Chester, and the manufacture of iron was commenced; but the ore proved somewhat intractable, and the results were not satisfactory. In the mean time, the doctor made a more thorough examination of the mineral, and on the 6th of September, 1864, discovered that it contained a large percentage of emery, a mineral hitherto nearly unknown in the United States; in fact, this is believed to have been its first discovery in America.

Coming at a time when the country was engaged in a terrible war with internal enemies, the discovery was doubly valuable. Heretofore, the emery used in this country had been imported from the Turkish dominions, and as the English and French governments had a monopoly of the mines near Smyrna, in Asia Minor, and on the Greek island of Naxos, in the Archipelago, the United States government was debarred from procuring its necessary supply, except under unusual difficulties. In this dilemma the Chester emery was utilized, and the government works were supplied from it a considerable time.

This mineral had been repeatedly examined by various scientific gentlemen, and specimens were placed in the collections at Amherst College and in that made for the State by Prof. Hitchcock, and labeled magnetite.

In 1868, Dr. Lucas, with Messrs. Charles Alden and H. D. Wilcox, formed what was known as the Hampden Emery Company, and erected a mill on the river, below Chester village, for the manufacture of emery. On the 18th of May, 1869, the doctor purchased the interest of his partners and continued the business.

In 1874 questions touching the ownership of the mine involved the doctor in litigation, which necessitated a change in his business, and from that time he has obtained his material mostly from the Turkish mines. The doctor continued the business in his own name until May 1, 1878, when Mr. Nathan Harwood became associated with him.

The discovery of emery in Chester had created a wonderful interest in the United States, and many examinations and explorations were made in various parts of the country, resulting in the discovery of the mineral in several localities.

In the spring of 1875, Dr. Lucas made a tour through several of the Middle and Southern States, including Pennsylvania and North Carolina, and examined the localities where corundum had been discovered.

Herman S. Lucas

In the spring of 1877 he made a second and more extended tour and a more careful examination, especially in North Carolina. In making his examinations of various localities he rode more than a thousand miles on horseback, and consumed the whole summer. During this season's investigations he discovered corundum in North Carolina and Alabama in extensive deposits; and in March, 1878, he commenced mining in Alabama, where he remained about three months, in Tallapoosa County, superintending the operations of getting out and shipping the mineral to Chester, Mass.

In June, 1878, he began operations in North Carolina, which are continued, and which promise at no distant day to develop into important proportions. The mineral found in North Carolina is superior to either the Massachusetts or Turkish emery, and has been given the name Corundum, the generic name for that family of minerals which includes alumina and the gems sapphire, ruby, etc., and is the hardest known substance next after the diamond.

Dr. Lucas has an extensive, accurate, and practical knowledge of minerals, which at the present time is being utilized to the great advantage not only of those engaged in the emery business, but of the country at large. The importance of this discovery is well illustrated by the remark of a great English statesman, "That the discovery of an emery-mine was of more value than that of many gold-mines."

The business of mining and manufacturing, in which the doctor is now engaged, is carried on by a company, of which he is president and treasurer, and Mr. N. A. Harwood, his partner, financial manager. The doctor gives a large share of his time to the superintendence of mining and shipping the crude material, while Mr. Harwood attends to its manufacture and sale.

The deposits of North Carolina and Alabama are supposed to be practically inexhaustible, and the most serious difficulty now in the way of their rapid development and introduction into general use is their distance from facilities of transportation. This will undoubtedly be remedied before many years; and the United States will not only be enabled to supply their own necessities, but, to a great extent, the markets of the world.

GEOGRAPHICAL.

THE town of Wales is situated in the southeasterly part of the county, and is bounded on the north by Brimfield, on the east by Holland, on the west by Monson, and on the south by Stafford, Conn. It is very nearly four miles square.

NATURAL FEATURES.

The town is hilly, but contains frequent intervals of very good land. The general character of the soil is sandy, occasionally changing to a productive loam. The principal body of water is Wales Pond, formerly called South or Moulton's Pond, which is a beautiful natural reservoir, situated a little east of the geographical centre of the town, and covering about 100 acres. Its outlet is Mill or Erwin's Brook, which passes northeasterly into the town of Brimfield, where it unites with the Quinnebaug River. Several smaller ponds are ranged along this brook, whose waters are used for milling purposes.

A number of low mountains or hills diversify the landscape. On the east is Grandy Hill, which has been so designated from the earliest time. Mount Hitchcock or Gardner Mountain, lying in the northwest corner of the town, partly in Brimfield, rises to a considerable height, and from its summit affords a view of remarkable extent and beauty. Mount Pisgab, just north of the centre of the town, is also quite elevated. Warner's Hill lies in the southerly part of the town. Other hills of considerable magnitude seem never to have been honored with a name.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

The town of Wales was formerly a portion of Brimfield, and the earliest settlement of the present town was made somewhat later than that of the more central portion of the original town of Brimfield. A reference to the history of the latter town in this volume discloses the fact that the first settlements were made in that portion of the town now Brimfield in the latter part of the year 1701, but that no great progress was made prior to 1717. No white settlers seem to have been permanently domiciled in South Brimfield,—the western portion of which is now Wales,—earlier than 1726, although there were sales and grants of land, as well as a limited occupation of the same, before that date. South Meadow, now Coburn's Meadow, situated in the southeast corner of the town, was occupied at an early day by the settlers of old Brimfield, and it was there that a large portion of the grass for their cattle and horses was obtained.

The earliest actual settlers in Wales, so far as we can gather from the oldest papers and records, seem to have been John Bullen and Anthony Needham, who, with their families, located in 1727, and perhaps a year sooner, upon the premises lately owned by Samuel L. Moulton, bordering on the Coburn meadow. Anthony Needham and family were domiciled upon the premises which have since constituted the homestead of Nathan Green, West of Wales Pond. It is possible that there were a few other settlers in the town contemporaneously with Bullen and Needham, but their names cannot now be ascertained.

Anthony Needham married Molly Moulton, and had eleven children, six of whom were sons. He died July 2, 1763, at the age of sixty-seven years. His oldest son was Capt. Anthony Needham, who was the first representative from South Brimfield in the Massachusetts Legislature. His daughter, Anna, was born March 2, 1742, and died in Union, Conn., in 1844, over one hundred and two years of age,—a greater age than any other person born in Wales is known to have attained.

John Bullen's daughter Mary died July 15, 1735, and hers is the first death recorded in the town. He and his immediate descendant, John, Jr., remained in the town and died there, but the later descendants on the paternal side removed therefrom in 1785. During the first sixty years of the town's history the Bullen family was prominent and influential.

In the drawing that took place for the grants of land, which were recommended by the committee appointed by the General Court,* and confirmed by said court in 1732, John Bullen drew "Lott 28," and Anthony Needham "Lott 29."

Nathaniel, Elnathan, Samuel, and Joseph Munger were also among the early settlers of Wales. Nathaniel was a resident of the town in 1727, and probably came with John Bullen, whose eldest daughter he married. He settled, lived, died, and was buried upon what is now called the "Coburn Farm." Elnathan Munger settled a mile and a half west of the central village of Wales. His first son, Joel, perished in the Revolutionary war. His second son, Darius, became one of the most prominent men the town has produced. He represented the town four years in the State Legislature, and filled other important offices. He died Nov. 21, 1815, aged seventy years.

* See history of Brimfield.

Rev. Ebenezer Moulton was a resident of Wales as early as 1728. He was married and had one child when he settled there. He made his first settlement upon the site of what is known as the "old Wales Tavern-stand," in the upper village, and he was probably the first to erect a dwelling upon that spot and till the ground. It was through him that the Baptist Church was first organized, in 1736. He served as a captain in the French-and-Indian war, and commanded a company in the expedition to Crown Point, from Sept. 11 to Dec. 25, 1755.* He resided in Wales until 1763, when he removed to Nova Scotia. He returned about 1783, and died in the town.

Samuel Moulton, brother of Ebenezer, was a resident of Wales several years prior to his marriage to Molly Haynes, of Brimfield, on Jan. 30, 1739. He occupied the lands now constituting the homestead of the late Dr. Aaron Shaw, which he in part cleared, and whereon he erected a rude dwelling. Soon after his marriage he exchanged properties with his brother Ebenezer, and, thus becoming owner of the "old Wales tavern-stand," it is said that he thereupon opened, and for years kept, an inn, the first in the town.

John Moulton, brother of Ebenezer and Samuel, was early settled in Wales. He located and spent his life upon what afterward became the homestead of Henry Pratt, near the outlet of Wales Pond. Freeborn Moulton, another brother, settled and occupied the William L. Needham place. He afterward removed to Monson. Jonathan Moulton, a cousin of the Moulton brothers, made his settlement contemporaneously with them, on the "Hall place," in the southwest section of the town.

The Needhams, Mungers, and Moultons are said to have come originally from Salem. Families of Johnsons, Jordans, and Hoveys were also among the early settlers in Wales.

The earliest marriage that can be found recorded of residents of Wales is that of Nathaniel Collins and Deborah Morgan, on March 31, 1730. They were among the emigrants from Springfield to Brimfield, and fixed their residence in Wales at the time of their marriage upon the "old Collins place," half a mile southeast from the northwest corner of the town. They raised a family there, and died at advanced ages.

Joshua and Seth Shaw owned land in Wales at an early period. They held title to a large tract lying upon either side of the present line between Wales and Brimfield, three-quarters of a mile east of the northwest corner of the town of Wales. Joshua settled on the Brimfield side of this tract, and Seth upon the Wales side, in 1731, upon the premises now the Eli Gardner homestead. The latter removed to Palmer in 1736.

John Shaw, the progenitor of a large number of subsequent residents of Wales bearing the same name, came from Grafton in 1752, and settled upon what afterward became the Sewell Shaw homestead.

From him descended Samuel Shaw, born May 29, 1788. He married Mary Davis, born Sept. 8, 1795, and who is still living. Warren, Elijah, Salem J., and Eden D. are the sons of Samuel and Mary Shaw.

Humphrey Gardner removed from Palmer to Wales in 1736, and was the person with whom Seth Shaw exchanged lands. Tradition says that the cause of Humphrey Gardner's removal to Wales was the fact that himself and family were so troubled by witches in Palmer, and that they could not longer endure the annoyance. It does not appear whether the witches also emigrated to Wales. Humphrey Gardner remained in Wales, however, and died there. His descendants still retain the homestead which he obtained of Mr. Shaw.

Capt. Trustrum Davis is shown by old records to have been a resident of Wales as early as 1732. He was the first settler upon the farm since designated as the "Houghton place," in the northeast corner of the town. He was a very active and prominent man for over thirty years. He served in the French-and-Indian war as captain of a company mustered into service Oct. 11, 1756, in the expedition to Crown Point, and as captain of another company from Feb. 14 to Dec. 16, 1760.†

Thomas Green, son of Thomas Green, of Brimfield, located at Wales in 1737, upon the lands now occupied by William Nelson, west of the pond.

Robert Green came to Wales from Tolland, Conn., in 1743. In October, 1774, he married, and established his residence but a few rods south of the extreme northwest corner of the town, and upon the ground through which the present boundary-line between Wales and Monson runs.

William Carpenter settled about 1740. He married a daughter of the first Anthony Needham, and raised a large family. He removed to Stafford, Conn., in 1782, and died there March 9, 1809. He is said to have been the first occupant of what is known as the "Walbridge place," in the southwest quarter of the town. He was prominent in town affairs, and represented South Brimfield in the convention for the formation of the State Constitution in 1780.

Ichabod and Joel Rogers came from Windham, Conn., to Wales in 1748, where they remained and died, leaving numerous descendants. Ichabod settled south of the central portion of the town, a mile from Stafford, and died Jan. 19, 1800, aged eighty-seven. Joel filled many positions of responsibility and trust in the town, and represented it in the General Court of 1797. He was the first settler upon the place now the homestead of Harding G. Back, in the northwestern part of the town. He died June, 1823, at the advanced age of ninety-four years and eight months, being, as far as known, the oldest man who has died in the town. Rachel Trask died in Wales, Aug. 9, 1845, aged ninety-nine years one month and twelve days, and is believed to be the oldest person who ever died there.

William Fenton, of Irish descent, settled in Wales in 1750, and married a niece of Seth Shaw. He lived in the northwest part of the town, on land since the Anson Baker homestead, and died Nov. 14, 1804, aged eighty-eight years.

Shubael Dimmick, from Mansfield, Conn., settled in Wales about 1750 upon the "Royce place," east of the pond. He afterward erected and operated a grist-mill, which stood nearly upon the site of Eden D. Shaw's factory. The brook whereon the mill was located became known as "Mill Brook," and was so designated thereafter. Mr. Dimmick died in February, 1797, aged eighty-two years.

Capt. Daniel Winchester left Roxbury about 1758, and took up his residence at Wales, succeeding Mr. Dimmick in the ownership and occupancy of the "Royce place," where he kept a store for many years. He was an influential man,—was a delegate from South Brimfield to the Provincial Congress that convened at Salem, Oct. 7, 1774, and twice represented the town in the State Legislature.

Capt. Asa Fisk emigrated to Wales from Hampton, Conn., in 1762. His first settlement was upon the "Wales tavern-stand," where for a time he pursued the vocations of landlord and farmer. After that he purchased a large tract of land upon the elevated ground in the south part of the town, which has been not inappropriately called "Fisk Hill." There he established his homestead, upon lands afterward the property of Moses Davis. He was a man of much energy and decision of character, and exerted a controlling influence in the affairs of the town.

Oliver Wales, from Union, Conn., in 1766, took up his residence in the town of Wales. He remained until 1778, when he returned to Union, and his brother Elijah, with whom he had traded properties, left that town and settled in Wales. In 1787 these brothers again exchanged places, and Oliver returned to Wales, where he died March 23, 1816, at the age of seventy-two years. He resided upon the premises known as the "Wales tavern-stand," where he followed the double vocation of farmer and landlord until his death, in 1816. He twice represented the town in the Legislature.

Rev. James Mellen, second pastor of the Baptist Church of Wales, located in 1765, and filled the pastoral office till 1769, when ill health compelled him to desist. He died soon after, at Dover, aged thirty-seven years. Notwithstanding his early death, of a wasting malady, it is worthy of note that his son Joshua Mellen, who was born in Wales, Sept. 14, 1765, lived until Feb. 22, 1858, when he died, at Westborough, Mass., at the advanced age of ninety-three years five months and eight days, a longer time than any other man born in Wales is known to have lived.

Rev. Elijah Coddington, fourth pastor of the Baptist Church, came to Wales from Middleborough in 1773, and continued until his death, May 7, 1830, at the age of eighty-eight years. He served as chaplain in a regiment of State militia for ten years, filled various town offices, and was popular in the ministerial office. He lived upon the high ground at the northern extremity of the main street of the central village.

Asa Houghton emigrated to Wales from Union, Conn., in 1779. He married a daughter of Capt. Trustrum Davis, and occupied the residence which Mr. Davis formerly occupied, and which has since become known as the "Houghton place." He filled many of the offices of the town, and was the third representative from Wales in the State Legislature in 1784. He died April 17, 1829, at the age of eighty-seven years.

Of the early physicians of the town may be mentioned Dr. James Lawrence, who came from Killingly, Conn., about the year 1746, and practiced his profession until May 14, 1778, when he died of small-pox, at the age of fifty-eight. Dr. Dudley Wade succeeded him from 1779 to 1783. Then followed Dr. Able Sherman, from 1783 to 1786. After him came Dr. Jeremiah Round, from 1787 to 1789.

Dr. David Young came from Worcester in 1790, and located at Wales, where he practiced his profession. He afterward engaged in business as a merchant. He died in Brimfield in 1802, a few months after leaving Wales, and was buried in the latter town.

Dr. Ferdinand Lethbridge followed next, in 1805, coming from Medway. He continued in practice until his demise, in 1811. In that year Dr. Thaddeus Fairbanks appeared, and remained until 1815. Dr. Daniel Tiffany practiced in Wales from 1812 to 1822, when he removed to Webster. He also engaged in agricultural pursuits.

Dr. Aaron Shaw studied with Dr. Lethbridge, and in 1813 established himself in practice in Wales, and continued therein, with a slight intermission, until his decease, July 17, 1845, at the age of sixty-two. Dr. John Smith, his contemporary for a long period, commenced practice in 1815, and continued the same for over fifty years.

TAVERNS.

The earliest tavern in Wales is supposed to have been kept by Samuel Moulton in the "Old Wales tavern-stand," as early as 1740. Capt. Asa Fisk kept an inn at the same place about 1762. He was succeeded by Oliver Wales, who kept the tavern for more than fifty years, and filled many important positions in the town. His name and location are frequently referred to in the early town records, and it seems to have been the principal place of attraction in the town in those primitive days. The pound was kept in the barn-yard attached to the inn in 1795. Oliver Wales died in 1816, and was succeeded in the business of inn-keeping by his son Loren, who followed that vocation until about 1830. Cornelius Miller then established a tavern in his residence, nearly opposite the Wales tavern-stand, and kept it about eight years. Wm. Ruby followed him, and kept it for two years. Then Otis Twitchell appeared, and kept tavern as late as 1845.

The town records show that, as early as 1763, Ebenezer Bishop was voted to "provide a pound, and be pound-keeper." Probably, as the custom was then, he was to arrange a suitable place on his own premises for that purpose. On March 13, 1797, it was voted to build a pound—"with stones"—to be 40 feet square, 4 feet at the bottom, 2 feet at the top, and 6 feet high, with a gate, lock, and key, "on the road between the dwelling-house of Capt. Nichols and Aaron Winchester's." The pound was constructed by David Needham for $40, and is probably the one which stood on the site of the new burying-ground as late as 1828, when it was disused, and the stones drawn away. A frame pound was afterward constructed on the west shore of Wales Pond, and was used up to 1860 or 1865, when it was gradually abandoned. There is no regular pound at present. Erasmus D. Shaw's barn-yard has been used for that purpose for the past few years.

The first highway laid out by the town was early in 1764. It was a rod and a half wide, and the committee reported that there were "many trees marked,"—the only guide-boards in those early times. Other roads two rods wide were laid out in 1765 and 1767, and after that they multiplied rapidly. But it must not be inferred from this that there were no roads in use prior to 1764. Rough bridle-paths, marked by blazed trees, and filled with charred stumps, were in common use, and a number of highways had been laid out by the old town of Brimfield, in that section of the town which afterward became Wales. In 1731 a road from a point just south of the centre of the present Brimfield passed over Haynes' Mill, in that town, down through the present town of Wales, past Wales Pond and into Stafford; and another passed around through the northwest corner of Holland, starting at the same point as the other road and ending at South Wales Pond, on one branch, and on another branch continuing down through South Meadow to Stafford. In 1732 a road ran west from South Pond to Cedar Swamp, in Monson, and another down into the South Meadow, in Wales. In 1733 a short road united the two first referred to in the northeast section of Wales, crossing Erwin's or Mill Brook.

ORGANIZATION.

As has been stated, Wales was at first included in the town of Brimfield. Holland, Monson, part of Palmer, and part of Warren (then called Western) were likewise included in the same territory.

On Sept. 18, 1762, the General Court, in compliance with the repeated requests of those persons who lived in the south part of old Brimfield, passed a resolution looking to the setting off of that section of territory as a distinct district, having all the rights of a town except that of corporate representation in the Legislature. They were to unite with Brimfield in the choice of a representative. The General Court directed Josiah Dwight, a justice of the peace, to "notify and warn" the inhabitants of the south part of Brimfield to convene at the house of John Bishop on Oct. 5, 1762, to choose a "Moderator to regulate s^d Meeting," and to "choose all such town officers as shall be necessary to manage the affairs of s^d District."

The warrant was issued by Justice Dwight to Jonathan Burk, "one of the principal inhabitants of the District of South Brimfield," on Sept. 28, 1762. On October 5th the meeting duly assembled, and chose the following officers: Moderator, Humphrey Cram; District Clerk, Capt. Joseph Blodgett; Selectmen, Humphrey Needham, Humphrey Cram, Anthony Needham, Jr., Nehemiah May, and John Moulton.*

Oct. 19, 1762, voted Humphrey Cram and Joseph Blodgett as a committee to "hire preaching for the winter season, and that the meeting be held at the house of Isaac Foster, in the east part, and at the house of Dr. James Lawrence, in the west part, in proportion to what the people pay at each place." Also voted to build a meeting-house at the northeast corner of Edward Webber's land by subscription; to buy two quires of paper to record births and deaths on; and to settle the line between old Brimfield and South Brimfield. Nov. 16, 1762, voted "with the Baptists" to divide the district into two societies for "setting up the gospel" amongst us.

Dec. 22, 1763, John Webber, Jonathan Burk, and Humphrey Cram were chosen a committee to agree with Rev. Benjamin Conchelin "to preach with us." £30 was appropriated for the purpose of affording preaching during the winter season. The place for the erection of the meeting-house was changed to the northwest corner of John Danielson's farm.

On Jan. 18, 1763, the South Meadow road (alluded to in the chapter on early settlement) was fixed as the dividing-line between the east and west parts of the town "for gospel purposes."

On March 14, 1763, besides the regular annual officers chosen, tythingmen, fence-viewers, deer-reeves, hog-reeves, and a sealer of leather were chosen. Two days later it was voted to hire four months' more preaching, after Mr. Conchelin's time expired, and to hold the meetings at the house of Capt. Joseph Blodgett.

On June 10, 1763, a petition of Dr. James Lawrence, Nehemiah May, and Robert Brown, asking for a division of the district, was voted on and carried. The petition and its object were formally indorsed by a paper signed by 36 inhabitants of the district, and bearing date June 10, 1763. On October 17th following, Nehemiah May was sent to the General Court to put through the matter of a division, and £1 15s. and 11d. was allowed him for expenses. Dr. James Lawrence was also sent for the same purpose, and he was allowed £2 4s. and 2f.

At the annual meeting, held March 12, 1764, a "surveyor of wheat and flour" was for the first time chosen. That meeting refused to appropriate any money for preaching and schooling. It was also enacted that "swine should run at large, yoakt and ringed according to law." This provision was made many times after at town-meetings, and seems to have been the custom of that period.

On Sept. 5, 1774, the district seemed inclined to take the administration of justice into their own hands, for we find it recorded that they voted to "choose twelve men as a Court of Justice and Honour to judge and determine all controversies that may hereafter arise in said District." The persons selected for this purpose were Nehemiah May, Jacob How, Nathaniel Munger, Asa Fisk, Anthony Needham, Daniel Winchester, Thomas Parker, Jonathan Wallis, Benjamin Blodgett, Edward Webber, Abel Allen, and Joel Rogers.

In the same year an act was passed making all districts then existing towns, with full rights and privileges. By virtue of this provision South Brimfield became a town.

On March 25, 1779, it was again voted to divide the town, and on April 8th of the same year Darius Munger and Thomas Bond were chosen to go to the General Court to effect that object.

Sept. 4, 1780, the town cast 45 votes for John Hancock for Governor, 31 votes for Artemas Ward for Lieutenant-Governor, and 3 votes for Timothy Danielson for Lieutenant-Governor.

March 11, 1782, it was again voted to divide the town, the "dividing-line to be the County Road leading from Brimfield along by Deacon Nathaniel Munger's to Union or South Meadow Road," and Joseph Bruce was selected to go to the General Court for that purpose. The effort appears to have met with success this time, for on July 5, 1783, the east parish of South Brimfield was duly incorporated as the district of Holland.

It would seem to have been a rather venturesome business to get married in the early history of Wales, and that a "mother-in-law" was held in uncommon regard; for on Sept. 15, 1784, a committee was chosen by the town to "seize John Moulton's estate for the support of his wife's mother."

On Dec. 3, 1792, it was voted "to provide a place to have the small-pox in," and "that those taking the infection repair within the lines."

There has never been a regular almshouse in the town of Wales, but the poor have been "farmed out," so to speak, at auction, to the lowest bidder, from the earliest times. An instance of this kind occurs in the town records of March 11, 1793, when it was "voted to set up Mr. Dimmick to the lowest bidder, to be provided for in sickness and death and every necessary of life for one year, and if the said Dimmick shall decease before the year is out the full sum bid is still to be paid."

Dec. 30, 1795, Oliver Wales, Joel Rogers, and Darius Munger, of South Brimfield, and Joseph Bruce, Alfred Lyon, and David Wallis, of the district of Holland, entered into an agreement, on behalf of their respective corporate bodies, for the support of the county road and an alternation in the selection of a representative.

On Jan. 12, 1828, the town voted to change its name to Clinton. On January 26th following that question was reconsidered, and the name of Wales adopted, in recognition of the liberality of James L. Wales, a native and resident, who bequeathed the sum of $2000 to the town. This donation, subsequently received, has proved a handsome source of revenue to the town. The General Court, by legislative enactment, confirmed the change in the name. The principal reasons for the change appear to have been the desire for a shorter name, and to avoid any appearance of subserviency, or inferiority, to the mother-town of Brimfield.

The following citizens of the town have served as representatives to various conventions and to the General Court, and filled the principal offices in the town:

STATISTICS.

The principal products of Wales are butter, charcoal, cider, firewood, railroad-sleepers, cheese, milk, pork, potatoes, apples, cabbage, eggs, pumpkins, and meats. This does not include the manufacturing products, which are mentioned elsewhere. The domestic products for sale and use in 1875 were valued at $15,322; the agricultural products, at $16,883; number of tons of hay cut, 1040. There were 106 farms, valued at $217,213; 230 buildings, valued at $109,185; and 7723½ acres of land, valued at $108,028. The domestic animals owned in the town were valued at $26,836, and the entire products of the town reached a valuation of $953,601.

On March 1, 1878, the total number of polls in the town was 202; value of personal property, $122,338; value of real property, $280,695; number of dwelling-houses, 166; number of acres of land taxed in the town, 9231½; number of children between five and fifteen years of age, 130.

VILLAGES.

The town of Wales virtually contains but one village, which is situated near the centre, about four miles from Brimfield Centre. Its nearest railroad-stations are Monson, Palmer, Warren, and Stafford Springs, the distance being from seven to ten miles. A mail is carried each day to and from Brimfield post-office by a resident of Wales, who also conveys passengers between these points. A daily stage leaves at six o'clock each day for Palmer, and returns at eight in the evening.

The village referred to is ranged along both sides of the main road from Brimfield to Stafford, Conn., and is over a mile long. Its lower end, toward the pond, was settled first, and is the old central village of the town, wherein most of the old settlers first located, and where the oldest landmarks and points of interest are found. The upper end of the village, lying above the junction of the old and new roads to Brimfield, is known as SHAWVILLE, a name which has been given to it in recognition of the important mechanical and industrial improvements which have been made by the members of the Shaw family in that section, and especially by Elijah Shaw, to whose business enterprise and public spirit Wales is largely indebted for whatever commercial prosperity it has enjoyed.* In this part of the village are located the principal factories and mills of the town.

The village contains, among other things, six woolen-factories, a box-shop, a silk-mill, two blacksmith-shops, four general stores, a tailor-shop, a tin- and hardware-store, a butcher-shop, three church buildings, three cemeteries, a hotel, and a post-office.

The hotel is situated in the lower end of the village, and has been kept since January, 1878, by William Royce. No hotel had previously existed in the town since 1845.

Of the exact date of the establishment of the post-office considerable conjecture prevails. The best information that can be obtained upon the subject fixes the date of its first establishment at about the year 1800, and it is believed that it was first kept in the "old Wales Tavern," and that Oliver or Lorea Wales was the first postmaster. Since that time the office has been filled by Daniel N. Green, James C. Royce, Leonard B. Wight, Joel H. Rogers, Absalom Gardner, Philip Snow, Warren Shaw, and perhaps others. Eugene Cady is the present postmaster.

The physicians since Dr. John Smith have been Dr. Cornelius M. Stewart, 1846-48; Dr. Lebbens E. Marsh, 1865-72; Dr. Joseph C. Yale, 1872-75; Dr. Frank L. Smith, 1875-77; and a Dr. Ferguson, for a short time. The only regular physician at present in the town is Dr. Benjamin A. Sawtelle, who commenced practice there early in 1878, and has his office in the hotel.

The only lawyer who ever practiced in Wales was Asa Olmstead, who was there in 1820, for one year.

SCHOOLS.

The advantages of a common-school education have been enjoyed by the citizens of Wales from the earliest time. As early as March 10, 1766, the records of the town contain a petition of a number of citizens to be set off as a school district, and at the different town-meetings appropriations of various sums have been made for the support of schools. In May, 1771, there were the following school districts, viz.: South Meadow, Middle, Northwest, Southwest, and South.

As in the case of Brimfield, it seems that the court indicted a fine of £28 5s. 5d. upon the town of Wales, in 1769, as a penalty for not keeping a grammar school. May 5, 1769, Capt. Joseph Blodgett was chosen by the town to attend the session of the court to be held at Springfield in the same month, to answer to the complaint exhibited against the district for failing to keep such a school, and was again chosen for the same purpose in August following. It seems that his efforts were unavailing, and that the decision of the court was adverse to the town, for, on March 30, 1772, Daniel Winchester was chosen to go to the Governor "to get the bond cancelled that was given to prosecute the appeal to the Superior Court for another trial for not keeping a Grammar School; which bond was forfeited, and to go to the General Court at the next session to see if they will take the fine off."

On March 13, 1799, the school districts were first numbered, as follows, viz.: No. 1, northeast; No. 2, middle; No. 3, south; No. 4, southwest; No. 5, northwest.

Prior to 1828 the town for several years had raised by taxation $200 yearly for the support of public schools. In that year the amount appropriated was $300, which was annually raised for the next ten years. In 1839 the town raised $400 for a like purpose. In addition to the sums appropriated by the town considerable amounts were contributed by voluntary donations of wood, board of teachers, and the like, to help sustain the schools. In 1861 the town appropriated $475 for the support of schools. This sum was continued until the spring of 1864, when $600 was appropriated. In 1865 the town raised $750. The last appropriation made was $800.

There are at present five school districts, the same as originally established. No. 1 is in the main village; No. 2, in the southeast; No. 3 is in the south; No. 4, in the west; and No. 5, in the northwest. The number of scholars in attendance upon these schools at the last report was 142.

CHURCHES.

Before considering the individual church organizations that have existed in the town of Wales, it may not be deemed inappropriate to refer to the subject of a "meeting-house," which grievously agitated the people of the district of South Brimfield in its early days, and the contentions in regard to which finally caused the division of the district.† A reference to the chapter on "Organization" will show what were some of the earlier movements for providing preaching in the town, and in erecting a suitable building.

On Dec. 22, 1763, it was resolved to erect the meeting-house at "the northwest corner of John Danielson's farm." April 16, 1763, William Ayers, Edward Davis, and Jacob Dresser were chosen a committee to select a place for the meeting-house, and Nehemiah May, Robert Brown, and Joseph Blodgett were chosen a committee to wait on them. February 6th and 20th it was voted to build a meeting-house in the centre of the district, 45 feet long, 35 feet wide, 20 feet 9 inches high on the post, and to cost £100, and a committee was appointed to erect said structure. John Morse, of Sturbridge, Joseph Craft, and Joseph Colton were appointed a committee to select the spot for the building. Voted to hire Ezra Reave to "preach on probation in order for settlement." On Feb. 23, 1764, the vote to build the meeting-house at the centre was rescinded, and another spot selected. Because "three Baptists," Joseph Belknap, John Belknap, and Benjamin Perrin,‡ voted in this meeting a protest against its proceedings was entered by a large number of citizens. April 23, 1764, it was voted to send Capt. Trustrum Davis to court to ask for a committee to come and settle the "contention and controverse," and in June following the committee came and located the meeting-house. But their selection was not satisfactory, and on Sept. 26, 1764, the town voted to send a committee to the General Court to advise the non-acceptance of the report, and to ask for a division into two districts or societies. Timothy Danielson and Nehemiah May composed the committee.

Such were the difficulties which troubled the early settlers of Wales in regard to a house of worship. It seems that the frame of the central house was actually erected, and stood upon the west side of the old road, near the present line of Holland, and about midway between the present northeast and southeast corners of Wales. It was never inclosed, but was taken down, sold, and removed to Willington, Conn.

The first church building erected in the town was by the Baptists, somewhere about 1760.‡ It stood nearly upon the site of the present "old Baptist Church" in the lower end of the village. That denomination occupied it until 1802, when they sold it to the town. It was subdivided into fourteen parts, † Mass. Archives, 14: 402, 443, and 446.

‡ Benjamin Perrin, and perhaps the Belknaps, had in 1756 declared themselves separate from the "standing order," and so were not entitled to vote in the matter.

§ A petition by Anthony Needham, Enoch Hides, and others, asking permission to erect this house, was granted by the town of Brimfield, March 14, 1757.

* Shaw University, situated at Raleigh, N. C., is named after this gentleman in recognition of substantial assistance rendered, and he is one of the trustees of that institution.

and sold at auction for the sum of $105.80, and removed in pieces by the several vendees.

While this edifice was being removed a new one, generally termed the "Union House," was erected by the town, near the old one. The pews were sold at auction, and the proceeds applied in liquidation of the cost of building, the town reserving the right to use the house for town-meetings and other municipal purposes. Another condition of the plan upon which the house was built was that the use of it from year to year should be apportioned among the several Christian denominations which should purchase or hold pews therein, each denomination to have the right to occupy the house for preaching of its own order a certain number of Sabbaths in each year, proportionate to the value in pews which its members might hold. It was further provided that at any and all times when neither of the other denominations occupied the house the Baptists might occupy it. The first apportionment under this arrangement was made in April, 1803. For the first year's use of the house the Baptists were assigned thirty-two Sabbaths, the Universalists twelve, and the Congregationalists eight.*

In 1846, in accordance with an act of the Legislature, the house was appraised, and the pews of the other denominations were purchased at their appraised values by the Baptists, who repaired and remodeled it, making it the second house of that order in the town. It is now known as the "old Baptist Church," but is not in regular use. The basement is still used by the town for municipal purposes, that right being reserved when the house was sold to the Baptists. It was further provided that in case that denomination failed to keep it in suitable repair it should revert to the town.

BAPTISTS.

This denomination was the first to establish itself in Wales, and has continued to be the leading religious organization of the town. As early as 1734, certain persons resident in the south part of the old town of Brimfield withdrew from the fellowship of the Congregational Church of that town, declaring themselves to be Anabaptists. In 1736 these with some others were organized into a church, with Ebenezer Moulton as their pastor. Mr. Moulton, however, did not become an ordained minister until Nov. 4, 1741. Joseph Hovey and Benjamin Johnson were the first deacons. Mr. Moulton continued pastor until 1763, when he removed to Nova Scotia. He afterward returned to South Brimfield, where he died in 1783.

In 1748, after serious difficulties, the church became divided, and so remained for more than twenty years. In 1765 the Rev. James Mellen, of Middleborough, filled the pastoral office, and continued to do so for four years. The Rev. Wm. Ewing was pastor from 1770 to 1772. In 1771 the church was reorganized, and at the sitting of the Warren Association, with which this church was connected, at Middleborough, in September, 1772, its delegates were instructed to inquire for a pastor. As a result of this inquiry, Elijah Coddington, of Middleborough, visited them the following year, and after a brief stay was chosen to the pastoral office. He was finally installed, Nov. 11, 1773. The church at this time was in a languishing condition, but soon began to revive. Within three years, commencing in 1779, over 200 were added to its rolls by baptism. Mr. Coddington remained pastor for fifty-three years, and became known as "Father" Coddington. He was chaplain of a regiment ten years, taught school ten terms, and filled various town offices.

The pastors of the Baptist Church since Mr. Coddington have been Revs. Joshua Eveleth, 1826-29; John M. Hunt, 1829-30; Tubal Wakefield, 1831-36; George Mixer, 1836-

42; Warren Cooper, 1842-43; Volney Church, 1843-48; Samuel R. Allard, 1848-50; Henry H. Hazleton, 1850-51; Sylvester Barrows, 1851-52; Asa A. Robinson, 1852-56; William S. Phillips, 1856-60; Moses Curtis, 1861-62; Justin Aldrich, 1862-66; Lyman Partridge, 1866-69; Edwin J. Stevens, January, 1870, to September, 1870; Charles A. Cooke, Nov. 1, 1870, to April, 1872; John Shepardson, 1872-76.

The present pastor, Rev. Wm. S. Phillips, was installed in 1877. The church building in present use is situated in the centre of the village, and presents a fine appearance. It contains a clock and bell, and was dedicated in March, 1874. The cost was about $18,000. The organ and furniture cost upward of $5000 additional. The church was largely indebted to Elijah Shaw for substantial aid. The present church membership is about 140. The Sunday-school numbers about 80 scholars and teachers.

CONGREGATIONAL.

From the earliest history of Wales there have existed those who adhered to this order, but they never appear to have had any strong church organization. About the middle of the last century a portion of the inhabitants of Wales were connected with a church of their order in the East Parish, now Holland. When the Union meeting-house before referred to was built, they were few in numbers. In 1819 they organized a church of 12 members, but it declined, and finally became extinct.

UNIVERSALISTS.

About 1780 the doctrine of universal restoration was quite extensively supported in Wales, under the preaching of Rev. Elhanan Winchester (a former Baptist). His writings also were extensively circulated among the people. At various times the Universalists have had organized societies in Wales, but none exists at present.

METHODISTS.

The first establishment of a Methodist society in Wales occurred in 1830. It is now in a flourishing condition, and has a neat church edifice in the centre of the village. In 1832 the society numbered 125 members. In 1857-58 a revival occurred, and numbers were added to the church. In 1858 the society became possessed of a parsonage, the property being held in $10 shares by individual stockholders. The original house of worship was built in 1832, and has been remodeled or repaired several times since, the last time in 1868-69. The present church membership is 45, and has been much larger. The average attendance at the Sabbath-school is about 40. The pastors of this church have been Revs. Horace Moulton, 1830-32; Enoch Bradley, 1832-33; Amasa Taylor, 1833-35; Horace Moulton, 1835-36; Otis Wilder, 1836-37; Joseph Lewis, 1837-39; Charles Virgin, 1839-40; William Gordon, 1840-42; Thomas W. Gile, 1842-43; Henry S. Shedd, 1843-45; Rufus P. Buffington, 1844-45; Spencer Tilleston, 1845-46; William A. Clapp, 1846-48; Jarvis Wilson, 1848-49; John Ricketts, 1849-51; Daniel Atkins, 1851-53; David Culver, 1853; Andrew Baylies, 1857-58; Silas Piper, 1858-61; John Goodwin, 1861-62; Moses P. Webster, 1862-64; John Noon, 1864-66; Charles H. Vinton, 1866-67; Miles R. Barney, 1867-68; George Hewes, 1868-70; John Wesley Cole, 1870-72; John F. Bassett, 1872-74; Thomas B. Treadwell, 1874.†

Rev. John Noon, the present pastor, became such for the second time in 1876. Some of the early pastors divided their labors between Wales and Monson.

CHRISTIANS.

In 1822-23, Wales was visited by several very active and zealous preachers of a sect, then of recent origin, calling themselves by this name. They created considerable excitement in the town, especially in the western and southeast sections,

* The relative numbers in these denominations varied in different years. In 1805 the Baptists occupied the house twenty-five Sabbaths, the Universalists nine, and the Congregationalists fifteen.

† Died November, 1875.

and large numbers of converts were baptized. They established no church or society, however, and the excitement subsided. Of their preachers, Rev. Amos Babcock afterward connected himself with the Baptists, and for a time was settled as a teacher and pastor at Holland. Another, Rev. Ebenezer Robinson, subsequently became a preacher of Universalism, and a physician, and lived, preached, and practiced in different places.

ADVENTISTS.

In the autumn of 1842 and the succeeding winter a very zealous preacher of Advent doctrines—a former Baptist minister by the name of Powell—began to labor in Wales, and caused great excitement. He prophesied that the “second coming” would occur in 1843, and the world be then destroyed. This alarmed the inhabitants. Frequent meetings were held. The Baptists, led by their pastor, Rev. Mr. Cooper, held union meetings with Powell. The Methodists and their pastor, Rev. Mr. Gile, held aloof. When 1843 had come and gone and the anticipated destruction of all things terrestrial did not occur, faith began to weaken and the people to forsake the cause. A few only remained steadfast, among that number being Henry Pratt, a shoemaker of the town, who afterward preached the doctrine.

A small body of Adventists still remains in the town, and has held regular meetings in the “old Baptist Church” since January, 1878. John E. Ainsworth is the pastor.

BURIAL-GROUNDS.

The first place of burial established in that part of Brimfield now the town of Wales was on Sept. 5, 1732, when, at a meeting of “ye Proprietors, 1 and $\frac{1}{4}$ acres of land, for a Burying-place at ye southeasterly part of ye South Pond, where Robert Moulton, Sen., now dwells,” were voted for that purpose. The ground has now fallen into neglect, and is used for agricultural purposes. A great many of the early settlers are buried there. The pond has somewhat encroached upon the land, and some of the remains have been washed out by the action of the water.

What is called the Old Burying-Ground comes next in order. It is located north of the pond, above the road which winds around at that point. A part of it was originally donated to the town by Anthony Needham, soon after the formation of the district of South Brimfield. April 2, 1792, Abner Needham presented the ground to the town in open meeting, that formality being required, because the town purposed adding more land and fencing the ground anew. On Sept. 18, 1813, more land was added, and May 9, 1814, a new fence was put around it.

This cemetery is now only used occasionally, but contains the remains of many of the old townsmen. The oldest stone in the grounds is that of Anthony Needham, which is in a good state of preservation, and shows that he died July 2, 1763, at the age of sixty-seven. Other early gravestones are those of Ichabod Rogers, who died Jan. 19, 1800, at the age of eighty-one; Dr. James Lawrence, died March 23, 1816, aged seventy-two; Oliver Wales, died March 23, 1816, aged seventy-two; Rev. Elijah Coddington, died May 7, 1830, aged eighty-eight; Asa Fisk, died Feb. 9, 1812, aged seventy-eight; Daniel Winchester, died Oct. 12, 1797; Darius Munger, died Nov. 21, 1815, aged seventy-six; and William Fenton, died Nov. 14, 1804, aged eighty-eight.

The New Burying-Ground, located in the lower part of the village, south of the old Baptist Church, was laid out in 1841. On Sept. 13, 1841, some lots were sold, as appears by the town records. The lot is about an acre in extent. It is well filled, and contains the remains of a number of prominent citizens,—among others, of James L. Wales. It is still in use.

There is another burying-ground on Shaw Hill, in the upper village. The land was donated by Julius M. Lyon for that purpose, and consists of from three to five acres. It is the one in most common use at the present time. Alvin Andrews, his son, John S., and his daughter, Jane L., wife of Elijah Shaw, were the first interred in this cemetery, having been removed from Brimfield Cemetery, May 28, 1862.

The Walker Burying-Ground lies in the southwest part of the town. It consists of about a half-acre of land, walled in, and contains a few old graves. It is not now in use.

SOCIETIES.

ANCHOR LODGE, F. AND A. M.

This lodge was chartered Dec. 9, 1874, with the following members: George O. Henry, George A. Harvey, Frank A. Royce, James A. Johnson, Charles F. Thompson, Charles G. Needham, Justus Stebbins, Peter W. Moore, Watson W. Needham, Frank L. Coburn, Lorin H. Clark, George B. Clark, Albert A. Smith, Eugene Cady, Horace L. Hills, and Aaron B. Johnson.

The principal officers of the lodge at the present time are Lorin H. Clark, W. M.; Eugene Cady, S. W.; James A. Johnson, J. W.; Peter W. Moore, Treas.; Chas. G. Needham, Sec. Past Masters, George O. Henry and George A. Harvey. Regular communications are held once each month at Masonic Hall, in the lower village.

INDUSTRIAL PURSUITS.

In the earlier history of the town, agriculture was the principal occupation of its inhabitants. But the roughness of the land and the unproductive nature of the soil presented many obstacles to the successful prosecution of that branch of industry. The town has always been cut up into small farms and lots, principally designed to raise vegetables for the support of a family.

Since the expiration of the first one hundred years from the settlement of the town, its manufacturing interests have assumed considerable proportions, and have constituted the chief source of income of the inhabitants, and their principal industrial pursuit.

Carriages of various kinds have been made, and occasionally a few hoes. The females have made many thousand yards of straw-braid, and hundreds of palm-leaf hats. In 1837 the assessors found the cash value of the hats manufactured during the preceding year to be $1500.

From 1830 to 1842 considerable was done in the manufacture of boots and shoes. The principal manufacturers were Nye & Solomon Moulton, Daniel N. Green, and Freeman Plympton. In 1836–37 the amount of work done in this line, as reported by the town assessors, was—

Boots manufactured.....	6,230 pairs.
Shoes “.....	9,053 “
Total.....	15,283 “
Cash value.....	$27,743

From 1842 to 1850 no great amount of business was done in this branch of industry. It then revived again, so that during the year ending March 31, 1854, 40,000 pairs of boots and shoes were made in the town, mostly shoes. In 1855 the assessors reported as follows:

Pairs of boots of all kinds manufactured.....	255
“ shoes “ “.....	32,970
Total.....	33,225
Cash value.....	$27,735

The principal manufacturers then were Jonathan G. Royce, Dwight W. Ellis, George H. Needham, Chauncey D. Brewer, and Erasmus D. Shaw. Since that time the business has greatly declined.

In the year 1847, Harlin G. Dunham engaged in the manufacture of cotton batting. A small building had been erected some years before by William M. Needham, on Mill Brook, a few rods below the (Phetteplace) mill premises. A part of this was occupied by William M. Needham for making shingles, and the other part by Mr. Dunham. He continued in the business until 1851, when he left town.

In 1854 the building was enlarged by Mr. Needham, and the manufacture of wicking commenced in 1855, by Wm. P. Osborne. But the business was not profitable, and was discontinued. In 1857, Messrs. Osborne & Needham began the manufacture of plow-handles and other articles. In 1858 they added the manufacture of shingles. In 1860, Mr. Osborne withdrew, and Mr. Needham engaged in sawing lumber, shingles, and lath. In 1863, William H. Lane succeeded Mr. Needham in the same business. In 1865, Elijah Shaw purchased the mill and used its water-power in operating the Heagan Mill.

Tanning and currying was one of the earliest industries of the town, and was first started on the premises of Zeno Farrington, Sr. Phineas Durkee is understood to have established a tannery upon these premises soon after he first became a resident of Wales, in 1752. It has been kept since by Robert Durkee, Robert Andrews, Sr., Aaron Winchester, John Sabin, and Zeno Farrington, Sr., the latter having been engaged in that business for over fifty years.

In 1853, Zeno Farrington, Jr., erected a building on the Plymouth place and commenced business as a currier. In 1855, 2100 sides of leather and 800 calf-skins were dressed.

But the branch of industry that has added most to the prosperity of the town, and proven the principal occupation of a large number of its inhabitants for a decade of years, is the manufacture of woolen cloths, stockinet, and fancy cassimeres.

In 1828-29 buildings were erected and other preparations made for the manufacture of this description of goods. The principal originators of this scheme were Bela Tiffany, Oliver Wales, and Hiram Watkins. In 1830, before any manufacturing was done, Tiffany sold out his estate and left town. Soon after this work was commenced, and continued to a small extent by Oliver Wales and others till 1835, when R. P. Wales and J. W. Bliss, of Brimfield, bought the establishment, added more machinery, made other improvements, and ran it till February, 1837, when the mill was destroyed by fire. In 1839 it was rebuilt by John W. Bliss, James L. Wales, and Royal Wales. In 1840 another change of owners took place, and in 1841 the concern was incorporated as the "Wales Manufacturing Company." In that year the manufacture of satinets cloths was commenced, and has been steadily continued to the present day. In 1865 the mill was sold to the three Rogers brothers, Joel H., Lafayette, and Clinton, who prosecuted the business until the spring of 1868, when the "Shaw Manufacturing Company," incorporated April 17, 1848, purchased the mill, and engaged in the manufacture of cassimeres and doeskins. It is now owned by Elijah Shaw, but is not running at the present time. It is situated in the lower village.

The mill designated as that of the "Shaw Manufacturing Company" is located in the centre of the village, near the Baptist Church. The building, first erected in 1847, was small, and contained but one set of machinery, which was put in it in 1848. In 1851 it was enlarged sufficiently to contain a second set, which was added. In 1856 it was again enlarged for a third set. About 1860 the machinery was altered to fit it for the manufacture of doeskins in place of satinets. It was subsequently used for the manufacture of cassimeres, but is not now running.

What is known as the "Bell Mill" is situated in the upper village, and is the largest and handsomest manufacturing establishment in the town. The original building was erected by Elijah and Aaron Shaw, in 1860-61, for the manufacture of woolen goods. It was destroyed by fire about 1870. On its site was erected, about 1873, the present large four-set mill. Broad cassimeres have since been manufactured. The mill is now owned by Elijah Shaw, is still running, and employs between 50 and 60 persons.

The "Eden Shaw Mill" is also located in the upper village, near the "Bell Mill," and manufactures the same description of goods. It was erected in 1864-65, by Eden D. and Aaron Shaw. The manufacture of doeskins was commenced in 1866. In 1869 cloth manufacture was engaged in. It is a large four-set mill, and is now in operation. It employs from 50 to 60 persons.

The "Heagan Mill" was erected by Elijah Shaw, the present owner, in 1865-66. It also is located in the upper village, and is a large four-set mill. It is not now running, but is designed and used for the manufacture of fancy cassimeres, and when in operation employs about 60 persons.

The "Valley Mill," situated in the extreme lower end of the upper village, was used as a saw- and box-factory in 1865. In 1872 it was converted into a mill for the manufacture of cloth. It is owned by Elijah Shaw, but at present is leased to Samuel Hodgson, who is engaged in the manufacture of different varieties of cloth. It contains two sets of machinery and employs about 30 persons.

The amount and value of the products of these mills have varied somewhat in different years. According to the census of 1875, there was produced for the year ending March 1st goods valued at $895,475. The value of stock used was $543,040; number of persons employed, 348; amount of annual wages, $144,399.

MILITARY.

During the French-and-Indian war the town was included in Brimfield, and the soldiers who engaged in that war from the section of the town afterward Wales will be found in the list of soldiers given in the history of Brimfield. Prominent among them—each filling the office of captain—will be noticed Ebenezer Moulton and Trustrum Davis, from South Brimfield.

In the Revolutionary war the citizens of Wales appear to have supported the cause of independence in a spirited and patriotic manner. On Jan. 17, 1775, the town resolved, among other things, "that we mean strictly to adhere to the principles of English liberty, and are ready to adopt any measures within the compass of our power, consistent with reason and justice, to assist and maintain the just and natural rights of the colonies in general, and this province in particular." Also, voted "to provide our Minute-Men, in case they are called into immediate service, with a blanket, a Cartridge-Box, Thirty Rounds of Powder and Ball, and a Hatchet, or Cutlass, or Bayonet." Voted Asa Fisk, Jacob How, William Carpenter, John Rosbrook, and John Bullin a committee to inspect tea, and Joel Rogers, William Bishop, Isaac Foster, Jr., Benjamin Blodgett, and John Graham a committee to inspect merchandise.

On May 29, 1775, the district joined with Brimfield and Monson in choosing Timothy Danielson as a delegate to the Provincial Congress. On March 13, 1777, the town voted "to raise money to encourage Continental Soldiers for three years." Also, "that Capt. Jehial Munger should go and ask advice of the General Court concerning those persons that are unfriendly to the American cause." March 21, 1777, voted £20 for each man that shall enlist for three years.

The records do not indicate that any active part was taken by the town in the suppression of Shays' rebellion. A few residents are said to have engaged in it, among whom were Timothy Fenton and Asa Fisk, the latter serving as captain.

The only notice taken of the war of 1812, so far as the records show, was on July 11, 1812, when the town voted 35 to 25 to request the President and Congress to avert war and restore peace.

In the suppression of the Rebellion of 1861-65 the town took an active and patriotic part. An illustration of the sentiments of its inhabitants is afforded by the following incident. On April 27, 1861, a flag-pole was erected by the people, and the national standard displayed therefrom. A few days after, the flag was cut down at night. This caused great excitement, and meetings of indignation were held. The result was that two persons suspected of participating in or being cognizant of the affair were seized and carried through the village, the one upon a rail, and the other, at the same time, upon an old blind horse, facing the horse's tail. The matter afterward received attention from the courts.

WALES' REBELLION RECORD.

The following is a list of soldiers from Wales who served in the war of the Rebellion :

BLANDFORD.

GEOGRAPHICAL.

BLANDFORD, one of the extreme western towns of Hampden and one of the most elevated in the county, is located upon the summit of the east range of the Green Mountains, which extends through Vermont and Western Massachusetts. It is bounded on the north by Chester and Huntington, on the south by Granville and Tolland, on the east by Russell, and on the west by Otis, in Berkshire County. Its area is 30,427 acres, and its population (in 1875), 967. Since 1840 the population has fluctuated in numbers and materially declined. The reason for this is attributable to the migration of many inhabitants to the West a few years ago, in search of more fruitful agricultural regions than Blandford could offer.

NATURAL FEATURES.

Blandford abounds in wildly picturesque mountain scenery, and is annually in the summer and autumn a popular resort for the inhabitants of Springfield and Westfield. The abundance of fish and game in this region invites the attention of the hunter and angler, who reap here a rich reward of sport. The soil is generally rocky, but moderately fertile. Mountain streams are plentiful, but none of them rise beyond the dignity of brooks. The most prominent natural elevations are Dug Hill, near the centre of the town, 1622 feet in height, and Jackson's Hill, in the southwest, which is much higher. There is also Green Mountain, at whose base there is a sulphurous spring, Tarrot Hill on the east, and Beach Hill on the south. In the northwest there is a deep depression in a hill-top, believed by many to be the mark of an extinct crater. There are several large ponds, as North Meadow Pond of 80 acres, Long Pond of 150 acres, and Blair Pond of 250 acres.

The town is rich in minerals, and among the many found here may be mentioned carbonate of lime, chromate of iron, steatite, crystallized actonite, mamillary chalcedony, kyanite, rose quartz, mica, sulphuret of iron, and many others. It is related that about 1795 one John Baird, residing in the "second division," discovered lead and silver ore near the north line of the town, but, by reason of a superstitious belief that it would not be well to pursue his discoveries, refused to disclose the whereabouts of the mine, and the secret died with him, although many subsequent fruitless efforts were made to discover it.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

The land now embraced within the limits of the town of Blandford was granted by the General Court to certain proprietors of common and undivided lands in Suffield, Conn., as an equivalent for a tract taken from them in establishing the dividing-line between Connecticut and Massachusetts. Shortly thereafter the proprietors conveyed the tract to Jacob Lawton, and he, in January, 1735, sold three-fourths thereof to Francis Wells, John Faye, and Francis Brindley, becoming with them joint proprietor. The first settler to arrive with his family was Hugh Black, who came in the autumn of 1735, and erected a dwelling-house near what is now the E. H. Osborn place. He was followed by James Baird, who located about four miles from Black, near Samuel H. Phelps' present farm. After these in close succession came Messrs. Reed, McClintock, Taggart, Brown, Anderson, Hamilton, Wells, Blair, Stewart, Montgomery, Boies, Ferguson, Campbell, Wilson, Sennett, Young, Knox, and Gibbs.

These first settlers were called Scotch-Irish, from the fact that their ancestors moved from Scotland to Ireland. Their descendants, coming over to America about 1727, settled in Hopkinton, Mass. (now Sudbury), whence they removed to Blandford.

As a matter of interesting history, the following statement (probably a letter) written by Francis Brindley, one of the four proprietors of the tract, will be found worthy of perusal:

"It is generally well known in your parts that Mr. Christopher Jacob Lawton obtained a grant for a tract of land called now Blandford, alias New Glasco, and in the time of it, in order to carry on the settlement, took in two partners for one-half, viz, Capt. Francis Wells and Mr. John Fay. Some time after, I bought of said Lawton one-half of his remaining half (exclusive of all charges), which entitles each of us to one-quarter part. But I should have observed, before I was concerned they had agreed with 45 families to settle it, from a place called Hopkinton, and articulated with them, amongst whom was one Hugh Hamilton, who could not go by reason he could not sell his interest there; so, by much importunity of him and his friends, being a man pretty well approved amongst them, I purchased his farm (and one of his neighbors'), to get them up to Glasco, and I soon sold them to loss. However, I gave them obligations for money and lands in Glasco. The money part I long since paid, and this man, if I remember right, was to have 300 acres, and (to oblige him, which he was to impart to no one living) I promised him to choose out of one of my lots, when I could certainly know where my right was; and accordingly, a surveyor was appointed to divide it, and lay it out in 500-acre lots, and before he had finished it, or even marked and bounded them, the General Court overhauled the grant (which made some disturbance), and ordered a committee, and had it new surveyed, and found Mr. Lawton had a mile or thereabouts more than was conformable to their grant. But finally they granted the overplus, as I took it, to all of us, on condition that we settled sixteen families more. But how it happened I know not, this second grant was done in Wells' and Fay's names only. But they have always told me and Lawton that we were and should be equally entitled to it with them, and that they would give us a quit-claim, in order to make good a division we were about to make above mentioned; but they have never done it (more than by promise), though often requested. This I told said Hamilton, and others concerned in Glasco, three or four years ago, and hearing he was uneasy and threatening, I wrote him I was willing to do it, if he'd appoint when, but I thought it was a pity to let him pitch at uncertainty, and I always was and am as willing to do it (and do him justis) as he can be to have it, and it has been retained on no other account on my side. But such are the circumstances often in such new settlements, that it's almost impossible—if men are so unequal in their demands, without the least injury done to them. But by what I can learn, what has moved him to this resentment, or at least to give a handle to it, is as I have sold to four men a lot of 470 acres, in order to perform my quarter part of the settlers to the last grant above mentioned, in order to qualify me to my full quarter part as above hinted, with Wells and Fay, that there might not any longer remain any difficulty not being named in the second grant, and I have sold for £70 less than others, in order to perform my part therein with a long credit. Now behold nothing will serve said Hamilton, as I am told, but three hundred acres out of that lot which I can't recall."

Touching the matter of the survey of Mr. Lawton's, by which the proprietors obtained a tract of seven, instead of six miles square, the General Court took prompt cognizance of the unauthorized appropriation of land, and ordered the proprietors to obtain fifty settlers at once, as an offset. In 1737 the four proprietors divided the township, and each took unto himself his proportion of the 51 lots into which the tract had been laid out. As above noted, the settlement was called from the first New Glasgow, in remembrance of Glasgow, in Scotland, and this name it retained until the incorporation of Blandford.

DEED OF PARTITION.

The following is a copy of the deed of partition of the town of Blandford, Hampden Co., Mass., dated March 30, 1737, at that time called "Glasco," entered into by the then proprietors, Christopher Jacob Lawton, Francis Brinley, Francis Wells, and John Foye:

It is not an easy matter to write the histories of the descendants of the early settlers of Blandford, for the reason that many of the sons and daughters of the pioneers having left the town early in life, but few of the old names are found among the residents of to-day. Such as could be definitely followed will be found set forth below.

The Boies family is very widely scattered. The only ones bearing that name in Blandford now are Watson E. and his son, Enos W. Du Boyce is said to have been the original name, and France the country which gave the family birth. During Cardinal Richelieu's time, the family fled to Scotland to avoid religious persecution, and in the latter country adopted the name of Boise, which after the settlement in Blandford was changed to Boies. David, the first settler, had four sons,—Samuel, David, John, and William. David, Jr., died young. The three remaining brothers married three sisters named Crooks. John had three sons,—John, Jr., Samuel, and David. Samuel, the younger, had three sons, who migrated from Blandford to the West early in life. John, Jr., the grandson of David, the original, had also three sons,—Enos, James, and Nathan. Watson E., now living in Blandford, is a son of the Enos last named. James R., a brother of Watson E., is now professor of languages at the Chicago University. A younger brother, Adoniram, died at the age of seven years. James, an uncle of Watson E., died in West Granby. This James had a son, Arulza (who died of yellow fever in New Orleans about fifty years ago), and a daughter, who is now Mrs. Orrin Bills, of Sheffield, Mass. Nathan, another of Watson E.'s uncles, removed to Palmyra about sixty years ago, and died there, leaving a large family. Watson E. has two living sisters,—Mrs. G. W. Shepard, of West Granville, and Mrs. William Moore, of Agawam.

Of the Blairs, Truman and Samuel, sons of Reuben, are residing in Blandford. David Blair, with a family of twelve children, was the first of the name to emigrate to America. He settled in Worcester shortly after 1720, and thence Matthew, his eldest son, removed to Blandford as one of its first settlers. Robert, a brother of Matthew, settled also in Blandford, on the tract called "the Gore." Matthew had six sons and four daughters. Matthew, one of the sons who settled here, was twice married, had eight children, viz.: Robert, Matthew, Jacob, Isaac, Moses, Adam, James, and Anna. Robert, the brother of Matthew, the elder, above, had six children,—Robert, David, Dolly, Asa, Rufus, Hannah. Reuben, the father of Truman and Samuel, now living in Blandford, was the son of Jacob, who was the son of Matthew, the latter being the son of Matthew, the earliest Blandford settler of that name. James, a brother of Reuben, and uncle of the present Truman and Samuel, removed to Ohio. His daughter afterward became the mother of Gov. Fairchild, of Wisconsin. Nathan, another of Reuben's brothers, died in Blandford many years ago. Timothy, a son of John Blair, of Worcester, and grandson of David, the original, moved to Blandford in 1787, and died here in 1837, without issue, aged eighty-five.

James Nye settled in Blandford in 1805. Three of his sons, Dennis, Clark, and Randall, still reside in the town.

The Knox family is now represented in Blandford by Miss Elizabeth Knox and Mrs. Benjamin Bennett.

Wm. Knox was a pioneer, and settled in Blandford about 1737. One of his sons, James, removed early to what is now Hillsdale, N. Y. John, another son, married here, and raised a family of four sons,—William, Elijah, John, and James. Of these, Elijah, the grandfather of Miss Elizabeth Knox, now living in Blandford, had children,—Alanson,* who died in Ohio; Ranar, who died in Missouri; Elijah, Jr., and Curtiss, who died in Blandford; Justus and Reuben, who died in California; Joseph, now living in Chicago; Eleanor, Lois, and Hannah (all dead); and Ruth, now residing in Meadville, Pa. Elijah, Jr., was the father of Timothy, who died in St. Louis, and Elizabeth, still residing in Blandford. Curtiss, brother of Elijah, Jr., and father of Mrs. Benjamin Bennett, of Blandford, was father also of Austin, now living in Southwick, Charles, living in Rock Island, Ill., and Joseph, living in Worcester.

The Gibbs family in Blandford originated with Israel, who came hither from Hopkinton. His four sons and four daughters were John, Israel, Ephraim, Isaac, Mary, Rebecca, Elizabeth, and Sarah, all of whom, save Elizabeth, lived to be upward of eighty years old. Those of the name now living in Blandford are George C. and his son George; Charles, son

Watson & Boase

This family is of French origin, and their ancestors belonged to the noted Du Bois family, who were very prominent in France during the reign of Louis XIV., and were driven from that country to the northern part of Ireland during the Huguenot persecutions. At that time the spelling of the name was changed to Boies, and in about 1825 to the present mode. In the early part of the last century, David, a descendant of the family, emigrated from Ireland to America, and located in the town of Hopkinton, Mass., but subsequently came to Blandford, Mass., about the year 1735 or 1737. But a few people in that early period had turned their attention toward settling the backwoods of Massachusetts, as the country was mountainous and heavily timbered, and the business of making a permanent settlement was attended with much more labor than in the valleys.

He was a man of deep religious thought and principles, and had a large family of children, of whom there were three sons, viz., John, William, and Samuel. John, arriving at manhood, turned his attention to agricultural pursuits, and raised a family of children, the male members of which were named John and Samuel, the former being the grandfather of the gentleman whose portrait heads this sketch. He was born in Blandford, Nov. 22, 1744, and was one of the first white male children that saw the light of day in that town. He was celebrated as a school-teacher, and was one of the prominent church members of his locality, being connected with the Baptist denomination. He was married to Sarah Freeland, by whom he had a family of six children who lived to a mature age. Three of them were sons, viz., James, Enos, and Nathan. He died Sept. 9, 1830. His son Enos was born in Blandford, April 21, 1776, and was married to Alice, daughter of Daniel Robinson, of Granville, Mass., May 1, 1799. She was born in Granville, Oct. 24, 1779. His occupations in life were those of school-teacher, farmer, and mail contractor, he having received his first mail contract in 1806. He educated a family of four children. He was a Democrat in politics, and held numerous town offices; was a member of the Massachusetts Constitutional Convention in 1819, and, living to be nearly eighty years of age, died July 9, 1855. His wife survived him but a few years, dying April 17, 1863. Of his family his two sons have both reflected honor and credit upon his name. The eldest, Watson E., was born in Blandford, May 19, 1808. He received the benefits of a common-school education, and also attended one year at the Wilbraham Academy. His early life was spent in agricultural pursuits, but in 1830 his father transferred to him a mail contract, the route being from Hartford, Conn., to Hinsdale, Mass. He has ever since held one or more mail contracts, and is probably the oldest mail contractor at present in the service. He has spent twenty-six consecutive years of his life in driving a mail stage-coach.

He was married, Feb. 23, 1832, to Lerinda, daughter of Zelotus Robinson, of Granville, Mass., by the Rev. T. M. Cooley. She was a native of Granville, and was born Sept. 3, 1810. Their family consisted of only two children,—Timothy Robinson, who was born in Blandford, Nov. 23, 1832, and died Jan. 26, 1857 (he was a prominent young man of the town, and at the time of his death held the positions of town clerk and treasurer); and Enos W., who was born in Blandford, Oct. 15, 1840, and was married to Achsah, daughter of Jonathan Freeland, of Agawam, Mass., Jan. 21, 1862. He has a family of three daughters, and is a farmer in Blandford.

Mr. Boise lost the helpmeet of his youthful days March 1, 1865. He was afterward married, July 1, 1875, to Emma A., daughter of Gordon Rowley, of Blandford, of which town she is a native. In politics he has always followed in the footsteps of his father, and been an energetic worker in the Democratic ranks. He was a member of the State Legislature of Massachusetts, in 1842, and has held the various town offices of selectman, town clerk, treasurer, and assessor, besides being special county commissioner for a number of terms. His brother James was born in Blandford, Jan. 27, 1815, and graduated, in 1840, from Brown University, at Providence, R. I., and has filled positions in the faculty in the department of foreign languages at Brown's, sixteen years at the State University, at Ann Arbor, Mich., and is at present connected with the Chicago University, at Chicago, Ill. He has published text-books in Greek and Latin, which are extensively used in colleges and public schools.

The Boise family, so far as is known, are all comfortably situated, but none of them have accumulated large estates, nor have they been military men, but appear to have been more anxious to improve the mind and obtain a good education, preparatory to entering professional life. By referring to the alumni of Williams College we find that seven of the graduates have borne the name of Boise, and were natives of Blandford, viz.: William, son of David Boise, class of 1801; Joseph, son of David, class of 1808; Patrick, son of Reuben Boise, class of 1809; Artemas, son of David Boise, class of 1816; Harper, son of William Boise, class of 1826; Reuben P., son of Reuben Boise, Jr., class of 1843; Fisher A., also son of Reuben, Jr., class of 1849.

Thus we have the history of one of Blandford's oldest families, who settled there long before we were a free and independent nation. They have lived among the rugged hills of Blandford through all the different vicissitudes that have happened to our Republic; but, by death and emigration, the name which, for the last century and a half, has had many representatives on the town tax-list, is now reduced to two,—Watson E. and his son, Enos W.,—having scattered from their ancestral home, and formed residences in other parts of our great country.

HENRY K. HERRICK.

Among the active farmers of the town of Blandford, highly respected for political and social qualities, is the subject of this sketch. He is to the manner born, being the only son of Thomas and Mary A. Herrick, and first saw the light Aug. 24, 1839. His opportunities for receiving a good education were very limited. He followed the footsteps of his father, and is engaged in agricultural pursuits, living upon his father's homestead.

He was married, Nov. 20, 1862, to Sarah E., daughter of Lewis and Mary E. (Cook) Parks, of Blandford, where she was born, Aug. 15, 1843. He has a family of three children,—Hattie P., born Aug. 25, 1863; Jennie M., born Sept. 10, 1864; and Sadie E., born Nov. 18, 1875. He is one of the prominent members of the Democratic party, and is at present chairman of the board of selectmen, which office he has held for the last four years. He has been prominently identified with the Union Agricultural Society of Blandford, and has held the offices of president, secretary, and director of that association.

THOMAS HERRICK, born in Blandford, Mass., Aug. 26, 1809, was the only son, in a family of six children, of Thomas and Betsey (Brockway) Herrick. His father was a native of Montgomery, Mass., and formerly lived at Westfield, Mass., but located in Blandford in 1808.

Thomas was a farmer by occupation, and had few advantages of obtaining an education. He was married, June 28, 1836, to Mary A., daughter of Harry and Charlotte (Blau) Knox. Her parents were representatives of Blandford's oldest families, and she was born there, May 7, 1813. Their family consisted of ten children, three of whom, viz., Isabella A., Bessie B., and Hattie H., died young. Charlotte E. was born July 11, 1837, and is the widow of E. W. Oakley, of Blandford; Henry K.; Ursula M. was born June 7, 1841, and is the widow of E. C. Hawes, of Springfield; Emma L. was born March 8, 1843, and is the wife of William R. Nye, of Blandford; Mary E. was born Feb. 3, 1845, and is the wife of James J. Richards, of Wilbraham; Melissa B. was born March 29, 1851, and is the wife of George D. Nye, of Blandford; Abbie A. was born Feb. 1, 1855, and lives with her brother on her father's old homestead.

He was always a Democrat in politics, and held various town offices. He died Feb. 1, 1872, mourned by all who knew him, for he was one of Blandford's most honored and respected citizens.

of Abner; Charles, son of Lyman; Bradner S., and his son John; and Russell, son of Dwight G.

Jonathan Shepard removed from Westfield to Blandford in 1770. His four sons were Jonathan, Ezra, Elijah, and Oliver. Of these, Jonathan had five sons and seven daughters. Of these five sons, Jonathan, the second eldest, had sons and daughters as follows: Jonathan, now in Ashtabula, O.; Lucius B., a merchant, now of Blandford; Joseph, in Ohio; Norman, deceased; Philander, in Minnesota; Henry, in Michigan; George, in Westfield; Mrs. Joseph Lazelle, of Westfield; Mrs. Lawrence Root, of Seneca Falls, N. Y.; Mrs. John Root, living in Michigan; and Caroline, deceased. Larned, grandson of the original Jonathan, died in Hartford, leaving no descendants in Blandford. Chandler, his brother, died in the West. Eli, another brother, died in Blandford, leaving a son, Joseph, still residing here. Bradford, another brother, died when quite young. Sarah, the youngest daughter of Jonathan (2d), the son of the original Jonathan, is still living in Sandersfield, Mass., as Mrs. Philander Twining.

John Watson was another Blandford pioneer. He married Sarah, daughter of Deacon Israel Gibbs, and died in 1825. He had eleven children, all of whom are dead save Oliver, now living in Blandford with his son Franklin, at the advanced age of ninety-seven. His brother James died in Blandford but a few months ago, aged ninety-three, a bachelor. Loring, another brother, had four children,—Loring, Jr., who died in 1858; Dolly Ann, who married Rev. Noah Bishop, of Springfield, Ohio, and died there; Myra, who died young; Eleeta, who now resides in Albany; Emily, now Mrs. Joseph Dewey, of Collinsville, Conn.; and Jane, now Mrs. McLearn, of Blandford. Loring, Jr., above noted, left two sons,—Loring, now living in New York City, and Benjamin, living in Kentucky. He left a daughter, now Mrs. Henry Peek, of New York. Of the other sons of the original John, Samuel and William died in infancy. John's children died young, and William (2d) died not long ago, leaving no descendants.

NOTEWORTHY INCIDENTS.

In May, 1744, the town was ordered to be divided into eight garrisons, and four of them were ordered to be built at the houses of John Stewart, Israel Gibbs, Lieut. Wm. Knox, and James Clintock. In 1746, Rev. Wm. McClenathan was sent to Hartford to procure soldiers, and Adam Knox sent to Northampton for a similar purpose. These measures for protection were taken during the troublous times of the French-and-Indian wars. About this time it was voted to send William Donaghy to the General Court with a petition asking that the male inhabitants of the town might be put under pay, the inference being that the pay was wanted for services rendered or to be rendered in defending the town from the Indians. The records fail to say what was the fate of the appeal. Blandford suffered some from Indian ravages, but the location of an important government fort at this point was a great safeguard to the settlers, and the red man was therefore not much feared in that region.

A record dated April, 1746, reads:

"Samuel Carnochan came and told me he had provided a bull, according to ye vote of ye town, and desired me to book him."

That the town-officers worked cheap in those days may be gathered from the fact that John Hamilton, town treasurer from 1742 to 1745, received £6, old tenor, for his three years' service in that capacity. In the spring of 1749 the Indians began to grow troublesome, and the inhabitants of the town were so frightened that all but four families fled to neighboring towns. The Indians did not, however, inflict any serious molestations, but the settlers, upon returning the ensuing fall, set about the erection of three forts. These were located, one upon the place now owned by Geo. Watson, the second upon a place now owned by Nelson C. Hall, and the third upon the land now owned by Jarvis J. Lloyd. These forts continued for a year to be used as places of common shelter after night-fall, and during that period the inhabitants went armed to their daily avocations and to church, determined to be prepared for any and all dire emergencies; but they were not further troubled, and soon relapsed into a sense of peaceful security.

All was not peaceful and harmonious between the inhabitants early in 1753, as a town vote at that time relates: "Chose Mr. Israel Gibbs to teek advis of megor Limen about defekglty's In the Town." This same Israel Gibbs owned the first cart that entered the town, and the team that drew it was driven—so goes tradition—by the Widow Moses Carr, and was moreover the first yoke of cattle seen in Blandford. To Mr. Gibbs also tradition assigns the distinction of having been the father of the first male child—Israel, Jr.—born in the town. The first female child born in the town is supposed to have been Mary, daughter of James Montgomery, born in May, 1737.

About 1791 the father of Martin and Linus Gibbs brought into the town the first single wagon ever seen here. It was a great curiosity to the inhabitants, and such a novel sight to horses that they were frightened by the appearance of the vehicle, just as horses nowadays take fright at a locomotive.

The early settlers were so poor that they frequently solicited assistance from the town proprietors, and often petitioned the General Court for money grants and remission of taxes. Among the donations tendered in response to these petitions, the court once gave 40 bushels of salt to be distributed among the inhabitants.

The records of 1755 show the following entry:

"By virtue of a petition put into the Great and General Court of Boston by the Rev. Mr. Morton on behalf of this town, the Honorable Court was pleased to grant us one swivel-gun, as an alarm-gun, with one quarter-barrel of powder and one bag of bullets for the same, and also one hundred flints for the use of the town, which we have received and paid charges on the same from Boston to this town, which is two pounds and sixteen shillings, old tenor, to Capt. Houston."

This swivel-gun and ammunition were kept housed at Rev. Mr. Morton's residence.

One of the first taverns in the town, if not the first, was probably kept by one Mr. Root. In 1757, when the ecclesiastical council assembled at Blandford, to act in the matter of the controversy between Rev. Mr. Morton and the town, Mr. Root provided the members of the council with accommodations at his house, and a town vote taken about that time appropriated to Mr. Root "6 pence Lawful money for Each Meal of Vittles each member of the council shall eat in the time they shall Seat Hear on our Business, and also 18 pence, old tenor, per Night for each Members of the Council's lodging, and that the town pay Mr. Root for the strong Drink that the Council drink while they are Hear on our Business, saving Syder at their Vittels."

Deacon Israel Gibbs furnished the members of this same council with rum and sugar, and he was ordered to be paid therefor the first cost thereof.

Temperance was at a discount in those early days. From the records it is learned that at town-meetings the inhabitants frequently took a recess of an hour for the purpose of refreshing themselves at the tavern. Tradition says that in those times the man who could drink the most and walk the straightest was a hero. Strong drink was indeed a favorite beverage with the ancient Blandfordites, and no family arrangement was supposed to be complete without a liberal standing supply. Since 1837, however, Blandford has been more or less inclined toward the total-abstinence doctrine.

The first physician was Dr. Ashley, who flourished in 1745. The first grist-mill, probably the one erected by Capt. Kelso, previous to 1745, but just when cannot be told. The first tannery, the one erected by John Watson, about 1760, not far from where the hotel in Blandford Centre now stands. The house now occupied by Mr. Bartlett in Blandford Centre was built by John Watson,—it is said in 1770. Justin Ashmun kept tavern in 1790, on the site of the present hotel at Blandford Centre, and about then and near the same place Russell Atwater kept a store. Where Enos W. Boies now lives Abner Pease kept tavern, as far back as about 1800, and at least twenty years before that date the house now occupied by the Widow Robinson, at Blandford Centre, was built. The first postmaster was Timothy Hatch, who was appointed in 1795.

Blandford was not behind her sister-towns in patriotic impulses and efforts during the trying times of the Revolution, and upon the first alarm from Lexington, sent out, with Chester, a company of 36 men, under the command of Capt. John Ferguson, of Blandford. During the war, the town furnished men and money with untiring zeal, and the early records bear abundant witness to continued labors in behalf of the cause of independence. Blandford was, however, opposed to the war of 1812, and sent Jedediah Smith as a delegate to the Northampton Convention. Of the soldiers sent by Blandford into the war of 1812, none are known to be living. Among those who went were Asa Harrington, Ebenezer and Eleazer Slocumb, Henry Tracy, — Wilson, and Isaac Gibbs.

The road of the Eighth Massachusetts Turnpike Association, laid out in 1800, passed through Blandford, and so on to Chester, as did the road of the Eleventh Turnpike Association, running from the south line of the State to Becket by the Pittsfield road.

The first recorded marriage seems to have been that of Solomon Stewart to Sarah McConoughey.

The chair used, in 1774, by Rev. William McClenathan, in the pulpit of the Congregational Church, is still preserved, and is the property of Enos W. Boies, Esq., of Blandford Centre. Mr. Boies owns also the original deed, of date 1737, by which Jacob Lawton, the original proprietor of the tract, conveyed three-fourths thereof to Francis Brinley, John Faye, and Francis Wells.

An important new departure in the industries of Blandford was effected by Mr. Amos Collins, a Connecticut merchant, who settled in Blandford in 1807. He introduced the business of butter- and cheese-making, and carried it forward with such success that he not only greatly contributed to the prosperity of the town, but gained a comfortable fortune for himself during the nine years of his stay.

ORGANIZATION.*

Nov. 10, 1741, the town was incorporated under the name of Blandford. In honorable remembrance of Scotland, whence their ancestors had migrated to Ireland, the early settlers had called their settlement New Glasgow, and in their petition for incorporation they desired the town to be named Glasgow. This desire was, moreover, in furtherance of a wish to obtain the gift of a church-bell, which had been promised by the people of Glasgow, Scotland, provided the new town was given that name. It appears, however, that Wm. Shirley, who had just been appointed Governor of the province of Massachusetts, came over from England in the ship "Blandford," and in honor of that vessel he chose to give that name to the new town, to the loss, by the people, of their promised bell.

REPRESENTATIVES AT THE GENERAL COURT.

Blandford was not represented in the Legislature until 1787. For many years no one would accept the office of representative. In the early records it was frequently voted "to send if we can get any one to accept." Since 1787 the representatives have been as follows:

Timothy Blair, John Ferguson, Reuben Boies, Jedediah Smith, Wm. Knox, Eli P. Ashmun, David Boies, Joseph Bull, Edward Pynchon, Samuel Knox, Alanson Knox, Andrew Wilson, Isaac Lloyd, Abner Gibbs, David Boies (2d), David Blair (2d), Reuben Boies, Jr., Israel Cannon, Orrin Sage, David Parks, Lyman Gibbs, Justin Wilson, Lester E. Gibbs, Logan Crosby, Kilbourn Bates, Milton Boies, Curtiss Hall, Russell A. Wilson, Daniel Collins, Adam Blair, S. S. Day, S. W. Loring, H. G. Lewis, W. E. Boies, Edwin Ely, Leverett Sackett, Sharon Bradley, Vincent Bradley, Rev. A. G. Bowker, Albert Knox, Chauncey S. Brown, William B. Miller, Samuel E. Lord, Ralsa Taggart, James C. Hinsdale.

Mr. Hinsdale represented the town in 1856. After that Blandford became a portion of the Eleventh Representative District.

VILLAGES.

BLANDFORD CENTRE.

Of the two villages in the town, Blandford Centre occupies the site of the early settlements of Blandford, and although small, having a population of perhaps 300, is tastefully laid out, and attractively embellished with many handsome dwellings. There are at this point two churches, one hotel, two stores, a post-office, school, fair-grounds, and two cemeteries. The villagers are for the most part engaged in agricultural pursuits.

NORTH BLANDFORD, distant three miles from the centre, was some years ago quite a manufacturing point, but in this direction its interests have latterly suffered a decline. At present there are a cattle-card factory, a cheese-factory, a tannery, a church, school, two stores, post-office, and a population of 300. Although North Blandford has lost important business interests, it is still a place of substantial thrift.

CHURCHES.

From the date of the earliest settlement of Blandford, the inhabitants devoted much care and thought to the subject of procuring means for the observance of divine worship. Much of the business transacted at the early town-meetings related to this matter. The first meeting-house in the town was erected in 1740, by the original town proprietors. The agreement stipulated that the structure should have "glass windows," but these were not supplied until twelve years later. For thirteen years the building had no floor save a few loose boards, the earth, and rocks. The seats were blocks, boards, and common benches. The pulpit was nothing but a square box. In 1759 it was voted "to make a pulpit for the minister and to build seats." In 1786 the house was first plastered. It was not until 1805, sixty-five years after it was commenced, that the house was completed.

The leaders of church music were chosen at town-meetings, and were enjoined to conduct it in "the good old way." In 1771 the question was raised whether the singing should be carried on with the beat, and was negatived. Caleb Taylor, of Westfield, was the first singing-master, and when he named the tune and sang with the beat, many were so shocked at what they termed the "indecentcy of the method" that they left the church. This church was originally Presbyterian, but in 1800 was changed to Congregational, "from the inconvenience," it is said, "attending its first form." The earliest pastors were Wm. McClenathan, 1744 to 1747; James Morton, 1747 to 1767; Joseph Patrick, 1772. The organization of this first church of Blandford is said to date back to 1735, when, in Hopkinton, the settlers, preparing to move toward their new homes in what is now Blandford, effected the religious organization which flourished contemporaneously with their early settlement in the wilderness.

A town-meeting held in April, 1743, was chiefly devoted to the consideration of the business of obtaining a minister. The votes upon the subject were as follows:

"That the town supplicate the Rev. Mr. John Harvey to come and preach a day to us now, before the next Presbytery; that the town send two 'Comishioners' to the Presbytery with respect to affairs betwixt the town and Mr. John Caldwell, on 'condishon' we rest satisfied with the determination of the Presbytery in this affair; that David Boys and John Huston be sent to the Presbytery by the town as Comishioners to act for us at the Presbytery; that our Comishioners supplicate the Presbytery for a supply to us; that there be granted fifty-two shillings per day or Sabbath, old tenor, to those that preach to us, either sent to us by the Presbytery, or belonging to the Presbytery, or by the mutual agreement of the town, and they to pay for their 'bord.'"

September, 1743, an appropriation of 12s., old tenor (probably meant to read 52s.), was made to pay Samuel Dunlap for one day's preaching. At the same meeting it was resolved to supplicate the Presbytery for "any supply they can find for us for less or more time, only Mr. John Caldwell excepted;" but why Mr. Caldwell was excepted does not appear, but it is found from an earlier record that Mr. Caldwell did some preaching for the town and engaged subsequently in a controversy with the selectmen. In October, 1743, it was voted that "the town write to the Presbytery for a present supply for the pulpit, and to see what they can or will do for us as concerning a minister in order to ballot whether they will send or join with us in sending home to England for one." Fifteen shillings were offered in old tenor, per week, to "any thatt will bord the ministers for time to come." The bid for a minister declined at this time to "forty shillings a day and pay for their board."

It was resolved to send for Mr. Harvey, to preach "a part to us and a Sabbath, as soon as his convenience will allow of;" and further, a committee was chosen "for to consult and contrive for the supply of the pulpit this year, not exceeding six weeks for one tryal." May, 1744, it was voted not to send to the Presbytery, but to continue Mr. Munson for another space of time "after he hath stayed out his present invitation." It was decided also to adhere to the doctrines of the Church of Scotland, and the Westminster confession of faith. In July, 1744, it was voted to settle the Rev. Wm. "McClanathan" as the town's pastor, and he was to have £150, old tenor, as a settlement, and a yearly salary of the same sum, the settlement money to be paid him in work within the space of two years after his settlement. Mr. McClanathan was ordained as pastor in October, 1744, and concerning his transfer from Boston to Blandford with his family, it is interesting to note that they were provided for the journey with "two horses and chairs to convey them to Westfield." The town voted to pay for the transportation of Mr. McClanathan's goods from Boston to Westfield, and "the charge of taking the chairs back to Boston." By a vote, every man in the town of the age of twenty years and upward was ordered to give Rev. Mr. McClanathan one day's work toward getting his firewood for the ensuing year.

In October, 1746, the town decided to ask a dismission from Mr. McClanathan, and Israel Gibbs was chosen to go to Boston to secure the dismission of the minister, in the event that the latter declined to consent to a dismission from the town. The records indicate that Mr. McClanathan accepted his dismission promptly, although no reason is given for the action of the town.

Rev. James Morton, the next settled pastor, was installed in August, 1847, but for some reason he didn't please the town, and in 1753 there was trouble between pastor and people, for in December of that year it was voted "to Let the Defekulty Rest for a Letil Tiem Withe Respekt to the Revrent Mr. Morin." Ecclesiastical councils were called to consider the matters at issue, but failed to effect an adjustment, and despite the fact that the town wished to get rid of him, Mr. Morton continued to preach until 1767. He continued to reside in Blandford thereafter, and died there in 1793, aged seventy-nine. Rev. Joseph Patrick succeeded him in June, 1772, and of him it is related that at his ordination he was publicly reproved by the Presbytery for having ridden from an adjoining town on a Sabbath evening. Mr. Patrick was, after a brief season, dismissed the following December.

There was no regular preaching thereafter until 1787, when Joseph Badger was installed. He was dismissed in 1800, and went as a missionary to Ohio. John Keep, a graduate of Yale, served from 1805 to 1821. Dorus Clarke was installed in 1823, and continued to be the pastor until 1835. Charles J. Hinsdale took charge in 1836, and remained the pastor about twenty years. The present pastor is Rev. Aaron W. Fields. The congregation numbers 75 members. The present church building, which is located at Blandford Centre, was erected in 1822, and is an ornamental as well as a substantial edifice.

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF BLANDFORD

is said to have originated in the "unconditional election" doctrine preached by Mr. Badger, pastor of the Congregational Church. Many of the members of the latter, who objected to that doctrine, withdrew and formed the Episcopal Church.

Although they enjoyed occasional preaching, they had no church edifice until 1830, when they erected one on the road to Chester, about a mile and a half from Blandford Centre. This church building stood until 1870, when it was torn down, the society having dwindled away to such small proportions, fifteen years before, that no regular services were maintained. A remnant of this society still exists. The last sermon delivered in the church was preached by a Rev. Mr. Jones, who, when he left, stole the communion-service, and shortly thereafter—about twenty years ago—murdered a peddler on the highway, near Russell. For this last crime he was hung.

A BAPTIST SOCIETY

was organized in 1826, and for several years thereafter listened to the preaching of Rev. Charles A. Turner. The society never owned a church edifice, and, although there are still a few members who hold occasional meetings, they have had no preaching since 1848.

THE FIRST METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

was erected at North Blandford in 1845. It has prospered fairly since that time, and is at present in charge of Rev. W. T. Miller, the pastor also of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Blandford Centre. This latter society, now numbering about 70 members, has a fine church edifice. It was organized in 1846, and in the following year built a church.

A small Methodist Episcopal Society, dating its organization back well-nigh a century and a quarter, has its existence in the south part of the town, known as Beach Hill, but has no preaching.

SCHOOLS.

Naturally, the town possessed in its early days limited educational advantages, and it was not until 1756 that favorable public action touching schools was taken, it having been voted in 1755 not to support a school. It was then voted "to grant three pounds to Be Layed out to Hyre a school-master." The first regular school was taught by James Carter, an ex-sea-captain, in the house of Robert Black. In 1758 it was voted "to Hiar a School Deame, and to Dispurs the five pounds, and two pounds more, Granted by the General Court, to Defra the charges." In 1762 the town was divided into three school districts, and three school-houses were erected. One of these was near the house of George Cline, one near the residence of Henry Wilson, and the third near where Stanton Clark lived in 1850. In 1802 thirteen school districts were created, which is the present number.

In 1805, Widow Jane Taggart bequeathed to the Third School District $1200 for educational purposes, and that sum by judicious investment had, in 1878, increased to $2400.

Among the college students furnished by Blandford in her early history, the first was Eli, son of Deacon Samuel Boies. He entered Yale in 1788, but died before completing his course. William, son of David Boies, graduated at Williams College in 1801. There also, in 1807, graduated Joseph, another son of David Boies. Patrick Boies, son of Reuben Boies, Sr., graduated at Williams in 1808. Artemas, son of David Boies, graduated at Williams in 1816. Gardner, son of Joel Hayden, graduated at Williams the same year. J. H. Ashmun, son of Eli P. Ashmun, graduated at Williams in 1813. Hon. George Ashmun, his brother, graduated at Yale in 1823. Lester, son of John Lloyd, graduated at Williams in 1814. BURIAL-PLACES.

There are in the town five burial-places, of which, however, the ground in Blandford Centre is the most ancient, for here rest many of the earliest of the pioneers. Many of the tombstones are so old that their inscriptions are utterly defaced, while others still bear in legible characters the records which were placed thereupon fully a century and a quarter ago. The oldest slab bears in roughly-cut characters the letters "H. M., 1742," but whose grave it marks no one knows. The next in point of age is that of Grace, wife of James Baird, and bears date 1746. Others are noted as follows:

INDUSTRIES.

The excellent water-power found here in numerous mountain streams was largely utilized twenty-five years ago, when several woolen-mills, paper-mills, tanneries, and other manufactures flourished at North Bloomfield; but these industries proved eventually unremunerative, and now, save the cattle-card factory of Waite & Son, the Diamond Cheese-Factory, and two small tanneries (all at North Blandford), the town has no manufactures. Agriculture is not pursued with either vigor or profit. Hay to a considerable extent is raised, but the production of grain is so limited that large quantities are annually purchased by the farmers for home consumption. The attention of the farmer is chiefly bestowed upon stock-raising and the manufacture of butter and cheese, which he says is more remunerative than tilling the soil. Blandford possesses a thriving agricultural society, which was organized in 1866. The grounds are located in Blandford Centre, and here every year seven or eight surrounding towns contribute handsomely toward the exhibition, which includes a horse- and cattle-show, and a general agricultural display. The total assessed valuation of the town in 1878 was $336,793, of which $251,135 was on real estate. The State, county, and town tax for 1878 was $6927.40, or at the rate of .0189 on the dollar. The dwelling-houses in the town number 213; the farms, 215. The value of manufactured products in 1875 was $33,525, and of agricultural and domestic products $163,856.

GRANVILLE.

GEOGRAPHICAL.

GRANVILLE, one of the southwestern towns of Hampden, lying on the eastern part of one of the Green Mountain ranges, is a region of hills, occasionally broken by fertile valleys. Its boundaries are Blandford and Russell on the north, the Connecticut State line on the south, Southwick on the east, and Tolland on the west. It has an area of 23,650 acres, of which a large portion is valuable woodland. Southwick village, about five miles from Granville Corners, is the nearest railway station. Westfield village, the market for Granville, is nine miles from the "Corners."

NATURAL FEATURES.

By reason of its elevated situation, Granville is a region whose atmosphere is remarkably pure and healthful; in witness whereof it may be cited that the town has always been noted for the remarkable longevity attained by many of its inhabitants. An early sanitary record remarks that during a period of fifty years, between 1760 and 1810, one out of every thirty of the inhabitants reached the age of ninety.

The highest eminence in the town is Winchell's Mountain in the south, which rises 1362 feet above the sea-level. Other noted elevations are Sodom Hill on the east, Bald Mountain, Bad-Luck Mountain (the latter so named by a party of unsuccessful hunters), Liberty Hill (where a liberty-pole was erected during the Revolution), South Mountain, and Prospect Hill. Mountain-streams, possessing excellent water-power, which is, however, but little used, are numerous. The largest of these is Valley Brook, which rises in the north and flows south nearly through the centre of the town. The fruitful valley through which this stream passes is known as Grand Valley, and divides East and West Granville. Other mentionable streams are Hubbard's and Pond's Brooks in the southwest, and Dickinson's and Tillison's Brooks in the east. The hills of Granville afford scenic views of great beauty and interest, even in this favored part of Massachusetts, where Nature seems to have displayed her most skillful handiwork. From Winchell's Mountain a view, it is claimed, may be had on a clear day of forty church-steeple in the valley of the Connecticut.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

In 1686 the tract now occupied by Granville and Tolland was possessed by Toto, an Indian chief, who, in that year, sold it to one James Cornish for a gun and 16 brass buttons. Cornish disposed of a portion of his interest to William Fuller, and in 1713 they transferred the entire property to Atherton Mather, who, in turn, disposed of his purchase to a company of proprietors in 1718. This last purchase was not confirmed by the General Court until 1739. The original tract in question was fifteen miles in length, seven miles wide at the western end, five miles wide on the east, and covered an area of about 41,200 acres. The proprietors' records being lost, many facts incident to the early settlement are now unobtainable. Although the purchase of the proprietors was not confirmed until 1739, settlers began to locate as early as 1736. The pioneer was Samuel Bancroft, of West Springfield, who, with his family, moved hither in 1736. Previous to this time, and up to the year 1754, when Granville was incorporated, the place was known as Bradford. Mr. Bancroft is yet referred to as the patriarch of Granville, and stories are still extant telling how he used to inspire reverential awe among his neighbors each Sunday morning with his antique dress, triangular cocked hat, and great bushy wig. His wife was Sarah White, a descendant of one of the Plymouth Fathers. The cellar of the first house he built in the town is still to be seen in the northeast section. It is said that during the first fifty years of the present century as many as 89 persons bearing his name resided in East Granville. Following Mr. Bancroft closely came Daniel Cooley, Jonathan Rose, Samuel Gillet, Thomas Spelman, John Root, Ephraim Monson, Phineas Pratt, Thomas Brown, Jabez Dunham, Peter Gibbons, Jonathan Church, Asa Seymour, Timothy, Noah, Daniel, and Phineas Robinson, Ebenezer and Amos Baldwin, Aaron, Ebenezer, and Daniel Curtis, Samuel Coe, David, Daniel, and Levi Parsons, John Bates, and David Clark. The early settlers in the western part of the town—now Tolland—have been treated of in the history of the latter town.

As nearly as can be ascertained, Samuel Bancroft had but one son, Jonathan, whose descendants are still living. Jonathan's three sons were Lemuel, Ethan, and Samuel, all of whom are dead. Lemuel had a son, Lemuel, Jr., who died in the far West; a son, White, who is dead, leaving a son, Levi, who resides in Westfield; a son, Ethan, who was killed by a horse early in life; and a daughter, who married a Mr. Root, of Westfield. Samuel had a son, Barbour, who is dead, and whose son, Benjamin, lives in Granville, N. Y.; a son, Samuel, Jr., and another son, both of whom reside in Ohio. Ethan had two sons, Bela and Alpheus, the latter leaving a son, James, now living in Granville. Ethan had also three daughters. One married Mr. Justus Rose, and died in Granville; another is Mrs. Elisha Brown, of Buffalo, N. Y.; the third married Mr. George Chandler, and died in Westfield.

Jonathan Rose, who was burned to death at the age of one hundred and three, had three sons,—Sharon, Daniel, and Timothy. The latter served as a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and after the close of the war earned some distinction by conducting a colony of settlers from Granville, Mass., to Granville, Ohio, where he became one of the judiciary, and died in 1815. Sharon had a large family, consisting of Giles, Sharon, Jr., Peter, Oliver, Dwyer, Mercy, Ruth, and Abigail. The descendants of Jonathan Rose now living in Granville are Isaac, Justus, Patrick, Salem P., Jephtha, James, Emerson, and Miles.

Thomas Gillet's sons were Frederick, Thomas, and George; his daughters, Mollie, who married Josiah Kent, and died in Southwick; and Sybil, who married Lot Clark, and died in Granville. The sons are all dead,—Frederick having left a son, Thomas, now living in Suffield, Conn.; Thomas having had no children, and George having left a son, John, now living in Westfield.

The only descendant of Ezra Marvin living in Granville is Eleazer, whose father, William, was a son of Ezra. All of William's brothers removed to Genesee, N. Y., early in life. Mrs. Harmon Coulton, of Granby, Conn., is one of William's daughters. A son, Jackson, lives in Westfield. William's widow still lives in Granville, at the age of eighty.

Of the Bates, Grangers, Harveys, and Hatches, no descendants are living in Granville. Apropos of old Josiah Hatch, it is related that, driving to church one slippery day in winter, he found his horse unable to make much headway up a steep hill. "Well," exclaimed Josiah, "if this is the way to heaven, I'm not going," and, utterly disgusted, he turned his horse about and drove home. He once angrily remarked to his son Jonas, "I believe you're a son of the devil." "Yes," said Jonas, "I've always thought that." "But," said the old man, catching the point, "I mean by the way of your mother."

Asa Seymour had five sons,—Alexander, still residing in Granville, at the age of ninety; Arden, William, Asa, Jr., and Deming, all dead; and Elijah, now living in Granville. Of his three daughters, Abigail married Timothy Gibbons, and died in Granville; Laura married Buel Spelman, and died in Ohio; Ruby married Wells Gibbons, and died in New York. Asa, Jr., had two sons,—Alfred, now dead, and Noble, living in Ohio. Mila, one of the daughters of Asa, Jr., married Silas Rose, and died in Cabotville, Mass.; Eliza, another daughter, lives in Springfield, Mass. Alexander's son, Edward, lives in Granville; Frank, a second son, is dead. One of Alexander's daughters is Mrs. Simon N. Henry, of Granville. His other daughters, Jane, Abigail, and Calista, married and went West. Arden's son, James, lives in Granville, and another, Augustus, resides in Bloomfield, Conn.; John, a third son, is dead. Of his daughters, Laura married a Mr. Curtis, and lives in Ohio; a second daughter married Chauncey Newberry, and died in Bloomfield, Conn.; Susan married Rev. Mr. Newton, a missionary, and resides in the West. Five of William's sons are living,—Collins, in Suffield, Conn.; Asa, in Granville; Milton, in Pennsylvania; Harvey, in Connecticut; and Marshal, in the far West. Thirza, one of William's daughters, married and removed to Michigan, where she died; Ellen, a second daughter, is Mrs. Wm. Roberts, of Granville. Elijah, fifth son of Asa, the elder, has one son, Stephen, a lawyer in Springfield. A daughter, Clarissa, died when young. Deming, the youngest son of Asa, the elder, married Corinthia Gibbons, and removed to Ohio early in life.

Oliver Phelps, an early settler, was at one time during the Revolutionary struggle a commissary in Granville, charged with the furnishing of provisions for the army. He performed his task so well that Washington is said to have written him a letter saying: "The comfort and even the life of the American army is owing to the seasonable supply of provisions from your hands, for which accept my grateful acknowledgments." In company with Nathaniel Gorham he purchased the Genesee Country* in New York, opened it for settlement, afterward represented a New York district in Congress, and died in Canandaigua, N. Y., at a ripe old age.

Of the living descendants of Oliver Phelps none can be traced. Eli resided in Blandford, where he died. Mrs. Dr. Wright, who died in that place some years ago, was likewise a descendant, as was Mrs. Joseph Parsons, who died in Granville. Another descendant was a Mrs. Baker, who some years since lived in Connecticut.

Lemuel Haynes, a colored man, who, at the age of twenty-seven, was licensed to preach the gospel, and afterward became nationally famous as "the great colored preacher," was brought up in Granville by Deacon David Rose. He preached extensively in various parts of the country, and after a life of much usefulness died in Granville, N. Y., in 1833, aged eighty.

Peter Gibbons, one of Granville's earliest settlers, died in 1824 at the age of ninety-four. His children were Peter, Lemuel, Bildad, Timothy, Eli, Jedediah, Elizabeth (who died unmarried), Mary and Sarah (who died young), Sarah (who married Joseph De Wolf and went to Ohio), Mary (who married Benoni Battles and died in Ohio), and Hannah (who died unmarried). Of the sons, Peter, the eldest, removed to New York with all his children, save Hannah, who died in Granville many years ago. Lemuel, the second son, had a daughter Amelia, who married a Mr. Messenger, of Granby, Conn.; a son William, who removed to Granville, O., and two sons, Lemuel, Jr., and Larkin, who settled in Pennsylvania. Bildad, the third son, had thirteen children. His only living descendants in Granville are Linus O. and Orlando W. Timothy, the fourth son, had Timothy, Jr., Datus and Alpheus; all dead. A daughter Elizabeth is Mrs. Reuben Ranney, residing in Elizabeth, N. J., aged ninety-one. Another daughter (Affie) married Samuel Spelman, and died in Granville. Another daughter was Samuel Spelman's second wife, and died in Granville. A son Lucius is still living in Granville, aged eighty-five, and has residing with him two children, Orson F. and Elizabeth D. Eli, the fifth son of Peter, the elder, had Sophia, who died unmarried; Timothy W., who died in Franklin, N. Y.; Lucy, who married Eliachim Pomeroy, and died in Suffield, Conn.; Polly, who married Timothy Hoag, and died in Montgomery, Mass.; Naney, who married Timothy E. Botsford, and lives in Akron, O.; Ruhanna, who married Adijah Dibble, and died in Granby, Conn.; Eli, who lives in Franklin, N. Y.; John G., who died in Franklin; Sarah Jane, who died young; Henry B., who died in Newport, N. Y.; and Decatur, who died in Springfield, Mass. Jedediah, the youngest son of Peter, the elder, had Carlos, whose son, J. M., is the town clerk of Granville; another son, Martin T., resides in Granville; another son lives in Westfield; another son, Edwin, died in Kansas. Damaris, a daughter of Carlos, married Lucius Gibbons, and died in Granville; Phylura, another daughter, married James Gibbons, and died in Granville; Amorette married Israel Godard, and resides in Bridgeport, Conn.; Hiram died in Hartland, Conn. (the latter's son, Monroe, lives in Springfield; another son, Watson E., lives in Hartland, Conn.). Eliza, a daughter of Carlos, married William Standard, of Granby, Conn., and died there; Jedediah, a son of Carlos, lives in Hartland, Conn.

Of the descendants of the Parsons, Israel, living in Boston, Mrs. Enoch Root, of Westfield, and Mrs. Orson F. Gibbons, of Granville, are grandchildren of Israel, whose daughter Thirza resides in Hartford, Conn., unmarried. One of his daughters, Elmira, married James Cooley and died in Granville; another daughter, Mrs. Caleb Rice, died in Springfield; another daughter married a Mr. Marvin and died in New York. Ezra M., a son, removed to Rochester; Alsop, another son, died unmarried; and Marshfield, another son, removed to New York. Hon. Anson W. Parsons, who resided in Philadelphia in 1850, and served with distinction as a State Senator in Pennsylvania, and an eminent member of the judiciary in that State, was born in Granville in 1799.

Daniel Cooley, with his brothers William, Clark, and George, settled in Granville about 1741. William's son Timothy was for fifty-nine years the pastor of the Congregational Church at East Granville. Two of Timothy's daughters, Jane and Mrs. Calvin Martin (widow of Judge Martin, of Pittsfield), reside in Granville. James P. Cooley, of the firm of Noble & Cooley, Granville, is a grandson of Rev. Timothy, as is Timothy M. Cooley, of Westfield. The descendants of Clark living in Granville are Zadoek F., Harmon, and Luman. Neither George nor Daniel left any descendants.

Thomas Spelman's sons were Aaron, Stephen, Charles, Daniel, Timothy, and Eber. His daughters, Mary, who married James Coe; Eliza, who married Samuel Bancroft; and Martha, who married Abel Tillotson. Aaron, the elder son, had one son, Elijah, and three daughters, one of whom married Claudius L. Collins, and moved to Connecticut; another married Shem Truman, and removed to Vermont; and the third married Asahel Graves, and went to New York. Elijah, Aaron's son, was thrice married. By his first wife he had thirteen children; his second wife had six children when he married her, and by her he had four more; his third wife had eight children when he married her. Elijah's living descendants are,—Solon, a son, residing in Westfield; Chapman and Levi T., sons, in Granville; William H., a grandson, in Granville; Mrs. Lemuel J. Bancroft, a daughter, in Castile, N. Y.; Mrs. George Lewis, a daughter, in East Granby, Conn.; Mrs. L. V. Elliott, a daughter, in Penn Yan, N. Y.; and Mrs. D. Stanford, a daughter, in Elizabeth, N. J. None of the descendants of Stephen, the second son of Thomas, the elder, are living in Granville. The only descendant in Granville of Charles, the third son, is Mrs. Leeson Brown, a granddaughter. Daniel, the fourth son, was one of a band of counterfeiters who, in 1770, occupied a cave in Granville, where they manufactured spurious coin and passed it off on the Indians. Daniel was captured and lodged in jail, whence he escaped, and settled in Providence, R. I., where he raised a large family. After an absence of forty years he returned to Granville, where he died at the age of ninety, never having been troubled more with reference to his counterfeiting proclivities. Timothy, the fifth son, removed early with his family to Granville, Ohio. Eber, the sixth son, removed at an early period to Stafford, Conn. One of his sons, Solomon C., is a court errier in Springfield, and another, Sylvester, a physician in Ohio.

* This great tract, known as the "Phelps and Gorham Purchase," contained 2,600,000 acres, covering the greater portion of Allegany, Livingston, Monroe, Ontario, Schuyler, Steuben, Wayne, and Yates Counties in New York. It was purchased of the State of Massachusetts.

The only descendants of John Root in Granville are Jacob and John, sons of Silas and grandsons of Amos.

Of the Dickinsons, Beville C. and his three sons, Ethan, Otis, and Lester, are living in Granville. Of the Barlows living in Granville are Heman, aged eighty-seven, a grandson of Edmund Barlow, an early settler. There is also at Granville Edmund B., a great-grandson of Edmund.

Rev. Gordon Hall, who died a missionary in India in 1826, was born in Granville in 1784.

Hon. Isaac C. Bates, three times chosen to Congress from his native district, was born in Granville in 1779. He died at Northampton in 1847, aged sixty-eight.

Hon. John E. Mills, a resident of Montreal, Canada, from 1815 to 1847, and mayor of that city, was born in Granville in 1797.

Gamaliel S. Olds, an eminent scholar and divine, who died in Ohio in 1848, was born in Granville in 1777.

REVOLUTIONARY REMINISCENCES.

July 11, 1774, the town selected as a committee "to inspect the debate between the mother-country and the inhabitants of America," Messrs. Timothy Robinson, Luke Hitchcock, Oliver Phelps, Josiah Harvey, Samuel Bancroft, Nathan Barlow, and John Hamilton.

The resolutions subsequently reported by the committee and adopted by the district were as follows:

"1. Resolved, That King George III. is our rightful sovereign and king, and that we will at all times bear all allegiance due unto him.

"2. That the inhabitants of this, his Majesty's Province, and the other colonies in America, are justly entitled to all the rights, liberties, and privileges that the inhabitants of Great Britain are entitled to, which rights, liberties, and privileges are in a particular manner confirmed to the inhabitants of this Province by charter, and that we would humbly request and confidently challenge these rights, liberties, and privileges to us belonging, as free and natural born English subjects.

"3. That it is our opinion that the aforesaid acts of Parliament [Stamp Act, etc.] are calculated to perplex and enslave this, his Majesty's free and loyal province, and are destructive of our invaluable liberties and privileges; and have a manifest tendency to alienate the affections of his Majesty's faithful subjects, and are in the highest degree oppressive and unconstitutional.

"4. That in order to obtain redress from the difficulties and calamities in which we are so deeply involved by the aforesaid acts of Parliament, it is our opinion that a more uniform and constitutional redress be agreed upon, for a universal rule to be observed throughout all the colonies, the construction of which we refer to the wisdom of the General American Congress, soon to meet. And we would humbly offer to their consideration, that it is our opinion that a suspension of all commerce with Great Britain, under proper regulations, and a covenant engagement of non-importation and non-consumption of their manufactures, to be solemnly subscribed by the people, will be the most likely means to produce the desired effect. And that such non-importation and non-consumption agreement is neither unwarrantable, hostile, nor treacherous, or contrary to our allegiance due to our king; and that it is the indisposable duty of every person who would reserve to himself and posterity the inestimable blessing of liberty, by all constitutional ways and means in his power, to endeavor to avert the much-dreaded consequences of those arbitrary and oppressive acts.

"5. That we greatly applaud the patriotic zeal of the merchants and other inhabitants of Boston, and especially the vigilance and assiduity of their committee of correspondence; and although we approve of the sentiment and spirit of their covenant presented to us to subscribe, yet we are of opinion that the same is rather premature and too precipitate, as it is a matter of the utmost importance to the British American colonies, and requires the most serious consideration, fearing it will breed discord among the inhabitants, and that a division of sentiment may be destructive of the good effect. We propose, therefore, and rather choose to defer the subscription thereto, but wait the determination of the American Congress. And do, as christians, promise and pledge our faith, that whatever constitutional determination and resolves shall be agreed upon and published by them, as a general rule of observance by all the provinces, we will subscribe to, and in all particulars abide by. A faithful adherence to this, we make no doubt, may be the happy means to reduce the ministry to a sense of their duty, and restore unto us our rights, and harmoniously unite us to our mother-country, and be the lengthening out of the tranquillity of the British Empire.

"6. That we do abhor all unconstitutional riots and tumultuous assaults upon the person or estate of any one who is personally in the execution of his own lawful business, but will, to the utmost of our power, endeavor that peace and good order be maintained.

"7. That there be a committee of correspondence to correspond with other committees in this and the neighboring colonies, and give due information of all infringements upon our rights and liberties.

"8. That a letter of construction be written by the Committee of Correspondence, in behalf of this district, to the inhabitants of the town of Boston, to assure them of our firm attachment to the common cause, and promise faithful assistance in all constitutional ways, to encourage to a firm and steadfast perseverance in all the ways of well doing."

Upon the reception of the alarm from Lexington, Granville mustered a company of 60 men and sent them promptly forward, under Capt. Lebbeus Ball, whose first lieutenant was Lemuel Bancroft, of Southwick. To this company the district gave the sum of £1 for each man "as an encouragement." Another company of 73 men, sent out early in 1776, belonged to the 5th Massachusetts Regiment, commanded by Col. John Mosely, of Westfield. The officers of the company were William Cooley, Captain; Edmund Barlow, First Lieutenant; Samuel Bancroft, Jr., Second Lieutenant; Richard Dickinson, Joel Strong, and Samuel Williams, Sergeants; Joel Bancroft, Clerk; Samuel Stiles, Drummer; Timothy Spelman, Fifer; and John Cooley, Thomas Gillet, and James Coe, Corporals. The company was equipped with 73 guns, 2 bayonets, 4 swords, 680 flints, and 5½ pounds of powder. Fourteen of Granville's citizens are said to have perished in the service,—among them being Isaac Chapman, who fell at Ticonderoga, Deacon Luke Hitchcock (who died en route to his home from the army, and was buried at Springfield), Enos Howe, and John Bartlett. The latter was a private in Capt. Cooley's company, and at the battle of White Plains he was cut down by a cavalryman, and his head so cleft in twain that the two parts thereof fell over upon his shoulders.

Granville performed a patriotic part in the trying days of the Revolution, and raised men and money for the service without stint, while the families of those who went into the war were provided by the district with comfortable support during the respective terms of each soldier's enlistment.

Upon the declaration of war against Great Britain in 1812, a resolution was passed "to petition Congress to avert the calamities of war and restore the nation to peace;" and one also "to present a remonstrance to Congress against an alliance with France." It was also determined "to choose a delegate to meet in county convention in Northampton, July 14, 1812, to take into consideration the alarming situation of our country, and to make such representation thereon as shall be thought proper." David Curtis was chosen to represent the district at the convention.

NOTEWORTHY INCIDENTS.

In the days of the early settlement there was much grave apprehension touching probable Indian troubles, although the settlement passed happily unscathed through the exciting periods of Indian depredations in Western Massachusetts, between the years 1744 and 1760. Timely precautions were taken by the inhabitants to guard against dangers from the savages. The first fort was built by Samuel Bancroft, in 1744, and the second, shortly after the erection of Mr. Bancroft's, by Deacon David Rose. Deacon Rose's fort, which was also his residence, was built of stone, and was the first house erected in that part of Granville now called Tolland. These forts afforded many of the settlers havens of safety whenever the near approach of Indians threatened danger, but, as before noted, no very serious demonstration was ever made in this direction by the savages.

Four of Granville's citizens who served in the last French war were tent-mates during the campaign, and returning together to Granville at the close of the war, died there many years afterwards at the respective ages of eighty-two, eighty-six, eighty-nine and ninety.

Mention has already been made of the fact that many of the early settlers lived to be very old, and in this connection it may be remarked that many of them met with accidental deaths. Samuel Gillet, the first person to die in the place, dropped dead one day while at work in his field. Samuel Bancroft, the pioneer settler, retired to rest at night in full health, and was found dead in his bed the next morning. Jonathan Rose, who lived to be one hundred and three years old, became deranged shortly before his death, and, for safe-keeping, was confined in the dwelling of one of his relatives. The building took fire one day, and Rose, being alone therein, perished in the flames. Ephraim Monson was scalded to death, Daniel Cooley, another early settler, died of an accidental wound, and Asa Burt was killed by the fall of a tree.

ORGANIZATION.

Granville was incorporated as a district Jan. 25, 1754, and under the act of 1786 became a town in the latter year, although, singularly enough, representatives were sent to the General Court as early as 1775. The district was named in honor of John Carteret, Earl of Granville, although some of the old residents believe that the name was suggested by the Grand Valley, so called, that marks the dividing-line between East and West Granville.

The territory incorporated in 1754 measured 15 miles in length by about 6 in width. In 1810 a considerable tract on the west was set off and incorporated as the town of Tolland. Unfortunately for the purposes of history, the proprietors' records antedating 1754, and the district and town records between the years 1754 and 1797, and again between 1830 and 1859, have been lost or destroyed. The following list of the persons who have served as selectmen and town clerks will therefore be found to include only those who served from 1797 to 1830 and from 1859 to 1879:

VILLAGES.

The villages in Granville are three in number.

EAST GRANVILLE,

the site of the earliest settlement, was originally called by that name, and here, as may be imagined, occurred the incidents with which the early history of the town is connected. Here is a church, a post-office, the town-hall, a store, and a collection of about forty neat and thrifty-looking dwellings, which, in some cases, betoken moderate wealth. An old tavern-building, once a popular hostelry, has outlived its usefulness in that respect, and is occupied as a private dwelling.

WEST GRANVILLE,

originally called Middle Granville,—when what is now Tolland was West Granville,—is a pleasantly-located village, four miles west of East Granville, and contains, besides about thirty dwellings, a store, hotel, post-office, a church, and an excellent school called "The Academy." In both these villages agriculture is the chief support of the inhabitants.

GRANVILLE CORNERS,

known commonly as Jockey Corners, nestles under the high hill upon which East Granville stands, and is removed about a mile distant eastward from the latter place. It contains a population of perhaps 300, and, in a business sense, is the most important village in the town, here being located two extensive drum-factories elsewhere referred to. There are also two churches, a hotel, post-office, two stores and other minor business interests. It has been a thriving village for many years, and bids fair to hold that course for time to come.

CHURCHES.

A CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

was organized about 1747, at what is now East Granville, and soon after, in the same year, a church edifice was erected about a mile west of the village. The first pastor, Rev. Moses Tuttle, was ordained in that year, and preached until 1754. He was succeeded, in 1756, by Rev. Jedediah Smith, an earnest preacher, under whose ministrations a strong revival set in, in 1757, when upward of 30 new members were received into church fellowship. Later, he sought to inculcate the Stoddard doctrine into the minds of his people, and the opposition he encountered created much dissension, and the withdrawal of many members. Despite his troublous experience, he remained the pastor until early in 1776, when his hostility to the Revolutionary cause compelled his retirement and removal from the town.

During the interval between 1776 and 1795 the church was without a regular pastor. In the latter year, Rev. Timothy M. Cooley, a native of Granville, was ordained, and served through an extended pastorate of fifty-nine years, until 1854, when, in his eighty-third year, he was, at his own request, relieved from his ministerial labors. Shortly after his ordination, the church raised a permanent fund of $5600 for the support of the ministry, and upon Mr. Cooley's retirement it was voted that he should have one-half the annual income of the fund during the remainder of his life.

Upon the completion of Mr. Cooley's fiftieth year in the service of the church, in 1845, the event was handsomely celebrated in Granville by a joyful jubilee, on which occasion the inhabitants erected in the village of East Granville a neat stone monument, which still stands, and which will long continue to stand as a reminder of the important incident. The church had, in 1879, a membership of 75, at which period the pastor in charge was Rev. Nelson Scott.

A new church building—the present one—was erected in the village of East Granville in 1802, in which year the old one, built in 1747, was taken down.

THE SECOND CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

was organized in 1781, in what is now West Granville, and, although a pastor—Rev. Aaron J. Booge—was ordained in 1786, no church edifice was built until 1788. This structure, having from time to time been repaired and improved, is still in use. Mr. Booge, although popular at first, fell into disfavor after a time, and when, in 1786, he was dismissed, the church was somewhat disorganized. His successor—Rev. Joel Baker, who was ordained in 1797—had a somewhat similar experience. His ministry was, for thirty years after his ordination, a remarkably peaceful one; but after that, for some unknown cause, opposition to him began to manifest itself, and this, it is said, so preyed upon his mind that he fell into a physical decline, and with his death, in 1832, closed his labors in the church. Among his successors were Revs. Seth Chapin, Henry Eddy, Calvin Foote, and Henry B. Smith. The church, which had, in 1879, a membership of about 70, was in charge of Rev. J. C. Alvord.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH

was the outgrowth of dissensions in the First Congregational Church by reason of the adoption of the Stoddard doctrine. Its broad principles offended many, and, withdrawing about 1760, they held meetings of their own for many years thereafter, styling themselves "Separatists." In 1791 they organized a Baptist Church at what is now called Granville Corners, and there, in 1800, built a house of worship. The church flourished with much vigor from this date forward, and in 1808 had a membership of 88. Only occasional preaching was enjoyed until 1798, when Elder Miner was called to the charge, in which he remained until 1816. His successor—Rev. Silas Root—preached from 1817 until his death, in 1846. The pastor in 1879 was Rev. Daniel Dearborn, and in that year the membership was about 90. The first church building, which was, in 1848, replaced by the present structure, is now used as the parsonage.

A UNIVERSALIST CHURCH was organized at Granville Corners in 1863, and in the same year a house of worship was erected. The membership is about 25, but there is at present no regular pastor, preaching being supplied from time to time as it can be obtained.

SCHOOLS.

Although the district doubtless bestirred itself previous to that date in the matter of schools, it is supposed that the first appropriation made for the advancement of education was in the year 1762, when £20 were raised for the purpose. The loss of the early records renders it impossible to say when the first school-house was built or who was the first school-teacher. The system of public education in Granville has always been a liberal one, and now (in 1879) the apportionment of the town into eleven school districts testifies that that liberal spirit has not been suffered to weaken. There is at Granville Corners an excellent graded school, which employs the services of two teachers, and which is highly esteemed in the community. Granville has contributed a considerable number of college graduates, of whom mention is here made of the following: Rufus Harvey, Timothy M. Cooley, Elijah Bates, Stephen Twining, Truman Baldwin, Isaac C. Bates, Roger C. Hatch, David B. Coe, David B. Curtis, Seth M. Leavenworth, Gordon Hall, Lorrin C. Hatch, John Seward, Harvey Coe, Chas. F. Bates, Chas. S. Robinson, Thomas Twining, Timothy C. Cooley, Augustus Pomeroy, David L. Coe, James Cooley, Curtis P. Baker, Joseph I. Foot, Wm. Webster, Gurdon S. Stebbins, John C. Terrett, George Foot, Louis E. Root, Junius H. Hatch, Benson Baldwin, David L. Root.

BURIAL-PLACES.

Of the five burying-grounds in the town, one is at Granville Corners, two are at East Granville, and two at West Granville. The oldest one is found at East Granville, near where the first Congregational Church was built in 1747, about a mile west of the village centre. The first person buried there was Samuel Gillet, who died in 1739, and who is supposed to have been the first person who died in what is now Granville. No headstone marks his resting-place, and it may also be remarked that many of those set up previous to 1760 have been either destroyed or have lost their inscriptions through the erosions of time. The oldest inscriptions now legible are given as follows:

Samuel Wheeler, Jr., 1758; Elsa Wheeler, 1758; Smith Miller, 1759; Ruth Rose, 1759; Sarah Pratt, 1757; — Coe, 1759; Annie Barlow, 1755; Isaac Dowd, 1761; Nathaniel Hubbard, 1762; Lydia Stow, 1761; Olive Tibbitts, 1762; Seth Coe, 1760; — Coe, 1762; Job Stiles, Jr., 1766; Martha Barlow, 1765; Nancy Smith, 1769; Asa Burt, 1774; Sarah Bancroft, 1777; Lydia Stiles, 1779; Louden Dickinson, 1772; Hannah Dickinson, 1778; Sarah, wife of Phineas Pratt, 1777; Phineas Pratt, 1770; Eliza, wife of David Rose, 1775; Hiram, son of Gerard Pratt, 1777; Phoebe, wife of Aaron Coe, 1774; three daughters of Lemuel Bancroft, 1775 and 1776; James Barlow, 1777; Zoviar, daughter of Thos. Gillet, 1783; Samuel Bancroft, 1788, aged seventy-seven; Statira, daughter of Eber Spelman, 1781; Eliza, wife of Aaron Spelman, 1786; Eliachim Stow, 1789, aged eighty-two; Asahel Clark, 1784, aged sixty-five; Lewman, son of Daniel Cooley, 1786; Daniel Cooley, 1782; Phineas Tinker, 1782; Reuben Rose, 1783; Justus Rose, 1781; Eliza, wife of Abimaz Reed, 1791; Thomas Spelman, 1790; Alsop, son of Elihu Stow, 1790; Algenne, daughter of Job Stiles, 1791; James Coe, 1794; Salvana Walworth, 1791; Abigail, wife of Jonathan Church, 1794; Mejarez Dunham, 1796; Oliver, son of Benjamin Waters, 1798; Jasper Marvin, 1797; Margaret, wife of Nathan Barlow, 1791; Thomas Gillet, 1791; Sarah, relict of Samuel Bancroft, 1802, aged eighty-three; Sarah, wife of Thomas Spelman, 1801, aged eighty-five; Catharine, wife of Eliachim Stow, 1801, aged eighty-two.

INDUSTRIES.

The only manufacturing industries of the town—save perhaps a few saw-mills—are located at the village of Granville Corners. Here Noble & Cooley have an extensive drum-factory, in which they employ about sixty workmen, and produce about $50,000 worth of manufactures annually, their product including, besides drums, toys of various kinds. Although the factory is located on Valley Brook, a rapid stream, steam-power is alone used. The woods used in the manufacture of drums are maple, poplar, and bass. Messrs. Noble & Cooley have operated this factory since 1855. About a mile east of the Corners, Hon. Ethan Robinson, the present Representative in the Legislature from this district, has another drum-factory, employing about 15 persons.

Agriculture is scarcely in a flourishing condition. The soil is generally sterile and stony. Farmers prefer to buy their grain, as they say they can do so cheaper than they can raise it. Good grazing-lands are plentiful, and stock-raising, together with a limited production of butter and cheese, are the principal pursuits of the husbandman. Tobacco is grown, but this industry, important here some years ago, is gradually being abandoned. The total assessed valuation of the town in 1877 was $383,795, on which there was a tax of $6077.61, a rate of nearly 16 mills on the dollar. The value of manufactures in 1875 was $65,680, and that of agricultural and domestic products $122,840. The farms number 220, and the dwelling-houses 256.

GEOGRAPHICAL.

SOUTHWICK lies in the second tier of towns to the west of the Connecticut River, and is bounded on the north by Westfield; on the south by the State of Connecticut; on the east by Agawam, in Massachusetts, and Suffield, in Connecticut; and on the west by Granville, in Massachusetts, and Granby, in Connecticut.

The portion of the tract projecting beyond the direct boundary between Massachusetts and Connecticut embraced originally a tract extending as far east as the present line between Southwick and Agawam, being divided nearly in the centre by Congamuck Pond. This tract was in dispute between Connecticut and Massachusetts as late as 1800, and, according to Dr. Holland, the settlement of the dispute was effected as follows: one Roger Moore, living on this tract, being warned to do military duty, refused, whereupon litigation ensued, and the case being presented for adjustment to the Connecticut Legislature, the matter was settled by making the pond the dividing line, those on the west remaining in Massachusetts and those on the east in Connecticut, the decision being rendered in accordance with the wishes of the inhabitants. The area of this projecting tract is equal to about six square miles. The New Haven and Northampton Railroad touches the town on the east, at Southwick village, four miles from the village of Westfield.

NATURAL FEATURES.

The surface in both the east and the west is mountainous, but north and south the land is generally low, the soil being rocky on the elevations and sandy in the lowlands. Although the timber-land has been cleared to a considerable extent there is still an abundance of timber, chief among which may be reckoned oak and chestnut, with numerous other varieties. In the southeast there is a vast pond, or, more properly speaking, four connected ponds, covering a large area, and known as Congamuck Pond. Many years ago an English company undertook, at great expense, to reclaim this tract for cultivation, but the undertaking proving greater than anticipated it was abandoned as impracticable. The only eminence of consequence is Sodom Mountain, in the west, at whose base flows Munn's Brook, the only brook of size in the town. There are in Southwick numerous inviting rural retreats, within pleasant leafy woods, and near the shores of the numerous ponds found within its borders. These retreats are largely visited in the summer by people from adjoining towns, as well as from Southwick itself.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

The settlement of Southwick proper did not begin until 1706, when it was incorporated as a district. Previous to that year it was a portion of Westfield, and a history of the earliest settlements on the tract will necessarily be found in connection with the early history of Westfield. Reference is, however, made to the statement that the first settler on the tract is said to have been Samuel Fowler, who located in 1734, in the north section, on what was known as "Poverty," in compliment to the barrenness of the soil thereabouts.

Among the early settlers were Gideon Stiles, Noah Loomis, Silas Fowler, Abner Fowler, Matthew Laffin, Ephraim Griffin, Israel Perkins, John Kent, William Moore, David Nelson, George Granger, Jas. Smith, John Campbell, Joseph Moore, John Berry, Moses Root, Phineas Southwell, Stephen Sexton, Ephraim Chamberlain, Phineas Perkins, Thomas Hough, Brigham Brown, Isaac Coit, David Ives, Shubel Stiles, Samson French, Doras Stiles, David Fowler, Holcomb Granger, Joseph Forward, Abner Forward, Job Langton, Solomon Stephens, Enos Foot, and John Rockwell.

The greater portion of the descendants of these early settlers are now residing out of Southwick, many of the first generation having responded to more alluring agricultural inducements and "gone West."

From the town records under date October, 1781, it is learned that the settlers in Southwick at that time included David Nelson, David Hastings, Thomas Hanchet, Amos Noble, Gideon Stiles, Benjamin Rising, Jr., George Sexton, Stephen Sexton, Solomon Munsel, Wm. Of the descendants of John Rockwell, Miss Lovica, a daughter, still resides in Southwick, at the age of ninety-two, the oldest person in the town, and the veritable "oldest inhabitant;" Abigail, another daughter, died some years ago; John Tully, a son, removed early to Tioga, Pa.; Uzal, another son (now dead), had sons,—Lawton, who died young; Joseph W., now residing in Southwick; Theron (dead); Owen, living in Westfield; Lawton, living in Boston; and Uzal, Jr., living in Springfield.

Thomas Hough's sons were Ensign, Joel, Horatio, and John, but no descendants thereof are now living in Southwick.

A daughter of Enos Foot, Mrs. John Mills, of Springfield, died a few months ago. His other children died unmarried.

Job Langton's children were Lewis, Charles, Jarvis, Julia, and Catherine. Julia married Orvis Carrington, and removed to Ohio; Catherine married Oliver Utley, and died in Southwick; Jarvis died young; Lewis removed to Kentucky; and Charles is now living in Northampton.

Dr. Isaac Coit, the first physician of the town, died childless.

Anson Stiles, a son of Gideon Stiles, still lives in Southwick.

Joseph Forward's children were Joseph M., Pliny, Robert, George, Polly, Perley, and Catherine. The sons are all dead. Robert died a bachelor; Joseph M. left Homer M. (now dead), Joseph M., and A. J., the two latter still living in Southwick. His daughters were Mrs. B. Y. Butler, of Southwick (now dead), Mary R. (dead), and Mrs. Hinsdale Smith, now living in Springfield. Pliny had one son, Pliny M., now living in Southwick, and three daughters, viz., Mrs. David P. Holton, of New York; Mrs. Thomas Rood, of Westfield; and Mrs. Silas Norton, of Southwick (now dead). George had two sons, Robert and Egbert, and four daughters, Jane, Ruth, Emerett, and Delia. All of these (save Ruth, who is dead) are residing in Ohio.

Matthew Jr. left Roland (now dead), whose son Chuncey lives in Southwick; Winthrop (dead), whose children live in New York; Luther, who lives in Saugerties, N. Y.; Walter, who died in Pittsfield; and Matthew, who lives in Chicago. The daughters of Matthew Jr. were Mrs. Case, of Canton, Conn.; Mrs. Joseph Boies, of Saugerties, N. Y. Field (now living in Southwick).

Noah Loomis drew largely upon the Bible, and named his four sons Noah Jr., Shem, Ham, and Japhet. Noah Jr.'s sons were Noah, Walter, and Russell. Four of Walter's sons—B. B., George, Edward, and Oliver—are now living in Southwick. Ham had ten sons and two daughters. Of these the only one living in Southwick is John W. The living daughters of Walter (above named) are Mrs. Charles M. Phelps, Mrs. Robert Hosmer, and Mrs. Henry Hamilton, all of Westfield. Shem had two sons, Japhet (dead) and Shem, now living in Springfield. Of his daughters, Beckie married Mr. Weatherhy, of Southwick; Pollie married Mr. Stocking,

JOHN BOYLE was born in County Kilkenny, Ireland, Aug. 7, 1803, being the only son of Richard and Ann Boyle. He emigrated with his mother to Canada in 1819, where she died; and he finally removed to Southwick, Mass., in 1826, where he commenced work by the month on the canal then being built between Northampton and New Haven, and he afterward took a contract on the same canal. Has followed the business of railroad construction ever since, having built a part of the Syracuse and Binghamton Railroad, besides working on many of the New England roads. He had no opportunity of receiving even a common-school education. He has been twice married, both of his wives being dead. He has two children by his first wife still living,—Robert and William, both residents of Southwick. He has also one by his second wife living,—Jane E., wife of William W. Phelps, of Southwick. He is a Democrat in politics, and was a member of the State Legislature in 1864. He is a liberal, enterprising, and public-spirited citizen.

RESIDENCE OF JOHN BOYLE, SOUTHWICK, MASS.

SARDIS GILLETT.

We are unable to give many facts in regard to the early history of this gentleman's ancestors, and cannot trace the genealogy of his family farther back than to Seth Gillett, his grandfather, who settled in the town of Southwick about one hundred years ago, and raised a large family of children, of whom Rodolphus was the father of Sardis. He was born Nov. 18, 1771, and married Eunice Cushman, Aug. 11, 1794, she having been born Jan. 1, 1770. They had a family of seven children, viz.: Tacy, Sardis (1st), Sardis (2d), Socrates, Mary, Seth, and Eunice, all of whom lived to maturity except the two eldest. This worthy couple lived to a ripe old age, and died within a few months of each other; Mrs. Gillett passing away Sept. 15, 1849, followed by her husband, Nov. 19, 1849.

Sardis was born in Southwick, Sept. 1, 1798, and passed his early life on his father's farm. He was married, Jan. 14, 1822, to Ursula, adopted daughter of Reuben Clark, of Southwick. She was a native of Connecticut, having been born June 22, 1799. Their family consisted of six children, four of whom are now living, as follows: Sardis Wells, now a resident of Cleveland, Ohio; Harrison Gray Otis, now located at Waterford, Pa.; William Wirt, who dwells on his father's old homestead in Southwick, together with his sister, Kate E.

Politically he was a member of the Republican party; held several offices of trust and honor. He was also a member of the Episcopal Church. During his life he used to tell the story that he had lived in three counties, viz., Hampshire, Hampden, and Hartford, and two States, viz., Massachusetts and Connecticut, without changing his place of residence. After fifty years of married life he was called upon to mourn the death of his wife, who died Oct. 24, 1867. He died Dec. 28, 1878, leaving friends and neighbors to regret his loss, and a large fortune which had been accumulated by years of hard toil.

of Southwick; Thirza married L. B. Platt, of Pittsfield; and Sallie married Mr. Judson, of Springfield.

Of the descendants of Isaac Gillett, Sardis, Charles, and Cratus are now residing at Gillett's Corners, about two miles south of Southwick village.

REVOLUTIONARY REMINISCENCES.

Southwick was true in the stormy days of the Revolution, and upon the alarm from Lexington, in 1775, the town called a meeting, and voted to raise "twenty-five minnet-men," and further that "the minnet-men shall reg their gons upon the town's cost that ant abel to reg their one gons, and the cost to be taken out of their wages." In this year Jonathan Hare was sent as a delegate to the Continental Congress. The first committee of correspondence mentioned in the records was appointed in January, 1776, and was composed of Noah Loomis, Silas Fowler, Wm. Moor, John Kent, Deacon Morton, Solomon Stephens, and Ephraim Griffin. In this year it was resolved "to be an independent state if Congress think proper," by which it was doubtless meant to endorse a declaration of national independence. A bounty of 30s. per man was offered nine men to enlist in the Continental service to go to "Canady," and it was further resolved "to Chus a Comety to borrow the money for the Solgers, provided the truserer Can't Colect it." A vote in 1778 directed "the ofecers, selectmen, and Comety to make a neferge (meaning perhaps an 'effort') in drafting the Continental Solgers." Fifteen pounds bounty per man were given Levi Bradley and Thomas Lesul for enlisting in the service, and shortly thereafter it was voted "to give the three men that Inlest in the Continental Sarves thirty pound Eich." At the same time it was resolved "to git the clothing for the Continental Solgers, viz., Shurts, Stockens, and Shus." The records set forth that about this time John Kent was chosen "vendew" master "to Sel the Stel Sent to the town from ye Bord of War."

In 1780 the town voted not to have Capt. Silas Fowler (in command of a company in the service) go on and draft soldiers for the Continental army, and agreed further to indemnify the officers for all cost that might arise by reason of the town's default in not raising the above men. A committee was also chosen to inquire into the drafting order issued by the General Court, the inference being that the town was not quite satisfied as to the legality of the orders. The resolution to stop the draft was probably rescinded, for directly afterward it was decided to raise only three men out of the six ordered by the General Court, and for these three men it was agreed to pay $1000 each (Continental money) as a bounty, and 20s. per month in addition to the State's wages, in silver money or its value in grain. A record of date 1781 shows that early in that year Southwick had nine soldiers in the Continental army. In December, 1781, an effort was made to raise more three years' soldiers; £45 were raised for soldiers' bounties, and the militia officers were directed to call their men together to see if the three years' soldiers could be obtained.

Previous to this, in 1780, three months' soldiers were offered $500 each, and 20s. per month in silver. Six months' men were offered $1000 bounty, and 20s. per month. Thirty-seven hundred pounds in Continental money, or £93 in new emission, were called for early in 1781 to buy Continental beef, and a committee was chosen to go to the army and inquire into the number and state of the soldiers sent by the town. The beef was bought for £120 per hundred,—more than a pound of money for a pound of beef. The records refer at this time to Gideon Stiles as a lieutenant in the service, and to the fact that Abner Fowler was sent to the Cambridge Congress. The town was fined £28 in 1781 for not raising seven six months' men ordered by the General Court. With a vote in 1781 to raise £15 in silver to pay for five three months' men the town records close their history of the town's action upon matters concerned in the Revolutionary struggle. Upon the close of the war in 1783, the town refused to pay the commutation or five years' pay to Continental officers, as ordered by Congress.

Among the soldiers who went into the war of 1812 from Southwick were Enos Foote, as colonel, and Abraham Rising, Robert Forward, David Noble, Elisha Steer, Benjamin Loundsberry, and Leonard Smith, as privates.

NOTEWORTHY INCIDENTS.

The earliest recorded road in the town was laid out in 1775, between Mr. Forward's land and Jas. Smith's land, "from the County road that leads to the Mills, to the town road that leads to the meeting-house." Twenty pounds were raised for highways in 1776; it was resolved to purchase a grave-cloth, and further resolved to build no bridge over Two-Mile Brook on the county road that "Leds through the Shepaster." In 1776 it was determined "not to have Enoculation sat up," but in the following year it was decided to "set up" the small-pox.

Jonathan Hare was chosen as an agent to "converse with other towns and inquire into the acts of the General Court," and it was voted in December, 1786, that "the Superior Court sha'n't set at Springfield the last Tuesday of this instant." A pound was built in 1777 "by James Smith's house, near the road to Poverty, 40 feet squair." A road was also opened from John Story's to the Simsbury road, and £45 raised for town charges, for which in the following year £368 were appropriated, when a road was laid out from the Simsbury road to Griffin's by the way of Root's marsh.

According to the records, the first person born in what is now Southwick was William, son of George Granger, in 1763; the first marriage that of Joseph Hide and Eunice Gilbert in 1771; the first death that of Samuel Fowler, January, 1771. One of the earliest taverns, if not the first, was kept by Saul Fowler on the site of the present hotel in Southwick village, about 1780, and in the same building also he kept a store. Dr. Isaac Coit, who flourished in Southwick at an early date, was a surgeon in the American army during the Revolution, and was Southwick's first physician, and he served in the town as justice of the peace as well for many years.

In 1779, Southwick voted to have a new State constitution, and in 1782 it was decided that the innholders and retailers of Southwick should not take out a license unless two-thirds of the county should,—referring, no doubt, to the excise act passed by the General Court. But £30 were raised in 1783 for town charges, and in 1786 a road from Granville line to the notch in East Mountain was opened.

The oldest residents of Southwick in January, 1879, were Heaton Granger, aged eighty-eight, and Miss Lovica Rockwell, aged ninety-two. The oldest building in the town is one built by Mr. Fowler, in 1778, in the northern section, and now owned by King Fowler. July 15, 1809, the town was called upon to mourn publicly over a sad calamity whereby four young ladies—Julia Stratton, Mary Langdon, Orpha Cannon, and Charlotte Cannon—were drowned in Congamuck Pond while out for a pleasure sail. The first and only lawyer the town ever had was John Mills, who settled in Southwick about 1815. About the year 1855, Amasa Holecomb manufactured telescopes in Southwick, and achieved in that pursuit some distinction. After being carried on in Southwick until 1875, the business was removed to Springfield. There was a Masonic lodge in Southwick village previous to 1830, but it passed away beneath the anti-Masonic storm that swept over the State at that time.

A curious feature, incident to the geographical changes to which Southwick has been submitted since the early settlement, is related in connection with the will of Roger Moore, who died about 1818. Upon the probate of his will it was shown that he was born in Westfield, Hampshire Co., Mass., subsequently lived in Simsbury, Hartford Co., Conn., later in Granby, Hartford Co., Conn., and died in Southwick, Hampden Co., Mass. Yet in all these changes he never left the place of his birth, although he was during his life a citizen of two States, a voter in four towns, and a resident in three counties. The place he lived on is now known as the Plympton place.

ORGANIZATION.

Originally a portion of Westfield, Southwick (so called from its relative position in the original town) was incorporated as a district in 1770, and as a town in 1779. The records of district-meetings from 1770 to 1775 have been destroyed, and the earliest action of the district officials, as well as the list of the names of the officials themselves between those periods, cannot of course be ascertained. The subsequent records are, however, well preserved, and the names, therefore, of those who have served as selectmen and town clerks from 1775 to the present time are here given:

VILLAGES.

SOUTHWICK.

The only village in the town is the village of Southwick, a station on the New Haven and Northampton Railroad, and very prettily laid out upon a level plain, which rests beneath the shadows of the high hills that range along the town's western border. Here are two churches,—Congregational and Baptist,—a hotel, two stores, a post-office, a town-hall, academy, a powder-mill, grist-mill, and perhaps 75 dwellings. Two miles south of Southwick village there is a settlement known as Gillet's Corners, where there is a church, a cigar-factory, and a small collection of houses. As a rule the residences of the villagers are tasteful in appointments and attractive in surroundings, while the air of wholesome thrift that prevails bespeaks the industrious character of the inhabitants.

CHURCHES.

Although a Congregational Church was organized in 1773, August 17th, the early town records being lost, no mention of town action upon church matters is found until the year 1775, when it was resolved to get Mr. Forward's wood that year by donation. Rev. Abel Forward was the church's first pastor, and was ordained in October, 1773. He died in 1786, after a ministry of thirteen years. The first church building was erected about 1773, about a mile south of what is now Southwick village, near the burying-ground. It was only partially seated at first, for in 1776 it was voted "to mak moor Sets in the meeting-house," and these, with two-horse blocks, Gideon Root and Amos Loomis contracted to make. Amos Loomis was also hired, at 9s. the year, "to sweep the meting-house, and fech water for crising." Mr. Forward's salary was voted, in 1777, to be £30, in country produce: "whet at fore shillings, Rye at three, Indon Corn at two Shillings, and other arteels at the Same Lay." In 1761, Israel Loomis was chosen to keep the keys of the meeting-house, bring water for baptism, and dig graves. This year, Mr. Forward's salary was £70, in hard money. By a town vote, it was decided "to receive that part of Simsbury called Moretown, into all Ecclesiastical matters so far as not to be any bar or hindrance in moving the meeting-house." About this time the subject of building a new church must have been agitated, for at a town-meeting, in 1781, a committee was appointed to find the centre of the town, and a suitable place for a meeting-house. This house was probably erected by 1783, since in that year it was voted to seat the meeting-house. Previously, in 1782, a committee was chosen to go to Moretown, "to see if they will do anything to support the gospel in this town." Mr. Forward was succeeded in 1788 by Rev. Isaac Clinton, a graduate of Yale.

In 1794 the town purchased of the town of Windsor, for the new church, pulpit and canopy (for $6), pews, pulpit-window, gallery-stairs, and breast-work. An instructor in psalmody was also hired, and a committee was appointed to dignify the meeting-house. Mr. Clinton was dismissed in 1807,* and was succeeded in 1816 by Rev. D. D. Rossiter. Rev. Calvin Foote, his successor, preached from 1820 to 1830, and during his ministry, in 1824, the meeting-house was destroyed by fire. In that year, a change of location having been decided upon, the present church edifice was erected in Southwick village. The church has a small fund, is prosperous, and has a membership of about 75. Rev. Richard Knight, lately stationed at South Hadley Falls, where he preached twenty-two years, is the present pastor in charge.

In 1775 there were Baptists in the town, and in that year, at a town-meeting, it was voted not to dismiss the "Baptists" from their minister-rate. In 1781, the protest by the Baptists against paying the minister-rate still being urged, it was voted that "the Baptists are not excused from paying Mr. Forward's rate, except Samuel Hare;" but why Mr. Hare was excused does not appear. That year a committee was chosen "to look into Baptist and other bad rates," and in 1785 it was agreed to seat the Baptists in the meeting-house, the same as the other inhabitants.

In 1805 the Baptists living in Southwick, who had been attending church in Suffield, Conn., determined to have preaching at home, and accordingly organized a society whose original members were Timothy Noble, Sally Noble, Betsey and Ruth Noble, Jonathan and Hannah Hays, Ahner and Elizabeth Johnson, Elizabeth, Josiah, David, Mehitable, and Deborah Kent, Eunice and Rachel Rising, Erastus Bill, Rachel Bellamy, Eunice Stiles, Mehitable Loomis, Chloe Booth, and Dolly Campbell.

* Mr. Clinton removed to Lowville, Lewis Co., N. Y., where he was principal of the Lowville Academy, and for many years pastor of the Presbyterian Church. He was a gentleman of the old régime, and wore the costume of the Revolution until his death, which took place about 1840.

Before his removal from Southwick he lost all his children except one daughter, Maria, who married Ela Collins, of Lowville, a distinguished lawyer, who held the offices of district attorney, delegate to the Constitutional Convention of 1821, and member of Congress. Mr. Clinton's son, Isaac Clinton Collins, was a prominent lawyer of Cincinnati, Ohio. He graduated at Yale College, and was a judge of one of the courts. Another son, Frank Collins, was a graduate of West Point, and served as lieutenant in the 4th U. S. Artillery during the Mexican war, and was wounded at Chapultepec. A third son, William Collins, who recently died at Cleveland, Ohio, was a prominent lawyer and a member of Congress.

In June of that year a council, composed of delegates from churches in Suffield, Granville, and West Springfield, convened in Southwick, at the house of Augustus Pease. The church record of this meeting relates: "First made choice of Elder Jesse Wightman, Moderator, brother Daniel Bestor, Clerk. After a prayer to God for direction, by Elder Hastings, then proceeded to business by calling on the brethren and sisters for their reasons why they wished such an event to take place among them, and happily found their views and motives to appear gospelwise." The church was then constituted, and Elder Hastings gave them the right hand of fellowship "as a church in gospel order, and in sister relation with the Baptist churches composing the Danbury Association." Elder Niles was the first pastor, and among the other early pastors were Elders Bennett, Pepper, Augustus Boles, Silas Root, John D. Hart, Jeremiah Bridges, Charles Willet, and Revs. Charles Farrar, R. H. Maine, R. Russell, Alfred Gates, and Z. S. Wilds.

A church building was erected in Southwick village in 1822, and is still occupied by the society, which has at present 165 members, with an average attendance of about 100. Rev. W. K. Dean, recently called from Rainbow, Conn., is now the pastor.

THE METHODIST CHURCH IN SOUTHWICK

dates its organization from 1816, when its membership numbered but 6 persons, under the charge of Rev. David Miller. It was at that time, and for several years thereafter, attached to the New York Conference. The society had no regular preaching, nor did it own a church building until 1825, when it came into possession of the edifice erected by certain Congregationalists at Gillet's Corners in 1824. These latter, at the time of the removal of the Congregational Church to Southwick village (after the burning of the old building in 1824), were dissatisfied with the change,—themselves living in the southern section,—and, withdrawing from the society, built a church of their own at Gillet's Corners. Failing to prosper, they dissolved within a year, and, as related, relinquished the structure to the Methodists.

The Methodist Church is in charge of Rev. E. C. Hitchcock, and has a membership of about 60. Among the early preachers of this church were Billy Hibbard, Smith Dayton, Coles Carpenter, T. Clark, Julius Field, Robert Serey, Andrew McCain, and a long list of others, as many as three preachers frequently serving in one year. In 1842 the church was made a regular station, and after that date the change of preachers was about yearly.

SCHOOLS.

The first mention made in the records of public action upon educational matters was under date of 1775, when £15 were raised for schooling, and when it was voted "to set out the districts of schooling." In 1777, £25 were raised for schooling; in 1778 the appropriation was increased to £36, and in 1779 to £80. In 1780 the amount called for was £1000, owing, of course, to the depreciation of the currency. Sixteen pounds (in silver doubtless) were appropriated in 1781, when the town was divided into five school districts. Where the first school-house was located, or who was the first school-teacher, are questions which neither tradition nor the records are able to answer. The school interests of the town are now and have for some time been in a highly prosperous condition. There are nine school districts and ten schools, including the Dickinson Grammar School at Southwick village. The expenditures for schools in 1877 reached $2335.35, of which, however, the town was called upon to appropriate but $1000, while $937 of the remainder was the income of the Dickinson school fund, bequeathed to the town many years ago by Richard Dickinson, and now amounting to about $16,000. Half the income from this fund is devoted to the support of the Dickinson Grammar School, which is free to all the inhabitants of the town. The average attendance at all the schools during 1877 was 164; the number of children in the town between the ages of five and fifteen, 203.

Among the graduates at American colleges, originating in Southwick, may be named Roger S. Moore, Thaddeus Foote, Joseph Foote, Francis Granger.

BURIAL-PLACES.

The only public grave-yard of the town is found about one mile south of Southwick village, and contains, besides many ancient gravestones, numerous handsome modern monuments. Among those of the early settlers whose graves are in this city of the dead may be mentioned the following:

Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Hough, 1770; Abigail, daughter of Thomas Smith, 1773; Stephen Rowell, 1778; three sons, of Martin Holcomb, 1786; Aaron Granger, 1777; Phineas Perkins, Jr., 1786; Rhoda, daughter of Abner Fowler, 1780; Mary, wife of Moses Root, 1777; Anna, wife of John Root, 1785, aged 77; Lionel, son of Noah Loomis, 1777; Rhoda, wife of John Cardell, 1798; John, Jr., son of John Cardell, 1797; Irana, daughter of William Miller, 1783; George Granger, 1796, aged 95; Lucy, his wife, 1795; Alvin, son of Ziba Cannon, 1795; Horace, son of James Smith, 1789; Ephraim, son of the same, 1787; Deacon Isaac Gillet, 1784; Rev. Abel Forward, 1786; Keturah, his wife, 1776; Deborah, wife of Nathaniel Man, 1787; Chauncey, son of Rufus Adams, 1797; Shadrach Moore, 1798, aged 83; Miriam, wife of Thomas Stevens, 1790, aged 92; Jesse, son of Shadrach Moore, 1777; Lovice, wife of Shadrach Moore, 1796; Eunice, wife of Thomas Campbell, 1789; Robert Campbell, 1776; Capt. Noah Loomis, 1808, aged 84; Rhoda, his wife, 1806, aged 81; Gordon Root, 1804, aged 70; Ephraim Adams, 1805, aged 80; Capt. Isaac Gillet, 1804; Ezra Kent, 1811, aged 86; Elizabeth, his wife, 1803, aged 72; Noah Bartlett, 1803, aged 74; Chauncey French, 1808; John Judson, 1809, aged 68; Abigail, his wife, 1803; Lucy, wife of Matthew Laflin, 1805, aged 63; Solomon Stevens, 1807, aged 82.

INDUSTRIES.

The agricultural pursuits of the town, although limited, far exceed in value the product of manufactures. The cultivation of tobacco has, until recently, largely engaged the attention of the husbandman; but that branch of industry having grown unremunerative, stock-raising is rapidly becoming an important feature in connection with agricultural interests. Grain, potatoes, etc., are produced, but not in quantities beyond the needs of home consumption, many farmers being, indeed, forced to purchase grain annually for their stock. As a rule, however, the farmers are thrifty and comfortably situated.

Excellent water-power is obtainable from Congamuck Pond, in the southeast, but it is utilized only to operate a powder-mill and a grist-mill. The former, which dates its creation back to the year 1800, is now, as it has been for thirty years or more, managed in the interest of the Zeron Rockwell estate. It employs the services of four people, and produces annually about $20,000 worth of blasting-powder, to the manufacture of which it is exclusively devoted. There are also several small cigar-manufactories, the chief of which, employing ten men, is conducted by Charles F. Gillet, at the village of Gillet's Corners. The total assessed value of the town, in 1878, was $596,407. The total tax thereon—State, county, and township—was $6304.68, or at the rate of 9½ mills on the dollar. There are in the town 145 farms, containing 17,661 acres, of which less than one-half are improved. The dwelling-houses in the town number 263.

The value of agricultural and domestic productions in 1875 was $227,956, and of manufactures, $49,308. The town debt amounted, March 20, 1878, to $7069.

SOCIETIES.

The only secret society is SOUTHWICK GRANGE, No. 46, organized in 1874, and numbering 60 members.

MONTGOMERY.

GEOGRAPHICAL.

MONTGOMERY, one of the smallest towns in Hampden, in respect both to size and population, occupies an area of 8657 acres in that mountainous tract which lies in the northwestern portion of the county, where the Hampden Hills tower in their majestic beauty. Its boundaries are, Huntington in Hampshire County on the north, Westfield and Russell on the south, Southampton and Westfield on the east, and Russell and Huntington on the west.

The railway station nearest to Montgomery is the one at Russell village, about four miles from Montgomery Centre.

NATURAL FEATURES.

As already remarked, the surface of the town is interspersed with towering hills, among which Mount Tekoa and Mount Shatterack are the most conspicuous. Tekoa, which from the southeastern border overlooks Westfield, is a noble eminence, much frequented by tourists, by reason of the magnificent view of the surrounding country to be obtained from its summit. Minerals abound in the rock-crowned hills, but neither in value nor quantity invite the attention of the capitalist. Rich woodlands cover the surface in profusion, and lend a varied and pleasing aspect to the natural beauty of the region. There are several useful mill-streams, such as Moose Meadow, Shatterack, Bear-Den, and Roaring Brook, but no large water-courses. In the southeast, the town of Westfield has constructed a reservoir covering an area of 36 acres, and thence obtains an abundant supply of pure water.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

A portion of the tract now occupied by Montgomery was originally included in that part of the town of Westfield known as "The New Addition." The exact date of the earliest settlements in this quarter cannot be ascertained, but it is known that settlers located there as early as 1767, for in that year Ephraim Avery removed thither with his family and built the first frame house seen in that section. It still stands, on the road between Montgomery and Westfield, and, although unoccupied, is in a state of fair preservation.

There were other settlers contemporaneous with Avery, but of course they were few in number. The names of the pioneers, as well as reference to their descendants, will be found in the following history:

Ephraim Avery, as already noted, settled in 1767. His sons were William, Abel, Samuel, Rainsford, and Ephraim, Jr., besides two daughters. These sons died some years ago, but three of old Ephraim's grandsons are still living,—Elisha and George in Montgomery, on the old farm, and Henry in Westfield.

Capt. Sylvester Squier had several sons, who are now dead. William and James, two of his grandsons, now live in Montgomery. Four of his granddaughters are still alive,—Mrs. Ives, of Williamsburg; Mrs. Macomber, of Conway, Mrs. Hannum, of Westfield; and Mrs. Lewis T. Allyn, of Montgomery.

Oliver Clark is said to have settled here in 1766 or 1767. He had a family of sons and daughters. His sons were Oliver, James, Hawley, Simon, Pharez, Elijah, and Elisha. His daughters were Ruth and Olive. Oliver, Jr., had five sons—Nelson, Hawley, Elisha, Flavius, and Almon—and three daughters. Of these latter, Mrs. Williams died in Montgomery, while two—Mrs. Lathrop, of Westfield, and Mrs. Robert Emmons, of Hartland, Conn.—survive. Of the sons of Oliver, Jr., but two—Flavius and Elisha—are living. Flavius lives in Norwalk, Conn. Elisha resides in Montgomery, at the age of seventy, and is one of the wealthiest farmers in the town.

David Allyn raised a large family of seven sons and six daughters. The seven sons were Jabez, David, Joseph, T. Ansel, James, Albert, and Albro, all of whom are dead. Of the daughters, Phoebe and Lydia died early. Mrs. Miner, of Springfield, another daughter, died some years ago. The other three are now living,—Mrs. Ransom Clark and Mrs. Elisha Clark, in Montgomery, and Mrs. Tiffin, in Greenwich, Mass.

Daniel Barrett, like David Allyn, was the parent of thirteen children, likewise seven sons and six daughters. None of his descendants are living in Montgomery. Three of his sons, Moses, Samuel, and Benjamin, died some years ago. The four living ones are Daniel, Marcus, and Lysander, somewhere in Pennsylvania, and Elisha, aged eighty-nine, in Illinois, where he is a minister of the gospel. Two daughters married two brothers named Root, removed to New York State, and died there. Amarillus married a Mr. Young, and lives in Virginia. Rubanna married a brother of the Young above named, and went to Virginia, where she died. Rebecca died in Westfield, as Mrs. Nathaniel Barnes. Joanna married David Allyn, and died in Holyoke.

Aaron Parks was noted as the man who had three wives. He had two sons, Moses and Orrin. Orrin died in Westfield; Moses in Williamsburg, Mass. Orrin had two sons, Elisha and Orrin, Jr., both of whom are dead. His two daughters still live,—Mrs. Dr. Bartholemew, of West Springfield, and Mrs. Anderson Allyn, of Holyoke. Moses boasted nine children,—seven sons and two daughters. Three—Aaron, Moses, Jr., and Lafayette—are dead. Lewis and William live in Ohio, Dexter in Ohio, and Oscar in Williamsburg, Mass. Caroline, one of the daughters, died early. The other is Mrs. Nathan Hutchinson, of Twinsburg, Ohio. Old Aaron had also four daughters, but they are all dead. Mrs. Guy Moore and Mrs. Nathan Chapin died in Montgomery, Mrs. Elias Carter in New York, and Mrs. Caleb Nichols in Twinsburg, Ohio.

John Kagwin left two sons and four daughters. Amos, the elder son, had two sons and four daughters. His sons were Berijah and John, both dead, and buried in Montgomery. John had no children. Berijah, Jr., now living in Holyoke, is a son of the Berijah above named. Of Amos' four daughters all are living,—Mrs. Clark Pomeroy, in Huntington; Mrs. Chester Pomeroy, in New York; Mrs. Elijah Ensign, in Westfield; and Mrs. George Beach, in Huntington. Of old John's four daughters, Sally married a Mr. Hotchkiss, and died in Montgomery; Polly married Rainsford Avery, and died in Montgomery; Susanna married Ebenezer Tillotson, and died at Windsor Locks, Conn.; Mercy married Hiram Cummings, and died in New York, near Utica. Elisha, old John Kagwin's second son, had a son, Elijah, who died in New York, and a daughter, Sarah, who died in Westfield. Neither ever married.

Allen Pettis, a son of Abial Pettis, a pioneer, still resides in Montgomery, at the age of eighty. Of Allen's sons, Elisha and John live in Springfield; Edward lives in Montgomery; Henry is dead; and Austin lives in Easthampton. His living daughters are Mrs. Atwater Moore, Mrs. Horatio Axtel, and Mrs. Horace Moore, of Montgomery, and Mrs. Watson Root and Mrs. Joseph Arthur, of Westfield. Allen had two brothers. Abial, Jr., died in Montgomery without issue. Philander died in the West. Allen's sister, Anna, married Richard Avery, and died in Southampton. His sister Polly married Joshua Brandt, and is still living in New York.

Joel Moore had for sons, Joel, Jr., Guy, and Dorus, all now dead. Joel, Jr.'s sons were Frederick, Milton, Trumbull, Zadeck, and Omer. His daughters were Eunice and Charlotte. Guy's sons were Aaron, now living in Covington, Mass.; Warren, Warcham, Hiram, and Horace, all dead; Apollos, living in Montgomery, and Julius, living in West Stockbridge. Of Guy's daughters, Hannah and Ziporah died early in life. The third one, Amanda, is Mrs. William Squier, of Montgomery. Dorus, the third son of Joel, Sr., died a bachelor. The elder Joel's only daughter, Phebe, married Oliver Clark, father of Elisha Clark, of Montgomery. Marcus, a son of Warren and grandson of Guy Moore, lives in Springfield. Marcus' brother, William, lives in Granville, Mass.

NOTEWORTHY INCIDENTS.

Montgomery was incorporated in 1780, during the stormiest days of the Revolution, and one of the first public measures was one looking to the enlistment of men for the army. A bounty of 8s. per man was offered, and as to wages they were to be £4 for the first month, and £3 5s. for each month thereafter.

The patriotic impulses of the town ran high and strong throughout the struggle, and the energetic efforts put forth on behalf of the common cause are recorded in the volumes which contain the proceedings of town-meetings from 1780 to the close of the war.

In 1783, after the struggle was ended, it was resolved "to concur with the town of Boston respecting the return of refugees and traitors into this or any other of the United States, as we judge such measures conducive to the safety, interest, and quiet of these States."

As an evidence that the cost of subsistence in 1790 was not extremely high, it may be observed that in the summer of that year Mr. Zadock Bosworth, a citizen of Montgomery, "victualled and attended" the Rev. John Ballentine each Sabbath in which that divine visited the town to preach, and for that service Mr. Bosworth charged but 1s. per day. Although patriotic in the Revolution, Montgomery did not take kindly to the renewal of hostilities in 1812, and sent Edward Taylor as a delegate to the Northampton anti-war convention in that year.

A sensational incident in the history of the town came to light in January, 1879, when Mrs. Louisa Avery was arrested upon the charge of murder, in having caused, it was alleged, the death of Mrs. Betsey Wright, an aged town pauper, whom Mrs. Avery undertook to support at town expense, and whom—so the story ran—she whipped to death in a fit of rage.

ORGANIZATION.

Montgomery was incorporated as a town Nov. 28, 1780, and was named in honor of General Richard Montgomery, who fell at Quebec in 1775.

The tract thus incorporated was originally a portion of that part of the town of Westfield known as "The New Addition," which was valued as a place abounding in excellent building-stone, and for that reason alone was sought by the inhabitants of Westfield as an addition to the original grant. The act of incorporation was passed by the General Court in response to a petition urged by the settlers in that part of Westfield, who deemed themselves inconveniently situated.

In 1792 small portions of the towns of Norwich and Southampton, now in Hampshire County, were added, and as thus made up the town has remained to this day.

The first town-meeting for the election of officers was held at the house of Zadock Bosworth, Dec. 14, 1780. Between that year and the present (1879) the following persons have served the town as selectmen and town clerks:

VILLAGES.

There is near the centre of the town a small collection of dwellings, and there also are two churches, the town-hall, and a post-office. There is, however, neither a store nor a hotel in the town, and the small settlement at the centre, although vaguely referred to by the townspeople as the centre, is the nearest approach to a village to be found in Montgomery. Marketing is mainly done at Westfield, at the sacrifice sometimes of convenience, but as the town is too thinly populated to support a store the situation is philosophically borne. The traveler, therefore, through Montgomery misses the familiar sight of a rural village, but contents himself with an unbroken view of expansive farms and neat farm-houses, which are, as a rule, tasteful in their appointments, and set amid picturesque surroundings.

CHURCHES.

Directly after the incorporation of the town, in November, 1780, the question of providing for public religious worship was earnestly discussed, and in December of that year an appropriation of £6 was made "to promote preaching in this town." It is probable that preaching was procured without delay, and that services were held on occasional Sabbaths in dwellings, and such places as were available. In 1783 the town directed a committee to make a contract with Rev. John Ballentine to preach twenty Sabbaths at $2 each Sabbath. Who Mr. Ballentine was, or where he resided, cannot now be told, since the records dealing with his ministerial engagement in Montgomery recite no more touching him than is above given. Rev. John Ballentine, who was the pastor of the First Congregational Church of Westfield from 1741 to 1776, died in the latter year, but it may have been one of his sons who preached for the people of Montgomery. Mr. Ballentine probably preached occasionally previous to the time of making the contract alluded to, and as there is no evidence to the contrary, it is safe to assume that he preached through the twenty stipulated Sabbaths.

From this date (1783) the ecclesiastical history of the town is a blank (as far as the town records deal with the subject) until January, 1788, when the town for the first time discussed the advisability of erecting a house of worship. Up to that period, the people seem to have been content to worship here and there, as they could secure a place.

It was, as related, resolved to build a meeting-house "as near the centre of the town as possible," and the committee appointed to fix the location reported that they had chosen a spot "on the hill near Trueman Mallory's." Over this report, however, arose a strong discussion and violent opposition. Some wanted the church located in one place, others wanted it located somewhere else, and the result was that half a dozen different factions were clamoring to have the church built upon half a dozen different spots. As time passed the conflicting elements grew more inharmonious, and nothing could be done about building the church, because no agreement could be reached touching the place where it should stand. Thus for nine years, or until 1797, the fruitless controversy was carried on, when, the dispute wearing itself out, a church was built in the centre of the town, near where the church of the Second Adventists now stands.

Meanwhile, the business of providing religious instruction was by no means neglected; and it would appear from the best evidence obtainable that Rev. John Ballentine preached at least every summer, while it is not clear that much preaching, if any, was enjoyed by the people in the winter season,—presumably because of the uncertainty of communication, during the months of snow, between hilly Montgomery and the valley towns. As an evidence, however, that some other preacher divided the religious labors in the town with Mr. Ballentine, and as an evidence of the singularly liberal spirit in which the town conducted church matters, it may be observed that at a town-meeting in 1789 it was voted to select a committee for the obtaining of preaching, and that the committee be instructed "to obtain a preacher of the standing order (Orthodox), and one of the Baptist persuasion, for alternate Sabbaths."

At the period of the erection of a Congregational church structure in 1797, a church society was organized with a membership that included the names of but five men. Occasional preaching was provided until 1801, when Rev. Seth Noble, son of Thomas Noble, of Westfield, was ordained as the first pastor. Mr. Noble's pastorate continued until 1806, when he was dismissed. It is related of this divine that he was exceedingly fond of the tune of "Bangor," and being once upon a time a preacher at what is now the city of Bangor, in Maine, he was charged by the people of that place to present to the General Court a petition for the incorporation of the territory into a town, with the name of Surfield. He erased the name Surfield in the petition, and, substituting that of Bangor, obtained the passage of the act, and so perpetuated the name of his favorite tune, although, it may be supposed, his patrons must have been both astonished and indignant at the result. Following Mr. Noble, the pastors were Revs. John H. Fowler, Solomon W. Edson, and Caleb Knight,—the latter retiring in 1839. The church was at no time very prosperous, and during the period of thirty-three years, from Mr. Noble's dismissal in 1806 to Mr. Knight's retirement in 1839, the regular pastors were but three in number, and their combined term of service but fourteen years, so it will be seen that for nineteen of the thirty-three years the church was without a settled pastor. In 1839 the church membership had declined to 24, and it was only with aid received from the Home Missionary Society that preaching could be hired for even half the time. Matters improved after a while, the membership increased, and in 1848 a new church building replaced the old one, which had stood since 1797. For some reason this new era of prosperity which promised so well failed to fulfill its promises, and after a precarious existence of twenty years more the church and society passed out of existence. The church building is now (1879) used by the Second Adventists, who hold occasional services therein.

A METHODIST CHURCH

was erected in 1849 at the town centre, opposite the First Church, and since that date religious services have been held each year during the summer and autumn months, no attempt being made to have worship in the winter seasons. Preaching was supplied in the autumn of 1878 by Rev. S. Coles, pastor of the Methodist Church at Russell.

SCHOOLS.

Educational interests can scarcely be said to have flourished in the early days of Montgomery. The subject appears to have received no attention whatever until 1782,—two years after the incorporation,—and then only to show that public sentiment inclined to the belief that the promotion of public education must be deferred to a more convenient season, for the question of providing a school for the youth of the town coming up for consideration, it was voted that "no money be raised for the encouragement of a school." This spirit continued to prevail until 1786, when, the attention of the General Court being directed to the matter, the town was cited to appear at court and show cause why a school had not been kept during the previous year. After this a new departure was instituted and schools were set up, to the gratification of the young and rising generation. There are at present (1879) five school districts, in each of which there is a flourishing school.

BURIAL-PLACES.

The burying-ground first laid out in the town is the one at the centre of the town, near the churches. It is a neatly-kept inclosure, but contains no headstones of very early date. Many of the earliest graves had no monuments, while others that were marked by tablets have been robbed by the ruthless hand of time. The oldest inscriptions traceable are the following:

Lucy Hatch, 1799; Horatio Crow, 1805; Lydia Crow, 1807; David Crow, 1817; Huldah Crow, 1809; Joel Moor, 1822; Elisha Hutchinson, 1819; Susanna Herrick, 1820; Achsah Chapin, 1823.

Many old graves are found in family burying-grounds, of which the town contains several.

INDUSTRIES.

Montgomery is a strictly agricultural town, and it is upon the fruits of the soil that its inhabitants depend exclusively for support. Much valuable timber, such as oak, walnut, chestnut, beech, birch, maple, and hemlock, is found upon the woodlands, and furnishes ample supply for a brisk manufacture of lumber for both home demand and shipment to other points. The raising of stock and the production of butter and cheese may be regarded as the principal industrial interests, the growing of grain and other agricultural products receives some attention, but the yield does not extend beyond the limits of local consumption. There are 65 farms in the town, and among them are some upon which tobacco is successfully cultivated in a small way, while all of them are rich grazing-grounds.

The assessed value of the town in 1878 was $160,000, on which the tax was $2333 (for State, county, and town), or a rate of $14.56 per $1000. The value of agricultural and domestic products in 1875 was $54,331; that of manufactures, $3643.

WAR RECORD.

Montgomery furnished 25 men for service in the war of the Rebellion, as follows:

Almon H. Clark, 31st Mass.
Henry O. Clark, 34th Mass.
Chas. N. Clark, 37th Mass.
Anson D. Clapp, 8th Conn.
Chas. C. Barnes, 34th Mass.

RUSSELL.

GEOGRAPHICAL.

RUSSELL, one of the smaller towns of Hampden County, is about 115 miles distant from Boston, and is traversed by the Westfield River and the Boston and Albany Railroad, the latter touching the town at Russell village. Its boundaries are Montgomery on the north, Granville on the south, Westfield on the east, and Blandford on the west. Hills and valleys dot its surface, and numerous streams coursing down its hill-sides furnish water-power for several manufactories.

The area of the town is about 8430 acres, of which a considerable portion is woodland.

NATURAL FEATURES.

The Agawam River, a shallow stream, winds its murmuring way through the town, and adds much to the picturesque beauty of the region. The country hereabout is elevated and mountainous, but quite attractive to the tourist and student of rugged nature in the mild seasons of the year. During the summer great numbers of people visit Russell to enjoy healthful rambles over the hills, and to view the inviting pictures which Nature has here scattered with a lavish hand. Timber is abundant, and includes chestnut, beech, birch, oak, maple, hickory, etc. Minerals are plentiful; specimens of serpentine, schiller-spar, beryl, galena, and copper pyrites are found. The black serpentine rock on Little Tekoa was extensively quarried some years ago, but latterly has not been utilized. There is in the centre of the town, on the mountain-top, a pretty sheet of water, earlier known as Hazard Pond, but now called Russell Pond. It is bountifully stocked with fish, including salmon and bass, which have been propagated here by artificial means by an incorporated association, which controls the fishing privileges of the pond.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

The history of Russell dates from a comparatively recent period. It was originally a portion of Westfield, and constituted a part of that tract called the "New Addition." In 1782, Russell was set off from Westfield, and incorporated February 29th of that year. Among the earliest settlers were two brothers named Barber and a Mr. Gray, who lived on what was called Glasgow Mountain. These three men are supposed to have been the first settlers. After them came Isaac Palmer, John Mallory, Levi Bishop, Elias Parks, Isaac Bronson, Ozias Finney, John Hawley, Abraham Bradley, Titus Doolittle, Docteur Stebbins, Thos. Field, Daniel and Andrew Mallory, Samuel Williams, Jacob Loomis, Robert Hazard, Newman Bishop, Abel Tuttle, Benjamin Todd, Stephen Hughes, Benjamin Atwater, Silas Noble, Richard Russell, Joel Atwater, Samuel Chapman, Jesse Newton, and Seth Gridley.

Of John Mallory's sons, William D. lives in Russell; John, in Westfield; and Roland, removing to New York City, died there many years ago. Mrs. Linus Dickinson, now residing in Springfield, is a granddaughter of John Mallory, the elder.

Isaac Palmer left four sons,—Squire, Loren, Elijah, and Reuben,—all of whom are dead. Squire left two sons,—David, now residing in Russell, and Bradford W., living in Chester. Amasa and Isaac, two of Reuben's sons, are citizens of Springfield, Mass.

Roland Parks

ROLAND PARKS is the son of Warren, who was the son of Roger Parks. The latter settled in Blandford, Mass., at an early day, and was one of the hardy pioneers who first commenced felling the trees and establishing their homes among the hills of Massachusetts. The mother of the gentleman whose name heads this sketch was Lydia Sackett. Both his parents were natives of Blandford, where he was born Dec. 31, 1803, and, passing his boyhood on his father's farm, remained there until the death of his father, in 1835. He then started in the world for himself, first selecting as his partner in life Maria, daughter of William and Rhoda Culver, of Blandford, to whom he was married June 25, 1836. His wife was born in Chester, Mass., June 14, 1807. After his marriage he removed to Russell, and for the next five years paid attention to farming, which business he relinquished in 1842, having been appointed station-agent for the Western, now Boston and Albany, Railroad at Russell. He was the first agent at that station, and retained the position till 1851; after which, for two years, he was deputy sheriff and jailer for the county. During Franklin Pierce's administration he was connected with the Boston custom-house, where he remained four years as inspector. He has kept store at Russell at different times from 1843 to 1867.

He has but one child, Olive C., born May 2, 1837, and married to Jarvis W. Gibbs, of Russell.

Having been brought up in the school of Democracy, Mr. Parks has never seen any reason why he should change his politics. He cast his first vote for President for Andrew Jackson, in 1825. He has several times served in the State Legislature, occupying a seat therein in the years 1841, 1851, and 1864, during which periods he was a member of many important committees. He has been justice of the peace for a number of years; was from 1873 to 1877 special county commissioner, and has also been postmaster.

Mr. Parks is entitled to the thanks of his fellow-townsmen for his exertions in procuring the building of the beautiful iron bridge over the river when the railroad company changed their track at Russell depot. Although advanced in years, he is still active and energetic. He has retired from business, and enjoys a comfortable competency, the result of his early industry and economy.

ago, leaving no descendants. The house erected by him near the centre of the town, in about 1800, is still standing, but uninhabitable.

Levi Bishop had five sons. David and Aaron still live in Russell; James and Charles are dead; Levi, Jr., is a prominent attorney and writer in Detroit, Mich.

Of Elias Parks' two sons, Robert died some years ago, and Lyman still lives in Russell. Robert left a son, Horace, who is depot master at Russell station.

Isaac Bronson had five sons. Two are dead; Allen and John reside in Russell, and Harvey in Granville, Mass.

Esther, a daughter of Abraham Bradley, married Allen Bronson, and lives in Russell. Lyman, his son, is dead, but left descendants in Addison, Vt. (sheriff of Hampden County in 1877); Judson, now residing in Westfield, Mass., and Dickinson, living in Rhode Island. Another son, George, died some years ago.

Of Titus Doolittle's family, Joel removed to Vermont, became a judge, and died there. Mark was a lawyer in Belcher-town, Mass., and is buried there. Amasa is dead, and Titus, Jr., who emigrated to the far West early in life. Old Titus had one daughter, who married Abraham Bradley, a pioneer.

Newman Bishop, now living near Russell Pond, at the age of seventy-seven, is a son of Newman Bishop, who was one of the earliest settlers, and died in 1856, aged ninety-seven. Newman, the elder, left three sons,—Jere., Alva, and Newman, Jr. Of these, only Newman survives. Jere. had four sons and two daughters. Alva lives in Blandford; Major lives in Fitchburg; Jere., Jr., and Alfred are dead. Of the daughters, one, Mrs. Russell Harris, lives in Westfield, and the other, Mrs. Dwight Wilcox, in Chester. Newman, Jr., has one son, Franklin H., now living in Russell.

Of the five sons of Samuel Williams, George died in Russell, leaving two sons,—George W. living in Russell, and Henry A. in Westfield. The other four sons of Samuel removed West at an early period. Samuel, Jr., went to Salt Lake and joined the Mormons.

Jacob Loomis had six sons,—Jacob, Hubbard, Josiah, Caleb, Lyman, and Solomon,—all of whom are dead. Of Caleb's sons, Edward lives in Russell and Ralph in Westfield. Jacob, a son of Solomon, lives in Springfield. Hubbard, another of Solomon's sons, left his native hills some years ago. Hubbard left a son and daughter. Harmon William, the son, is a lawyer in Chicago. The daughter is Mrs. Chauncey Latimer, of Westfield. A daughter of Lyman is now Mrs. David Bishop, of Russell.

Abel Tuttle's four sons—Abel, Jr., Byman, Almon, and Daniel—are all dead. The living descendants of Abel, Jr., are Mrs. Apollos Moore, of Montgomery, Mass.; Mrs. Joseph King, Mrs. Lucina Goff, and Mrs. Cynthia Tuttle, all of Westfield, Mass. Byman and Almon, sons of Abel, the elder, died in the West. Milo, a son of Daniel, died a bachelor. Of Daniel's two daughters, Mrs. Wm. Chamberlain resides in Westfield. Another, Mrs. Samuel D. Williams, died in Russell a short time ago.

Benjamin Todd, a pioneer, fought through the Revolution, and was with Gen. Israel Putnam when the latter made his famous leap at Horse-Neck, Conn. He had four sons and three daughters. Two of his sons, Harvey and Plymud, died bachelors. Benjamin, Jr., removed to New York early in life. Orrin, a son of Gershom, the fourth son of old Benjamin, is yet living in Suffield, Conn.

Stephen Hughes had four sons,—John, Stephen, Henry, and John G.,—but they all died; it is said without issue. Mrs. Benjamin Pendleton, a daughter of Stephen, lives in Russell.

Of Benjamin Atwater's three sons,—Harris, Titus, and Noah,—all are dead. Franklin B., a son of Titus, lives in Russell; James, a son of Harris, lives in Canton, Conn. Noah had two sons. John lives in Westfield; Wells died a few years ago.

Silas Noble had five sons and three daughters. The sons were Silas, Jr., Roland, Reuben, Albert, and Seth. Seth removed to Illinois, the others are buried in Russell. Mrs. James Blakslee, living in Russell, is a daughter of Albert. Silas, a son of Reuben, lives in Granville, Mass.

Richard Russell raised five sons,—Thomas, Simeon, Almon, Abel, and Yale,—all of whom are dead. Almon, a son of Abel, lives in Russell; and Edwin, another of Abel's sons, is in Suffield, Conn.

Joel Atwater had four sons and several daughters. The daughters married early and removed to the West. Of the sons, Jere. died some years ago; Leonard lives in Westfield; Joel, Jr., in Suffield, Conn.; and Joseph somewhere in the West.

Samuel Chapman was the father of Reuben A. Chapman, who, leaving Russell at the age of twenty-one, afterward became chief-justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. He died in 1875, while traveling in Europe. Reuben's sister, Clarissa, married Richard Armstrong, Minister of Public Instruction at Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, and is now residing there, engaged in missionary work. Mrs. Reuben Bradley, one of Samuel Chapman's daughters, died in Russell some time ago. Reuben Chapman left two daughters. One is now Mrs. T. M. Brown, the wife of a lawyer in Springfield; the other, Miss Mary, is abroad.

Jesse Newton's three sons—Elias, Ezra, and Robert—removed from Russell many years ago. Robert married Dolly, the daughter of Seth Gridley, a Russell pioneer. Oliver, a son of Seth Gridley, died some years ago, leaving sons, who removed to the West, and one daughter, who is now Mrs. Julius Bedortha, of Russell.

NOTEWORTHY INCIDENTS.

The early town records do not disclose many evidences of the peculiar customs prevalent among the early settlers in Western Massachusetts, for the reason that they appear to be meagre transcripts of the details of town business.

In 1805 the town charges were fixed at the inconsiderable sum of $50 for that year, and in the following year a public pound was directed to be built in David Holmes' yard, although it is likely that the town had a pound before that date. In 1806, a school-house having been completed "nigh Robert Hazzard," town-meetings were ordered to be held therein after that time. The first pauper mentioned in the records was Mary Stebbins, and she seemed to give the town much concern, and was, moreover, a burden upon it from 1805 to 1821. In the first-named year it was decided to sell Mary Stebbins "at the loest bider for fore months," and Stephen Hughes got the contract for keeping her, at three shillings per week.

A record was made in 1814 of Mary Stebbins being bid off to John A. Mallory at eighty-five cents each week, and in 1816 the town voted that the selectmen should not give more than ninety cents per week for keeping Mary Stebbins. The prices of the necessities of life must have been low in 1821, for in that year Squire Palmer kept Mary Stebbins for forty-seven cents per week, and, as the records make no later mention of Mary Stebbins, it is to be inferred that she passed out of existence about that time. She appears to have been the only pauper the town had for many years, although under date of 1821 mention is made that Andrew Mallory was allowed $61.80 for keeping his father and mother one year. Under date of March, 1817, it was voted "not to allow the cost of dinging up Miss Harris."

An amusing incident, showing how cheaply physicians esteemed their services in the early days, is related of one Dr. King, who lived in Blandford about the year 1800. One stormy night a stranger tarrying at the tavern of Landlord Grey, near the centre of Russell, was taken suddenly ill, and a messenger being dispatched for Dr. King, who lived fully six miles away, that worthy came promptly through the rain and mud, physicked his patient until he cured him, and when asked for his bill, replied, hesitatingly, as if fearful of asking too much, "Well, I think I ought to have fifty cents." The patient paid the bill without a murmur, and the doctor was subsequently heard to express his satisfaction by remarking that it was "a pretty good night's work."

The Landlord Grey referred to in the story must have been one of the first innkeepers in Russell. Titus Doolittle kept tavern about 1800, in a house now occupied by Mr. Quance as a residence, on the river-bank, about midway between Russell village and Salmon Falls. It is a substantial-looking house at this day, although it is probably nearly a hundred years old. A Mr. Day kept a tavern shortly after 1800, where Mr. Lawrence Marony now lives, a half-mile northeast of Russell village. Mr. Day kept the tavern for nearly forty years, to the close of the year 1848, and from the fact that it was known as the Hawley tavern, it would appear that Hawley must have kept it before Day's advent. The first postmaster in Russell was Reuben Palmer, who was appointed in 1825, and who also kept a store then and for some years previous about a half-mile north of Russell village.

John Gould kept a store in 1806, near where the Chapin & Gould paper-mills stand at present, and where at that time, too, a Dr. Frye had a cotton-mill. In connection with his store Mr. Gould also operated a grist-mill.

What Russell did in support of the war of 1812 cannot be learned from the records, but according to the recollection of Mrs. Hannah Dickinson (now living in Russell at the age of ninety-two, and a resident there since 1807), the town sent but two men into the service,—John Carrington and Lyman Holmes. Mrs. Dickinson above noticed is remarkably active in her mental faculties, and talks in a spirited and interesting manner of the events of seventy-five years ago. She has a sister, Mrs. Northrop, now residing in Marcellus, N. Y., at the age of one hundred and one.

The two oldest houses in Russell are supposed to be the residence of Thomas Williston, on the river-bank, opposite the paper-mill at Salmon Falls, and the house now occupied by the Widow Clark, a mile southwest of Russell village. Both these dwellings are said to have been built as early as 1780.

A record made in 1823 of a vote "not to petition the General Court to dissolve the town of Russell" would seem to indicate that the town had a narrow escape from oblivion.

The Eighth Turnpike Association of Massachusetts laid their road from a line between Westfield and Russell, through Russell and Blandford to Falley's Store, and thence west.

There was also a turnpike association early in the present century, charged with the maintenance of a road between the towns of Russell and Blandford.

During the Revolution the road from Springfield to Albany entered Russell at the southeast corner, over Glasgow Mountain, now called Little Tekoa.

Russell suffered considerably by the flood of December, 1878, and by washed-out roads, destroyed bridges, etc., was damaged to the extent of about $5000, exclusive of the loss of the dam at the Chapin & Gould paper-mill. The floods of 1819 and 1839 are also well remembered in this section as having caused similar havoc.

There are no secret orders in the town at present. A Good Templars' lodge flourished some years previous to 1874, but at that date passed out of existence.

ORGANIZATION.

Feb. 25, 1792, Russell was incorporated as a town, and was made up of a portion of Montgomery and a portion of that part of Westfield known as the New Addition. The town was named in honor of a Mr. Russell, of Boston, upon his agreeing to donate a bell for the first church erected by the inhabitants. For some unexplained reason Mr. Russell was never called upon to ratify his promise, but the honor was his, nevertheless. The town records, especially those of early dates, are in a very imperfect condition, while the records of town-meetings from 1792 to 1804 are not to be found. A list of selectmen and town clerks who served the town from 1804 to 1879 is herewith presented.

TOWN CLERKS.

The first report of a town-meeting, as gleaned from the records, is dated April, 1804. There were records of earlier date, but they are not in existence. Beginning at 1804, the town clerks were:

Levi Chapman, 1804-6; Isaac Palmer, 1806-11; Dudley Williams, 1811-12; Isaac Palmer, 1812-18; Dudley Williams, 1818-20; Isaac Palmer, 1820-26; Reuben Bradley, 1826-27; Reuben Palmer, 1827-31; Linus Dickinson, 1831-33; Jere.

Bishop, 1833-34; John Dickinson, 1834-37; Zachariah Dickinson, 1837-39; Jus. Bishop, 1839-41; John Dickinson, 1841-43; Wm. D. Mallory, 1843-45; Roland Parks, 1845-47; Lucius P. Bishop, 1847-49; Nelson D. Parks, 1849-51; Justin E. Loomis, 1851-53; H. L. Gridley, 1853-54; J. W. Gibbs, 1854-55; Joseph Gridley, 1855-58; J. W. Gibbs, 1858-59; H. Smith, 1873-74; E. E. Gibbs, 1874-75; George T. Bryant, 1875-76; H. L. Goodrich, 1876-79.

REPRESENTATIVES AT THE GENERAL COURT.

No mention is made in the records of the election of a representative previous to 1827, in which year Capt. John Gould was chosen, and after him the following:

Abel Tuttle, Jr., Reuben Palmer (Mr. Palmer being charged not to oppose [in 1829] the building of the railroad from Boston to Albany, if built without expense to the State), Roland Parks, Chauncey M. Morse, Justin Loomis, Jere. Bishop, Benjamin Bennet, James Bishop, John Dickinson, Daniel Fry, Bradford W. Palmer, Frederick Sackett, Newman Bishop, Gardner S. Burlbank, Henry K. Loomis, Nelson D. Parks.

This list closes with the year 1857, when Russell became a part of the Eleventh Representative District.

VILLAGES.

The only village in the town is the village of RUSSELL, a station on the Boston and Albany Railroad, and located on the Westfield River, where the stream receives the waters of Black's Brook, from which the village derives its water-power. Here are two churches, the town-hall, an excellent district school, hotel, post-office, two stores, and several small manufactories. A large tannery established here some years ago was recently destroyed by fire, but is likely to be restored shortly. The village numbers about 200 inhabitants, and in the summer and autumn seasons gains considerable business from the large influx of visitors who tarry there en route to the mountains of Blandford and Montgomery.

There are two small settlements on the Westfield River, near Russell village, one two miles south, at the Jessup & Laffin paper-mill, and one two miles northwest, at the Chapin & Gould paper-mill. These settlements are peopled by the employes of the mills, and include an aggregate population of about 200.

CHURCHES.

The town records are silent upon ecclesiastical matters, and the inference is therefore that, unlike most Massachusetts towns, Russell left the consideration of church affairs exclusively to church societies. An early record says that "The religious covenant and articles of faith and practice of the Second Baptist Church in Westfield, begun June 6, 1786, now under the care of Elder Ebenezer Stowe," were adopted by the First Baptist Church of Russell shortly after the date just mentioned, and upon the organization of that body. A meeting-house was built in 1792 in the village of Russell, and after a somewhat precarious existence the church was dissolved about the year 1811. In 1816 the church was revived, and that year ordained as its first pastor Rev. Asa Todd, who was succeeded, in 1825, by Rev. Amos Clark, among whose successors were Revs. Mr. Childs, J. M. Whipple, J. M. Phillips, George Gunn, M. H. Rising, Lester Williams, and J. C. Carpenter. The meeting-house erected by the first society was used by the new church until 1820, when it was destroyed by fire. A new one was built in 1826, and in 1853 this latter was replaced by the present neat and substantial structure, at a cost of about $2400. The pastor now in charge is Rev. J. B. Ashley.

The first Congregational Church of which any note is made was organized Nov. 1, 1800, by Rev. Joseph Badger, of Blandford. It had then 15 members, but did not seem to prosper during the subsequent thirty years of its existence. It was eventually dissolved in 1830.

The Congregationalists and Methodists built a church in conjunction near the centre of the town, about 1820, and used it in common, under the name of the Union Society. The foundations of this structure, which was torn down in 1830, are still to be seen.

After the dissolution of the Union Society, in 1830, the Methodists of Russell had no regular place of worship until 1869, when the present society was formed, and a very neat church building erected in the village of Russell. Rev. N. J. Merrill was the first pastor. The present pastor is Rev. S. Coles. The congregation numbers 70 members. The two churches here noted are the only ones in the town.

BURIAL-PLACES.

The village of Russell contains a trimly-kept and handsomely-embellished burying-ground, but the early tombstones are few in number, and those do not date beyond 1794. More ancient graves there probably are, but their location is unknown. Of the old tombstones, reference is made here to that of Maj. Ebenezer Whiting, who died in 1794; Mary, "amiable consort of Deacon Titus Doolittle," who died in 1798; Reuben Parks, 1803; Lowell Thomas, 1811; Jane, his wife, 1803; Hager Warner, 1813; John Dickinson, in 1830, aged ninety-three; Dorothy, his wife, 1815; Titus Doolittle, 1818; and Jonah Mallory, in 1816.

Another burial-place is found near the centre of the town, at Russell Pond, and here it is likely the first interments were made in the town. Except, however, a tombstone recording the death of a daughter of Jacob and Thankful Loomis, in 1793, none of earlier date than 1802 are found. In that year Mehitable Hazard was buried; Enoch Stiles, in 1805; Matilda Williams, in the same year; Juanna Williams, in 1804, aged seventy-three; and Bethiah Ward, in 1812.

SCHOOLS.

The first reference made in the existing town records to educational matters occurs under date of 1804, when $130 were raised for the support of schools. In 1805 the appropriation for schooling was reduced to $100, and at this time there were two school-houses in the town,—one at the centre, near Robert Hazard's house, and one on the mountain, in the southern section. The records do not mention the first school-teacher, but, in 1807, Miss Lindsey taught, and a Miss Sherman taught in 1808. The Miss Lindsey mentioned became Mrs. Dickinson shortly after 1807, who is still living in Russell village.

In 1810 what is known as the South River school district was divided into two districts, and it was agreed that one-half the money assessed should be schooled out to the east side, with the privilege given to the west-side people to send their children to school there as long as the assessed money held out.

There were, in 1878, five school districts in the town, with the same number of schools. The average attendance at all the schools was 85, and the amount expended for their support in 1877 was $868.

INDUSTRIES.

Agawam River, which flows through Russell, furnishes admirable water-power at this point, but it is utilized by only two manufacturing establishments, which are, however, models of their kind, and enterprises, moreover, of considerable magnitude. One of these is the Jessup & Laffin Paper Company, whose mills are located two miles southeast of the village of Russell, at Salmon Falls. The buildings, which are very extensive, are constructed of brick, and appointed with the most valuable and improved machinery required in the making of fine paper, to the production of which these mills are devoted. A capital of upward of $250,000 is invested in the enterprise, and paper to the value of about $175,000 is produced annually. About 100 men and women are employed, and these are for the most part provided with homes in a large boarding-house erected by the company near the mills.

The Chapin and Gould paper-mills are located about two miles northwest of Russell village, and are likewise engaged in the manufacture of fine paper. About 100 persons are employed, and the daily yield of paper is about 4500 pounds. The firm was organized in April, 1858, and began operations in a mill erected upon the present location in that year. This mill was destroyed by fire in 1870, and at once replaced by the present mills, of much larger capacity than the first.

The other manufactures of the town are railway-ties and lumber, but those industries are limited in yield. There are about seventy-five farms in the town, but the agricultural products are all consumed at home.

RUSSELL'S WAR RECORD.

Here will be found the names of those who enlisted from Russell in the war of the Rebellion :

HOLLAND.

GEOGRAPHICAL.

THE town of Holland is situated in the southeast corner of Hampden County. On the north it is bounded by Brimfield, of which it formerly constituted a part. Wales bounds it on the west, and together with it formed the district of South Brimfield in 1762. On the south is located the town of Union, in Connecticut. Sturbridge, in Worcester County, forms its eastern boundary.

NATURAL FEATURES.

The physical characteristics of the town are similar to those of Brimfield and Wales. Numerous small mountains diversify the landscape, their slopes diversified with alternate timber-lots and farming-lands of fairly-productive qualities. The soil is generally sandy, with occasional areas of clayey loam, which yield the cereals readily when properly cultivated, and which seem especially adapted to the growth of grass. Rattlesnake Mountain, situated in the western part of the town, near the Wales line, is a prominent landmark. Blodgett or Williams' Mountain lies just north of it, and marks the locality where the earliest settlements were made. Blake Hill is situated on the northeastern border of the town.

Holland—formerly called Kesioige—Pond is a handsome body of water, located in the northern part, and comprises an area of about 80 acres. Partridge Pond, comprising about 4 acres, formerly existed just south of the centre of the town, but has now been included in and covered by the Hamilton Reservoir, which was constructed in 1862 by the Hamilton Woolen Company, of Southbridge, who dammed the Quinnebaug River about a mile southeast of Holland Pond. The object in view was to afford a water-supply for the company's mills at Southbridge. It has also been utilized by mills at Fiskdale. It is nearly three miles long, and has an average width of from 60 to 80 rods. The reservoir is said never to have properly fulfilled the purpose designed. Considerable valuable land has been damaged by it, causing much trouble.

The value of manufactures in 1875, according to State reports, was $176,600, and of agricultural products, $34,248. The total valuation of the town in 1878 was $398,652, of which $283,041 was in real estate. The total tax—State, county, and town—was $4185.85, or at a rate of .0105. The debt of the town, March 1, 1878, was $7510.

The Quinnebaug River enters the town at the south, passing through the reservoir and Holland Pond, and thence north into Brimfield and Sturbridge.

Several small streams traverse various sections of the town, being mostly tributaries to the reservoir.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

Much that relates to the early settlement of the town will be found in the histories of Brimfield and Wales.

Probably the first person who made a settlement in that section of Brimfield now included in the town of Holland was Joseph Blodgett, who was one of the original proprietors of Brimfield, and filled many important town and church offices in that town and the district of South Brimfield. He was a surveyor, and the early records of Brimfield contain many references to his work. He was the father of Jonas Blodgett, who was the last clerk and surveyor of the proprietors of Brimfield, and who died in 1839, at the age of ninety-five. He resided in Holland near the Frost place, adjoining the Wales line.

Blodgett made his residence, as early as 1727, on the South Meadow road, a little south of Calvin Polley's, and near the hill which bears his name. In the division of the lots confirmed by the General Court to the original settlers in 1732, Joseph Blodgett drew "Lott 67." His son, Joseph Blodgett, Jr., also lived near Calvin Polley's, and other sons lived in that vicinity. Representatives of the Blodgett family have continued to reside in Holland ever since.

Soon after Blodgett made his settlement came Enoch Hides, John Webber, John Bishop, Robert Brown, Ebenezer Wallis, and Jonathan Brown.

Henry and Trenance Webbersettled in Holland about 1730. They were from the State of Rhode Island. Frank Webber, a lad of fourteen, came with them. He remained in Holland until he attained the age of twenty-five, when he went to sea and was never afterward heard from, and left no known descendants. Reuben and Trenance Webber descended from Henry, and made the earliest settlement about the time of the Revolution, on what is known as the "old Webber place," near the present residence of Wm. A. and Dwight E. Webber, who are descended from Reuben.

David Wallis came from Woodstock, Conn., about 1755, and located where William S. Wallis now resides. The timbers of the original house which he erected at that place are in the building still standing. It is probably the oldest house in town. David Wallis was a blacksmith by trade, and followed that occupation, together with farming. When in Woodstock, he owned four slaves. One of these, Samuel Deering, he took with him to Holland, and he lived to be one hundred years of age. "Sam" had an excellent idea of the land in Holland, but always complained that the people there did not treat him with proper respect. The sons of David Wallis were Thomas, Jonathan, William, John, and David. Jonathan followed the occupation of a blacksmith. Thomas became a practitioner of medicine, and was one of the early physicians of Holland. William and John engaged in farming.

The son David never came to Holland, but his son David settled there in 1758, when a mere child, grew up with his grandfather, and served in the Revolutionary war. He afterward engaged in farming, married Percis Rosbrook on May 8, 1782, and established his residence where Horace Wallis now lives. He had ten children, nine of whom lived to be over sixty-eight years of age. The oldest was eighty-three. Three are now living. Horace Wallis, at the age of eighty-three, still resides in the old homestead, and retains in a remarkable degree his faculties of mind and body. His memory of events long passed is wonderful, and we are indebted to him for many interesting particulars relating to the early history of the town. Percis Cutler, a sister, seventy-eight years of age, still resides in Holland. All but one of these children have engaged in school-teaching more or less. David, another of the children, removed to Tioga County, in the State of New York, and was clerk of the courts of that county for nine years. He left a large number of descendants there. The fourth generation of the Wallis family, who are descended from the third David, are now residing on his old homestead.

William S. Wallis, who occupies the original Wallis homestead, is descended from John Wallis. He is engaged in farming, and is a man of prominence in the town.

James Marcy came from Woodstock, Conn., about 1767, and located a mile southwest of the present hotel, on a large farm. His children were James, Elisha, Uriah, David, Job, Sarah, and Betsey. Sarah and Job removed to New York State, and Betsey to Woodstock, Conn. James located in the southwest part of the town, and engaged in farming. His son, Loren, resides in the south part of the town, and pursues the same avocation. Elisha, at the advanced age of ninety-six, lives in the west part of the town, about a mile from the centre. He resides with his son, Washington, who is a farmer. Uriah lived to be eighty-two, and never married. David Marcy, after building the present hotel, wherein he kept tavern for a number of years, moved about half a mile south, on the Hallowell Perrin farm, and died there in December, 1860, at the age of seventy-three. He married Sybil, daughter of Hallowell Perrin, and had three children, —Mary Ann, wife of Elisha Kinney; Uriah P., who engaged in farming and lumbering, about a mile southwest of the present tavern, and now resides in Stafford, Conn.; and Melisent, who married Horace Kinney, and who also resides at Stafford.

Benjamin Perrin, another of the early settlers of Holland, lived about a mile south of the centre. His sons were John, Cyril, and Hallowell. John settled at Providence, R. I. Cyril married Huldah, daughter of Ichabod Goodell, one of the early settlers, and had thirteen children. They afterward removed to Monson. Hallowell Perrin resided a half-mile south of the present tavern. He kept tavern and engaged in farming. He married Sybil Bruce for his first wife, and had Sybil, Melisent, Ambrose, and Diana. Sybil became the wife of David Marcy; Melisent married Baxter Wood; Diana married a Dr. Bottom, and resides in South Wilbraham, now the town of Hampden. There are no descendants of Perrin now living in Holland.

Ichabod Goodell, another early resident of Holland, married a Webber, and had four children, Huldah, Polley, Percis, and Jabez. The latter, when a young man, went to New York State to teach school. He bought land on the present site of the city of Buffalo for a dollar and a quarter an acre, and became very rich. He left the town of Holland $500 in his will.

Eliphalet Janes, the first clerk of the district of Holland, in 1784, resided where Eleazer Moore now lives, near the Fuller factory place. He operated a saw- and grist-mill there in the latter part of the last century, but afterward fell upon the district for support.

William Belknap was early engaged in agricultural pursuits, and resided where C. B. Drake now does.

Asa David lived east of the reservoir. He filled many positions of responsibility in town and church, and taught school a great deal, besides farming. He left town about 1793. Jonathan Ballard engaged in farming near Dana. Freeland Wallis, a brother of Horace Wallis, also occupied this place.

Another early inhabitant was Reuben Stevens, who lived where L. C. Howlett now resides, and engaged in farming and cloth dressing.

Nehemiah May, who was prominent in public affairs in South Brimfield and Holland as early as 1764, was born in Woodstock, Conn., Jan. 31, 1730. He resided in the south part of the town, within half a mile of the Connecticut line. He served as a captain in the Revolutionary war, and served at New London and Ticonderoga.

Ebenezer Morris had a blacksmith-shop below Capt. May's, whose daughter he married.

Jonathan Cram, a man of prominence and influence in the early history of the town, also resided in the south part of the town, and engaged in farming.

Joseph Bruce lived where Lewis C. Howlett now resides, and followed farming. He is said to have been eccentric in some things, and to have been a man of great method and system.

John Polley lived in the west part of the town, near the Wales line, where he devoted his attention to agriculture.

Gershom Rosebrook lived across the bridge, east of the reservoir, and also engaged in farming.

Other residents of Holland, as early as 1760, were Humphrey Cram, James Frizell, Edward, Jacob, Benjamin, and Samuel Webber, Jonathan Wallis, John Rosebrook, James and John Anderson, and William and Asa Belknap.

One of the first stores in town was kept by a man named Brown, about 1788, on the spot where Eleazer Moore now resides. Early in the present century Alfred Lyon kept a store and tavern near the reservoir-dam, about a quarter of a mile east of the meeting-house, on the old Lyon place. The next store was kept by Isaac Partridge, about half a mile south of the centre of the town, on the Mushapang road. Elisha Kinney is the present owner of the premises. Chase & Ward next kept a store, in 1813, in what formerly was the old L on rear of the present tavern. Luther Brown succeeded him as proprietor. Dr. Josiah Converse next kept a store where Frank E. Kinney now resides. Sewell Glazier followed next in the same place. Clement B. Drake kept store there as late as 1848. About 1850, Elisha Kinney had a store in the same place for several years.

In 1847, Willard Weld kept a store in a building which was opposite to where the blacksmith-shop now stands.

Stores were also kept in the old part of the village, near the Fuller factory. Orlando Anderson did business there about 1833, and enjoyed an enviable reputation for honesty and fair-dealing. Lynn & Co. were his successors in the same place. About 1848, Jonathan Sykes had a store on the opposite side of the road, above the bridge. John Carpenter kept a store there in 1860, which was the last one the town has had.

It appears from the records of the town that David Bugbee kept a tavern as early as 1784, about half a mile west of the present one, where Wm. Lillie now resides. The tavern of Alfred Lyon has already been referred to. Hollowell Perrin also kept one south of the Sybil Marcy place.

In 1812-13, David Marcy erected the Holland Hotel, and commenced the business of inn-keeping, which he pursued for two years. He then disposed of it to John Webber, who kept it for several years. Mr. Bridgman followed next for a time. In 1820 it was kept by Allen Tiffany. Mr. Harris succeeded for one year. Then Luther Brown, Eldridge G. Fuller, Baxter Wood, and a man named Benson followed in turn. In 1836 it passed into the hands of Elisha Kinney, who has kept it continuously since, to the entire satisfaction of the public. Mr. Kinney also devotes some time to agricultural pursuits.

The earliest road laid out in Holland was in 1731, when the old road to Union and Woodstock, Conn., commonly called the South Meadow road, was established. It passes from Brimfield through portions of Wales and Holland.

The first physician who practiced in Holland was Dr. Thomas Wallis, a native of the town, who practiced there as early as 1786. He continued in practice a great many years, also filling numerous town offices. His first residence was in the south part of the town, but he subsequently occupied the place where William S. Wallis now lives. Dr. Seth Smith was another practitioner of medicine early in the present century. About 1812, Dr. Ichabod Hyde, Dr. David B. Dean, and Dr. Joshua Richardson were in practice in the town. Dr. Chileab B. Merrick followed, then Dr. Josiah Converse, and finally Dr. Abial Bottom, who was the last regular physician the town has had. Dr. Bottom is at present in practice in South Wilbraham, or Hampden.

ORGANIZATION.

As early as 1760 a petition was presented to the town of Brimfield from the southeast part of that town, including Holland, part of Wales, and part of Brimfield, to be set off as a district. The west line of the district petitioned for was the present town line of Holland. The reason assigned in the petition was the inconvenience of attending meeting on the Sabbath. Though the signers failed in their petition, they began to hold meetings in that part of the district, and to procure preaching they sought assistance from the town. On Nov. 16, 1761, the town of Brimfield "voted to give y^e southeast part of y^e town three pounds, ten shillings, to help them hire preaching."

Sept. 18, 1762, the district of South Brimfield, including Wales and Holland, was set off by an act of the General Court. This territory remained under one municipal government until July 5, 1783, when, owing to frequent contention between the inhabitants of the east and west parishes, which have been referred to at length in the history of the town of Wales, the district of Holland was created. The new district was endowed with all the rights and prerogatives of a town, except that of corporate representation in the Legislature. In this respect they were to unite with Wales, which had in the mean time, under a general act of the Legislature, been erected into a town, still retaining the name of South Brimfield. The name of Holland was bestowed on the new district in honor of Lord Holland, better known as Charles James Fox, an eloquent advocate on the side of the people of this country in the Parliamentary contests which preceded the recognition of American Independence. The district of Holland, as set off, constituted the southern portion of the "three-mile addition" which was made to Brimfield in 1714.*

*See history of Brimfield.

The original warrant under which the organization of the district of Brimfield was effected was issued by Abner Morgan, justice of the peace, and directed to Joseph Bruce. The first meeting of the district occurred on July 24, 1783. Joseph Bruce was chosen Moderator, Nehemiah May, Jonas Blodgett, and Alfred Lyon, Selectmen, and Jonathan Wallis, Treasurer.

In Feb. 18, 1784, a number of inhabitants of Sturbridge were received as citizens of Holland, with full rights, in response to a petition presented by them to that effect. On March 1st of the same year £20 were appropriated for schooling and £60 for the Rev. Wm. Reeves, the first minister. The first road authorized by the district, a mere bridle-road, was also created.

On Sept. 2, 1789, the old antagonism between Holland and Wales manifested itself in the vote of the district of Holland to petition the General Court to be annexed to Brimfield in the choice of a representative, instead of to South Brimfield. John Brown, Dr. Thomas Wallis, and William Belknap were appointed a committee to prepare such a petition.

On Nov. 5, 1792, the district voted "not to receive the small-pox by inoculation, or any other way, if it can be avoided." Also that "Dr. Thomas Wallis should not receive or suffer any person or persons to come into his house to have the small-pox under any pretense whatever, as the selectmen had forbid him taking in or harboring any person or persons to have the small-pox before this meeting."

The training of the vocal organs of the young was evidently early attended to in Holland, for on Oct. 1, 1794, the district voted "to hire a singing-master to instruct the youth in psalmody."

On March 6, 1797, a committee of five was chosen to build a pound on the plain. One had previously been kept by Edward Webber. The new pound was to be located on the northwest corner of the common, was to be 30 feet square, built of chestnut or oak, and to cost £4 15s. It probably stood not far from the site of the present one.

On Jan. 28, 1801, the district voted to "raise seventeen dollars to pay Mr. Benjamin Reeves for teaching singing school this season."

The practice of disposing of the poor by public auction was early in vogue. On April 6, 1801, it was voted "to set up the Boarding & Clothing & keeping of Ruth Swinnerton for one year, exclusive of Doctring, at the lowest Bidder."

On April 25, 1803, $10 was raised as a bounty for killing crows and blackbirds, ten cents being allowed for a crow, and the same sum for a dozen blackbirds. The recognition by the inhabitants of the proverbial cunning of the crow was thus early recorded.

For those who performed labor upon the roads of the district from six to ten cents an hour for a man were the prevailing rates for a long time.

May 14, 1808.—Voted to exchange some of the common with Capt. Church for some of his land, and "to give him $5 to boot, which he agrees to lay out in repairing the meeting-house, or to give it to the town for that purpose." On Sept. 9, 1808, the town voted to cause a petition to be framed, similar to that of Boston, against the embargo, and to cause it to be sent to the President.

Jan. 10, 1810, it was voted to give the land belonging to the district which laid north of the pound, exclusive of enough for the pound, together with the land south of the turnpike as far as the road leading to Andrew Webber's house in a westerly direction, to Luther Carter, provided he builds or causes to be built a house, 30 by 40 feet, for a tavern. On July 11, 1812, it was voted to draft resolutions relative to an alliance with France, and a delegate was chosen to attend the convention at Northampton on July 14th to petition the President and Congress to avert war and restore peace.

One of the great evils of the day seems to have been elopement, for, on July 13, 1813, John Hinds and wife, Ezekiel Hinds and Mrs. Hill were bid off to John Webber, "to provide for them and use their labor," but the town was "to indemnify him from any inconvenience or trouble that may arise from elopement, Imprisonment, or Debts contracted by them."

In 1821 the district voted strongly against the proposed amendments to the State constitution.

The principal officers of the town have been :

VILLAGES.

The collection of houses in the northern part of Holland is the nearest approach to a village that the town contains, and yet this part is perhaps not more thickly settled than some other portions. Here, however, are to be found the hotel, post-office, town-hall, and town clerk's office, the Congregational meeting-house, the pound, and a blacksmith-shop.

These, with two or three dwelling-houses, constitute the village.

The post-office is kept in the hotel, and the office of postmaster has been filled for a number of years past by Frank E. Kinney, one of the proprietors of the hotel. It was probably established about 1813, for when David Marcy erected the hotel in that year he was appointed postmaster, and is believed to have been the first one. Mr. Marcy continued for two years, and was succeeded by John Webber, who still kept the office in the hotel. The office seems to have been filled in succession by the several proprietors of the hotel, for Elbridge G. Fuller, Baxter Wood, and Elisha Kinney have each in turn been postmaster. Mr. Fuller kept the office at his factory. The Rev. Benjamin Ober was also postmaster for a time, and kept the office at the parsonage. The town has a tri-weekly mail.

The nearest railroad stations are Southbridge, nine miles distant, Warren and Stafford Springs, each eleven, and Palmer thirteen.

SCHOOLS.

One of the first matters which received attention from the District of Holland, after its creation, was that of schools. At the second regular meeting, held Sept. 8, 1783, a committee of seven was appointed to divide the district into school districts. On the 22d of September four school districts were established, namely, the northeast, southeast, southwest, and northwest. On March 1, 1784, £20 were appropriated for schooling, and this sum continued to be raised for the same purpose at each annual meeting for a number of years. On April 7, 1786, a "prudential committee," consisting of one for each district, was appointed. On March 5, 1792, the appropriation for school purposes was increased to £26, and in the following year it was increased to £30. In the year 1794,

* So far as the town records show.

the sum was still further increased to £40. On March 2, 1795, £110 was voted to build and repair school-houses, and a committee was appointed to report upon the number of houses needed and the proper location for the same. In March, 1797, £56 was appropriated for school purposes, and in the following year $500 was raised to build a school-house in the southwest district. On Jan. 27, 1800, the number of school districts was reduced from four to three,—the northeast, southeast, and southwest,—each district to have an equal proportion of the money annually raised. Soon after, two new school-houses were ordered built and the others repaired. In March, 1804, $200 was appropriated for schools, and that sum has since remained, with slight variation, the amount of the annual appropriation.

At the present time there are four regular district schools in the town, having in attendance about 80 scholars. The schools are reported to be in a satisfactory condition.

CHURCHES.

The principal religious organization in the east section of South Brimfield, now Holland, has always been the Congregational. As early as February, 1764, the records of South Brimfield, deposited at Wales, show that a vote was passed, that a committee "attempt to hire Mr. Ezra Reave on probation, in order for settlement." Previous to Mr. Reeves the Rev. Mr. Conchelin had preached for the denomination for stated periods.

The first meeting-house in Holland was the old Central House, which stood on the west border of the town, near Rattlesnake Mountain, and has been referred to at length in the history of Wales. The next house stood nearer the centre of Holland, about thirty rods north of Mr. Lillie's. This was afterward removed to Connecticut. The house next used was erected about thirty rods east of the present one on the common. The next was erected where the present one now stands, but was destroyed by fire in 1858. The same year the present one was built, and has since been in use. The society was long sustained by the corporate body of the district, and £60 annual salary was voted Mr. Reeves for a long time. On June 8, 1792, it was "voted that Col. Lyon have liberty to remove the meeting-house to the plain, at a stake set up, and there finish it, on condition that he give to the district of Holland a sufficiency of land on the plain for all conveniences of roads, training-field, and other accommodations necessary for a meeting-house." On Jan. 14, 1794, it was voted that the "pulpit be coloured a good handsome pee-green, dun workmanlike in the course of next summer." Other votes of the district indicating the various changes made in the meeting-house, and its different removals, are to be found in the town records of Holland.

THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH* OF CHRIST IN HOLLAND was organized Sept. 12, 1765, at which time the confession of faith and covenant were read and signed by three members then present.

On the following day after the organization of the church the Rev. Ezra Reeves was installed over the church as its pastor. During his ministry of fifty-three years 158 names were entered upon the roll of its membership. We find no records of what churches composed the council, or of what ministers took part in the installation services. So meagre are the records of the church during Rev. Mr. Reeves' ministry, almost nothing is furnished of the internal history, of its struggles, or the refreshings of the Spirit. How many were dismissed to other churches, or how many died, or what was its membership at his death, cannot be ascertained from the records, only a cross, indicating all removals, whether by letter or death. The following tribute of respect to his memory has been placed in the records of the church:

"The Rev. Ezra Reeves was born on Long Island, Jan. 27, 1734, graduated at Yale College, New Haven, entered the marriage state on s'd Long Island, from whence he removed with his family to Holland, Mass., which was then connected with South Brimfield, & was installed over the chh* & people of Holland, Sept. 13, 1765. Died Apr. 28, 1818, in the 85th year of his age.

"He was a man of exemplary piety, of an humble spirit, contented in his Master's service, & coveting not the Wealth, the honor, or applause of the world. Though of dignity of character, he was not raised above any one in his deportment, but was easy of approach and free to communicate, of a very social disposition. Sometimes facetious, but never suffered himself to degrade his Ministerial character, or bring a stain on the Christian profession. He possessed a great degree of christian charity, & was eminently a peace-maker. As a preacher, he was orthodox, & labored hard to impress the truths on the minds of his hearers. He was a tender & affectionate parent, a well-wisher to precious & immortal souls. He sustained an undiminished character, so that his enemies were compelled to acknowledge he was a christian. Thus lived & died this worthy character.

"May we all endeavor to cherish his virtues & live the life of the righteous that our last end be like his."

Whole number of names upon the roll, from its organization to the present time, 380; present membership, 48; additions the past year, 18; average attendance of Sabbath-school, 60; public worship, 80.

Pastors since the death of Rev. Ezra Reeves: Enoch Burt, from May 9, 1821, to March 5, 1823. During his pastorate Rev. Mr. Burt preached one-half of the time in South Brimfield. Rev. James Sanford was pastor from 1827 to 1843. During his ministry the church became self-supporting, but some of the prominent members leaving town so weakened the pecuniary ability of the church that Mr. Sanford, greatly to the regret of the people, resigned. Rev. Benj. Ober was pastor from December, 1847, to March, 1851. Rev. A. C. Page was pastor from Dec. 3, 1851, to April 12, 1854. Rev. H. R. Grannis supplied the church two years. Rev. Francis Wood was pastor six years, from March, 1856, to April, 1862. From July following Ogden Hall supplied two years. Mr. Alden Southworth was ordained May 3, 1865, after having labored one year with the church. Sermon by Rev. Charles Chamberlin; prayer by Rev. S. J. Curtiss. Dec. 9, 1868, D. J. Bliss was ordained pastor of the church. Sermon by Rev. A. E. P. Perkins, of Ware; ordaining prayer by Rev. S. J. Curtiss, of Union, Conn. Dismissed May 3, 1874. Rev. J. C. Pike supplied for three years. Rev. Solomon Bixby present pastor.

Deacons of the church: three months after its organization, Moses Lyon and Humphrey Crowe were chosen deacons, Oct. 25, 1768; James Frizell, May 20, 1779; S. Ballard, Sept. 24, 1787; David Wallis, Sept. 4, 1794; Samuel Webber, April 16, 1819; James A. Lynn, March 16, 1841; Horace Wallis, May 4, 1866; William B. Webber and William H. Harris, who are in active service at the present time.

BAPTISTS.

This denomination does not now exist as an organized society, but at one time constituted an influential religious body in the town. On June 6, 1817, those persons living in Holland, and on the borders of Sturbridge, who were members of the churches in South Brimfield, Sturbridge, and Southbridge, sent to those churches, and the one at Thompson, a letter stating that twenty persons—ten brothers and ten sisters—desired to form a church, and asking them to send their pastors and two or more brethren to sit with them in council on June 25th, at the house of Benjamin Church, to consult upon said matter. The letter was signed by Samuel Webber and Walter Lyon, committee. The council convened at the time stated, and the church was duly organized. The original number who composed the church was 20, and 12 were added during the rest of the year. On July 12, 1817, Samuel Webber and Walter Lyon were chosen deacons. The first regular pastor of the church was Joseph Glazier, who was ordained by a council of churches, Aug. 25, 1823. Elder John M. Hunt was admitted a member of the council the same day, and had the pastoral care of the church for a time.

* By Rev. Solomon Bixby.

Sept. 5, 1832, Washington Munger was installed pastor. The church was supplied by John Payne, Linas Austin, and others at different times, but the records do not show that any others were regularly in charge of the church besides Mr. Glazier and Mr. Munger. Amos Babcock was the last to preside over the church.

The date of the last entry contained in the records is Aug. 21, 1845. Between that time and 1850 the society dissolved. It had included during its existence as a church 212 members, 80 probably being the highest number connected with it at any one time.

In 1819-20 the society erected a church building in the village, near the common, which was formally dedicated Aug. 25, 1820. It was in size 36 by 40 feet. Since the dissolution of the church the society have transferred the structure to the town, under certain restrictions, which now uses it as a town-hall, and occasionally for school purposes.

Subsequent to the dissolution of the Baptist Society, the Methodists held meetings for a time in Holland, but the movement never assumed any great strength or importance.

BURIAL-GROUNDS.

The only public cemetery in Holland is situated near the village on the road to Brimfield. Early in the year 1763 the district of South Brimfield voted an "acre of land for a burying-place, and the southeast corner and north of John Bishop's land." The outgrowth is the present cemetery, enlarged and improved from the original. The principal enlargements and improvements were in 1855 and 1860.

Many of the headstones in the cemetery are old and fast crumbling away. A number of the older graves appear never to have had any headstone. The stone bearing the oldest date is that of Peniel Perrin, a child of Benjamin Perrin, who died July 25, 1764. Most of the early settlers of the town are buried there; among others, Gersham Rosbrook, John Polley, Edward Fay, Abel Allen, Nehemiah May, Benjamin Perrin, and Trenance Webber.

In the southeast corner of the town, the Shoals family, who formerly lived in Union, Conn., established a private burying-ground of about an eighth of an acre, but it is now seldom used.

INDUSTRIAL PURSUITS.

Of the industrial pursuits of Holland, but little can or need be said. The principal occupation of the inhabitants has been the pursuit of agriculture, and so remains at the present day, the products of the town being similar to those of Wales. But little manufacturing has been done, and there is none of any importance at the present time.

EARLY MANUFACTURES.

About 1803, Josiah Hobbs had a tannery in the southwest part of the town, and continued the business until 1828, when he was succeeded by Jedediah Healey, who carried on the business for a number of years. In olden time cattle were driven to the tannery, killed, and the skin of the shoulders made into upper leather, and of the butts into sole leather. George Haradon subsequently occupied the tannery as a place of residence, and carried on shoemaking there. It was destroyed by fire about 1866.

Over eighty years ago, John Paddock, in connection with his father, engaged in the manufacture of iron, about half a mile below the dam of the present reservoir. Another one existed where the Fuller factory afterward stood. The business of nail-cutting was also pursued on the land occupied afterward by C. B. Drake. Powder was manufactured to some extent at the same place.

About 1830, Elbridge G. Fuller erected a factory east of Holland Pond, on the road from the village to East Brimfield. The article manufactured here was cotton cloth. The business was successful, and gave employment to upward of 50 persons for a number of years. It was destroyed by fire about 1855, and has not been rebuilt. This was the most important manufacturing enterprise that ever existed in the town, and Mr. Fuller was for years a man of prominence and distinction. His widow still resides there at an advanced age.

About the time of the erection of the Fuller mill, John C. Butterworth commenced the manufacture of cotton batting in a building erected by him for that purpose. Leander Bradd succeeded him for a few years. Elbridge G. Fuller made wicking there for a short time. The building was destroyed by fire about 1854, and never rebuilt.

MILITARY.

The records are very meagre concerning the military history of the town. In the time of militia-training days the town is said to have been active, and many interesting facts and incidents connected therewith are narrated by the oldest residents. In the early wars the town was comprised either in Brimfield or the district of South Brimfield, and much that relates to its history at that time will be found in the histories of those places.

The records show that the town was averse to the war of 1812, and earnestly deprecated an alliance with France.

In the war of the Rebellion the town contributed the several quotas of men that were called for by the national government, and was earnest and patriotic throughout that memorable contest.

The following is the list of soldiers who went from the town to the war of the Rebellion:

Clement F. Drake, Charles J. Clapp, Merritt A. Town, Julius Rice, Henry W. Webber, David Clapp, Jr., Henry N. Bennett, Henry M. Moore, Henry M. Walker, Charles F. Roper, Burnett E. Miller, John Harding, James L. Groves, Newton Wallis, George A. Haradon, Josiah B. Hall, Harris C. Wallis, George Barnes, Baxter C. Bennett, Albert Back, Albertus N. Walker, Jason Lewis, John Franklin, John Anderson.

Acknowledgments are due to Horace Wallis, Sr. and Jr., to Frank E. Kinney, Elisha Kinney, Wm. A. Webber, and other citizens for assistance rendered in compiling this town history.

TOLLAND.

GEOGRAPHICAL.

TOLLAND occupies the extreme southwestern corner of Hampden County, of which it is, too, one of the smallest towns. Its boundaries are the towns of Blandford and Otis on the north, the Connecticut State line on the south, Granville on the east, and Berkshire County on the west. Tolland has as yet no railway communication with other points, but expects to have in time, since the projected Lee and New Haven Railroad is graded as far as this point, and, although abandoned through a forfeiture of charter, is likely to be resuscitated and carried to completion. The town covers an area of about 18,000 acres, less than half of which are said to be improved.

NATURAL FEATURES.

The surface of the town is almost wholly mountainous, although here and there are fertile valleys. The soil is generally stony, with small tracts of clay and sandy loam. Farmington River, a mill-stream of considerable value, washes the western border, and there are besides several mountain-streams, which are utilized for milling and other purposes. Noyes' Pond, near the centre, is the source of Hubbard's River, and is famous as a fine fishing-ground, pickerel of large size and excellent quality being the chief catch. The elevation upon which stands the church at Tolland Centre is said to be the highest eminence in the region lying between the Connecticut and Housatonic Rivers. Woodland is plentiful, and, of the great variety of timber, hemlock, oak, ash, and chestnut are the most abundant. In common with the mountainous towns of Western Massachusetts, Tolland is rich in natural scenery of the picturesquely-rugged sort, and is much visited by tourists, especially in the autumn.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

The tract now known as Tolland was originally a portion of the town of Granville, and remained so up to the year 1810. Settlements were made in this portion of Granville as early as 1750, by Titus Fowler, Thomas Twining, David Slocomb, Ebenezer Harding, Marvin Moore, Jabez Rogers, Pierce Marshall, James Hamilton, Abraham Granger, John Manchester, James Barlow, Samuel Hubbard, Moses Gough, David Fowler, and Robert Thomas, and John Hamilton. A house built by Titus Fowler in 1772, supposed to be the oldest structure in the town, still stands at Tolland Centre in a state of excellent preservation, and is occupied as the residence of Mr. Nathan Slocomb. Mr. Slocomb is a grandson of David Slocomb, one of the early settlers, whose son, Eleazer, died in Tolland some years ago. Denison Slocomb, now living in Tolland, is a son of Hull Slocomb, whose father was also named David. Mrs. E. O. Harding, a sister of Denison Slocomb, is living in Tolland. These three are the only descendants of David Slocomb now residing in the town.

Ebenezer Harding has but one descendant living in Tolland, his grandson, E. O., whose father, Timothy, died here.

Of the descendants of Marvin Moore, there are now in Tolland Eleazer D. and Fowler T. Moore.

Jabez Rogers had ten sons and two daughters, to wit: Leonard, Jabez, Samuel, Nathaniel, Asa, Percy, Russell, Martin, Dwyer, John, Lucy, and Sarah. Lucy died a Mrs. Rockwell, and Sarah, marrying Isaac Harding, died in Granville. John W., a son of Russell, and grandson of Jabez, lives in Tolland, as does Russell S., a son of John.

Pierce Marshall had five sons,—Pierce, Jr., George, Samuel, Dudley, and Gayos (Gaius). Those of the Marshall descendants now residing in Tolland are Alonzo, a son of Dudley, James L., a son of Samuel, and Mrs. Alonzo Miller, a daughter of Samuel.

The sons of James Hamilton were John, Robert, Thomas, Henry, James, and Samuel. There are no Hamiltons in Tolland now save Mrs. Daniel Hamilton, a widow, whose husband was a son of Robert.

Titus Fowler, one of the pioneers, had six children, as follows: John, Titus, Jr., Chauncey, Eliza, Catherine, and Hannah. Eliza married Cornelius Slocomb, and, removing to Ohio, died there. Catherine married Judah Twining, and died in Tolland. Hannah married Marvin Moore, and died in Tolland. None of the descendants of John or Chauncey are living in Tolland. Amos H., a son of Titus, died in Tolland, and left a widow, who still lives here. With her reside her two children, Elbert E. and Ellen.

One of the ancestors of the Twinings, now living in Tolland, was Thomas, one of the earliest settlers. His children were William and Stephen, and three daughters. Of these latter, one married Joseph Wolcott, of Sandisfield, and died there; another married Chauncey Fowler, and died in Tolland; the third married a Mr. Graham, and, removing to the West, died there. Stephen removed to New Haven early in life. A daughter of William married Joseph Slocomb, and still lives in Tolland. Two of her brothers, Alfred and Stephen, reside in New York City.

Elijah Twining, a brother of Thomas, and likewise an early settler, had eight children, as follows: William, Eleazer, Ruth, Lewis, Judah, Timothy, Susan, and Lois. Ruth married Henry Smith, and died in Sandisfield; Susan also died there, as Mrs. Edward Wolcott; Lois died when quite young. Of Eleazer's living descendants, Mrs. Abigail Humphrey resides at New Boston, aged eighty-four; Judah R., at Hartland, Conn., and Pauly, at Barkhamstead, Conn. William, a son of William and grandson of Elijah, lives at Black River, N. Y., aged eighty-eight; Lewis, his brother, resides in the West. Mrs. Philander Twining, a widow of one of Judah's sons, lives in New Boston. There also lives her son, Nelson B. Another of her sons is Homer P., the town clerk of Tolland. A daughter of Timothy married a Mr. Goodale, went West, and died.

Abraham Granger had two sons and three daughters. One of the daughters married Allen Bidwell, and died in Tolland; another married Eleazer Spencer, and died in Ohio; the third married Nathaniel Gaylord, and died in Hartland, Conn. The sons were Launcelot and George W. Mrs. Fowler T. Moore, now living in Tolland, is a daughter of Launcelot. Her brother, Lafayette, lives in Winchester, Conn. Her living sisters are Mrs. H. C. Brown, of Barkhamstead, Conn.; Mrs. Alex. Sheldon, of Jamestown, N. Y.; and Mrs. Taylor, the wife of a minister residing in New York. George W., Jr., a son of George W., resides in Tolland; his sister, Mrs. D. H. Mills, lives in New York City.

John Manchester has no living descendants in Tolland. His sons were William, John; Shadrach, and Samuel. Sha-drach lives in Plainfield, Conn.; Samuel lives in Barkhamstead, Conn.; William and John died in the West some years ago. Of the daughters of John, the original, one married Mr. Murphy, and died in Tolland, and another, marrying Isaac Wilcox, removed to the far West.

ORGANIZATION.

Tolland is one of the newest towns in Massachusetts, and dates its existence back only to the year 1810. June 14th of that year it was incorporated as a town, after having been set off from the town of Granville, of which the tract had always been a part. To the date of its incorporation it was known as West Granville, or the third parish of that town. In addition to the tract taken from Granville, a section was also taken from the eastern part of Sandisfield, in Berkshire County. The petition for incorporation was presented to the General Court in 1810, by William Twining, a resident in West Granville village (afterward Tolland), and one of Granville's representatives at the court that year.

Much that is valuable and interesting in the history of Tolland has been lost to posterity through the destruction by fire at Northampton of the town records covering the period between the years of 1810 and 1849. The list of the persons who have served the town as selectmen and town-clerks, given below, dates, therefore, from 1849.

TOWN CLERKS.

VILLAGES.

The seat of town government is at TOLLAND CENTRE, which, although a small settlement of perhaps a score of dwellings, is a neatly-kept and pleasantly-located village. It occupies the highest elevation in the town, and commands a broad and charming view of a vast stretch of surrounding country. There is a post-office at the village, but no store, the town-hall, and a church,—the only one in the town.

CHURCHES.

The only church in the town is the Congregational Church at Tolland Centre. The organization of this church dates back to 1795, when what is now Tolland was yet known as West Granville. In that year, or the year following, a church structure was erected near where the present edifice stands, but there was no regularly settled pastor until in January, 1798, when Rev. Roger Harrison was ordained. Besides fulfilling the office of pastor, Mr. Harrison served the towns of Granville and Tolland in various offices of public trust. His pastorate continued from 1798 to 1822, when he was dismissed. He continued, however, to reside in Tolland until his death, in 1853, at the age of eighty-four. During Mr. Harrison's ministry Gordon Hall, who was born in 1784, in what is now Tolland, made a profession of religion as a member of Mr. Harrison's church, and shortly thereafter entered college, whence he went to India as an American missionary. He became distinguished in the missionary field, and at the time of his death, which occurred in Bombay in 1826, he was somewhat noted as an author.

After Mr. Harrison's retirement, the church depended for upward of twenty years—until 1843—upon supplies. In that year Rev. Alonzo Sanderson was ordained, and continued to be the pastor until 1852, after which there was no settled pastor until 1853, when Rev. Franklin D. Austin was called to the charge. The old church building stood until 1842, when it was replaced by the present edifice. Rev. David Ogden is the pastor now in charge (1879). The church membership, which numbers about 75, includes several persons resident in adjacent towns.

There is in the "south quarter" a Baptist society, which was organized in 1830, but it has never owned a church building, nor has it enjoyed regular worship. Services are occasionally held in the dwellings of the members, as convenience serves.

SCHOOLS.

The history of education in Tolland presents no features of peculiar interest, and since the early records of the town are not in existence, many incidents connected with the progress of the schools of Tolland must remain unwritten. The scholastic advantages possessed by the inhabitants have been naturally limited in their scope to the possession of common district schools, and this may indeed be told as well of the generality of towns in Western Massachusetts occupying the standard of population and wealth vouchsafed to Tolland. The town has, however, contributed many students to American colleges, and of these mention could be made of not a few who have graduated with conspicuous honors.

Eight school districts, in 1879, contributed to make schools easy of access to all, while for the support thereof the town was called upon to dispense but the nominal sum of $275 for the year.

BURIAL-PLACES.

There are three public graveyards in the town, but only one of them—located about a mile east of Tolland Centre—lays any claim to early origin. It is, moreover, grossly neglected, and within its limits there are scarcely a dozen erect headstones. The rest are either broken or fallen to the earth, while rank weeds overrunning the inclosure make it an unsightly spot. There are many old stones whose inscriptions have been utterly effaced by time. Of others, inscriptions have been transcribed as follows:

Jesse, son of Recompense Miller, died in 1777; Joseph Whitney, 1783, aged sixty-nine; Lucy, wife of Peter Miller, 1776; Abraham, Jr., son of Abraham Granger, 1789; Alexander, son of the same, 1798; Hannah, wife of Elezer Slocum, 1798; Rebecca, wife of Thomas Hamilton, 1801; Titus Fowler, 1827, aged eighty-eight; Sarah, wife of George Bidwell, 1804; Allen, son of Isaac Allen, 1804; Henry Hamilton, 1817, aged seventy-four.

INDUSTRIES.

The industries of Tolland are limited. The soil is generally poor, and, beyond the article of hay, does not yield sufficient to supply the wants of the farmers, who are annually forced to purchase grain in Westfield. Tobacco was, some years ago, raised to a considerable extent, but of that commodity very little is produced now. Generally the farmers devote their energies to the raising of stock and the manufacture of butter and cheese in a small way, the region affording good grazing facilities. There is a small tannery on the Farmington River, owned by Albert Hull, and a small bedstead-factory in the north, operated by Charles N. Marshall, both establishments being run by water-power. The distance from the nearest market is about fourteen miles. The town has a post-office, but not a single store within its limits.

The total assessed valuation of the town in 1875 was $267,-330, on which the tax was $4410, or at the rate of 16½ mills on the dollar. This onerous tax is due largely to the fact that some years ago the town issued $25,000 in bonds in aid of the projected Lee and New Haven Railroad, which, after being graded as far as Tolland, was abandoned for lack of funds, and still remains in that unfinished condition, the company having forfeited its charter. Some day it is likely to be pushed to completion, and on that hope the Tolland people base their expectations of future increased prosperity. The dwelling-houses in the town number about 110, and the farms 105.

TOLLAND'S WAR RECORD.

Tolland was not in sympathy with the declaration of war against Great Britain in 1812, and sent Eleazer Slocomb as a delegate to the anti-war convention at Northampton.

For the war of the Rebellion the town furnished soldiers as follows:

Thomas Butler, 2d Cav.

GEOGRAPHICAL.

THIS last addition to the towns of Hampden County is located southeast of the centre, and is bounded on the north by Wilbraham, on the east by Monson, on the west by Longmeadow and Springfield, all in the same county, and on the south by the towns of Somers and Stafford, in Connecticut. It contains about 11,281 acres of land.

NATURAL FEATURES.

The physical aspects of the town are more rugged than those of Wilbraham. The centre of the town, from north to south, comprising an area of about two miles in width, is thickly studded with lofty hills, which are frequently called mountains. Mount Vision, formerly known as Rattlesnake Peak, marks the northern limit of this range in the town, and affords, from its summit, an extensive view of the surrounding country. Pine Mountain and Bald Mountain are names given to two neighboring elevations in the southeast part of the town.

Scantie Brook, a stream of considerable size and an affluent of the Connecticut River, which it enters at East Windsor, in the State of Connecticut, rises in the southeastern corner of the town, passes in a northwesterly direction to its centre, and then takes a southwesterly course down into Connecticut. The water-power furnished by this stream is excellent, and the earliest manufacturing enterprises of the old town of Wilbraham were undertaken on the Scantie. Three important affluents, called variously First, Second, and Third Brooks, or East, West, and Middle (or Big) Brooks, flow into the Scantie from the north, near the centre of the town, and smaller streams enter it in other parts of the town.

The soil of the town is good, and renders rich returns to its industrious inhabitants. The largest number of farms lie in the eastern and southeastern sections of the town, where the surface is more level and uniform, but west and southwest of the main road from Wilbraham the land is good, and many productive farms are successfully tilled. The mineral and geological features of the town are not of special importance, but correspond with the general description elsewhere detailed.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

The settlement of Hampden did not commence so early as that of Wilbraham. Prior to 1741 there was not a settler within the present limits of the town. South of a line drawn due east and west across the old town, on the south side of the Cross farm, there was not a house or cultivated field.

In the spring of 1741, Stephen Stebbins came from Longmeadow and settled on the north bank of the Scantie, where Orville Pease afterward resided. The house which he built was removed over sixty years ago, and was used for a barn on the John McCray place. Aaron Stebbins, a brother, settled soon after a few rods north, where Rev. Mr. Rockwood since resided. Lewis Langdon settled on the corner, between them, and built the first saw-mill in town, in 1750. Abner Chapin, from Chicopee, occupied the first lot south of the Scantie, where his descendants have since resided. Lieut. Paul Langdon, who brought the first four-wheeled wagon into the place, in which he moved his worldly goods and family,—first from Salem, then from Hopkinton, and lastly from Union,—settled near the Potash Hill.

On the east side of the mountain was William King, a large land-owner, whose house was directly in front of the present Congregational Church. William Stacy, from Salem, settled where Gilbert Stacy afterward resided; Moses Stebbins, where Mrs. Beriah Smith afterward lived; Comfort Chaffee, who came from Wales, settled between them, where William P. Chaffee, his great-grandson, afterward resided. In the east, on the Scantie, were Henry Badger, from Union; Isaac Morris, from Woodstock; Benjamin Skinner and Jabez Hendrick settled on the Hiram Hendrick place; Daniel Carpenter, on the Carpenter farm; Ezekiel Russell, on Albert Beebe's farm; and Rowland Crocker, a little above. The Sessions family, since so prominent and influential in the town, came from Pomfret, Conn., and located in 1781.

SUMNER SESSIONS.

This gentleman was born Dec. 29, 1797, in the south parish of Wilbraham, Mass., now the town of Hampden.

His father, Robert Sessions, was born in Pomfret, Conn., March 15, 1752, was married to Anna Ruggles (also of Pomfret) in 1778, and removed to Wilbraham about the year 1781. He was one of the original "Boston Tea-Party," of patriotic memory, and assisted in throwing the tea overboard. He was then a young man, employed in a store in Boston. He served in the Continental army, rising to the rank of lieutenant, and was once a bearer of verbal information to Gen. Washington.

Amasa Sessions, grandfather of Sumner, was a son of Nathaniel Sessions, who was born in Andover, Mass., and settled in Pomfret in 1704. He was the son of Alexander Sessions, the first of the name to come from England.

Darius, son of Nathaniel, and uncle to Robert Sessions, was deputy governor of Rhode Island at the beginning of the Revolution. The historian Bancroft says of him: "That, in the burning of the Gaspee" (an affair like the "Boston Tea-Party"), "Darius Sessions and Stephen Hopkins were the two pillars on which the liberty of Rhode Island depended."

Sumner Sessions was the sixth son, and eleventh child, of a family of thirteen children. One died in infancy, two died at the age of thirty years, and the others lived to advanced age. Francis left one son,—F. C. Sessions, now living at Columbus, Ohio. Horace graduated at Hamilton College and Andover Theological Seminary, and was afterward ordained as an evangelist, and went to Liberia, Africa, as an agent of the Colonization Society, to aid in the establishment of a colony of colored emigrants from the New England States. He took the first printing-press to that country, and died at sea, on his return trip home, March 4, 1826, of fever contracted in Africa.

Robert, Jr., lived and died in Wilbraham; was an active member of the Methodist Church, and was drafted into the State militia in the war of 1812. His son, H. M. Sessions, now resides on his father's farm. Another brother went to Michigan, and a sister to Ohio, when those States were considered the Far West. One other brother and three sisters passed their lives in Wilbraham. But one brother and sister are now living,—William V. Sessions, whose biography appears elsewhere in this work, and Mrs. Cyrus Newell, of Longmeadow, Mass., now in her ninetieth year.

Mr. Sessions has passed the greater part of his life in the pursuit of agriculture, having lived for forty-six years upon the farm which he now occupies. Having a mill privilege, he erected, and owned for a number of years, the oldest woolen-factory in Wilbraham.

He joined the Congregational Church in 1821, and two years later was chosen deacon, an office which he still holds. He has ever manifested the utmost fidelity to the interests of religion, and has been a staunch supporter of the benevolent and missionary enterprises of his day. He early identified himself with the cause of the oppressed, assisting in the organization of the Anti-Slavery Society of Wilbraham nearly fifty years ago. He also assisted in the organization of the Temperance Society about the same time, and has systematically abstained from the use of all intoxicating beverages. He has never held any important public office, but always manifested an interest in public affairs and in the welfare of the country.

In the year 1826, Mr. Sessions was united in marriage with Mary Wood, of Wilbraham, who died April 1, 1845. The fruits of the union were four children,—three daughters and a son. Of the daughters, the second, Harriet E., graduated at Mount Holyoke Seminary, in the year 1856, and is now a teacher in the same institution; the other two, Mary E. and Frances E., reside with their father. The only son, Edward Payson, the youngest of the family, died at the age of seven years.

Mr. Sessions married for his second wife, in the year 1846, Martha M. Saxton, of Wilbraham, who died Sept. 1, 1850.

RESIDENCE OF SUMNER SESSIONS, HAMPDEN, MASS.

Wm. V. Sessions

The Sessions family traces its origin back to the shores of England, and was first planted in this country by Alexander Sessions, the great-great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch. Fuller details regarding the genealogy and descent of the family will be found in the biography of Sumner Sessions, in this work.

Robert Sessions, the father of Wm. V. Sessions, after an honorable service in fighting for the liberties of his country in the Continental army, removed in 1781 to the south parish of Wilbraham, now the town of Hampden. He located upon the farm now occupied by Wm. V. Sessions, and a long life of active, systematic labor spent upon it made it one of the best in the town. He occupied a prominent place in society, filling many offices of trust and responsibility. He was a justice of the peace for many years, town clerk and treasurer for twelve years, selectman and assessor for a long term of years, and was almost uniformly chosen as moderator of town meetings. He represented the town of Wilbraham in the State Legislature for five years, and died in 1836, at the age of eighty-four. Two of his older sons served in the army in the war of 1812.

William V. Sessions, the subject of this sketch, was born in Wilbraham (now Hampden), Mass., upon the farm where he now lives, on Sept. 14, 1801. He was the youngest of a family of thirteen children, all but one of whom attained mature years. His early life was passed upon his father's farm, and in attendance upon the common schools of his day. Upon the death of his father he became the owner of the farm upon which he was born, and has resided there uninterruptedly since, making the pursuit of agriculture a life-long study, and by careful and judicious management reaping rich returns from Mother Earth for his fidelity to her requirements. The golden rule that leads to success in farming enterprises he conceives to be the judicious reinvestment of the profits of farming upon the farm itself, a rule that has been followed by the most successful agriculturists of the day. While farming has been the principal occupation of Mr. Sessions, he has yet found time to devote his attention to other pursuits which he deemed to the material welfare of his native town. For several years he, in company with Samuel Beebe and others, engaged in the manufacture of woolen goods, in the first woolen-mill erected in the town (that by Sumner Sessions, his brother); but the enterprise did not meet with financial success. Mr. Sessions not only succeeded to his father's place as a successful farmer, but also in the relation that he sustained to society in general, and the place that he occupied in the community in which he lived. Throughout a long, active, and laborious life he has filled many stations of honor and responsibility with singular fidelity, integrity, and skill. He has been selectman, assessor, and justice of the peace for many years, has represented his town in the General Court, and for three years filled the office of county commissioner. In the affairs of social life his services have also met with great demand and high appreciation. He has frequently acted as executor of the wills, and administrator upon the estates, of his deceased townsmen, and has been the custodian of the funds of many of their widows and orphan children. Though thus burdened with private responsibilities of great moment, no one has ever suffered the loss of a single dollar through his incompetency or corruptness. He has been ever identified with the religious and benevolent enterprises of his day, a consistent member of the Congregational Church since his twenty-first year, and now holds the office of deacon of that church.

On Nov. 26, 1829, Mr. Sessions married Lydia Ames, of East Windsor, Conn., by whom four children have been borne to him, three daughters and one son. Two of the daughters died in childhood. Lydia A., the other daughter, was educated at Mount Holyoke Female Seminary, and, after teaching there several years, became the first principal of the Painesville (Ohio) Female Seminary. She retained this position for seven years, establishing the institution upon a firm basis, and receiving the grateful thanks of its founders and patrons. This daughter was united in marriage, in 1871, with Rev. W. W. Woodworth, pastor of the Congregational Church at Berlin, Conn.

William Robert Sessions, the son, since attaining his majority, has been engaged in agricultural enterprises with his father, and under his management the farm has been much improved, stock-raising encouraged, and a fine barn, forty-four by one hundred feet, and three stories high, erected. The firm of Wm. V. & Wm. R. Sessions has paid special attention to the careful breeding of thoroughbred short-horned cattle for purposes of butter-making. Their cattle have attained great celebrity, and are widely known in the Northern and Western States, and greatly sought after in those sections, large numbers having been disposed of there. Since the increase of years has granted his father some respite from his cares, the son has assumed them, and with great success. He was a selectman of the town of Wilbraham most of the time for the past twelve years, and is now chairman of the board of selectmen of the new town of Hampden. He has also represented the town in the Legislature. He served in the Union army in the suppression of the late Rebellion, and experienced the horrors of prison-life in Libby Prison. Following the example of his grandfather, he has acted as moderator of town-meetings every year since the late war save one, when he was absent in the Legislature. Thus is the third generation of this active and useful family still aiming to promote the welfare of its native town, and adding wisdom to its councils.

The first road laid out in this town was from "Third Brook," so called, near Miss Experience Stebbins', running easterly and southerly through the southeast part of the town to Wales. A part of the way it was in the "Old Path."* Paul Langdon was surveyor. The early roads varied in width from 1 to 3 rods. A fuller reference to them will be found in the history of Wilbraham.

Among the early taverns that have been kept in the town may be mentioned one by William Wood, where Mr. Root now lives, about 1810. A man named Tillotson built a house opposite Mr. Root's, and kept hotel for a few years, the first part of the present century. It was afterward kept by Levi Flint, Dudley B. Post, and others. Rudolphus Chaffee kept tavern in both houses a number of years. John McCray also kept tavern for ten or twelve years on the corner where the Allen house, the only hotel in the town, now stands.

William Clark kept a store at the centre the early part of this century. Edward Morris came next, then Levi Flint for a number of years. Dudley B. Post was in trade about 1822. A man named Parsons succeeded Flint for a short time. Gordon B. Sexton followed next. Bugbee & Co. traded at the centre, in the long building, now the Congregational parsonage, about 1835.

Dr. John Goodale is supposed to have been the first physician who established himself in the town. He lived just south of the centre, and practiced the early part of the present century. His descendants still reside in the town. Dr. Holt lived at the centre, and followed soon after Dr. Goodale. He died of typhoid fever quite suddenly, about 1810. Dr. Daniel Ufford succeeded him, and practiced for a number of years. He subsequently removed from the town. Dr. Edwin McCray studied with Dr. Ufford, and practiced for a short time. He removed to Longmeadow, and thence to Agawam, where he enjoyed a good practice until his death. Dr. Marcus Cady engaged in practice about 1825, and lived at the centre until his death. Dr. Abial Bottom commenced about 1840, and is still in practice, as is also his son, Dr. D. W. Bottom. Dr. George T. Ballard commenced about 1861, and is still in practice.

The only lawyer who ever practiced in the town was Otis Norcross, about 1825. He remained but two or three years, and lived at the centre.

ORGANIZATION.

The inhabitants of the town of Hampden were set off as the South Parish of Wilbraham by act of the General Court, June 11, 1782, and from that time the religious history of the two sections has been distinct and separate. The preamble to the act of incorporation indicates the object of the division to have been the "greater convenience of attending the public worship of God."

The division into parishes, however, does not seem to have allayed the animosities which had been engendered by the continued rivalry and antagonism which had existed since the first settlement of the town, between its northern and southern sections. Difference of opinion upon matters relating to the government of the town continued, and on Jan. 19, 1824, a vote was taken upon an article "to see if the town will petition the General Court, at their next session, to divide the town of Wilbraham into two towns," but the proposition was rejected by 114 nays to 67 yeas. The subject was again agitated at different times, and not unfrequently with some degree of asperity.

Finally, on March 28, 1878, an act passed the Legislature which established the town of Hampden, the territory assigned to it being nearly identical with the boundaries of the South Parish, as follows:

"Beginning at a stone monument on the east line of the town of Longmeadow, and eighteen hundred and thirty-two feet southerly by said line from the stone monument marking the northeast corner of said town of Longmeadow; thence south eighty-eight degrees and twenty-five minutes east, fourteen thousand one hundred and fifty-eight feet to a stone monument; thence north twenty-seven degrees and fifteen minutes east, three thousand three hundred and thirty-two feet to a stone monument; thence south eighty-eight degrees and twenty-five minutes east, nine thousand eight hundred and fifteen feet to a stone monument on the west line of the town of Monson."

The first town-meeting of the new town was held in the vestry of the Congregational Church, on April 8, 1878, and was duly "notified and warned" by S. C. Spellman, justice of the peace. William R. Sessions was chosen moderator. The following persons were chosen to fill the principal offices of the town: Sumner Smith, Clerk and Treasurer; Wm. R. Sessions, Freeman W. Dickinson, and Patrick E. Wall, Selectmen; S. M. Staunton, Andrew Beebe, John W. Isham, Assessors; A. B. Newell, J. N. Isham, and M. H. Warren, School Committee.

On April 18, 1878, another meeting of the town was held, when the following appropriations for the year were made: $1000 for schools, $100 for permanent repairs of school-houses, $1000 for paupers, $600 for highways and town officers, and $450 for contingent expenses.

The town is now fully organized, and in a prosperous condition.

VILLAGES.

The only village is situated at its geographical centre, on the north shore of the Scantie Brook. It is ranged along the principal road, running east and west through the town. The houses are neat and tasteful in appearance, and a brisk business air pervades the place, which may properly be termed a manufacturing village. Three woolen-mills are within the proper limits of the village, while other industrial enterprises are carried on near by. Besides these, the village contains Methodist, Congregational, and Baptist Churches, and an academy, each in good condition, which add much to the architectural beauty of the place. The nearest railroad stations are at Stafford Springs, Conn., and North Wilbraham.

The principal stores in the village are kept by Sumner Smith and Albert F. Ballard. Elbridge Vinnicke is also in trade.

The post-office was established about 1826, the first postmaster being Dudley B. Post. The office has since been filled by Samuel Beebe, S. C. Spellman, William Spellman, Horton Hendrick, and Sullivan M. Staunton, the present incumbent.

The scenery around the village is wild and picturesque, the hills on the west and south rising to an elevation of several hundred feet. In the valley, nestled close along the bank of the Scantie, may be seen the little village, noisy with the hum of industry, while beyond and around it lie the broad and well-cultivated acres of the husbandman.

SCHOOLS.

Much that relates to the early schools of the town has been incorporated in the history of Wilbraham. Some of the early teachers of the town were Moses and Stephen Stebbins, Samuel Beebe, Samuel Henry, Marcus Cady, Betsey Sessions, Sally Sileox, and Lydia Ames.

Hampden Academy, an institution that has acquired a favorable reputation among the schools of the day, was built by private subscription about the year 1844, and was established to supply a demand for higher educational facilities. The first teacher was Elijah Brooks, and the second E. J. Howe. Others have been Charles Marsh and a Mr. Bliss, the latter since a minister. Alonzo B. Newell, an efficient and popular instructor, has had charge of the school for a number of years past, which holds regular sessions at present only in the winter season.

There are four school districts in the town, with an average total attendance of about 125 scholars.

CHURCHES.

CONGREGATIONAL.

The South Parish was incorporated June 11, 1782. Previous to this, however, there had been preaching at private residences and in the open air. The first meeting-house was raised in June, 1783, and was placed in the street nearly opposite to where Mrs. Aaron Warren since resided. For ten years it was a mere shell, rough-boarded on the outside, with board windows, and the timbers of the walls and roof were all exposed. In 1793, £246 15s. were appropriated to finish the house and "see it glassed." A church was organized in 1785, and Rev. Moses Warren was ordained pastor, Sept. 3, 1788, when the church contained 65 members. His settlement was £150, and his salary £58 14s. ($188.33), one-half to be paid in commodities, including 24 cords of wood yearly. Unsuccessful attempts were made to remove the meeting-house out of the road in 1817, 1822, and 1824. In 1838 it was removed by private subscription, and a bell was put in, the first in the town. Mr. Warren continued his ministry until his death, Feb. 19, 1829, in the seventy-second year of his age. He had baptized 478 adults and children. The subsequent pastors of the church have been Rev. Mr. Clarke, Rev. Ebenezer R. Wright, Rev. James A. Hazen, ordained Jan. 30, 1839, dismissed June 22, 1847; Rev. Hubbard Beebe, installed April 19, 1848, discharged April 1, 1852; Rev. E. Skinner, ordained May 19, 1853, dismissed April 11, 1855; Rev. James C. Houghton, installed April 11, 1855, dismissed Oct. 1, 1856; Rev. John Whitehill, ordained Dec. 11, 1861, dismissed May 27, 1868; Rev. Edward B. Chamberlain, ordained March 3, 1869, dismissed March 10, 1873. The present pastor, Rev. Edward Payson Root, became the acting pastor Oct. 14, 1875, and the ordained pastor June 1, 1876.

The church at the present time is in a prosperous and harmonious condition. The number of members is 119; Sabbath-schoolers, 60; number of families attending and contributing to the support of the society, 50. The Sabbath-school library is small, but is about being re-established.

BAPTISTS.

The early history of the Baptist movement, which finally resulted in the establishment of the present church in Hampden, has been treated of in the history of the town of Monson. At the time of the dissolution of the Monson Society, in 1855, the strength of the movement concentrated in South Wilbraham, or Hampden, and the pastor of the society, the Rev. J. C. Foster, established himself there, and a church edifice was then erected. The history of the church since that time has been more favorable, and the following have served as pastors: Rev. Henry S. Stevens, Rev. Moses Curtis, Rev. Bailey S. Morse, and Rev. E. S. Hill. Rev. Charles A. Cook was then hired for a year. An arrangement was then effected with the Baptist Church at Longmeadow, whereby one pastor should supply both societies, and still continue. Rev. O. R. Hunt is the pastor. The present membership is about 80; of Sabbath-school, about 40; with a Sabbath-school library of 300 or 400 volumes. The church building is in the centre of the village, and cost about $4500.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

The Methodist Episcopal Church at Hampden (then Wilbraham) was organized about 1830, by a number of persons who left various other churches, though mostly Congregationalists. A leading person was Mr. Sessions, a strong Arminian, who exercised a controlling influence until the time of his death, in 1861. His large family of children are all strong Methodists, and his son, Horace Sessions, has long filled the position occupied by his father.

This church has been kept up since its organization, and is prosperous at the present time.

The records have either been lost or are inaccessible.

The present pastor is Rev. W. Herbert Atchinson, and the society occupy a neat and attractive house of worship.

BURIAL-GROUNDS.

The town contains two places of burial. Of these the older is located about a quarter of a mile from the centre, and comprises two or three acres. It was laid out early in 1755, and the first person buried therein was Lydia, a child of John Bliss, on March 29, 1755. The oldest monuments now in the yard are those of Sarah, wife of John Langdon, who died July 22, 1755, aged twenty-one years; Lieut. Paul Langdon, who died Dec. 3, 1761, in his sixty-ninth year; and Stephen Stebbins, who died Feb. 26, 1768, in his fifty-seventh year; Ezekiel Russell, Isaac Morris, David Burt, Comfort Chaffee, Capt. Steward Beebe, Moses Warren, and John Bliss are also buried there, besides others of the earliest settlers of the town. The yard is still in use, although the portion first set apart as a burying-ground is full.

The new cemetery is eligibly located about a quarter of a mile from the village, on the road to Stafford. It was laid out in 1876, and contains about four acres. It is a pleasant spot.

INDUSTRIAL PURSUITS.

The earliest industrial enterprises of the town of Wilbraham were undertaken in the south part, now Hampden. Lewis Langdon erected the first saw-mill about eighty rods below the Hampden Woolen-Mills, on the Scantic, in 1750. Abner Badger had a saw-mill on Third Brook, near Capt. Chaffee's before 1772. About the time of the Revolutionary war Lewis Langdon erected a grist-mill, afterward owned by Benamuel Leach, about one hundred yards below his saw-mill. David Burt erected one shortly after in the southeast part of the town. Another was also erected about the same time by Mr. Wright, not far from the residence of Benjamin H. Russell (deceased), on Middle or Second Brook. In the early part of this century, Mr. Bacon, of Brimfield, built a grist-mill where the Hampden Woolen-Mill stands, but sold it soon after to Christopher Langdon. It afterward passed through the hands of Jacob Wood and Hubbard Arnold into the possession of William Moseley, who thoroughly remodeled the mill, rebuilt the dam, erected a saw-mill, and added a shingle-mill. It was afterward destroyed by fire, and a wrapping-paper manufactory built on its site.

At the "turn of the river," so called, was the saw-mill of Capt. Charles Sessions, and after it fell to pieces another was erected on the north side of the river, where the Lacousie Woolen-Mill now stands, and to make place for which the saw-mill again crossed the stream to the south side. Meantime, a saw-mill had been erected by Caleb Stebbins at his grist-mill, and David Burt also erected one on his dam. About 1850, Milton Stebbins erected a grist-mill and saw-mill just south of the bridge on the west side of the mountain.

Fulling-mills and carding-machines were early erected by Walter Burt, near Burt's Mill, and by Jonathan Flint just below the village bridge; and Laban Button, near Burt's, had a fulling-mill. Beriah Smith & Brothers, who bought out Flint, did a large business in dyeing and dressing cloth. Just below Smith's was Roper's clover-mill, which was famous in its day. He added the manufacture of chain to the cleansing of clover-seed.

The amount of wood consumed by the early inhabitants gave an overplus of ashes for home consumption, and William King manufactured potash near the old meeting-house, and Paul Langdon by Potash Hill.

Mr. West followed the business of tanning at the foot of the hill by the brook near the bridge. Daniel and Joseph Chaffee also engaged in that branch of industry.

The first woolen-mill in the town was built by Sumner Sessions on the Scantic in 1845. It was rented and operations commenced by Levi Bradford and Eleazer Scriper in April, 1846. Business was commenced with one set of machinery for the manufacture of satinet. In April, 1847, Mr. Bradford retired from the firm, and Luther E. Sage, William V. Sessions, and Samuel Beebe became partners, and the firm-name was changed to Scriptor, Sage & Co. Another set of machinery was added by the new company, and the manufacture of satinets, tweeds, cassimeres, and doeskins was carried on until January, 1856. An act of incorporation was then obtained from the Legislature, and a new company was formed Jan. 30, 1856, with a capital of $20,000, under the name of "The South Wilbraham Manufacturing Company." In 1862 a large addition was made to the mill and other machinery added, and a large business was done by the company for a number of years. A new company was afterward formed and the name changed to the Lacousic Woolen-Mill, which is still in operation. The mill contains 5 sets of machinery, 16 looms, furnishes employment to from 75 to 80 persons, and produces about 16,000 yards of fancy cassimeres each month.

The Hampden Woolen-Mill was built by Eleazer Scriptor, about 1858 or 1859, and was known as the "Ravine Woolen-Mill." Luther Sage ran the mill during the war. It was then small, and he erected a larger mill farther down the stream. A Mr. Hollister operated the mill for a time. It was destroyed by fire Feb. 8, 1878, but, having been rebuilt, is now owned by H. A. Kimball, and is under the management of L. Reynolds, agent. It is in size 50 by 96 feet, and is a four-set mill, furnishing employment to about 75 persons, and producing about 1000 yards of fancy cassimeres daily.

The Seantic Woolen-Mill was erected about 1865, by the Seantic Woolen-Mill Company, who engaged in the manufacture of fancy cassimeres until 1875. It then passed into the hands of Judson A. Leonard, who owned and operated it for several years. In February, 1877, Kenworthy Brothers bought the mill and engaged in the manufacture of yarn of different grades and qualities, a business which they are still pursuing. It is a two-set mill, making about 200 pounds a day, and employing about 12 men. The cloth machinery is not much used.

Mortimer Pease has a small mill just above the Seantic Woolen-Mill, which is used in preparing the waste of the different woolen-mills for re-carding.

The manufacture of paper was once carried on to a considerable extent in the southeastern part of the town, but the enterprise is now numbered among its past industries.

MILITARY.

The military history of the town of Hampden is necessarily identical with that of Wilbraham. The south part of the town has never been backward in the manifestation of practical patriotism, and from its mountains have gone forth many who have contributed strong hands and willing hearts to the cause of liberty and union.*

In compiling the history of the town we have been assisted by Sumner Smith, William V. Sessions, the pastors of the churches, and other citizens; and much assistance, of which we thankfully availed ourselves, was derived from the historical address of Rev. Dr. Rufus P. Stebbins, delivered in 1863, upon the occasion of the celebration of the centenary of the incorporation of Wilbraham.
